yasmāl lokatrayaṃ tv etad rāvitaṃ bhayam āgatam
tasmāt tvaṃ rāvaṇo nāma nāmnā tena bhaviṣyasi

(Śiva to Rāvaṇa) And since this triple world, reverberating with your cries, was terrified, you shall be known by the name "Rāvaṇa."
—Rām 7.16.27

māmikeyaṃ tanur nūnaṃ sṛṣṭā duḥkhāya lakṣmaṇa dhātrā yasyās tathā me 'dya duḥkhamūrtiḥ pradṛśyate

(Sītā to Lakṣmaṇa) Surely, Lakṣmaṇa, this body of mine, which is now seen to be a veritable incarnation of suffering, must have been created by the creator for suffering alone.
—Rām 7.47.3

pitāmahavacaḥ śrutvā viniścitya mahāmatiḥ viveśa vaiṣṇavaṃ tejaḥ saśarīraḥ sahānujaḥ

When the immensely wise Rāma had heard those words of Grandfather Brahmā and had confirmed his resolution, he bodily entered, together with his younger brothers, the blazing energy proper to Viṣṇu.
—Rām 7.100.10a

cariṣyati kathā yāval lokān eṣā hi māmikā tāvac charīre vatsyanti prāṇās tava na saṃśayaḥ

(Rāma to Hanumān) As long as this tale of mine shall circulate throughout the worlds, so long will the breaths of life remain in your body. Of this there is no doubt.

THE VĀLMĪKI RĀMĀYAṆA TRANSLATION PROJECT: A HISTORY

The idea of producing a scholarly and densely annotated but readable English translation of the critical edition of the Vālmīki Rāmāyaṇa goes back to the summer of 1969, at which time two of the edition's seven books, the Yuddhakāṇḍa (1971) and Uttarakāṇḍa (1975), had not yet even appeared in print.

That summer my close friend Jeff Masson and I, who were at that time working on our doctoral dissertations and reading daily with the scholars associated with the Sanskrit Dictionary Department of the Deccan College in Pune (or Poona, as the city was then named), fled the heat of the Deccan plateau for the cooler climes of the Sahyadri Hills in the old hill station of Mahabaleshwar. There, in the intervals of our writing sessions, we would sit in our garden overlooking the monkey-haunted forests of the Western Ghats. In order to keep up our Sanskrit fluency and just for the sheer delight of it, we would read aloud and discuss Vālmīki's immortal poem, along with the commentaries of Nāgeśabhaṭṭa, Govindarāja, and Śivasahāya as found in the Gujarati Printing Press edition. We quickly became immersed in the poem's beauty as well as the depth of its moral, religious, social, and political messages.

The significance of the poem to our understanding of the culture and civilization of India, the unparalleled influence of the work, and its virtually innumerable later versions produced in and for all the languages, regions, religions, and cultures of the subcontinent and, indeed, of all the nations of southern Asia from what is today Afghanistan in the west to Bali in the east is undeniable. Thus the importance of having, at last, a scientifically reconstructed archetype of the text as was then being produced by the learned scholars of the Rāmāyaṇa Department of the Oriental Institute of the M. S. Sayajirao University of Baroda under the directorship of the late Dr. U. P. Shah was obvious.

Equally apparent was the need for a comparably scholarly translation and annotation of the critical edition so that the fruit of the labors of the Baroda scholars could be made available to scholars in virtually all areas of the humanities and social sciences concerning South and Southeast Asia, students of world literature and religion, and a general reading public who would perhaps be put off by the generally archaic and awkward English of existing translations of the so-called vulgate editions of the poem. For there have been numerous translations of the Vālmīki Rāmāyaṇa, in whole or in part, into European languages other than English since A. W. von Schlegel's partial rendering into Latin from 1829 to 1838. Most translations into European languages, starting with the partial translation of Carey and Marshman, done originally between 1806 and 1810, have, of course, been into English. No translation had been attempted of any of the books of the critical edition, and no translation into any language had been accompanied by the kind of detailed annotation that a work of this significance, antiquity, and textual complexity demands. Moreover, no translation that had been undertaken at that time or since has attempted to place before the scholarly or lay communities the benefit of the readings, comments, and interpretations of the numerous important Sanskrit-language commentaries that the text has inspired and that have survived from as early as the twelfth century C.E.

Masson and I discussed the matter and concluded that a project of this magnitude could not be done effectively, if at all, by a single scholar and that we should, instead, try to assemble a small group of like-minded younger Sanskritists, a consortium in effect, whose members would each be responsible for one or perhaps two of the epic's seven kāṇḍas. During several visits to the Oriental Institute in Baroda, we discussed the idea with Dr. Shah and others connected with the Rāmāyaṇa Department. We were encouraged to move ahead with the plan and offered the support and assistance of the Institute.[1]

On our return to the United States in 1970, we contacted some interested colleagues and, with the support of the National Endowment for the Humanities Translations Program, began a series of annual conferences and consortial meetings at Berkeley during which we worked out the general plan of the project, guidelines, and protocols for the translation and annotations and the assignment of the kāṇḍas to the individual scholars who would be responsible for them.

Despite some early criticism on the part of a few senior scholars, when the project was first announced at meetings of the American Oriental Society, it was generally received with enthusiasm by Sanskritists who felt that a translation such as we were undertaking was a desideratum for the field. The goal was not, as some feared, a "translation by committee"[2] but rather individual scholarly translations of the kāṇḍas of the epic in which accuracy and annotation were in the hands of the individual translators subject to critique by and discussion with the consortium while matters of style and consistency would be the responsibility of the project's general editor. These early arrangements are discussed in some detail in the preface to our translation of the Bālakāṇḍa.[3]

[1] Aside from the unfailing scholarly advice and encouragement we received from Dr. Shah and his colleagues and successors, both scholars and administrators, at the Oriental Institute, Baroda, we remain grateful for their having kindly provided us with copies of the transcriptions of the unpublished commentaries of Uḍāli Varadarāja and Mādhava Yogīndra, and for having accorded me the honor of being invited to deliver the first U. P. Shah Memorial Lecture at the Institute.

The original members of the translation consortium, along with their original assignments, were, in addition to Masson (Araṇya- and Kiṣkindhākāṇḍas), then professor of Sanskrit at the University of Toronto, and myself (Bāla- and Ayodhyākāṇḍas), were Bimal Krishna Matilal of Oxford University (Uttarakāṇḍa), Barbara Stoler Miller of Barnard College (Sundarakāṇḍa), and Barend A. van Nooten of the University of California at Berkeley (Yuddhakāṇḍa). We were also most fortunate in having as our rhetorical and editorial consultant the distinguished poet and professor of rhetoric at the University of California, Leonard Nathan.

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

As with any group of people working on a long-term project, there have been, from time to time, changes in the composition of the group. Some of these changes have been happy ones, and others, sadly, have not. Two immensely positive additions to the consortium during its early years were Professor Sheldon Pollock, then of the University of Iowa and currently the Arvind Raghunathan Professor of Sanskrit and South Asian Studies at Columbia University, who gallantly and brilliantly took on both the Ayodhyā- and Araṇyakāṇḍas, and Dr. Sally Sutherland Goldman, senior lecturer in Sanskrit at the University of California at Berkeley. Aside from her work on the translations and annotations of the Bāla-, Sundara-, Yuddha-, and Uttarakāṇḍas, Sally Sutherland Goldman has, in her role as associate editor of the entire project, proven to be its mainstay.

Unhappily, over the course of the first decade of the project, the consortium lost several of its founding members. Some, like Professors Masson and Miller, withdrew from the project because their particular career paths led them to become so deeply involved in other projects that they could no longer carry through their work on the Rāmāyaṇa. In one case, that of Professor van Nooten, he took early retirement after having prepared a draft translation of the text of the Yuddhakāṇḍa and no longer wished to work on the annotation and introduction. Thus, that volume, by far the longest in the series, came to be a collaborative effort involving him and us.

[2] A very distinguished senior Sanskrit scholar raised this caution, noting, in a personal communication, that no such communal translations had ever proven successful with the sole exception of the one that produced the King James translation of the Bible, and that that consortium had had, so he said, "divine inspiration."

Finally, and tragically, several of the original members of the consortium were lost to us through their untimely passing. Professor Matilal died far too young, while Professor Nathan, too, although at a riper age, passed away early in the project. Sadly, Professor Miller, too, although she had at that time left the project, left us at a very early age. All of them are deeply missed. na khalu sa uparato yasya vallabho janaḥ smarati.

Aside from the core workers on the project mentioned above, this long, difficult, but joyous journey could not have been completed without the passion and critical assistance of many colleagues, scholars, and students in the United States and, especially, India. We therefore cannot end our labors without acknowledging their immense contributions to the cause of making a scientifically reconstructed version of Vālmīki's monumental and immortal poem accessible to readers the world over. Let us then begin by recalling the help of several immensely learned Indian scholars whose knowledge and love of the Rāmāyaṇa was unparalleled. All of these paṇḍitarājas are, sadly, now no more. First, we would like to thank Pt. Dr. V. W. Paranjpe of the Deccan College, with whom we had the opportunity to read the Sanskrit epics with their commentaries over several years in Pune and Berkeley. Thanks are also due to scholars who advised me and others involved with the project who gave unstintingly of their knowledge and assistance. Chief among them are the immensely learned Sanskrit sāhityaśāstrin Dr. V. Raghavan; the extraordinary vaiyākaraṇa Dr. S. D. Joshi of Poona Vidyapith; and, of course, the great Rāmāyaṇa authority Dr. Umakant Shah of the M. S. University of Baroda, who was also the director and general editor of the critical edition.

But our most profound and most affectionate gratitude belongs to Pt. T. Srinivas Shastri, who was long associated with the Dictionary Department of the Deccan College. For the years 1968–1970, 1974–1975, and 1992, we had the pleasure and privilege of reading and discussing the Vālmīki Rāmāyaṇa and many of its commentaries with him. His vast learning, exquisite Sanskrit, and boundless intellectual generosity set a standard that we can only hope to live up to. We would be remiss, also, if we were to fail to mention Mr. K. Venugopalan, also of the Deccan College Dictionary Project, who frequently sat in on our reading sessions with Shastri-ji and whose comments and clarifications, like many of those of the scholars mentioned above, contributed in countless ways to our understanding of this great work of literature and to our modest attempt to render it into a form that can be enjoyed by and, we hope, be of value to those who are not able to savor its riches in the original Sanskrit.

But there are many on this side of the world, too, who have lent their labors more directly to the minute and demanding work of getting the volumes of the translation properly edited, corrected, formatted, proofed, and entered. Their vital assistance has been acknowledged for each of the preceding volumes, and so, we will here express our most heartfelt gratitude to those who have worked so tirelessly on the preparation of this, the final volume in the translation.

By any measure, our greatest appreciation must go to Dr. Kristi Wiley of the University of California at Berkeley, who has served for years as the project's invaluable assistant editor. Her sharp eyes, scholarly expertise, and careful reading of the successive drafts of our introductions, translations, and notes have helped immensely in refining the language, accuracy, grammar, punctuation, and style of the finished volumes, which owe much of whatever value they may have to her dedicated and expert labors.

We must also extend our thanks and warmest appreciation to the talented group of our graduate students who have, over the past five years, been of enormous service as research assistants to the project. We would like to extend our thanks to Lisa Brooks, Priya Kothari, Isaac Murchie, and James Marks. In particular, we owe a debt of gratitude to Janet Um for her meticulous and unfailingly helpful work in the preparation of the final manuscript. We would also like to express our thanks and appreciation to Dr. Luis Gonzalez-Reimann for his careful reading of and helpful comments on several passages in the current volume. We are especially grateful to him for his advice and assistance in the matter of the Uttarakāṇḍa's understanding of the theory of the yugas and the placement of the Rāmāyaṇa narrative within the cycle of the cosmic eras.

Over the long course of the Rāmāyaṇa Project, we have received encouragement and material support—often multiple times—from a number of institutions to which we would like to express once more our profound gratitude. These include the American Institute of Indian Studies, the Translations Program of the National Endowment for the Humanities, the Committee on Research of the University of California at Berkeley, the Andrew Mellon Foundation, Princeton University Press and its excellent editorial staff, and the Centre for Historical Studies (CHS) of the Jawaharlal Nehru University, which, during Sally Sutherland Goldman's tenure there as visiting professor in 2010, graciously extended to us the resources and infrastructure to carry forward the work on this final volume of the translation. Thanks also to the CHS faculty, especially Professor Emeritus Romila Thapar, Professor Kunal Chakrabarti, Professor Kumkum Roy, and Professor Heeraman Tiwari, who, in many learned conversations, helped us to put the Rāmāyaṇa and the complex receptive history of the Uttarakāṇḍa into a historical context.

Finally, and most of all, we offer our humble obeisance to the first and foremost of poets, ṛṣi Vālmīki himself, who has given the world the undying delight of his grand poetic history of Sītārāma.

kūjantaṃ rāma rāmeti madhuraṃ madhurākṣaram / āruhya kavitāśākhāṃ vande vālmīkikokilam //

vālmīker munisiṃhasya kavitāvanacāriṇaḥ / śṛṇvan rāmakathānādaṃ ko na yāti parāṃ gatim //

yaḥ piban satataṃ rāmacaritāmṛtasāgaram /
atṛptas tam ahaṃ vande prācetasam akalmaṣam //

I praise the koel Vālmīki, who, flying up to the highest branch of the tree of poetry, there sweetly warbles the sweet syllables, "Rāma! Rāma!"

For, having once heard the roaring of the Tale of Rāma by the lion-sage Vālmīki, who ranges the woodlands of poetry, who would not attain the highest bliss?

And so I praise the flawless Prācetasa, who, though he drinks forever from the ocean of the nectar of Rāma's deeds, is never sated.

Therefore, in reverence, humility, and gratitude, we say to the ādikavi in the words of the great Dante to the spirit of Virgil:

O de li altri poeti onore e lume
Vagliami 'l lungo studio e 'l grande amore che m'ha fatto cercar lo tuo volume.[4]

O glory and shining light for other poets, let the long study and immense love that led us to scrutinize your poem now prove worthwhile.

Guide to Sanskrit Pronunciation*

The pronunciation of Sanskrit is not very difficult for English speakers. A few guidelines will serve to clarify the basic pronunciation of the sounds. English examples are based on hypothetical "dictionary" pronunciation.

Vowels

a	like the u in "but"
ā	like the o in "mom"
i	like the i in "bit"
ī	like the ee in "beet"
u	like the first u in "suture"
ū	like the oo in "pool"
ṛ	like the ri in "rig"
e	like the a in "gate"
ai	somewhat like the i in "high"; this sound becomes a diphthong to glide slightly into the "i" vowel

A Note on Sanskrit Prosody

Sanskrit syllables are generally classified as either heavy (guru) or light (laghu). Basically, heavy syllables are those containing a long vowel or dipthong, while light syllables contain short vowels. Additionally, syllables with short vowels are regarded as heavy when they precede a conjunct consonant, an anusvāra, or a visarga. The general rule for syllabic stress is that the penultimate syllable receives mild stress if it is heavy (guru), thus karaṇīya. If the penultimate syllable is light, the stress falls on the antepenultimate, regardless of its prosodic weight, and thus the correct pronunciation for the name of Vālmīki’s poem Rāmāyaṇa.

INTRODUCTION

1. Preamble and Synopsis of the Uttarakāṇḍa

The contents of the Uttarakāṇḍa are to a very great extent strikingly different from those of virtually all the other kāṇḍas of the epic. As we have noted elsewhere,[1] the Rāmāyaṇa as a narrative tends, with certain exceptions,[2] to remain sharply focused on the adventures of the central hero, Rāma. Even in the one major exception, the Sundarakāṇḍa, which places Sītā and Hanumān as well as Rāvaṇa and the rākṣasa court on center stage, as it were, for almost the entire narrative, the book is filled with descriptions of Rāma and with retellings of his life and deeds.

By way of contrast, the Uttarakāṇḍa, by its location, its very nature, and its construction, makes little room for Rāma to engage himself directly in action. The tale of Rāma, as it is represented in the received text of the Vālmīki Rāmāyaṇa, consists of two overlapping but not coterminous histories. One is the biography of King Rāma narrated from birth to death, while the other is the account of the Rāmāvatāra from the incarnation of Lord Viṣṇu until the fulfillment of his divine mission, which consists of the salvation of the world from the violent oppression of the monstrous rākṣasa lord Rāvaṇa and the establishment of a millennial rule of dharma. Rāma accomplishes this mission in the closing sargas of the Yuddhakāṇḍa, which then ends, in virtually all manuscript traditions, with a phalaśruti extolling the merits and rewards accruing to those who read, recite, or hear the poem.[3]

As both the closing verses of the initial sarga of the Bālakāṇḍa and the final verses of the last sarga of the Yuddhakāṇḍa make clear,[4] Rāma's rājyābhiṣeka, or royal consecration, inaugurates a millennia-long utopian era in which all natural, political, social, economic, and medical ills are said to be eliminated. This is the ten-thousand-year (or, in some passages, eleven-thousand-year) utopian re-creation of the conditions of the Kṛta Yuga,[5] known in modernity as the Rāmarājya. The apparently untroubled nature of Rāma's reign, however, introduces an interesting factor more or less unique to the Rāmāyaṇa legend that makes it difficult for the hero to engage in any further gripping or dramatic actions. For by ushering in and presiding over a millennia-long period of utter peace, prosperity, and social harmony, Rāma, now the monarch and chief magistrate of his ideal kingdom, has (with a few critical exceptions to be discussed at length below) no longer any need to take much of an active part in matters of state or society.

The Rāmacarita differs markedly in this respect from its closest textual parallel, the Kṛṣṇacarita, as narrated in the Mahābhārata, as well as in the Harivaṃśa and other Vaiṣṇava purāṇas. In the case of Kṛṣṇa, his half brother Balarāma, and his Pāṇḍava companions, the divine mission (devakārya) of the incarnations and the lives of the heroes are more or less coterminous. All of them end their earthly manifestations at most within a few decades of completing their task of ridding the earth of its burden of oppressive and demonic kings. In contrast, Rāma, his brothers, and his vānara and rākṣasa allies live on after the death of Rāvaṇa for thousands of years, during which Rāma gently but firmly reigns and offers sacrifices until, at last, he is reminded that he is wanted back in heaven in his true Vaiṣṇava form.[6]

This matter is most clearly illustrated in a number of passages that several commentators as well as the editors of various editions, including the critical edition, regard as prakṣipta, or interpolated, and that either do not appear in some editions and translations of the poem or are specifically marked in them as interpolations. U. P. Shah, the editor of the critical edition of the Uttarakāṇḍa, relegated these passages to his appendices, as will be discussed later in this introduction. In some of these passages the absence of grievances or problems among Rāma's subjects is addressed explicitly.[7] In one such passage, Rāma, as a consequence of the utopian nature of his reign, while sitting in his judgment hall, has considerable difficulty in finding anyone with a complaint, dispute, or indeed any matter at all for him to adjudicate. He sends Lakṣmaṇa out of the palace to try to find someone with a grievance:

> And then Rāma said to Lakṣmaṇa of auspicious marks: "Go out, great-armed increaser of Sumitra's joy.
> "And go forth, Saumitri, to speak with those who have business to be attended to." When Lakṣmaṇa of auspicious marks had heard Rāma's speech, he proceeded to the gateway where he himself summoned those who had business to be attended to. But no one there said: "I have some business to be attended to here today."

See Introduction, "Text," pp. 210–12.

For when Rāma was ruling his kingdom, there were no mental or physical afflictions. The earth was covered with all kinds of plants and was filled with ripened grain. No child, youth, or person of middle age died at that time. Everything was governed in accordance with righteousness, and so no cause for grievance arose.

Therefore, while Rāma was ruling his kingdom, one could find no one who had business that needed to be attended to. Cupping his hands in reverence, Lakṣmaṇa reported as much to Rāma.

But Rāma, his mind calm, said this to Saumitri: "Go back again and seek out those who have business that needs to be attended to.

"Through properly executed statecraft, no unrighteousness is to be found anywhere. Therefore, in fear of the king, everyone always protects one another."[8]

Finally, Lakṣmaṇa is able to locate only a miserable dog, who complains that he has been beaten by a mendicant brahman. After hearing this odd case, Rāma pronounces judgment on the offender.[9] In a second such passage similarly relegated by Shah to an appendix, Rāma calls in his full complement of counselors and deliberates with them before rendering a judgment in a property dispute between a vulture and an owl.[10]

As its title indicates, the Uttarakāṇḍa is, in part, an extended epilogue to the epic story in which the hero, King Rāma, serves largely as either an auditor of historical, illustrative, or exemplary tales told by various other figures or as a sort of chief administrator who, as the occasion demands, dispatches his kinsmen to deal with such matters as the suppression of malefactors, the alleged infidelity of his queen and the supposed impropriety of his having taken her back, and the expansion of his dynasty's territorial control. Other than this, of the one hundred sargas of the critical edition, Rāma plays an active role in only some forty. In fact, the first thirty-six sargas of the book, which account for almost exactly half of its total text,[11] consist of the sage Agastya's responses to Rāma's questions about the pre-Rāmāyaṇa histories of the important epic characters Rāvaṇa and Hanumān. The proportions of the text that are devoted to these two figures and their backgrounds are widely different. The history not only of Rāvaṇa but also of his ancestry all the way back to the creation of the rākṣasa race itself occupies the book's first thirty-four sargas, while a relatively expansive retelling of the infancy of Hanumān takes up the following two.

The first section, a mini-epic in itself, which Hermann Jacobi termed the Râvaṇeïs,[12] provides an unusually detailed history of the rākṣasas, including their genealogy, their marriages, their battles with the gods, and their acquisition, loss, and recapture of the magnificent city of Laṅkā (sargas 1–8). The following two sargas (9–10) recount the marriage of Viśravas and Kaikasī, the births of their children, Rāvaṇa, Kumbhakarṇa, Śūrpaṇakhā, and Vibhīṣaṇa, the asceticism of Rāvaṇa and his brothers, and the boons they obtained thereby. The great bulk of the section (sargas 11–34) narrates at length and in detail the pre-Rāmāyaṇa career of Rāvaṇa, including his seizure of Laṅkā from his half brother Kubera; his marriage and the birth of his son Indrajit; his torment of the gods, seers, yakṣas, and gandharvas; his military campaigns against kings, gods, and demons; his occasional defeats; and his abduction and rape of various women and the curses he incurs thereby. Following this elaborate account of Rāvaṇa's genealogy and career of conquest, two sargas (35–36) relate the birth and infantile exploits of Hanumān, including his attempt to swallow the rising sun, his wounding by Indra, the anger of his father, the wind god Vāyu, and how he came to receive various boons from the gods.

It is only in the thirty-seventh sarga of the book that the narrative returns to the actions and events in Rāma's life. Sargas thirty-seven through forty narrate the events following Rāma's consecration, including a curious account of the leave-taking of a group of some three hundred allied kings and their armies who, we learn for the first time, had apparently assembled to assist the hero in his assault on Laṅkā, a subject to which we shall return later. We also learn that Rāma redistributes the gifts and tribute he had received from these kings to his more active allies, the vānaras, and the few rākṣasas, Vibhīṣaṇa and his attendants, who had assisted him in the war. These allies then take their leave of Rāma and return to their respective homes. After this Rāma receives as a gift the fabulous flying palace Puṣpaka, which, after Rāma's return from Laṅkā, had been dismissed and returned to its rightful owner, Kubera.[13] Bharata closes this section with a brief paean of praise for the utopian conditions that have prevailed in the kingdom during the brief period since Rāma's accession to the throne (sargas 37–40).

Following the dismissal of the flying palace Puṣpaka, we have one of the very few sargas (sarga 41) of the epic to focus, albeit tastefully, on the romantic and erotic life of Rāma and Sītā. There is a dense description of the beauty of Rāma's aśoka grove, or pleasure garden, where he and Sītā at long last indulge in the joys of marital bliss, drinking, dining, and being entertained in the beautiful park. It is here that we first learn through Rāma's observation that his wife is "endowed with auspiciousness," that is to say, pregnant. She tells him of her pregnancy-longing to visit the sages who dwell along the banks of the Ganges, and, in what will prove to be a dark irony, Rāma agrees and promises her that she shall do so the very next day.

The following ten sargas constitute one of the core elements in the Uttarakāṇḍa, and their contents form the principal basis for the discomfort with the book from medieval times down to the modern day. They narrate the sequence of events that comes to be commonly known as the Sītātyāga, or abandonment of Sītā. Immediately after his romantic idyll with Sītā in the aśoka grove, Rāma is informed by one of his agents that malicious rumors are circulating among the people about the propriety of Rāma's conduct in taking Sītā back after she has been in the power of the lecherous rākṣasa. Rāma summons his brothers and, in order to preserve his reputation as a perfectly dharmic ruler, commands Lakṣmaṇa to take Sītā and abandon her on the farther bank of the Ganges. Distraught but obedient, Lakṣmaṇa takes the unsuspecting queen, who thinks she is being taken on the pious excursion Rāma had promised her, and carries out his brother's instructions. Abandoned and desolate in the wilderness, Sītā is discovered by some young boys from the neighboring ashram of the sage Vālmīki, who takes her in as his ward. Lakṣmaṇa then learns from the charioteer and counselor Sumantra how all of this was long ago foretold to Daśaratha by the sage Durvāsas. Upon his return, Lakṣmaṇa consoles his grieving brother (sargas 42–51).

At this point, Rāma tells a series of tales to Lakṣmaṇa illustrating the terrible fate that befalls kings who offend or neglect their duty toward brahmans. These are the tales of King Nṛga, who was cursed by a brahman to become a lizard; of King Nimi and the sage Vasiṣṭha, who cursed each other to become devoid of consciousness; and of King Yayāti, who was cursed by his father-in-law, the sage Uśanas, to lose his virility for his disrespect to the sage's daughter, Devayānī, and her son, Yadu (sargas 51-1*–51-7*).[14]

[14] The illustrative and cautionary tales told by Rāma occupy seven sargas that have, for reasons that we find questionable, been relegated by the editors of the critical edition to an appendix. We have restored these passages to their proper place in our translation (51-1*–51-7*) following sarga 51. For a discussion of the textual issues involved, see Introduction, "Text," pp. 212–16 and notes to these passages.

The book now turns to another matter. The next twelve sargas return with some interesting variations to the epic's central theme of Rāma's avatāric mission of defending the virtuous, especially the vedic sages, from the depredations of the rākṣasas, the demonic foes of brahmanical civilization. But, unlike in the case of Rāvaṇa, Rāma no longer takes a direct role in this defense. A delegation of sages who live along the banks of the Yamunā River arrives at the Kosalan court to lodge a complaint that they are being harassed by a powerful demon, Lavaṇa. After hearing from them and their leader, the Bhārgava sage Cyavana, about the monster and his oppression of the ascetics, Rāma dispatches Śatrughna, who has hitherto had virtually no active role in the epic, to go and destroy the rākṣasa. He consecrates Śatrughna as the new king of Lavaṇa's city, Madhurā, and sends him forth with troops and provisions. On his journey, Śatrughna stops for a night at the ashram of Vālmīki, where, that very night, Sītā gives birth to twin sons, Lava and Kuśa. The prince then proceeds to Madhurā, where, after a fierce battle, he kills Lavaṇa and founds a new city and kingdom, thus expanding the territorial reach of the Kosalan Ikṣvāku dynasty into the heartland of the Śurasenas. After ruling his peaceful and prosperous kingdom for twelve years, Śatrughna is consumed with longing to be with Rāma, and he returns to Ayodhyā. On his way to Ayodhyā, Śatrughna once again stops for the night at Vālmīki's ashram, where he and his troops overhear the singing of the tale of Rāma.[15] But, once his brother is in Ayodhyā, Rāma brusquely tells him that his duty lies with his own kingdom and sends him back to Madhurā after only a few days (sargas 52–63).

Following Rāma's dismissal of Śatrughna, the kāṇḍa turns to another defining episode in its characterization of Rāma. In sargas sixty-four through the first half of sarga sixty-seven, as we have reconstructed it,[16] we learn that a grieving brahman arrives at Rāma's palace gates carrying the dead body of his young son. The brahman places the blame for his son's untimely end squarely on Rāma, arguing that if Rāma were actually governing a perfectly dharmic realm, such a tragedy could not have occurred. Rāma accepts this position and learns from the sage Nārada that the cause of this rent in the otherwise perfect fabric of righteousness in his kingdom is that, somewhere in his realm, a śūdra is engaged in the ascetic practices that are, at least in that cosmic era, the Tretā Yuga, reserved for the higher varṇas, or social classes. Rāma orders that the child's body be preserved and then, in his flying palace, searches his kingdom for the śūdra ascetic. Upon finding the ascetic Śambūka and learning that he is indeed a śūdra, Rāma summarily beheads him. The instant that Śambūka dies, the dead child is miraculously restored to life, signaling that dharma is once more unblemished in Rāma's kingdom. Rāma is felicitated by the gods for killing the śūdra. This episode, meant, no doubt, to shore up the brahmanical social order, has had a controversial receptive history from ancient to modern times, like the episode of the abandonment of Sītā (sargas 64 through first half of 67).

[15] The episode in which Śatrughna spends the night at Vālmīki's ashram has, for reasons that we find questionable, been relegated by the editors of the critical edition to an appendix. We have restored it to its proper place in our translation at sarga 63 following verse 3ab. For a discussion of the textual issues involved, see Introduction, "Text," p. 215 and notes to 7.63.*3ab–App. I, No. 9, lines 1–52.

After killing Śambūka, Rāma does not return immediately to Ayodhyā but instead visits the ashram of the sage Agastya, where he receives a splendid celestial ornament and, throughout the following six sargas, becomes once again the auditor of tales told by the sage (sargas 67–72). These are the strange tales of the kings Śveta and Daṇḍa. The former, we learn, was condemned because of his lack of charity to the hideous fate of having perpetually to eat his own corpse. The latter, for having raped the daughter of the powerful brahman sage Uśanas Kāvya, was cursed by the sage to be destroyed in a tremendous dust storm that will turn his once prosperous kingdom into the desolate Daṇḍakāraṇya, one of the principal sites of Rāma's exile and earlier adventures.

Rāma now returns to his capital, where he announces to Bharata and Lakṣmaṇa that he has resolved to perform the rājasūya, the rite of royal consecration. Bharata, however, counsels him not to carry out this plan as the rājasūya ritual inevitably involves the conquest and slaughter of all the rival kings of the earth. This is, no doubt, because such violence would accord poorly with the character of Rāma as we have seen it in the preceding books of the epic. Lakṣmaṇa then intervenes, advising Rāma to perform instead the aśvamedha, or horse sacrifice, a rite that, among other things, frees one from all sins and impurities. He bolsters this recommendation by recounting the tale of how Indra was freed from brahmahatyā, or the sin of killing a brahman, through a performance of the aśvamedha. Rāma responds by now turning from auditor to narrator. He relates at some length a variation of the widely distributed tale of King Ila/Ilā, according to which the famously transgendered monarch is only restored to masculinity through a performance of the aśvamedha. Finally, Rāma orders the performance of his own great aśvamedha in the Naimiṣa forest. The opulent sacrifice is conducted with great pomp. These discussions and narratives concerning the two sacrifices occupy ten sargas (74–83).

One of the honored guests at Rāma's aśvamedha is the sage Vālmīki, who brings with him Sītā and her sons, his two wards, the twin bards Lava and Kuśa, of whose birth and existence Rāma is apparently unaware. The boys sing the Rāmāyaṇa before the sacrificial assembly just as they had learned it from the sage and are praised for their artistry by Rāma. Once Rāma realizes that the singers are, in fact, Sītā's and his sons, he asks the sage to present Sītā before the assembly. Vālmīki complies and testifies as an unimpeachable witness to her utter fidelity. Rāma nonetheless asks that she take a public oath of fidelity. Sītā does so, but as proof of her truthfulness, she calls upon her mother, the earth goddess, Mādhavī, to bear witness to her oath and take her back into her bosom. The earth opens and the goddess carries her daughter down into it, leaving Rāma stricken with grief and fury.[17] Desolate, Rāma now has a golden image of his beloved fashioned and with it at his side performs many sacrifices and rules over his happy and prosperous kingdom for thousands of years. This resolution of the earlier account of the abandonment of Sītā occupies six sargas (84–89).

Then, in three brief sargas, the book once more makes a hasty turn toward the political and territorial expansion of the Kosalan dynasty. These sargas serve to supplement the earlier episode of Śatrughna's conquest of Madhurā. First, Rāma's maternal uncle Aśvapati sends his guru Gārgya as a messenger to solicit Rāma's assistance in conquering the country of the gandharvas, which lies along the banks of the Indus River. As in the case of Madhurā, Rāma does not assist directly but dispatches Bharata and the latter's two sons, Takṣa and Puṣkala, along with a vast host. They join with Aśvapati and launch an attack on the gandharvas. After an inconclusive weeklong battle, Bharata annihilates all thirty million gandharvas with a powerful divine weapon and founds the two eponymous cities of Takṣaśīla and Puṣkarāvatī there, one for each of his sons.

Rāma is delighted by the news of this annexation of the realm of the gandharvas and directs Lakṣmaṇa to find yet another country in which he can similarly establish his own two sons, Aṅgada and Candraketu, as kings. He requests, however, that this be done less violently than in the case of Bharata's conquest. Bharata suggests that they subdue the salubrious country of Kārāpatha, which he then subjugates and in which he establishes Lakṣmaṇa's sons, respectively, in the eponymous cities of Aṅgadīyā and Candrakāntā. The three brothers, Rāma, Bharata, and Lakṣmaṇa, now utterly content, enjoy their lives and perform sacrifices happily for ten thousand years (sargas 90–92).

The final eight sargas of the Uttarakāṇḍa (and thus of the entire Rāmāyaṇa) deal with the last days on earth of Rāma and his brothers. One day [17] The sarga in which the sorrow and anger of Rāma is described has, for reasons that we find questionable, been relegated by the editors of the critical edition to an appendix. We have restored it to its proper place in our translation as sarga 88*. For a discussion of the textual issues involved, see Introduction, "Text," p. 216 and notes to sarga 88*.

Kāla, the god of death and personification of time, arrives in the guise of an ascetic and announces that he must have a serious, private conversation with Rāma. It is revealed that Kāla is serving as the messenger of Brahmā, who has sent him to inform Rāma that the period of his avatāra is at an end and that the gods long to have their lord, Viṣṇu, back with them in heaven.

Rāma posts Lakṣmaṇa at the door of his council chamber and instructs him that, on pain of death, he must permit no one to interrupt this meeting. Suddenly, the notoriously irritable sage Durvāsas arrives, famished after a prolonged fast, and demands instant access to the king in order, as it turns out, to beg a meal. When Lakṣmaṇa tries to put him off, the sage threatens a curse that would mean the destruction of the entire Ikṣvāku lineage. Faced with this dilemma, Lakṣmaṇa has little choice but to sacrifice himself. He admits the sage into Rāma's presence, thus obligating the king to fulfill his pledge to Kāla. After consulting with his advisers, Rāma reasons that, to the virtuous, exile is the moral equivalent of execution, and so he banishes his beloved brother and inseparable companion. Lakṣmaṇa immediately leaves the city and, on the bank of the Sarayū, experiences a yogic death and is escorted to heaven in his earthly body by Indra, along with the gods, seers, and apsarases.

Rāma now resolves to abandon his earthly existence. He installs his sons, Lava and Kuśa, as rulers of the two successor kingdoms of Southern and Northern Kosala and summons Śatrughna back from Madhurā. The latter arrives, as do Rāma's old comrades in arms, the vānaras, along with Vibhīṣaṇa and his rākṣasa retainers. Rāma then leaves Ayodhyā, leading a solemn procession of his allies, kinsmen, and subjects to the Gopratāra tīrtha on the Sarayū River. They all enter the waters, and Rāma at last returns to his true form as Lord Viṣṇu while, with the exception of Hanumān, Vibhīṣaṇa, and a few others, his followers and devotees also resume their proper heavenly forms and attain their respective heavenly abodes. The kāṇḍa and the epic conclude, in the critical edition, with the simple statement, "Here ends the foremost of tales, known as the Rāmāyaṇa, together with its epilogue (sahottaram). It was composed by Vālmīki and is worshiped by Brahmā." As one would expect, most manuscripts and published editions of the poem follow this verse with various phalaśrutis, as they do at the end of the Yuddhakāṇḍa (sargas 93–100).

2. The Major Characters of the Uttarakāṇḍa

A study of the characters of the Uttarakāṇḍa presents a more complex and, in some ways, more difficult task than have our parallel studies in the introductions to the previous volumes of this translation. One of the reasons for this is the very structure and purpose of the book. All of the previous six volumes were centrally dedicated to a sequential chronological history of the life and adventures of Rāma and his principal kinfolk and companions, starting from shortly before the hero's birth and culminating with his long-delayed consecration as king. Even when, as in the Bālakāṇḍa, the narrative is interrupted by accounts of other legends and histories, such as the tale of Ahalyā and the account of Viśvāmitra's attainment of brahmanhood,[1] these are introduced as essential elements in the young prince's moral and cultural education and either involve someone very close to Rāma or necessitate his active participation. In the one book, the Sundarakāṇḍa, in which Rāma is "offstage," as it were, until the very closing chapters, the text is still very centrally focused on him as represented in the thoughts and speech of the principal characters, Sītā and Hanumān, even as the book provides a chronological account of Hanumān's heroic leaps to and from Laṅkā and his adventures and interactions with Sītā while he is on the island.[2]

As noted in the previous section, the nature of the Uttarakāṇḍa is rather different. For various reasons, the book consists substantially of secondary narratives that are related by Rāma and to Rāma by the sage Agastya and other figures, with the king serving largely in the roles simply of auditor and narrator. One very central thematic reason for the generally passive role of the hero in this last book concerns the intertwined issues of Rāma's mission as an avatāra of Lord Viṣṇu and his celebrated role as the paragon of righteous sovereignty who rules for many millennia over a utopian kingdom, the legendary Rāmarājya. There are thus relatively few figures in the book that allow for any sort of significant characterological analysis. We will, however, discuss those few central figures briefly.

RĀMA

Rāma is quite unusual when compared with the other principal incarnations of Lord Viṣṇu. Most of them, Matsya, Kūrma, Varāha, and so on, appear on earth for one brief moment to accomplish a single critical mission, such as the rescue of the gods, the salvation of the earth, or the salvation of the virtuous through the destruction of an evil tyrant. Once they have completed their respective missions, they return to their primordial divine forms. Among the well-known standard list of the daśāvatāras only Kṛṣṇa, the Buddha, and the two Rāmas (Rāghava and Bhārgava) remain for very long on earth. Of the two very popular and widely worshiped incarnations, Rāma Rāghava and Kṛṣṇa Vāsudeva, the latter, having accomplished his two avatāric missions of killing the demonic tyrant Kaṃsa and relieving the earth of its burden of demonic kings, returns to his heavenly form very quickly thereafter.[3] Rāma, on the other hand, having removed the thorn of the world, the lokakaṇṭaka Rāvaṇa, then inaugurates and rules a millennia-long kingdom of God on earth.

Now the principal feature of Rāma's rule, as described several times in the epic,[4] is its millennialist or utopian character, according to which all of Rāma's subjects are said to be virtuous, prosperous, healthy, long-lived, and happy. Generally speaking, his reign knows no strife, crime, untimely death, injustice, disease, or even natural disaster.[5] Therefore, in such a perfect realm, the avatāra, who came to earth to punish evil and right wrongs, can have little of an active nature to do other than rule benignly and perform sacrifices and other religious duties. According to the poem, Rāma continues his dharmic rulership for more than ten thousand years.[6]

[3] According to the Mahābhārata, Kṛṣṇa abandoned his earthly form just thirty-six years after the end of the Bhārata War, the management of which constituted the second of his major avatāric functions. His incarnation ends immediately after the internecine slaughter of the Vṛṣṇis and Andhakas in Dvārakā. See the Mausalaparvan of the Mahābhārata. The chronology is given in the first adhyāya of the Mausalaparvan (MBh 16.1.1).

[4] 1.1.71–76; 6.116.82–90; 7.40.12–17; 7.89.7–10.

[5] Rents, as it were, however, do occur in the otherwise flawless fabric of the dharmic kingdom at several critical moments during the first twelve years of Rāma's long rule. These include the criticism of the people, the exile of Sītā, the death of a brahman child because of the untimely asceticism of a śūdra, and the crimes of Lavaṇa. These are dealt with separately; see Introduction, "Synopsis," pp. 7–8; "Controversial Episodes," pp. 82–113; and "Structure," pp. 131–32; 134–35; 143.

[6] See Introduction, "Work," p. 56, note 7.

Given these particular circumstances of Rāma's career, there are very few occasions in the Uttarakāṇḍa for Rāma to engage himself directly in kingly action. And since there are so few such occasions and since Rāma is represented largely as a listener or narrator in the book, there is relatively little opportunity for any sustained study of the representation of his characterization.[7] That said, however, there are two important incidents in the book that shed light on the way Rāma is characterized, and it seems that this characterization can be seen as in some ways in contrast to the way the hero's temperament is portrayed in the earlier books. These incidents—the abandonment of Sītā and the execution of Śambūka—have come to be controversial and will be discussed at length below.[8] The Rāma portrayed in the Uttarakāṇḍa seems to show a somewhat harsher side than he does earlier in the epic, and this is one of the things that has led some readers to believe that the book is from a later time and a different hand than the previous books.

In this context, let us consider very briefly the issue of his treatment of Sītā. It is true that Rāma speaks very harshly to his wife when she is returned to him near the end of the Yuddhakāṇḍa at the time of her famous ordeal by fire.[9] But the text makes it clear that he subjects her to this not only for the purposes of demonstrating his adherence to dharma but also in order to create the conditions for her to be publically proven innocent by Agni and the other assembled divinities. Once the dramatic scene is over, he receives her lovingly. In the Uttarakāṇḍa, however, although he is shown to remain deeply convinced of her purity and fidelity, he unhesitatingly and deceitfully abandons her, on the basis of local gossip, to whatever fate she may meet in the wilderness. As will be discussed below,[10] this has provoked numerous critiques of Rāma's behavior in several quarters from antiquity to modernity, and it seems to contrast starkly with the portrayal of Rāma in the Bālakāṇḍa, where it is he himself who is the cause of the redemption and purification of Ahalyā, who was an actual as opposed to a falsely accused adulteress.[11]

[7] The general lack of problems, complaints, and disputes among Rāma's subjects appears to have concerned later redactors of the text and led them to interpolate spurious, prakṣipta episodes in which Rāma as monarch and chief magistrate is represented as having to settle a quarrel between a stray dog and an ascetic (Prakṣpita III, sarga 2 = App. I, No. 8, lines 361–465), as well as a property dispute between an owl and a vulture (Prakṣpita III, sarga 3 = App. I, No. 10). These and other interpolated passages provide the authors opportunities to expatiate on the proper duties of a king without having to propose any grievances among the actual subjects of the Rāmarājya.

[8] For a detailed discussion of these incidents, their representation in later versions of the Rāmakathā, and their afterlife in the cultural, social, theological, and political cultures of medieval and modern India, see Introduction, "Controversial Episodes," pp. 82–113.

As for the summary execution of the śūdra ascetic Śambūka, it, too, seems to show a rather stringent and harsh enforcement of the rules of social and ritual conduct, which the text seeks to justify on the curious grounds that Śambūka's untimely penances have somehow caused the death of an innocent child, a death that can be reversed only by the errant śūdra's execution. The execution portrays a rather different character on the part of a figure who earlier in the poem is represented as an extraordinary exemplar of compassion and of forgiveness toward even the most violent and reprehensible of sinners.[12] After all, despite all the horrendous crimes Rāvaṇa had wrought against the world and against Rāma and Sītā themselves, Rāma seems willing to pardon him if only he returns Sītā and begs forgiveness.[13] Moreover, after Rāvaṇa's death in battle, Rāma acknowledges him as one of his own and orders that he be given a proper vedic funeral ceremony.[14] Is the executioner of the wretched śūdra ascetic the same Rāma as the one who, on the point of defeat and death, forbids his brother to deploy the brahmāstra to destroy all the evil rākṣasas and thus save the day?[15]

At one point in the Uttarakāṇḍa, Rāma is shown to lend his support to a brutal and massively sanguinary campaign of conquest against the kingdom of the gandharvas of the northwest.[16] The conquered territory is then divided to form kingdoms for Bharata's two sons. This campaign, conducted by Bharata and Yudhājit, results in the slaughter of thirty million gandharvas, but what is interesting here is that Rāma appears to be disturbed by the violence and the carnage that has been involved in the conquest. For when he subsequently instructs Lakṣmaṇa to similarly occupy a country that will be divided between Lakṣmaṇa's two sons, Rāma takes care to tell Lakṣmaṇa that he should do so in such a way that "there will be no oppression of kings and no destruction of ashrams, so that we may give no offense."[17] Evidently the authors of this section of the Uttarakāṇḍa remain concerned with upholding Rāma's reputation as the most compassionate of kings. We may see this, too, in the discussion among the three brothers, Rāma, Bharata, and Lakṣmaṇa, late in the book concerning which sacrifice Rāma should perform in order to ritually sanctify his consecration. Rāma's initial plan, as will be discussed below,[18] is to perform the rājasūya, the particular rite associated with the enthronement of a great king. But Bharata dissuades him from this plan, arguing that the ritual involves the massive annihilation of rival monarchs. Wishing to avoid injury to others, Rāma desists from this project and is instead persuaded by Lakṣmaṇa that he should undertake a performance of the aśvamedha, which, in this case, will involve no explicit armed conflict or conquest.[19]

[11] The story of Rāma's redemption of Ahalyā is narrated in the Bālakāṇḍa (1.48.16–22). A version of the tale of Ahalyā is also narrated in the Uttarakāṇḍa at 7.30.16–42. But there, Rāma is merely the audience of the story and plays no role in it himself.

[12] Although the practice of asceticism by śūdras is said in the Uttarakāṇḍa to be forbidden in the Tretā Yuga, Rāma was quite friendly toward the low-caste ascetic woman Śabarī at Araṇyakāṇḍa sarga 70. However, it must be said that Rāma's execution of Vālin as a violator of social dharma in the Kiṣkindhākāṇḍa (sargas 17–18) does show a similarly stringent application of capital punishment on Rāma's part.

SĪTĀ

There can be no doubt that Sītā, the heroine of the Rāmāyaṇa, is in many ways its most poignant figure. As a consequence of her long years of generally uncomplaining hardship, captivity, suffering, and heartbreak, her journey has captivated audiences from the moment of the epic's earliest circulation. Indeed, in terms of her centrality to the narrative, even when she is not the direct focus of the poet's attention, her wrenching reversals of fortune and her great fortitude under terrible duress constitute her as one of the epic's most compelling figures. It is no doubt this that has led the author to propose as an alternative title of the work, the "Great Tale of Sītā (sītāyāś caritaṃ mahat)."[20]

Rescued from a field as a foundling by King Janaka of Videha,[21] she grows to be the most beautiful princess in the land, one so extraordinary that only the mightiest and most valorous of princes can win her hand through a test of superhuman strength.[22] One interesting new thing we learn about Sītā in the Uttarakāṇḍa is her prehistory. For now we are told that she is the reincarnation of the pious brahman woman ascetic Vedavatī, who, back in the Kṛta Yuga, was sexually molested by Rāvaṇa and who, to preserve her honor, immolated herself in a fire, vowing to be reborn as the daughter of a virtuous man but not from a human womb. She is ultimately reborn in the Tretā Yuga as Sītā for the destruction of him who had defiled her.[23]

Married into an ancient, noble, wealthy, and powerful royal house,[24] she suddenly finds, on the very eve of her husband's consecration as prince regent, that he is to be banished as a penniless and homeless wanderer in the wilderness for fourteen long years. A paragon of selfless wifely devotion and courage, she resolves to follow him in his exile,[25] only to be first assaulted by a ravenous monster and then abducted by a lustful and demonic king.[26] Held in miserable captivity,[27] alternately cajoled and menaced by her captor and threatened by her monstrous wardresses,[28] she somehow manages to persevere and at last is rescued by her valiant husband.[29] Relieved and delighted to have her beloved lord with her once again, she is, despite her devotion and innocence, harshly rebuked and made to undergo an ordeal by fire in order to publically demonstrate her fidelity.[30] But finally, her tribulations apparently behind her, Sītā shares in Rāma's delayed royal consecration and joyfully takes her rightful place as his queen.[31]

And so, despite her and her husband's trials, it appears that the tragic tale will have the proverbial happy ending after all. Indeed, this very satisfying dénouement of the tale of Rāma and Sītā is one of the several reasons, as discussed below,[32] why many post-Vālmīki authors of versions of the Rāmakathā and their audiences prefer to end the tale at this point, with the auspicious consecration of the happy couple, now reunited, their troubles behind them.

But in the Vālmīki Rāmāyaṇa there is an Uttarakāṇḍa, and it is in this book that Sītā, once again the emotional heart of the story, will experience both her greatest heartbreak and her final apotheosis. She makes her first appearance in the book midway through it, shortly after Agastya has regaled Rāma with a detailed history of the rākṣasas and of Rāvaṇa's dramatic career, as well as an account of the childhood of Hanumān.[33] There, in the book's forty-first sarga, we find a description, really the only one in the epic, of the romantic life of the happy loving couple, Rāma and Sītā. It is here that the poet unabashedly evokes the śṛṅgārarasa, or erotic sentiment, replete with its supporting seasonal and floral elements, in describing the marital bliss of the pair. For now the long-separated and long-suffering couple reach the apogee of their happiness. After a description of their pleasures in the lush winter aśoka grove, Rāma, noticing a special glow in Sītā's demeanor, realizes with joy that she is pregnant.[34] In keeping with a widely held Indian belief that no longing of a pregnant woman should be thwarted, he asks her what she desires. She, in turn, expresses her most heartfelt wish that she might make a visit to the ashrams on the banks of the Ganges and pay her respects to the holy sages who reside there.[35] This wish is consonant with the epic's previous characterization of Sītā as a pious and self-sacrificing woman who expresses a desire for the simple life of a forest ascetic.[36] Mutually delighted, the couple separate, with Rāma joining his companions in an inner chamber.[37]

It is here that the bright and charmingly romantic tone of the narrative turns suddenly and stunningly dark.[38] Rāma, engaged in pleasant banter with his friends, asks them to tell him what the people in the city are talking about, particularly regarding his wife, his brothers, and himself. One of his confidants, Bhadra, tries at first to reassure the king that popular opinion of the royal family is overwhelmingly favorable and that the talk of the town is mainly focused on Rāma's defeat of Rāvaṇa.[39] But Rāma, eager as always to act in the best interests of his subjects, presses Bhadra for the full story. In response he is told that although the men of the country praise Rāma's heroic feats, they also criticize him for having taken back Sītā after she had been in the clutches of Rāvaṇa and the depraved rākṣasas. They fear that the king has set a bad example for them and that because of it they, too, will now have to put up with errant wives.[40]

It is at this point that, eager to quell the scandal, Rāma makes his fateful decision to banish his pregnant queen under the pretext of fulfilling her pious wish to visit the holy ashrams along the Ganges. He orders the reluctant Lakṣmaṇa to take her.[41] And as Lakṣmaṇa carries out his brother's terrible command, the pathos and the irony of Sītā's situation move toward a climax. It is also here that, for the first of only two times in the Uttarakāṇḍa, the poet gives her a voice.[42]

As they set forth on their journey, Sītā sees sights and experiences physical symptoms that portend evil consequences. In keeping with her gentle and loving nature, she does not suspect that the impending calamity is her own. She fears only for her dear husband. Praying for him and his family, she mentions in particular her mothers-in-law without distinction.[43] Lakṣmaṇa tries to maintain a falsely cheerful demeanor, but as they approach the Ganges, he breaks down and weeps openly. The naive Sītā now mistakes Lakṣmaṇa's sorrow for his grief at being separated, even for a few days, from his dear brother. She chides him for being so childish, observing, ironically, that she herself is not grieving at such a brief separation from Rāma and reassuring him that they will return to Ayodhyā the next day.[44]

The characterization of Sītā here is exquisite, and it sets up one of the most moving passages in the poem. We see her as a gentle young woman at the pinnacle of her happiness. She has a loving and powerful husband to whom she will soon bear children, and she is on her way to reverence the holy seers and, no doubt, to receive their blessings. In her joy and innocence, unaware of the cruel disaster that has befallen her, she thinks only of others.

After they have crossed the river, Lakṣmaṇa, once more giving way to grief and prodded by Sītā, at last tells her the terrible news that Rāma has ordered that she be abandoned near the ashram of the seer Vālmīki and that she must resign herself to her fate, living a life of abstinence and piety there.[45] Shocked at hearing the terrible words of Lakṣmaṇa, Sītā faints. Upon recovering, she delivers one of the epic's finest and most moving speeches. She laments her earlier hardships and her cruel fate and resorts to the cultural discourse of karma by asking what evil she had done, what couple she had separated in a previous life to have deserved her present suffering, and she once more proclaims her innocence.[46] Although filled with despair, she announces that she cannot end her life, as she otherwise might, as she bears in her womb the promise of continuing her husband's lineage. Then, somehow maintaining her composure, she tells Lakṣmaṇa that he is not to blame and was right to obey the king's command. Next, thinking as always of others and of propriety, she gives him a message for Rāma. Without complaint she bravely extends her good wishes to him and her mothers-in-law and enjoins Rāma to treat his subjects just as he does his brothers. She does not, she tells him, grieve for herself but rather commends him for acting in such a way as to avoid the censure of the people.[47] Only when Lakṣmaṇa has departed, leaving her alone, does she surrender herself to her grief and terror, making the woodlands resound with her weeping, as she echoes the cries of the peacocks.[48]

Found by some boys from the nearby ashram, Sītā is soon welcomed by Vālmīki, who, through his power of meditative insight, already knows her entire situation and offers to have her sheltered by the ascetic women who live near his hermitage. Sītā gratefully accepts the sage's hospitality with the simple words, "So be it."[49] These are the last words we shall hear her speak until, twelve years and forty sargas later, she returns to Rāma with Vālmīki and her sons at the time of Rāma's aśvamedha.

During Rāma's aśvamedha, the once glamorous queen appears in the dress of an ascetic woman as Vālmīki attests to her utter blamelessness and to the legitimacy of her twin sons with the authority that only an omniscient sage can command.[50] Rāma accepts the sage's words as proof, acknowledges that she herself had earlier given proof of her innocence in the presence of the gods (i.e., at the agniparīkṣā), and begs the sage for forgiveness.[51] Prior to Vālmīki's attestation of Sītā's virtue, Rāma had already demanded that she herself give public proof of her innocence through a solemn oath taken before the sacrificial assembly.[52]

At length Sītā enters the great assembly as all the gods and hosts of heavenly beings look on. Her face modestly lowered, she utters only a single poignant sentence, her solemn oath (śapatha):

> "As I have never even thought of any man other than Rāghava, so may Mādhavī, the goddess of the earth, open wide for me."[53]

These are her last words on earth, for at that very moment, the goddess of earth herself, Sītā's true mother, emerges from the ground on a great bejeweled throne and, seating her daughter beside her, returns to the underworld.[54] In this way the much-abused and long-suffering queen redeems herself through her own agency, solemnly vowing her eternal fidelity and devotion to Rāma with great dignity while implicitly declining his offer to take her back once again.

HANUMĀN

Given the epilogic quality of the Uttarakāṇḍa and its author's or authors' efforts to use it to give the early histories of some of the epic's principal figures, thus providing rationales for several of the puzzling events of the main story, it would be hard to imagine that so central and fascinating a figure as the great monkey hero Hanumān would be neglected. And, of course, he is not. Immediately after hearing Agastya's lengthy account of Rāvaṇa and his lineage, Rāma expresses his curiosity concerning Hanumān's failure, despite his unparalleled strength, to have protected his lord and companion Sugrīva from the hostility of his powerful brother Vālin. After praising Hanumān's great feats, which enabled Rāma to find the abducted Sītā and achieve victory over Rāvaṇa, he concludes that the monkey's passivity in the face of Vālin's humiliation of Sugrīva seemed to indicate that for some reason he must not have known his own strength. He asks Agastya to explain.[55] Agastya responds with a lengthy and amusing account of Hanumān's infancy, his childish adventures, his conflict with Indra, his acquisition of boons and powers from the gods, his abuse of those powers, and the way in which he came to be ignorant of them.[56] The episode provides almost a kind of comic relief, lightening the mood following the grim account of Rāvaṇa's career and prior to the emotionally wrenching episode of the abandonment of Sītā and its aftermath.

Already immensely powerful at birth, Hanumān, in his mother's absence and overcome with hunger, mistakes the rising sun for a large piece of fruit. He leaps up into the sky, intending to devour it. His effort, however, coincides with the time of a solar eclipse so that the young monkey comes into conflict with the eclipse demon, Rāhu, who is also on his way to engulf the solar orb. Mauled by Hanumān, Rāhu flees to Indra for protection. When the king of the gods attempts to intervene,

[56] This passage is an expansion, with a number of additions and modifications, of the similar account of Hanumān's childish adventures as recounted by Jāmbavān at Kiṣkindhākāṇḍa sarga 65.

Hanumān mistakes his great white war elephant, Airāvata, for yet another piece of fruit. As he rushes upon Indra, the latter defensively strikes him with his dreaded vajra. Wounded, the baby monkey falls on a mountainside, breaking his jaw. This enrages Hanumān's father, the wind god Vāyu, who, as the inner life breath of all creatures, cuts off their respiratory and excretory functions. With the world in crisis, the gods appeal to Brahmā, who counsels them to propitiate Vāyu. They do so, and when Brahmā has healed and restored Hanumān, they all grant the monkey many boons, including invulnerability to their divine weapons as well as great learning, especially in the field of grammar.[57] Indra also bestows upon him his famous name Hanumān, "he of the great jaw," in commemoration of his broken and mended jaw.[58]

But, newly empowered by these boons and blessings, the childish and mischievous monkey, heedless of the admonitions of his parents, rampages through the ashrams of the great seers, smashing their sacrificial vessels and scattering the sacred fires. Respectful of the immunity to punishment granted by Brahmā, the seers finally invoke a mild curse, the effect of which causes Hanumān to forget his own immense strength for a long period. And so it was that, although Hanumān came to forge a profound friendship with Prince Sugrīva, he stood by idly when the latter was forcibly driven out of Kiṣkindhā by Vālin, for he did not at that time realize that he had the power to prevent it.[59]

This popular episode, like many of those in the career of Rāvaṇa, clarifies several previously unexplained features of the central narrative. Thus we learn why Hanumān was of no help to Sugrīva during the latter's conflict with his brother and how he acquired his extraordinary powers and even his otherwise puzzling name. In addition, the story lends a charming, if somewhat undignified, element to the great monkey's history.[60]

Apart from Agastya's interesting tale of Hanumān's childhood, the great monkey does make two brief but significant appearances in the Uttarakāṇḍa. In the thirty-ninth sarga, when Rāma is dismissing and exhorting his allies Sugrīva and Vibhīṣaṇa together with their retainers, Hanumān prostrates himself before him. He begs of Rāma that his own [57] It is these boons that account for Hanumān's epithet Vajrāṅga (Hindi Bajrang), "he of the adamantine body" and his reputation as a great grammarian.

[60] Because of the somewhat embarrassing revelations about Hanumān's foolishness and delinquency as a child, Agastya expresses himself as a bit reluctant to answer Rāma's question. He says, "Because of its extreme childishness, I really ought not tell you, immensely powerful Rāma, what he did in his infancy (bālye 'py etena yat karma kṛtaṃ rāma mahābala / tan na varṇayituṃ śakyam atibālatayāsya te—7.35.17)."

love and devotion be always fixed on him alone and that he might remain alive as long as he can hear the tale of the Rāmāyaṇa recited on earth. Rāma embraces his dear devotee and promises him that the Rāmāyaṇa story will endure as long as the earth itself and that as long as that holds true, so will the breaths of life remain in Hanumān's body. He then removes his own precious pearl necklace from around his neck and lovingly places it around Hanumān's.[61]

The passage is important as it confirms the unique relationship between Rāma and Hanumān, who comes to be regarded as Lord Rāma's paramabhakta, or supreme devotee.[62] As Rāma's blessing also confers, in effect, immortality on his simian devotee, it serves as the rationale for Hanumān's inclusion in the company of the seven legendary immortals, the cirajīvins, of the epic tradition.[63] In addition, it serves to reinforce the prophecy of Brahmā at the time of the composition of the poem that it would endure as long as would the mountains and rivers on the earth.[64]

Hanumān's final appearance in the kāṇḍa and in the epic takes place as Rāma prepares for his departure for the heavenly realm. When the monkeys and rākṣasas who had been Rāma's allies in the great war at Laṅkā learn of Rāma's impending mahāprasthāna, "the great departure from the world," they flock to Ayodhyā, intent on following him to heaven. Rāma grants permission to them all with the exception of his two most ardent devotees, Vibhīṣaṇa and Hanumān.[65] Holding the latter to his earlier pledge, he says:

> "Resign yourself to remaining alive, for you must not violate your vow.

[61] 7.39.14–21. Compare this episode with Sītā's conferral of a pearl necklace that Rāma had given her upon Hanumān at the very end of the Yuddhakāṇḍa (6.116.68–73). For a discussion of the textual, devotional, and iconographic afterlife of this incident, see Lutgendorf 2007, pp. 218–20.

[65] Rāma instructs Vibhīṣaṇa that he must remain alive to rule the rākṣasas in righteousness so long as their race shall endure, brooking no argument from him. As Vibhīṣaṇa is virtually the only dharmic member of a race that is naturally given to adharmic conduct, perhaps Rāma fears that a successor to the Laṅkan throne might revert to the evil ways of Rāvaṇa. As with Hanumān, this accounts for Vibhīṣaṇa's inclusion among the cirajīvins. At 7.98.22–23 he tells the rākṣasa king:

> "Vibhīṣaṇa, as long as your people shall endure, you shall live on as the immensely powerful lord of the rākṣasas in Laṅkā.
> "You must protect your subjects in accordance with righteousness. Please do not argue with me."

> "As long as the tales about me remain current in the world, lord of the tawny monkeys, you must uphold your vow by remaining alive."[66]

It is no doubt these passages that have inspired the popular tradition that Hanumān continues to walk the earth down to the present day and that he is present whenever and wherever the tale of Rāma is told.[67]

RĀVAṆA

As we have discussed in our introductions to some of the previous volumes of the translation, Rāvaṇa, the great antagonist of the epic, is, at least in Vālmīki's portrayal, a more interesting and complex figure than the crude, brutal, and lecherous villain of countless later texts, of performative media, and of the popular imagination. Thus, in spite of his overweening lust and arrogance and the havoc he has wrought throughout the three worlds, he is also represented in the earlier kāṇḍas as a glorious potentate, an obsessed lover, a husband mourned by his many wives, and a figure who at the end comes to realize the folly of his final transgression.[68] But here, in the epic's last book, whose action takes place after the death of the rākṣasa lord, we see different aspects of the character of this monstrous but fascinating antihero and are given, interestingly, some insight into its formation.

As mentioned above, the Uttarakāṇḍa is unique among the books of the epic in devoting so much of its narrative to the pre-Rāmāyaṇa career of Rāvaṇa and to his genealogy and the careers of his ancestors. In fact, the author or authors of the book devote more time and space to these topics than any other, including the deeds of Rāma himself, so that the entire first half of the text can be considered a sort of mini-epic that some scholars have argued was originally a separate narrative.[69] We will discuss what Jacobi called "the Râvaṇeïs" and its significance separately below.[70] But it will be instructive here to turn to the way this section represents Rāvaṇa's character, especially during his formative years and during his campaigns of violence, both military and sexual. In it we also see a number of episodes in which the supposedly invincible conquistador, immunized from violent death through his famous boon, is bested by his adversaries and in which the irresistible ravisher of women is fatally cursed by some of his victims.

The very first things we learn about Rāvaṇa take place before he is born or even conceived, and they are highly determinative of his character. Rāvaṇa's mother, Kaikasī, was the child of the powerful rākṣasa ascetic Sumālin. He appears to take little thought for his beautiful yet unmarried daughter until one day he happens to spy the splendid god of wealth, Kubera, passing by in his magnificent flying palace. The sight of the glorious king of the yakṣas seems to remind Sumālin of the typical concern of fathers, the marriage of their daughters. The connection is, no doubt, that Kubera Vaiśravaṇa is the son of the immensely illustrious sage Viśravas, the son of the seer Pulastya, and grandson of Brahmā himself,[71] and this fact inspires Sumālin with a desire to secure that same sage, Viśravas, as a husband for his daughter.[72]

But, rather than trouble himself with negotiating a marriage arrangement, Sumālin simply sends the innocent girl off on her own to ask the sage to marry her. In this way, he anticipates, Kaikasī will come to have sons who will equal the splendor and power of Viśravas's firstborn, Kubera.[73] Out of respect for her father's command, she goes off at once and approaches Viśravas while he is in a state of consecration for performing the agnihotra rite. The poet describes the moment as "that fearsome hour (dāruṇā velā)."[74]

The sage asks the girl about her parentage and her purpose. She tells him only her name and that she has been sent by her father. Apparently too bashful to state her purpose, she tells the sage to use his extraordinary powers to determine the rest for himself. He does so but warns Kaikasī that since she approached him at such a fearsome hour, she will give birth to fearsome and cruel rākṣasa sons.[75] Horrified by this pronouncement, she pleads that such horrible sons would not be worthy of a descendant of Brahmā. The sage partially relents, promising that her youngest son (Vibhīṣaṇa) alone will be righteous and worthy of his lineage.[76] Thus, in due time, Kaikasī gives birth to Rāvaṇa, Kumbhakarṇa, Śūrpaṇakhā, and the righteous Vibhīṣaṇa. The birth of her eldest is described as follows:

> After some time, Rāma, the young girl, who had been addressed in this fashion, gave birth to a horrendous and very fearsome child, who had

> Then his father, who was the equal of Grandfather Brahmā, gave him his name: "He was born with ten heads, and so he shall be called Daśagrīva, 'Ten Necks.' "[77]

The episode is a curious and disturbing one in which the punishment for the innocent error of a young girl is hideously visited upon her yet-to-be-conceived son by the child's father himself.[78] It also casts an interesting light on the vicious character of Rāvaṇa, or, to give him his proper name at birth, Daśagrīva.[79] For if we follow the logic of the story, Rāvaṇa is hardly to be held accountable for his evil nature. It is attributable to his mother's minor and unintentional transgression and his father's horrible and excessively cruel overreaction to it. Moreover, Rāvaṇa's parental difficulties do not end with his father's prenatal curse. Although he is born with an inherently evil nature, it is his mother who, in her greed and ambition, goads him into a state of bitter envy and ultimately hostility toward his glorious elder half brother, Kubera. He vows to equal or surpass Kubera in power and glory; and it is this that sets him on his course of fearsome asceticism so that he can acquire the boons that will enable him to conquer and terrorize the triple world.[80]

It is worthwhile noting that despite his grim paternal legacy and his maternal incitement to bitter sibling rivalry, Rāvaṇa is not initially portrayed, even after he has secured his boon of near invincibility, as wholly lost to righteousness.[81] Thus when, relying upon his grandson's newly acquired powers, Sumālin and the rākṣasas, who had been driven out of Laṅkā by Viṣṇu in an earlier war and were sheltering in the underworld, now urge him to drive out its current master, Kubera, and reclaim it for his own race, Rāvaṇa initially demurs. Taking recourse to the time-honored Indian tradition of great deference to one's elders, he tells Sumālin,

> "You must not speak in this fashion. The lord of wealth is our revered elder."[82]

But Sumālin persuades him that there can be no question of brotherly affection among heroes. And thus Rāvaṇa's career of conquest begins with his defeat of his own half brother.[83] It is a career marked more than any other in the epic and purāṇic corpus by extreme violence—martial violence against males and sexual violence against females—in which he will violate all norms of familial and social propriety, and engage in cannibalistic assaults on brahmans.

Rāvaṇa's aggressiveness and martial exploits are legendary, and he does not hesitate to challenge any representative of masculine power and authority, whether he be a king, a god, a great serpent, a demon, or even a supreme deity such as Lord Śiva. And it makes little difference to him even if they are his kinsmen, as in his defeat of his half brother, Kubera,[84] and his slaying, in his mad frenzy of battle, of his brother-in-law, the dānava Vidyujjihva, husband of his sister, Śūrpaṇakhā.[85] He does not hesitate in the course of his wild campaign of the abduction of women to attack and kill their kinsmen, including the brahmanical seers themselves.[86]

There is not space here to list all of Rāvaṇa's many battles. However, it is worthwhile to mention a few of them that are particularly striking, either because of some significant consequences they had for his later career and ultimate downfall or because, unlike the majority of his conquests, they ended in his defeat and humiliation.

Perhaps the best-known example of Rāvaṇa's colossal arrogance and his humiliation occurs immediately after his defeat of Kubera. As he flies over Mount Kailāsa in the flying palace Puṣpaka, which he had taken as a prize of war from his half brother, the movement of that aerial palace

In compensation for having made his sister a widow, he sends her off to indulge in untrammeled pleasure in the Daṇḍaka forest under the protection of his kinsmen Khara and Dūṣaṇa and their fourteen thousand powerful rākṣasa troops. This thus sets the stage for the dramatic events that constitute the core of the Araṇyakāṇḍa: the mutilation of Śūrpaṇakhā, the killing of Khara and Dūṣaṇa and their troops, and, finally, Rāvaṇa's fateful abduction of Sītā. is abruptly halted. Rāvaṇa is then confronted by Lord Śiva's great servant Nandīśvara, who tells him that because the mountain is the pleasure ground of the great god and his consort, passage there is forbidden to all beings. In his overweening arrogance, Rāvaṇa is enraged by this prohibition, asking who this Śiva thinks he is. Also, the rākṣasa mocks Nandi's appearance as, for some reason, he, who is usually represented either as a bull or a human, has here the face of a monkey. This, in turn, infuriates Nandi, who curses Rāvaṇa, saying that since he has mocked his simian appearance, in the future powerful monkeys will be born to encompass the destruction of the rākṣasa and his race.[87]

Heedless of Nandi's words, Rāvaṇa decides to show Śiva his immense might by lifting up the entire mountain. He thrusts his twenty arms under it, and as he begins to raise it, Śiva, amused at his presumption, presses it down with his toe, thus crushing Rāvaṇa's arms beneath it. Rāvaṇa roars in agony with a cry so loud it causes the whole world to reverberate. Far from being angry, Śiva is delighted with Rāvaṇa's strength and boldness and frees him. And in celebration of the way his cries had caused the world to reverberate (rāvita) he confers on him his famous sobriquet, Rāvaṇa, "the Reverberator."[88]

Nandi's prophetic curse is merely the first in a string of such imprecations on the part of Rāvaṇa's victims that, collectively, will determine the conditions of his death.[89] Thus, after defeating or subjugating many earthly kings, Rāvaṇa confronts the Ikṣvāku dynast Anaraṇya of Ayodhyā, one of Rāma's illustrious ancestors. As the king expires from a blow of the rākṣasa's hand, he curses his conqueror on the strength of a so-called truth act, or satyakriyā, which enables the virtuous who are true to their dharma to make their wishes come true.[90] Anaraṇya declares that if he has been true to his dharma as a righteous monarch, then so may a future king of his own Ikṣvāku dynasty be born to destroy Rāvaṇa. This, combined with the curse of Nandi, will thus account for Rāvaṇa's death at the hands of Rāma and his army of monkeys.[91]

Interestingly, Rāvaṇa's final two martial conflicts as they are narrated in the Uttarakāṇḍa end in humiliating defeats for this supposedly invincible terror of gods and men. He comes to the city of Māhiṣmatī eager to do battle with its monarch, the Haihaya king Arjuna. Told by the ministers that the king is not in residence, Rāvaṇa decides to take some time to relax on the banks of the lovely Narmadā River, which flows nearby. And so, before encountering his next opponent, Rāvaṇa will bathe, perform worship of Śiva, and sing and dance.[92] What is important here is that what ensues fascinatingly intertwines the two related aspects of Rāvaṇa's aggression, the martial and the erotic. This is signaled by the poet in his erotized description of the feminine Narmadā as a highly sexualized woman, so that the rākṣasa's plunge into her waters is itself a sexual penetration. The river is described as follows:

> The ten-faced bull among rākṣasas descended quickly from the Puṣpaka. Then, just as one might enter the embrace of a lovely and beloved woman, he immersed himself in the Narmadā, the foremost of rivers, which had blossoming trees for a chaplet, a pair of cakravākas for breasts, broad banks for hips, a line of haṃsas for a lovely girdle, a body smeared with pollen, the foam of the water for a white mantle, a plunge into its waters for an embrace, and blooming lotuses for lovely eyes. Afterward, seated on its charming bank, which was adorned with all kinds of flowers, the lord of the rākṣasas, together with his ministers, took pleasure in the sight of the Narmadā.[93]

Arjuna Kārtavīrya, whom Rāvaṇa has come to challenge to battle, is in many ways a kind of hypertrophied doppelgänger of the rākṣasa lord himself. Like Rāvaṇa, he is polymelic; but in place of the rākṣasa's paltry ten arms, Arjuna has a thousand.[94] To the extent that such exaggerated polymelia connotes both extraordinary martial vigor and a correspondingly exaggerated virility in a figure, as it certainly does in the case of these two, the episode is clearly suggesting that Arjuna is one hundred times more powerful in both respects than Rāvaṇa. This strongly foreshadows the outcome of their encounter. The erotic tone of the passage, introduced by the description of the Narmadā, is brought to the fore when Rāvaṇa becomes puzzled as to why the river's current is flowing upstream. He sends spies to discover the cause, and they find that Arjuna is engaged in erotic play with a thousand beautiful young women, calling to mind a mighty bull elephant in the midst of a thousand impassioned elephant cows. Showing off the virile power of his thousand arms, Arjuna has used them to stanch the river's current, causing its waters to flow in reverse. Rāvaṇa challenges him to fight, but Arjuna's ministers tell him not to interrupt their lord's love play. A great battle between the forces of the two kings then breaks out, culminating in a great single mace-duel between the two of them. After the two both deliver and sustain many massive blows, Arjuna strikes Rāvaṇa powerfully on the chest with a blow so devastating that only the rākṣasa's boon prevents it from killing him on the spot. But clearly Arjuna's mace is more powerful than Rāvaṇa's, and the latter, stunned, collapses. With his thousand arms, Arjuna then seizes his fallen foe, binds him, and takes him prisoner.[95] It is only through the intercession of the great sage Pulastya, Rāvaṇa's paternal grandfather, that Arjuna, out of respect for the sage, releases his helpless prisoner. The triumphant and more potent Arjuna and the humiliated and ashamed Rāvaṇa part as friends, and the latter then resumes his career of conquest and slaughter.[96]

But the mighty rākṣasa's worst humiliation is yet to come. Having recovered his high spirits after his defeat at the hands of Arjuna, Rāvaṇa continues his digvijaya and then heads to the vānara stronghold of Kiṣkindhā to challenge the mighty king of the monkeys Vālin. Told by Vālin's minister Tāra that the king has departed to perform his sandhyā ritual in each of the four oceans, Rāvaṇa proceeds to the southern sea, where, finding the monkey absorbed in his ritual, he attempts to steal up on him to seize him. But Vālin is too quick and too powerful for the rākṣasa. Whirling around, he catches Rāvaṇa, tucks him under his armpit, and leaps into the sky. With the great rākṣasa lord dangling helplessly at his side, Vālin swiftly flies to all four oceans, where he completes his ritual performance and then returns to Kiṣkindhā with his captive. Rāvaṇa is dumbfounded and entranced by the power and speed of Vālin and admiringly forms an undying friendship and alliance with him.[97]

This curious episode serves, we believe, two purposes. On the one hand, it demonstrates that even though Vālin was virtually unequaled in power and even mightier than Rāvaṇa himself, Rāma was able to kill him. Agastya, the narrator of the whole saga of Rāvaṇa and the rākṣasas, of which this episode marks the conclusion, tells Rāma:

> "Vālin's supreme might was unequaled, and yet, Rāma, you burned him up as well, as might a fire, a moth."[98]

[95] 7.32.49–72.

[96] Uttarakāṇḍa sarga 33. Agastya, the narrator of Rāvaṇa's history, sees a moral in the episode. At 7.33.22, he tells Rāma:

> "Thus, O delight of the Rāghavas, there are those who are mightier even than the mighty. Therefore, he who desires his own well-being should not hold his enemy in contempt."

The story also indirectly suggests the reason why Vālin had to be eliminated as the lord of the vānaras and replaced with his brother, Sugrīva. For it would have been impossible for Vālin to assist Rāma in the destruction of Rāvaṇa, who had become his close ally and friend.

Equally striking, if not more so, than Rāvaṇa's career of warfare against all creatures and equally significant for its impact on his destiny is his history of violent sexual assaults upon the various women he meets in his career of rapine and conquest. The first of these assaults takes place immediately after the demonstration of Rāvaṇa's impotence in the face of the immensely powerful Lord Śiva during their encounter at Mount Kailāsa. Wandering the earth, the rākṣasa comes upon a beautiful young woman engaged in the practice of asceticism. Rāvaṇa chides her for engaging in spiritual exercises that are so out of keeping with her youth and beauty and asks her why she is doing so. She tells him that her name is Vedavatī and that she is the daughter of the brahman sage Kuśadhvaja and granddaughter of the priestly divinity Bṛhaspati himself. She is thus, in her own words, a veritable incarnation of vedic speech. She further informs him that all supernatural beings sought her hand in marriage but that her father rejected them as suitors, as he was reserving her for none other than Lord Viṣṇu. Because of this, the demon Śambhu murdered her father in his sleep.[99] Vedavatī's mother immolated herself on her husband's pyre, and she herself undertook her course of austerities in order to fulfill her father's desire that she would one day obtain Viṣṇu as her husband. She tells Rāvaṇa, whose lecherous nature she knows through the power of her asceticism, to leave her alone. But, besotted by lust, he belittles Viṣṇu, much as he had earlier done in the case of Śiva, claiming that he is superior to him in every way. He then seizes Vedavatī by the hair, which in the Indian tradition is in itself a form of sexual assault.[100] Violated, she cuts off her defiled hair with her hand, vowing to immolate herself and to be reborn for his destruction.[101] She then enters a blazing fire. It is thus that she is ultimately reborn as Sītā. As is often the case with ascetics in the literature, she chooses not to deplete the accumulated power of her austerities by directly cursing Rāvaṇa, and so, like Anaraṇya and like Sītā in the Uttarakāṇḍa, she resorts to a "truth act" to accomplish her purpose.[102]

[102] Uttarakāṇḍa sarga 17. Vedavatī's "truth act" takes place at 7.17.25–27. Although it is not explicitly stated in the passage, there is little doubt that we are to understand that in marrying Rāma in her reincarnated form as Sītā, Vedavatī is fulfilling her and her father's wish that she should secure Viṣṇu as her husband. In some ways the episode is thematically reminiscent of the widely distributed Śaiva legend of the self-immolation of

Following an inconclusive battle with the Nivātakavacas and his defeat of the sons of Varuṇa,[103] Rāvaṇa pauses on his return journey to Laṅkā to abduct the daughters of kings, seers, gods, gandharvas, yakṣas, rākṣasas, daityas, and dānavas after killing their menfolk and thus demonstrating his insatiable sexual addiction and violence on a massive scale. The ravished women, in their grief and terror, curse Rāvaṇa:

> "Since this evil-minded Rāvaṇa is enamored of women who belong to others, he shall therefore meet his death on account of a woman."[104]

Once again we see a dire prophecy that will come back to haunt Rāvaṇa, as indeed his downfall will later be occasioned by his obsessive lust for a married woman, Sītā.

The immediate consequence of the women's curse, however, is also of interest in this context. For:

> Then, after he was cursed by those virtuous women, who were devoted to their husbands and who were firmly fixed on the path of virtue, he was drained of his blazing energy and robbed of his luster.[105]

In other words, the force of the curse deprives the rākṣasa lord, for a time, of his sexual and martial energies. This passage also provides us with one of those episodes that seems to differentiate the Uttarakāṇḍa's characterization of Rāvaṇa from that which we have seen in the preceding books. In this case, his portrayal as a violent serial predator ripping thousands of wailing, lamenting, and cursing women from their shattered homes and murdered menfolk[106] seems to be in rather sharp contradiction with the description of the women of Rāvaṇa's antaḥpuram, or inner apartments, in the Sundarakāṇḍa, where the poet says of them:

> That immensely powerful warrior had, however, not taken a single one of the women there by force; rather, they had been won over by his virtues. With the sole exception of Janaka's daughter, who was > deserving of only the best, not one of them desired another man or had previously belonged to one.[107]

[106] The description of Rāvaṇa's deeds here conforms very closely to the śāstraic prescription for the so-called rākṣasa form of marriage as stated, for example, at ManuSm 3.33:

It is difficult to see these two passages as coming from the same hand.

The final and most dramatic example of Rāvaṇa's acts of sexual violence depicted in the Uttarakāṇḍa involves a double outrage, rape and incest.[108] This is his encounter with the apsaras Rambhā and the fateful curse of Nalakūbara that is its consequence. On a moonlit night while encamped with his forces on Mount Kailāsa, the rākṣasa encounters the incomparably beautiful and richly adorned apsaras, who is on her way to a tryst with her lover, Nalakūbara, the son of Rāvaṇa's elder half brother, Kubera. As in the episode involving Arjuna Kārtavīrya, the poet sets the scene by describing the classic uddīpanavibhāvas, or environmental stimulant factors, of the śṛṅgārarasa, or erotic sentiment, here the rising moon, the cool breeze, the fragrant blossoms, and the like. They serve only to inflame the rākṣasa's ever-raging lust.

Rāvaṇa accosts Rambhā and proposes that she give herself to him. He asks her whom she is going to meet, boasting as before about his superiority to all other potential lovers, including the gods themselves. Rambhā resists, saying that she is on her way to meet her lover, Nalakūbara, Rāvaṇa's nephew, which makes her, according to the conventions of Indian society, in effect Rāvaṇa's daughter-in-law. She therefore claims Rāvaṇa's protection. But, heedless of her appeal and inflamed with lust, he seizes Rambhā and forcibly rapes her.[109] Released after her violation, she runs to her lover and tells him what has happened. Once [109] Accounts of actual physical rape, that is to say, in our modern usage of the term, forcible sexual penetration of an unwilling person, as opposed to abduction or sexual battery, are very rare in the epic literature. There are many descriptions of sexual assault and abduction in both epics and in many purāṇas and, indeed, they lie at the emotional centers of both the Rāmāyaṇa and Mahābhārata. But in virtually all such cases the victims are rescued before they can be physically raped, or, as in the case of Sītā, are protected by a curse and/or their own ascetic power or truth act (satyakriyā). The only other examples of an actual physical rape described in either epic also occur in the Uttarakāṇḍa. The first is that of Ahalyā, who in the Uttarakāṇḍa's version is raped by Indra rather than tricked into having intercourse with him (7.30.26–27). As punishment for the violation of Ahalyā, Indra is cursed by her husband, Gautama, to suffer capture at the hands of his enemies, the loss of his permanent tenure as king of the gods, and the fate of having to suffer half of the guilt of all further rapes (7.30.29–33). The second is that of King Daṇḍa's quasi-incestuous rape of Arajā, the daughter of his purohita and guru Uśanas Kāvya, as narrated in the Uttarakāṇḍa in sargas 71–72. This assault, too, results in a dreadful punishment in the form of a deadly curse pronounced by Uśanas. This curse is so severe that it brings about the destruction not only of the guilty Daṇḍa but of all his retainers, troops, and mounts, and his entire kingdom as well (7.72.3–10). See, too, Introduction, "Structure," pp. 151–54.

Nalakūbara has satisfied himself as to the veracity of her report,[110] he ritually sips water and curses Rāvaṇa so that, should he ever force himself again on an unwilling woman, he would die, his head shattered into seven pieces.[111] When Rāvaṇa learns of the curse, he loses his desire to engage in nonconsensual sex.

As in the preceding cases in which Rāvaṇa is cursed for his various acts of martial and sexual violence, the curse here is designed to account for some significant condition or event that will be of importance in the Rāmāyaṇa story proper. In this case, the issue is of critical importance, for it is only Nalakūbara's fearsome curse that deters Rāvaṇa from forcibly ravishing Sītā when he has her at his mercy in captivity. In this way her sexual purity is not compromised.

With this doubly outrageous incident, the poet brings the obloquy of Rāvaṇa to its ultimate height and sets the stage for his final destruction through his own unbounded libidinal excess. This is signaled at the close of the episode when, upon hearing of the curse preventing any future rapes on Rāvaṇa's part, the gods celebrate, assured now of their enemy's ultimate doom.[112]

Aside from its accounts of Rāvaṇa's assaults as a martial aggressor and serial assaulter of women, the Uttarakāṇḍa makes at least a token nod to the popular view of rākṣasas as flesh-eating, blood-guzzling, and man-eating ogres in regard to the epic's chief antagonist. This characterization of Rāvaṇa is generally played down in the poem in contrast to the gory descriptions of the cruder, solitary, forest-dwelling members of the race, such as Kabandha and Virādha,[113] the latter of whose turn on the epic stage is an ominous precursor of Rāvaṇa's abduction of Sītā.[114]

By contrast with these nightmarish creatures, the splendid and urbane prince Rāvaṇa is only rarely shown as a cannibalistic monster. This aspect of his nature is first shown in the Araṇyakāṇḍa when he threatens to devour Sītā should she not yield to his sexual advances within the period of a year,[115] a threat renewed in the Sundarakāṇḍa.[116] Perhaps feeling the lack of this aspect of the stereotypical nature of the rākṣasas as both cannibals and implacable foes of brahmanical society and religion, the account of Rāvaṇa's career in the Uttarakāṇḍa mentions, almost as an aside, his outrageous act of devouring all of the officiating priests at King Marutta's sacrifice. There we learn that:

[110] Note that Nalakūbara, although he sees Rambhā's disheveled and distraught state, is unwilling to take her at her word without first verifying her account by determining the truth independently through meditation. See notes to 7.26.40.

> Rāvaṇa then devoured the great seers who had assembled there for the sacrifice and, sated with their blood, once more began to roam the earth.[117]

Thus it appears that the lengthy account of Rāvaṇa's antecedents and career of violence is in part intended to further enhance his reputation for reckless and indiscriminate evil. This contrasts to some extent with the portrait of a deeply flawed but glorious monarch doomed by the almost tragic flaw of his insatiable desire that is painted by the poet in earlier sections of the poem, particularly the Sundarakāṇḍa. It also provides the poem's audience with the backstories, as it were, of many of the facts and incidents narrated in the preceding six books. For in it we learn of the dreadful prenatal curse of Rāvaṇa and his bitter sibling rivalry with Kubera as well as how and why Sītā was born for his destruction, why he was destined to die because of a woman, why he had to be slain by a scion of the Ikṣvāku dynasty assisted by divine monkeys, and why he was unable to force himself sexually on Sītā.

3. The Rākṣasas of the Uttarakāṇḍa

From its very beginning, the Uttarakāṇḍa draws us into the world of the rākṣasas. It could be argued that the entire poem is obsessed with these dreaded creatures of the night, who haunt the epic from its first book. In addition to the many encounters that the epic heroes have with these demonic creatures, two of the poem's kāṇḍas—the Sundara- and Yuddha—locate their action in the island-fortress of the rākṣasas, Laṅkā, or its environs. Throughout the epic, the poet delights in describing the rākṣasas as creatures of excess, especially in their libidinal desires and their violent, bloodthirsty nature. These excesses are most vividly portrayed in the hypererotized and terrifying figure of the rākṣasa lord, Rāvaṇa. Despite the virtual obsession of both poet and audience with the rākṣasas and the graphic and detailed descriptions that the poet uses in his construction of these figures, the first six books of the epic leave its audience largely ignorant as to who they really are. It is this lack that the extended narrative of the history of the rākṣasas in the Uttarakāṇḍa attempts to address.

What strikes one about the Uttarakāṇḍa at the outset is that the first thirty-four of the one hundred sargas of the critical edition are occupied with a detailed account of the rakṣovaṃśa, or the genealogy of the rākṣasas, in general, and with the lineage and biography of Rāvaṇa, in particular. In other words, approximately one-third of the sargas and almost one half of the text of the final book of Vālmīki's epic tale concern themselves with the ancestry and the career of the epic's principal antagonist, who is considered to be the very essence of evil.[1] Although there have been a few, somewhat convincing, studies that attempt to explain and contextualize this seemingly tangential narrative,[2] in the main, this section of the epic has been largely ignored by scholars, who generally consider it late and spurious.[3] Yet this opening section of the kāṇḍa is more than a haphazard addition on the part of redactors. Its mere length speaks to its importance. The thirty-four opening sargas are made up of 1,277 ślokas, or verses, in the critical edition. This section is thus approximately the same as the epic's treatment of the vānaras found in the Kiṣkindhākāṇḍa, the epic's shortest book (sixty-six sargas), in which the first thirty-eight sargas tell of the events in Kiṣkindhā, the capital city of the vānaras, and contain approximately twelve hundred ślokas. Given the average length of the sargas in this opening section of the Uttarakāṇḍa compared with that found in the remainder of the kāṇḍa, the history of the rākṣasas accounts for a full half of the book.[4] Clearly the rākṣasas and their world loomed large in the imagination of the author and audiences of the Uttarakāṇḍa.

[1] See Introduction, "Characters," pp. 24–35.

[2] Jacobi was one of the earliest scholars to note the unique nature of these sargas (see Introduction, "Synopsis," p. 6) and to argue that they constituted an originally independent epic tale. Antoine is one of the few scholars who have attempted to establish this through a comparison of the section's narrative structure with other sections of the epic. See, for example, Jacobi 1893, p. 26 and Antoine 1975, pp. 46–54, also cited by Brockington 1998, pp. 391–92.

Who were these rākṣasas? Vālmīki's Rāmāyaṇa presents us with what can only be described as a mixed, and at times seemingly contradictory, picture of the creatures. Most scholarly efforts to identify the rākṣasas have been attempts to historicize both their race and location. Thus there has been and continues to be intense scholarly debate concerning the exact location of the rākṣasas' fortress of Laṅkā on Mount Trikūṭā,[5] as well as much scholarly energy expended on establishing the ethnicity of the rākṣasas.[6] But, as Pollock has pointed out in his introduction to the [4] See Introduction, "Work," pp. 54–55.

[5] The earliest and most common identification of Laṅkā was with the island of Ceylon, modern Sri Lanka, or with a city located there. Oppert (1893, pp. 87–88) was one of the first to suggest the association. But see, too, Talboys-Wheeler 1869, p. 232. Following Oppert, other scholars make a similar identification (Gorresio 1870, p. ii; Weber 1870, pp. 8–9; Pargiter 1894, pp. 233–34; Ramadas 1925, 1929; Ramaswamy Sastri 1938; John 1940, p. 279; Chaudhuri 1951; Pandey 1962; Pulsalkar 1966; Vyas 1967, pp. 29, 43–44; Das 1971, pp. 61–63; Mirashi 1974–1975; S. C. De 1976; Sircar 1979; Guruge 1960, pp. 51–58 [1991, pp. 67–69]; Shukla 2003, p. 179; etc.). Other scholarly opinions as to the identification of Laṅkā are varied, ranging from an uncertainty as to the viability of any identification (Jacobi 1893, p. 99; Keith 1915, pp. 324–25; Brockington 1998, p. 423; etc.) to an identification with the mountain known as Amarakaṇṭaka and/or a location on Indrana Hill or the hills near Indrana (Kibe 1928, p. 123, and 1936, 1939, 1941, 1947, 1960; Ghosh 1929; Harilal 1937; Iyer 1940, pp. 17, 32; Mankad 1965, p. lxiii; Shah 1975, p. 47; Yardi, 1994, pp. 38–48, 2001, pp. 82–83; etc.) or on Indrana Hill in Chota Nāgpūr (Sankalia 1976, 1980–1981), or at the mouth of the Godavari River (Mishra 1985). There are also identifications that are a bit geographically further afield, such as Mohenjodāro (Roy 1982), Sumatra (Adhikari 1920–1921), the Maldive Islands (Vader 1926; Nadkarni 1957), and Australia (Mehta 1941, pp. 160ff.). See, too, Brockington (1998, pp. 420, 423), who remarks on the excessive interest of scholarship in identifying the location of Laṅkā. Brockington (1998, p. 423) comments: "It is likely, therefore, that both Kiṣkindhā and Laṅkā would have lain in the upland areas approximately between Jabalpur and the Chota Nagpur plateau, either in reality or only in the poet's imagination; whether we can ever identify the localities intended is doubtful at best." See, too, R. Goldman 1984, p. 27.

[6] Thus most scholars treat the rākṣasas as a fundamentally human group, identifying them as essentially human but generally aboriginals or tribal peoples (Weber 1870, pp. 8–9, 46; C. V. Vaidya 1906, pp. 98–102; Vyas 1967, pp. 28–29; R. Sharma 1971, p. 271; Guruge 1960 [1991], pp. 85–89; Thapar 1978, p. 19 [but cf. Thapar 2013, pp. 210–11]; Brockington 1998, p. 423; etc.). A number of studies have attempted to identify specific Araṇyakāṇḍa, these efforts to historicize the rākṣasas and others serve more to obfuscate their role in the epic than to enlighten us. In fact, such projects, Pollock suggests, serve as windows into the historical moment and location of their authors rather than providing insights into the epic or its author and audience.[7]

Moreover, the picture Vālmīki presents of the rākṣasas is complicated. His epic is peopled by numerous rākṣasas, the representation of whom, as Hopkins has noted, is diverse, presenting a complex and seemingly contradictory picture;[8] for, in his words, "They help the gods; they fight against the gods. They are beautiful; they are hideous. They are weaker than gods or Gandharvas; they overcome the gods with ease. They protect; they injure."[9] Others have noted this complexity and have offered various analyses, taking their lead from Hopkins. A common theme is that the rākṣasas can be classified by their differing types or differing behavior. Thus, C. V. Vaidya remarks on the inconsistency in the perception of these creatures,[10] while S. N. Vyas understands that Vālmīki's rākṣasas represent three distinct clans:[11] (1) that of Virādha, the descendant of Java and Śatahṛdā;[12] (2) that of the dānavas, that is, Kabandha, who is also called Danu,[13] whom Vyas understands to be hostile toward Rāvaṇa and the inhabitants of Laṅkā; and (3) that of the rākṣasas of Laṅkā, ruled by Rāvaṇa. Vyas hypothesizes that while the rākṣasas of the epic were originally the aboriginal peoples of the subcontinent and Laṅkā, they were eventually transformed into spirits, good or evil, depending on whether or not they supported or opposed the Aryan peoples. Similarly, R. Sharma identifies two types of rākṣasas: those who are tribes or "peoples," such as Dravidians (technically a linguistic group) (Pargiter 1894; Dikshitar 1933; Mishra 1985, pp. 19–20; Yardi 1994, pp. 67–69; 2001, pp. 89–92; etc.), the Gonds (Kibe 1914, 1928, 1936, 1939, 1941, 1947, 1960; Ramadas 1929; Ghosh 1929; Iyer 1940, p. 18; Shah 1975, p. 49; etc.), etc. Some scholars have identified the rākṣasas as either Buddhists (Talboys-Wheeler 1869, pp. 231–32; Biardeau 1999, p. 1707) or Aryans attached to the ancient Śiva cult (Ramaswamy Sastri 1938, p. 105). Grierson (1912) appears not to object to a historicizing project but is noncommittal. A number of scholars avoid identification (R. Sharma 1971, pp. 270–78; Wurm 1976, pp. 159–260; Shukla 2003, pp. 197–99; etc.) or actively resist such efforts altogether (Hopkins 1915, pp. 38–46; R. Goldman 1984, pp. 26–29; Pollock 1991, p. 71; Goldman and Goldman 1996, p. 65; Thapar 2013, pp. 232–36; etc.). Biardeau (1999, pp. 1678–90) discusses the genealogy of the rākṣasas but basically reiterates what is found in the text.

rākṣasas by birth and those who are transformed into rākṣasas, typically through a curse arising from a specific transgression.[14] R. K. Shukla agrees, identifying two categories of rākṣasas: those who are rākṣasas by birth and those who are rākṣasas by culture.[15] The latter are those who, like Virādha and Kabandha, have become rākṣasas because of serious transgressions.

Pollock's insightful analysis of the rākṣasas acknowledges similar distinctions between the rākṣasas of the forest and those of the city. Concerning Virādha and Kabandha, Pollock tells us, "Both Virādha and Kabandha are, with epic imprecision, called rākṣasas, but what among other things differentiates them from rākṣasas is that they live permanently in the forest, alone and without community."[16] And he, too, reminds us that these forest-dwelling rākṣasas suffer their current condition as punishment for moral transgressions.[17] Of Rāvaṇa and the rākṣasa inhabitants of Laṅkā, Pollock notes that it is their very humanlike qualities that make them and their deviations from accepted behavior so appealing and yet horrific to the epic's audiences.[18]

In our introduction to the Sundarakāṇḍa, we introduced yet another possible dynamic to help understand the rākṣasa world of Laṅkā: class.[19] We highlight the dichotomy between the monstrous rākṣasīs and the beautiful, cultivated creatures of the palaces and mansions of Laṅkā and suggest that this might be reflective of the stratification of class. The upper class, the members of the royal court—including the beautiful women of Rāvaṇa's harem[20]—are set in juxtaposition to the lower class, the deformed and disfigured rākṣasīs who taunt Sītā in her captivity.[21] Such a dichotomy based on class, rather than ethnicity, as it were, is clearly paralleled in the court of Ayodhyā in the figures of Kaikeyī [18] Pollock 1991, p. 75. Oppert (1843, pp. 525–26) was perhaps the first to suggest this concerning the demonic classes in general, arguing: "I believe it will be admitted that the Asuras, Rākṣasas, and other fiendish demons owe their existence primarily to the imagination of Aryan minds, but that the non-Aryan element of the Indian population contributed afterwards considerably to the further development and boundless enlargement of the number, activity, and power of these fiends" (p. 526).

and her wicked maidservant Mantharā, where the former is beautiful, "golden-hued," and the latter deformed. Evil in both groups is marked by deformity.[22]

Integral to both Pollock's and our analyses is the highly sexualized nature and behavior of the rākṣasas. Pollock notes how their unrestrained sexuality permeates the poem and remarks on the relative harshness of the epic message as contrasted with other similar narratives.[23] The Sundarakāṇḍa with its development of śṛṅgārarasa, or the erotic sentiment, provides an ideal locus to articulate a fascination with and yet fear of the libidinal. For as Hanumān searches the island citadel of Laṅkā for the abducted queen, where could he possibly look for her other than the place where the feminine resides and that is the locus of sexual activity? The antaḥpuram, or inner apartment, is the very site of the exotic, the gustatory, and the erotic.[24] If in the Araṇyakāṇḍa we discover the libidinal excesses of the rākṣasas, in the Sundarakāṇḍa we find sexual excess located not only in the rākṣasa world, but, more specifically, mapped onto the feminine bodies that lie at the very center of that world.[25]

The Uttarakāṇḍa's rather extensive representation of the rākṣasas is structurally quite different from that found in the preceding books. Up until now the rākṣasa world has been elaborately described, especially in the Sundara- and Yuddhakāṇḍas as largely situated in Laṅkā and in its outpost in the Daṇḍaka wilderness. Moreover, the events of all the preceding kāṇḍas are described in a relatively fast-moving narrative in which the hero, the heroine, and the antagonist actively engage in a power struggle. The action and the narrative are intended to be largely simultaneous.[26] But in the Uttarakāṇḍa the struggle is over, the antagonist defeated, and the heroine rescued. The main action is located in Ayodhyā, following the return and coronation of Rāma. Now king, Rāma is overcome with curiosity about the history of his erstwhile nemesis. The narrative is thus now one of historical interest. Rāma wishes to know the family history of these rākṣasas and, in particular, that of Rāvaṇa and Indrajit. At its outset, the epic has made clear the lineage of its hero and heroine, each of whom is provided with a genealogy and biography in its opening book.[27] But the narrative, up until this point, has [26] Technically, of course, the entire epic is a narrative of past (and to some extent future) events as Lava and Kuśa are said to be reciting or singing the epic story to Rāma during his aśvamedha sacrifice.

[27] See, for example, Bālakāṇḍa sargas 37–43 and 69.15–32, where Rāma's family history never provided similar detail concerning the king of the demons, Rāvaṇa.[28]

The opening narrative of the Uttarakāṇḍa, framed as a response to Rāma's questions, seems situated far from Rāvaṇa's Laṅkā.[29] Sages, led by Agastya, have arrived at Rāma's court in Ayodhyā in order to felicitate him for his victory over the rākṣasas. The ṛṣis, men for whom celibacy is a cherished life goal, will function to encapsulate the violent and erotized narrative of the history of the rākṣasas within an ascetic and masculine frame. The words of the holy men are somewhat surprising to Rāma, for they express great relief over and offer fulsome praise for the slaying of Indrajit and the other fierce rākṣasas killed by Rāma and his monkey hosts, but demonstrate little interest in Rāvaṇa and his role in the great battle of the Yuddhakāṇḍa.[30] Rāma then questions Agastya:

> "Why is it, sirs, that you pass over those two immensely powerful warriors Kumbhakarṇa and the night-roaming rākṣasa Rāvaṇa only to praise Indrajit Rāvaṇi?
> "Why is it that you pass over those immensely powerful warriors Mahodara, Prahasta, and the rākṣasa Virūpākṣa only to praise Indrajit Rāvaṇi?
> "What was his power like? What was his strength? What was his valor? And what was the reason that he surpassed even Rāvaṇa?
> "I am not commanding you, but if I am permitted to hear it, if it is not a secret, and if you can tell me, I wish to hear it. Please tell me. How did he conquer Śakra and how did he obtain his boons?"[31]

The question seems innocuous and reasonable. Rāma, who with his brother and allies has just engaged in a prolonged confrontation with and genealogy are provided; Bālakāṇḍa sarga 70, where Janaka recites Sītā's lineage; and the Ayodhyākāṇḍa, where Sītā briefly tells Anasūyā of her wedding and names some of her ancestors (2.110.26–52). See, too, S. Goldman 2016.

[28] At various points in the epic, the poet describes Rāvaṇa as the son of Viśravas (1.19.17; 3.64.16; 4.57.19; 5.16.24), and at 5.21.6–7, Sītā's rākṣasī guards identify him as the son of Viśravas. The critical edition of the Rāmāyaṇa refers to Rāvaṇa by his patronymic Paulastya, "descendant of Pulastya," some seventeen times, but never by the patronymic Vaiśravaṇa, which is reserved for his half brother, Kubera (3.3.18; 3.46.2,4,20; 3.59.29; 4.42.22; 5.7.7; 5.18.32; passim). Interestingly, however, at 7.3.29, Kubera is called the "lord of the rākṣasas." On Rāvaṇa's identity, see Goldman and Masson 1969.

[31] 7.1.24–27. Rāma's question is somewhat curious in that, in fact, the sages have just praised Rāma for killing Prahasta, Vikaṭa, Virūpākṣa, Mahodara, Akampana, as well as Kumbhakarṇa (7.1.16–17).

the rākṣasas, might well be curious to know more details about this race and its leader. Agastya's response, while only partially addressing Rāma's questions,[32] opens with the history of a lineage. However, it is not the lineage of Rāvaṇa that is first narrated; rather, it is that of his half brother, Kubera. The filial relationship between the two will, nevertheless, only be made clear in sarga 9, where Rāvaṇa's father's family is finally introduced; for Kubera and Rāvaṇa share a father, and their family histories and births have much in common.

The genealogy of the rākṣasas in general, and, more specifically, of Rāvaṇa and his siblings, occupies the first twelve sargas of the kāṇḍa. This is then followed by the chronicle of Rāvaṇa's rise to power, discussed above, and his career of assaults and conquests throughout the triple world. The genealogy appears at its inception to be yet another masculinist list of fathers begetting sons, such as are found in numerous epic and purāṇic accounts.[33] But the narrative deviates from this norm almost immediately, creating fissures in which we can find clues to further understand why these rākṣasas are so central to the epic's narrative and what function they serve in the Uttarakāṇḍa.

The lineage of Kubera that Agastya relates traces itself back to the brahman-seer Pulastya, a mind-born son of the creator Brahmā.[34] Pulastya takes up residence near the ashram of the sage Tṛṇabindu on the slopes of Mount Meru, where he undertakes vedic recitation and practices austerities. It just so happens that the very spot where Pulastya is engaged in his religious activities is the same one where beautiful young girls—the daughters of the gods, great serpents, apsarases, and royal seers—would come to play. These distractions anger the sage and he declares, "Any young girl who comes within sight of me shall become pregnant."[35] The girls, fearful of such an unwelcome condition, stop coming there. The daughter of Tṛṇabindu, however, unaware of the sage's pronouncement, wanders into that area unknowingly and so becomes pregnant. Her father, realizing what has happened, gives her to the sage in marriage. And Pulastya, pleased, now awards her a boon, saying:

[32] Somewhat ironically Agastya's narrative deals only peripherally with Rāvaṇa's son Indrajit and never really addresses Rāma's questions. Indrajit Rāvaṇi himself is discussed in only three passages in the Uttarakāṇḍa: 1) at 7.12.26–29, where his birth and the origin of his epithet Meghanāda are described; 2) at 7.25.4–15, where he said to perform a number of sacrifices in order to gain his martial and magical powers; and 3) at sarga 29, where he actually defeats and captures Indra, thus earning his best-known epithet, Indrajit.

[34] The Uttarakāṇḍa does not itself identify Pulastya as a mind-born son of Brahmā. Such an identification is, however, found in both the Sundarakāṇḍa (5.21.6–7) and in the Mahābhārata (1.59.10; 1.60.4; 3.258.12).

> "Bless you, I am greatly pleased with the abundance of your virtues. Therefore, I shall this very day grant you a son who will be my equal in virtues. He shall continue both our lineages and shall be renowned as Paulastya.
> "Since you overheard [viśrutaḥ] the vedas as I was reciting them, he shall, no doubt, also be renowned as Viśravas."[36]

The son of Tṛṇabindu's daughter, Viśravas, conceived as his father was reciting vedic mantras and, more importantly, as his mother was listening to them, will be virtuous. Many of the themes played out here are not original, and similar tales telling of the tension between the ascetic and sexual pervade the religious and poetic literature.[37]

Once the narrative is appropriately situated, doubly marked, as it were, by masculine brahmanic celibacy, first by the ascetics led by Agastya and then by Pulastya himself, whose own birth lacks any female agency, the feminine is introduced. The young girls pose a sexual threat to the celibate world of the seer. The sage, through his pronouncement, has neutralized it and established a physical space wherein he is protected from temptation. However, Pulastya's space is not absolutely inviolable, and one young woman unknowingly trespasses into it and suffers the consequences, impregnation. Her father immediately marries her to the sage and soon after she gives birth to a son. In this way her potentially unconstrained and previously threatening sexuality is contained and domesticated within the institution of patriarchal marriage. Additionally, the sage is provided with a son and heir, while Pulastya remains true to his ascetic vows.

A second, less obvious, but equally important dynamic of the narrative is the role that the wife/mother plays in shaping the character of her son. In the patriarchal world of traditional brahmanical India, as it is most commonly represented in the epic literature, the wife/mother is viewed as a mere vehicle or locus (kṣetra, literally "field") for the production of a son. In many well-known narratives, the female is entirely dispensed with as the medium for the conception and gestation of a child and is replaced by an animal or inanimate surrogate, such as a pot.[38] While the Rāmāyaṇa, given its restricted narrative, tends to be more limited in its use of this motif of surrogacy than, for example, the much more capacious Mahābhārata, it, nevertheless, expresses its discomfort with the human reproductive process in a number of similar ways.[39] Indeed, the narrator of the entire history of the rākṣasas, Agastya, is himself one of the tradition's group of sages said to have been born directly from a pot into which his father had deposited his semen.[40]

Here, of course, Pulastya is distanced from any sexual impropriety, displacing any direct sexual desire and potency onto his erotized and fecundating gaze. Because of the mother's hearing, even if accidentally, the chanting of vedic hymns, the son inherits the virtues associated with that vedic recitation. Viśravas, like his father, becomes an ascetic and is given Devavarṇinī, the daughter of Bharadvāja, as his wife. They too have a son endowed with all the idealized virtues of a brahman. He will become known by the patronymic Vaiśravaṇa, "son of Viśravas." Also known by the name Kubera, he performs such severe austerities that his great-grandfather Brahmā grants him the boon of becoming one of the lokapālas, or divine world guardians. He is also given the Puṣpaka flying palace in which he can range the heavens. His father, Viśravas, pleased, then gives him the city of Laṅkā, which had earlier been abandoned by the rākṣasas. Vaiśravaṇa repopulates Laṅkā with its rākṣasa inhabitants, also called nairṛtas, "sons of chaos," and becomes their lord.[41]

Like his father and his grandfather before him, Vaiśravaṇa is a brahman, but, unlike either of them, he takes no wife, and, despite his brahmanic heritage, he becomes the ruler of a kingdom. Rāma, perhaps uncertain, like the audience, as to the relevance of Agastya's account of Kubera's lineage to his original question, once again interrupts the narrative to ask the sage how the rākṣasas originally came to be in Laṅkā. Rāma, who had always heard that the rākṣasas came from the lineage of Pulastya, is astonished to learn that they originated elsewhere, and he presses the sage for further information.[42] In response, Agastya now relates the full history and genealogy of the rākṣasas. The masculinist frame of the narrative, momentarily disrupted by the intrusion of the tale of Tṛṇabindu's daughter, is now reestablished. But the story shifts to a detailed account of the origin of the rākṣasa lineage (sargas 4–8). What is most fascinating about this account of the lineage is that, unlike virtually any other such account in the epic or purāṇic literature, it relates Rāvaṇa's mother's lineage, not his father's.[43]

[39] For example, see 1.15.12–28 for the impregnation of Daśaratha's three wives through the consumption of pāyasa and 7.51-4* for the birth of Agastya and Vasiṣṭha from a pot. See, too, notes to 1.8.7.

[43] Rāvaṇa's father's lineage is the same as that of Kubera; however, at this point the narrative has not made that clear.

We now learn that the rākṣasas, although created by Brahmā Prajāpati, are not genealogically descended from him. Rather, Brahmā, having first created the waters, brings forth creatures—called yakṣas and rākṣasas—to protect them.[44] Among the original rākṣasas there were two brothers, Heti and Praheti. The latter desired no wife, but the former, Heti, married Bhayā, Kāla's sister, by whom he had a son named Vidyutkeśa.[45] Once again the opening narration of the genealogy follows a normative pattern, but this, too, is soon disrupted. Vidyutkeśa's father, Heti, feeling that it is time for his son to be married, approaches Sandhyā, whose daughter he is anxious to acquire as a wife for his son. We are provided no information concerning Sandhyā, her parents, or even her race. Nor is there any explanation as to why Sandhyā, rather than her husband, would be in negotiations with Heti concerning her daughter's marriage. Elsewhere in Vālmīki's epic, such marital arrangements are generally made by males.[46] Sandhyā does not appear to be overly eager for the proposed alliance but agrees to it. Her daughter, we discover, is named Sālakaṭaṅkaṭā, a name that scholars have pondered much over in their identification of the rākṣasas.[47] Shortly after her marriage, Sālakaṭaṅkaṭā becomes pregnant and resorts to Mount Mandara, where she bears a son, Sukeśa.[48] At this point, rather than transitioning into the next generation in the lineage, as expected, or even depicting a normative transition of a woman from a sexual object into a maternal one, as we saw with Tṛṇabindu's daughter, the narrative is further disrupted. Sālakaṭaṅkaṭā, interested only in lovemaking, abandons her newborn son and returns to her husband.[49] Sālakaṭaṅkaṭā's unexpected and unmotherly behavior forces our attention away from the anticipated genealogical narrative.[50] The figure of Sandhyā, clearly a harbinger of this disruption, has already used gender to upset the expected narrative flow, [44] 7.4.9–13. In the creation of these beings, we have the famous etymological basis for the names of both the rākṣasas and the yakṣas. Scholars and students of the epics have long been puzzled over the polysemic verbal root √rakṣ, which can mean "to injure" as well as "to protect." See Pollock 1991, p. 74, note 156; and notes to 7.4.13.

[45] 7.4.15–17.

[46] See, for example, Bālakāṇḍa sargas 66–72, where all the arrangements for Rāma and Sītā's wedding are done by males; see, too, 7.12.1, where Rāvaṇa arranges the marriage of Śūrpaṇakhā. But see below, where the gandharva woman Narmadā makes the marital arrangements for her daughters.

[49] 7.4.25. The abandonment of female infants is not unknown in the epic literature, the most famous and well-known example being that of Śakuntalā by the apsaras Menakā (MBh 1.66). See, too, Sundarakāṇḍa 26.2, where the poet compares Sītā to a female child abandoned in the wilderness. What makes Sālakaṭaṅkaṭā's case especially egregious in the cultural context is not that an infant is abandoned but that it is a male infant.

[50] See S. Goldman 2016.

but now Sālakaṭaṅkaṭā's abandonment of her maternal role to satisfy her libidinal desires has located insatiable sexual appetite in the female body and has aligned it with the rākṣasa world.

While Sandhyā is apparently the original "matriarch," it is her daughter, Sālakaṭaṅkaṭā, who gets the credit for this; for it is her name that becomes associated with the rākṣasa lineage, or at least one branch of it.[51] The counternormative behavior that these women and their descendants exhibit is both located in the feminine and marked as other, that is, outside or beyond the Aryan world.[52]

The Uttarakāṇḍa clearly constructs the rākṣasa lineage as different from that of other groups, and a strong indication of this difference is the prominence that the mother's family plays in it. This distinction is recognized and rationalized by a number of scholars who identify this role of the mother's family in the lineage as a marker of matrilineal societies, and thus, they argue, we can assume that the rākṣasas were a matrilineal society.[53] For example, in his Society of the Vālmīki Rāmāyaṇa, R. Sharma, who understands the rākṣasas to be "essentially human beings,"[54] notes that there is a significant difference between these rākṣasas and the Aryans, as well as all the other peoples that populate Vālmīki's epic, and that is "the 'matrilineal character' of their family life."[55] Sharma continues: "It was only due to this peculiar character of the Rākshasas that notwithstanding the fact that their father was Pulastya, a brahmarshi, Rāvaṇa

[53] The terms patrilineal and matrilineal are understood as social structures and are defined as relating to, based on, or tracing ancestral descent through the paternal and maternal lines, respectively. The terms are also used of traditions wherein the father's or mother's surnames are inherited from father to son, or mother to daughter, or wherein hereditary succession or other inheritance is handed down through the father's or mother's line. Brodbeck (2009, p. 14) distinguishes the terms patriarchy and matriarchy from patriliny/patrilocy and matriliny/matrilocy; the -archy is associated with power; while the -liny is associated with a "lineal" descent, and the -locy with location of residence. He understands the Mahābhārata to be patrilineal and patrilocal, at least in theory.

[54] R. Sharma 1971, p. 271. In so doing, Sharma cites Hopkins 1915, pp. 39, 46. Hopkins is, however, not so explicit, understanding that "Even in the Rāma-tale of the Mbh., Rāvaṇa, the chief Rākṣasa, is less royal-human than in Vālmīki's version" (39) and "In the R, the royal Rākṣasas are nobler and more like Asuras" (p. 46).

and his brothers were recognised as Rākshasas because they were born of Kaikasī who was a rākshasī."[56]

R. Thapar, in a similar vein, but somewhat more cautiously, notes, "It is also curious that Rāvaṇa whose father was the brahma-ṛṣi Pulastya [sic] is, however, given the status of his mother who was a rākṣasi."[57] R. K. Shukla, who merely comments that "The Rākṣasas can be distinguished from the Āryans in the matrilineal character of their family life,"[58] in a note cites two examples from the Uttarakāṇḍa—not directly connected to this main genealogy—to demonstrate the matrilineal nature of the rākṣasas.[59] In the first, which corresponds to critical edition 7.25.23, the term mātāmahasya, "of the maternal grandfather," is used and in the second, which more or less equates with 7.25.24–25, he cites the phrase duhitur duhitā yā mātṛṣvasuḥ, "the daughter of his daughter, who is [the daughter] of the maternal aunt." The term mātāmaha, "maternal grandfather," the counterpart of the more common term pitāmaha, "paternal grandfather," is used eight times in Vālmīki's epic, five times in the Ayodhyākāṇḍa, and three times in the Uttarakāṇḍa.[60] Each occurrence of the term in the Ayodhyākāṇḍa refers to Kaikeyī's family, while in the Uttarakāṇḍa, its first two occurrences are to Rāvaṇa's maternal grandfather and uncle—Sumālin and Mālyavān, respectively, while the third refers to Puloman, the father of Śacī, Indra's wife, who is the mother of Jayanta, Indra's son. The word, thus, cannot be said to necessarily refer only to matrilineal societies, as it would be difficult to identify either Kaikeyī's or Śacī's lineage thus.

Shukla's second example, the phrase duhitur duhitā yā mātṛṣvasuḥ, is unfortunately somewhat misleading as presented in his note, since the sequence as cited does not occur in any edition of the Sanskrit text consulted or as a variant in the critical apparatus. With only Shukla's citation, absent both his Sanskrit text and its context, it is difficult to say whether or not we can understand the passage as a reference to the rākṣasas' society as matrilineal. The Sanskrit of the critical edition actually reads:

pitur jyeṣṭho jananyāś ca asmākaṃ tv āryako 'bhavat /
tasya kumbhīnasī nāma duhitur duhitābhavat // 7.25.24

mātṛṣvasur athāsmākaṃ sā kanyā cānalodbhavā /

[61] GPP 7.25.23–24 reads very similarly.

> And he [Mālyavān] is our mother's father's elder and so our venerable grandfather. The daughter of his daughter is called Kumbhīnasī.
> And that daughter born of our maternal aunt Analā is, according to proper custom, the sister of us brothers.

Here Vibhīṣaṇa, explaining to Rāvaṇa that their mother's sister's daughter, that is, their own cousin-sister Kumbhīnasī, has just been abducted, begins by reminding Rāvaṇa who Kumbhīnasī is and how they are related. The offspring of Mālyavān, including Analā, have been mentioned earlier.[62] However, Mālyavān's children's offspring have not. While it is clear that the maternal family line is prioritized here, it is a narrative necessity. Moreover, while the women of the family are mentioned, it is the relationship between the maternal grandfather, Sumālin, and his elder brother, Mālyavān, that is emphasized and held as most significant. Thus, neither the context nor the Sanskrit really can be said to provide any conclusive evidence as to whether or not the rākṣasas of the Uttarakāṇḍa were matrilineal. This, however, is not to deny the importance and unusual prominence given to the women in this genealogy, but it does suggest that we must look elsewhere to understand its basis.

The genealogy continues. Vidyutkeśa's son, Sukeśa, abandoned by his mother, was discovered crying inconsolably by Śiva and Pārvatī. Śiva grants the infant two boons: the first, that he would immediately be the same age as his mother, and the second, the gift of a city that could fly through the sky.[63] Once again the narrative reverts to the genealogy dominated by the masculine. A gandharva named Grāmaṇī, realizing that Sukeśa was "righteous" and had received these boons, offered him his daughter Devavatī, a name not normally associated with rākṣasas, in marriage.[64] Noteworthy is the intermarriage between a gandharva and a rākṣasa, as well as the narrative's use of the word dhārmikam, "righteous," to modify Sukeśa and dharmeṇa, "with righteousness,"[65] to describe the process of giving of Devavatī to Sukeśa.[66] Thus there is little here to distinguish rākṣasa (or gandharva) society from that of the others depicted in the epic. Sukeśa had three sons, Mālyavān, Sumālin, and

[63] 7.4.26–29.
[64] 7.5.1–4.
[65] These terms are normally not thought to be applicable to the rākṣasas, outside a few who are clearly identified as unusual. For example, Vibhīṣaṇa (6.13.2; 6.29.2; 6.40.13; 6.57.18; etc.). See 7.9.20,27 and 7.10.6, on how Vibhīṣaṇa acquires his dharmic, "righteous," nature.
[66] The rākṣasas commonly are given names that describe their physical characteristics. Perhaps the name Devavatī here can be understood as a mechanism through which to suggest that she was not a rākṣasa.

Mālin, who, like their father, are called rākṣasas,[67] despite the fact that their mother was a gandharvī. It is in this generation that the tone of the descriptions of these figures undergoes a change.

> They [Sukeśa's sons] were as imperturbable as the three worlds, and they were as well established as the three sacred fires. They were as formidable as the three mantras and as terrible as the three dreaded diseases.
> The three sons of Sukeśa, whose splendor was equal to that of the three sacred fires, continued to grow there like illnesses that have been neglected.[68]

The images are unusual in that they set in juxtaposition two of the most sacred elements of the brahmanic tradition, the sacrifice and sacred mantras, with illness and disease. Nevertheless, the rākṣasas clearly know sacred mantras and practice the vedic sacrifice. The striking juxtaposition reflects a threat to the brahmanical world that originates not from the outside but from the very practitioners of the sacrifice. These three sons undertook severe austerities:

> With these austerities—so hard to accomplish in this world and practiced with truth, sincerity, and self-control—they tormented the three worlds, including the gods, asuras, and men.[69]

Brahmā, pleased, granted the three brothers a boon to "become unconquerable slayers of enemies, long lived, powerful, and devoted to one another."[70] With their newly acquired powers, they conquered the worlds and then requested that Viśvakarman build them a mansion, which he did. Called Laṅkā, it was located on Mount Trikūṭa, and the rākṣasas took up residence there.[71]

The narrative, although momentarily diverted, remains within a masculine frame through the establishment of the martial and spiritual credentials of the three brothers. Once reestablished, it again reverts to the topic at hand: the lineage of the rākṣasas. And, once again, the narrative is disrupted, this time by a gandharva woman named Narmadā, who gives her three lovely and illustrious daughters to the three sons of Sukeśa, much in the same way that Sandhyā had given her daughter Sālakaṭaṅkaṭā to Vidyutkeśa. The text goes out of its way to emphasize the fact that Narmadā does this even though she was not a rākṣasa woman (arākṣasī).[72] The difference of race is again emphasized in the names of the young women, Sundarī, Ketumatī, and Vasudā, names not generally associated with rākṣasa women. Each of these couples—Mālyavān and Sundarī, Sumālin and Ketumatī, and Mālin and Vasudā—had numerous offspring. Sukeśa's sons' wives are gandharvas; nonetheless, their children, technically only one-fourth rākṣasa, are considered rākṣasas.[73] Clearly here the patrilineal descent predominates.

Both Sandhyā and Narmadā, mothers who negotiate their daughters' marriages, introduce a narrative rupture, and in the case of Sandhyā, the disruption locates the sexual in the feminine, while her daughter links it to the rākṣasas. But can we say the same for Narmadā's interruption of the narrative? The history now reasserts the masculine, while the rākṣasas, led by Sukeśa's sons, proud of their strength and power gained from boons, torment the three worlds. The gods and seers seek refuge with Viṣṇu, who vows to destroy the rākṣasa hosts.[74] A ferocious battle ensues in which Viṣṇu severs Mālin's head,[75] forcing his brothers and their remaining troops to retreat to Laṅkā. Viṣṇu, aided by Garuḍa, pursues them, annihilating the rākṣasas. The remaining rākṣasas, led by Sumālin, abandon Laṅkā and flee to Pātāla.[76] It might be argued that Narmadā's rupture into the narrative, with its counternormative reassertion of the feminine into the genealogy, aligns the rākṣasas with the feminine, and thus anticipates their defeat at the hands of Viṣṇu. But even if this is the case, it does not adequately explain Narmadā's role in the narrative.

Following the battle, the narrative reverts once again to the lineage. Here occurs a transition that provides not only a clarification of Narmadā's role but also of the seemingly tangential earlier narrative of Kubera Vaiśravaṇa's birth. After some time, Sumālin leaves the underworld with his unmarried daughter Kaikasī. He spies Kubera, passing in his flying palace Puṣpaka. Worried that his daughter's youth is fleeting and that, despite his best efforts, she has not been chosen by any suitor,[77] he decides that she herself should seek out Viśravas and ask him to marry her.[78] Once again feminine agency has inserted itself into the story; here, in the form of the granddaughter of Narmadā. And just as Sālakaṭaṅkaṭā disrupts the narrative with her counternormative behavior, so will Kaikasī. A young, unmarried woman who is unable to find a husband is a liability, and there is little doubt that the liability arises from anxiety that her sexuality might be uncontrolled. Her father tells her:

> "Your youth is passing, daughter, it is time to give you away. Intent on practicing righteousness, we have made every effort on your behalf.
> "Indeed, dear daughter, you are endowed with every virtue, like Śrī with her lotus. Still, you have not been chosen by any suitor out of fear of rejection.
> "For all those concerned about their honor, being a father of an unmarried girl is a burden, since, dear daughter, one does not know who might wish to marry the girl.
> "A young girl will always remain a source of suspicion for three families—that of her mother, that of her father, and the one into which she is given."[79]

As noted in the previous section,[80] Kaikasī approaches Viśravas while he is performing the agnihotra rite.[81] He grants her children, but curses them to be rākṣasas, because she approached him at an inappropriate moment.[82] Kaikasī bears four children: Rāvaṇa, Kumbhakarṇa, Śūrpaṇakhā, and Vibhīṣaṇa, whose roles in the epic are well known. Despite the fact that these children are only one-eighth rākṣasa and that their father is a brahman, they, nevertheless, are considered to be rākṣasas. Their classification as rākṣasas does not appear to derive primarily from their genealogy but from the curse of their father. Both Kaikasī and Tṛṇabindu's daughter have intruded upon the sacred space of the vedic seers—a space that is associated with celibacy and marked as masculine. Both are sexually viable and pose a threat to that celibacy.[83] We are left with little doubt that the mere gaze or sight of a male is potent enough to impregnate a female, and we are also reminded that no young woman is safe outside of the immediate supervision of male kin. Once again, the narrative clearly establishes the woman as the sexual aggressor and transgressor, a theme repeated throughout the genealogy. Moreover, the theme of sexual transgression emerges as a core concern in the remainder of the kāṇḍa, as accusations and rumors concerning Sītā's purity and her alleged sexually transgressive behavior arise. That this is a central concern of the genealogy is further evidenced in the Uttarakāṇḍa by the narrative of Rāvaṇa's half brother, Kubera, whose own history is also given at this point. Kubera serves as a contrast, as he and Rāvaṇa share a brahman father, Viśravas. Viśravas's own mother, Tṛṇabindu's daughter, it will be recalled, is also sexually transgressive, but not a rākṣasī. Kubera's mother is Devavarṇinī, the daughter of the sage Bharadvāja. We know little of her history except that she is given in marriage and then conceives and bears a child.[84] She is nowhere in the Uttarakāṇḍa associated with transgressive behavior and, as the daughter of a sage, clearly lacks any rākṣasa blood. It thus comes as no surprise that her offspring Kubera is a paragon of virtue, while Rāvaṇa is his antithesis.

What is unique here is that these two parallel narratives—that of Tṛṇabindu's daughter and of Kaikasī—frame the lineage of the rākṣasa Rāvaṇa, while providing both sides of the family with a similar story of female ancestry. Rāvaṇa descends from a brahmanic and noble lineage, but one that is clearly flawed in respect to his mother's family. And at the heart of that flaw is sexual transgression, which is located in the feminine. Evil resides in the uncontrolled feminine, and it is fear of the uncontrolled feminine that throughout the epic is depicted as an underlying source of narrative tension. Vālmīki's Rāmāyaṇa is populated with numerous terrifying female figures. Some, like Tāṭakā, Śūrpaṇakhā, Surasā, Siṃhikā, and the rākṣasī guards of Sītā,[85] are easily identifiable, and their threat to the patriarchal world described by Vālmīki is clear. Others are less obvious; Kaikeyī, for example, whose sexuality and desire for power lie at the heart of the epic's plot, is not depicted as overtly evil but rather as a woman who, convinced that her status and happiness are threatened, feels she has no other option but to use her sexuality to thwart her husband's will.[86] Who better to articulate the nonnormative attitudes and behavior needed for a woman to challenge her position than Mantharā, the hunchbacked servant of Kaikeyī? Both her class and appearance place her beyond the Aryan fold and mark her as a threat to it.[87]

[85] Surasā's case is more complex. She is the mother of the nāgas, and when requested by the gods, she takes on the form of a rākṣasī to test Hanumān. Nevertheless, when she assumes the form of a rākṣasī, she is uncontrolled, devouring, and demonic; see 5.1.130–156. For Siṃhikā, see 5.1.166–179. For the rākṣasī guards of Sītā, see 5.15.4–17; Sundarakāṇḍa sargas 21–22; etc.

[86] Kaikeyī is several times described as anāryā, "non-āryan," by Vāmīki (2.11.5; 2.16.20, 45,54; 2.86.25).

[87] See Sutherland 1992.

In this respect, the Uttarakāṇḍa's history of the rākṣasas echoes this earlier thematic, as evil is repeatedly located in the female characters. Thus, Kaikasī's ill-timed approach to Viśravas at her father's behest gives rise to the cursing of her children even before they are conceived. Then, too, much like Kaikeyī, she succumbs to jealousy and instigates a fraternal feud between Rāvaṇa and Kubera. At sarga 9, Kaikasī chides the young Rāvaṇa, who has been devoted chiefly to asceticism:

> "My son, look at your brother, who is haloed with blazing energy. And then, even though your status as his brother makes you his equal, just look at your own condition.
> "Daśagrīva, my son of immeasurable valor, you must exert yourself so that you will quickly become just like Vaiśravaṇa."[88]

Fired by his mother's words with envy of his brother, Rāvaṇa swears to become as powerful or even more powerful than Kubera, and vows to undertake severe asceticism in order to accomplish his desire.[89] Rāvaṇa's greed and his jealousy of Kubera are a direct result of his mother's unhappiness. In this case, the evil resides directly in Kaikasī and need not be projected outward, as it was with Kaikeyī.[90]

This close reading of the rākṣasa genealogy makes it clear that the rākṣasa lineage cannot be understood, as some scholars have suggested, to be representative of a matrilineal society nor does the narrative reflect social constructions or attitudes that are vastly different from those of the brahmanic culture that forms the heart of the epic narrative. It does, however, represent and reinforce a deeply ingrained cultural fear of, and yet obsession with, sexuality as it is located in the female body. Thus, it is no accident that the most sexually transgressive figure in the epic, the serial abductor and rapist Rāvaṇa, emerges from the body of a woman whose own behavior has violated the most sacred of moments of the brahmanical world, the time of the vedic sacrifice. In Rāvaṇa's birth we have the perfect combination, as it were—sexual transgression, misogyny, and the demonic—wherein the demonic is located in and emerges from the sexualized female body. The epic repeatedly engages these themes, which form a core element of the imagination of Vālmīki's poem,[91] and the Uttarakāṇḍa's narrative of the genealogy of the rākṣasas serves to rationalize, historicize, and control that very engagement.

4. The Work of the Uttarakāṇḍa

As we, along with many earlier students of the Rāmāyaṇa, have noted, the Uttarakāṇḍa shows considerable evidence in many of its sections of a somewhat later composition than the bulk of the central five books of the poem, books 2 through 6.[1] Moreover, the characterization of some of the epic's central figures, particularly Rāma, appears to be rather different in some ways from that in the other books. So what then is it that accounts for the inclusion, evidently at a very early date, of this complex, composite, and ultimately controversial kāṇḍa in the monumental poem of Vālmīki as it has come down to us? In order to answer this question, it is necessary to look at the epic from a number of perspectives and to think about what the Rāmāyaṇa would have been and what it would have lacked if, as some have argued, it originally ended with the happy reunion of Sītā and Rāma and the consecration of the latter at the end of the Yuddhakāṇḍa.

Brockington's observation that the Uttarakāṇḍa originated basically as a response to the natural curiosity felt by the audience to hear about the later events in Rāma's life is no doubt correct, but one needs to look more closely into the book to understand exactly what audiences, elite and popular, of the poem would have found lacking in a hypothetical epic ending with the Yuddhakāṇḍa.[2] Let us then examine the elements the book provides that might respond to a perceived need to satisfy the "curiosity" of readers and hearers of the poem in antiquity. In other words, what is the work that the book accomplishes for its audiences?

First, before we think about the interest in the later events in Rāma's life, let us not forget that, as noted above, more than half of the book is not concerned directly with Rāma at all. Instead, its first half concentrates overwhelmingly on the antecedents and career of the epic's villain, Rāvaṇa, in other words, on events that transpired long before the birth of Rāma. It would appear that, aside from the titillating effect of learning about the rākṣasa king's scandalous career of violent conquest and sexual assault, the first thirty-four sargas of the kāṇḍa basically serve to build up for the audience the great lineage and enormous power of Rāvaṇa, a power derived from the boon of the creator divinity Brahmā, that enabled the rākṣasa lord to conquer and terrorize the worlds of gods and men with virtual impunity. In so doing, the book serves to rationalize the need for the Supreme Lord to take on human form to deal with this colossal foe. Although rākṣasas, a class of terrestrial demons known from the earliest vedic literature, are commonly treated in the religious and mythological literature as frightening, bloodthirsty, flesh-eating, nocturnal monsters who threaten the settlements of pious brahman forest dwellers and as night-roaming ogres who may carry off and eat their victims, they rarely rise to the level of existential threats to universal dharma, or world order, as the rivals and enemies of the gods.[3] That is a role normally reserved in the vedic, epic, and purāṇic literature for the titanic asuras, the mighty half brothers and near equals of the gods themselves.

Almost invariably, in the literature, when the great gods and goddesses of the Hindu pantheon are called upon to save the world from a demonic oppressor, their foe is an asura. Rāvaṇa is different. He is a rākṣasa. But, unlike many of that class, he is no disgusting, forest-roaming savage predator gorging on wild animals and forest sages. Instead, he is portrayed as the magnificent king of a fabulous and opulent kingdom. He is the mighty great-grandson of Lord Brahmā himself, the half brother to the lord of wealth, Kubera, and the scion of a line of holy brahman-seers. A great ascetic and a mighty warrior, he is further empowered by a boon of near invulnerability that has rendered him impossible to kill for the mightiest human heroes and even the gods themselves. Thus, in order to save the gods, the brahmans, and the whole world from his depredations and oppression, it is necessary for no less a figure than Lord Viṣṇu himself to incarnate as a unique god-man to dispatch this "thorn of the world." Therefore, in order to show the greatness of Rāma, the hero of the epic, it is necessary for the poem's audience to understand the grandeur of his enemy. This is the work started in the preceding books of the poem but only fully realized in the Uttarakāṇḍa. Thus, this lengthy section of the book is not a version of some independent saga, as some have argued,[4] but an essential epilogue of the Rāmāyaṇa. For without it and its grand narrative of Rāvaṇa's conquest of the world and his subjugation of the gods, it is hard to understand why the Supreme Deity must intervene to do away with a mere rākṣasa.[5]

Turning to the later deeds of Rāma himself, it is important to note what these particular deeds are and what they represent. Rāma is revered to the present day as the ideal monarch, the righteous ruler whose reign, memorialized as the utopian Rāmarājya, continues to inspire the Indian political imagination.[6] But what do we see of Rāma as king in the first six kāṇḍas of the epic? Relatively little. The entire central portion of the epic is devoted to an account of how Prince Rāma's planned consecration is thwarted by a political plot originating in the women's quarters and how he spends fourteen years in exile during which he protects the forest hermits from the depredations of the ghoulish rākṣasas and ultimately leads a successful military campaign to rescue his abducted wife from the clutches of the monstrous Rāvaṇa. The massive sixth book, the Yuddhakāṇḍa, culminates in Rāma's long-delayed ascension to his ancestral throne. After this Rāma is said to have ruled righteously for ten (or, in some passages, eleven) thousand years.[7] But of what King Rāma actually did during that immensely long reign we learn virtually nothing outside of what is narrated in the Uttarakāṇḍa. In fact, aside from a few passages rehearsing the perfection of Rāma's reign and noting that he performed numerous sacrifices, the first six books of the epic end with Rāma's consecration as king and therefore contain no mention whatever of his career as a reigning monarch. We are told nothing of his judgments, nothing of his judicial acts as the chief magistrate and executive of his realm, nothing of any efforts to expand his kingdom, and, finally, in reference to one of the greatest concerns to ancient Indian kings and their epic chroniclers, nothing of his having produced any heirs to his legendary kingdom or having made any provision for succession to his imperial throne.

Surely, all of this would have been felt as a lack by redactors, storytellers, and audiences. One of the principal functions of the Uttarakāṇḍa, then, as Brockington notes, was to provide audiences with some account of what Rāma did once he had finally achieved the position of king. Indeed, the very first words of the kāṇḍa are prāptarājyasya rāmasya, "now that Rāma had attained sovereignty."[8] And so, virtually all of Rāma's actions, as described in the book, are illustrative of his role as the perfectly dharmic ruler while, aside from its opening accounts of Rāvaṇa and Hanumān, most of the kāṇḍa's secondary narratives, whether told to Rāma or by him, are exemplary or cautionary tales illustrating the proper or improper conduct of kings. In this way, the kāṇḍa's secondary narratives, such as those of Nimi, Nṛga, and Yayāti that Rāma tells,[9] or that Rāma hears, like those of Śveta and Daṇḍa,[10] are cautionary tales of the evil fate that befalls kings who do not adhere to dharma.[11]

[7] The exact length of Rāma's reign is a somewhat contested subject. See note 21 below and 1.1.76; 6.116.82,90; 7.41.17; 7.89.5; and 7.92.16 and notes.

As noted above, Rāma basically takes only two significant decisions in the Uttarakāṇḍa. These are, as it happens, the two that have provoked the most debate and controversy during the long receptive history of the poem. They are also the two actions that have been used by critics of the kāṇḍa who believe that they show a different and less compassionate character of Rāma than is represented in the other books and therefore serve as evidence of its spuriousness. These are the abandonment of Sītā and the execution of Śambūka.[12]

But the actions of Rāma as king, now that he is responsible for the maintenance of dharma and social order, may not be reflective of his actions prior to his consecration. And, frankly, although his treatment of Sītā and Śambūka have long been debated and are certainly shocking to a modern democratic and egalitarian sensibility, they are certainly in keeping with the social and political order upheld in the poem. Rāma's world is, after all, that of an ideal polity in which it is boasted in the poem that all four of the varṇas, or social classes, strictly adhered to their fixed duties, wives were always faithful to their husbands, and no one experienced the death of a child.[13] Rāma's actions in these two cases, harsh though they may seem to us, were carried out to maintain or restore these idealized conditions. In the case of Śambūka, the revival of the dead child and the felicitation of the gods are represented as proofs of the righteousness of Rāma's severe punishment for the śūdra's violation of the varṇa rules. One of the functions of the Rāmāyaṇa, after all, is to serve as a guide to social and political behavior, as both a dharmaśāstra and an arthaśāstra, in effect.

Similarly, Rāma's banishment of Sītā, despite the grief it causes him and his knowledge of her innocence, is represented as serving two proper royal imperatives. First of all, Rāma understands that an ideal king must have the full confidence of his subjects. Learning of the gossip in the city, Rāma acts swiftly to put an end to it. Further, the complaint circulating among the townsmen is that since Rāma has taken back a woman that they regard as of questionable purity, they, too, will have to put up with errant wives since the people must always follow the conduct of their king. This, like the death of a child and the breaking of varṇa rules, would, if not quickly addressed, falsify the claim of the perfection of Rāma's rule. The dharmic king must be ever vigilant to see that this does not happen.

Moreover, as a political treatise on kingship, the Rāmāyaṇa without the Uttarakāṇḍa would appear to be incomplete. We learn of Rāma's establishment of an ideal kingdom in Kosala, but what then? As of the end of the Yuddhakāṇḍa, Rāma remains childless as, so far as the text tells us, do his brothers. Nothing has been said about any succession to the throne of the great kingdom. Considering the profound concern of the epic poets regarding the questions of childlessness, procreation, and royal succession, as shown, for example, in the Mahābhārata and in the Bālakāṇḍa of the Rāmāyaṇa, and the extreme lengths that childless kings go to secure heirs, this would seem, once Rāma has been consecrated, to be a glaring omission from the work. Additionally, the concise account of the tale of Rāma that Nārada relates to Vālmīki at the very beginning of the epic tells us that Rāma will establish hundreds of royal lineages.[14] But by the end of the Yuddhakāṇḍa, Rāma has not established even his own direct dynasty, let alone hundreds of others.

This, too, is a critical matter of audience expectation that the Uttarakāṇḍa addresses. For it is only in this book that we are told that Rāma has sons and heirs, and, as in the other epic tales of succession, we are given the circumstances of their births. It is these two sons, Lava and Kuśa, who will be established on the thrones of the divided kingdom of Kosala.[15] Further, the kāṇḍa attempts, rather belatedly, to portray Rāma as the ideal type of cakravartin, or universal emperor, who extends his sway and that of his dynasty across the Indian subcontinent through the conquest of rival kings in something of the manner of the epic literature's other dharmarāja, Yudhiṣṭhira, through proxies in the form of his brothers and their sons. As noted above, Rāma, no longer the demon-slaying warrior of the earlier books, sends Śatrughna off to kill Lavaṇa and annex the region of Madhurā.[16] Similarly, he sends Bharata and his sons to conquer the land of the gandharvas and found two kingdoms there. After that, he has Lakṣmaṇa and Bharata assist the sons of the former to conquer, divide, and rule the region of Kārāpatha.[17]

The Rāmāyaṇa, moreover, is more than simply an exemplary text on social conduct and political practice. It is one of the central, foundational works of Vaiṣṇava theology. However, unlike many later Hindu versions of the Rāma story, it treads very lightly through most of its first six kāṇḍas on the divinity of its hero.[18] Aside from the opening frame of the story in which we learn of the appeal of the gods and Viṣṇu's promise to take birth as Rāma to put an end to Rāvaṇa,[19] and the gods' revelation to Rāma of his divinity at the end of the war at Laṅkā,[20] the central portions of the epic have almost nothing to say about Rāma's divinity. Thus, by the end of the Yuddhakāṇḍa we have learned about how and why the Lord took birth as a human prince, and we have been told the circumstances of that birth. But there has been no resolution of Viṣṇu's avatāric mission. We have been told only that King Rāma ruled for ten or eleven thousand years.[21]

This is a problem since, unlike the biographies of the other principal epic incarnations of divinities, a hypothetical Rāmāyaṇa without an Uttarakāṇḍa would fail to provide the kind of closure and ascension that ancient Indian audiences and authors appear to have expected. Thus, for example, the Mahābhārata provides a complete life story of its incarnated divinities, the Pāṇḍavas and Śrī Kṛṣṇa, from the circumstances that led to their births to their reascension to their proper heavenly realms. This tradition is carried through the purāṇic accounts of the Kṛṣṇacarita from the Harivaṃśa forward to the great narratives of the Viṣṇupurāṇa and the Bhāgavatapurāṇa.[22] Why would the Rāmāyaṇa be an exception? It is only in the Uttarakāṇḍa, after all, that we learn of the circumstances under which Rāma came to end his millennia-long sojourn on earth and how he, along with his co-incarnations, his brothers and the vānaras, like their counterparts in the Mahābhārata, resolved to leave the world and resume their proper heavenly forms.[23] Indeed, the closing chapters of the kāṇḍa lend the epic its most powerful and moving devotional passages as all of Rāma's friends, kinsmen, and allies, along with the entire population of his city, unable to bear the thought of separation from their Lord, beg to be permitted to accompany him to the next world, joining him in his mahāprasthāna, or great ritual departure from the world.[24]

There remains one last but no less important realm in which the Uttarakāṇḍa is critical to our understanding and appreciation of the Rāmāyaṇa as it has come down to us. That is the realm of the literary and the aesthetic. For in addition to its critical importance as a charter for social and political action, and its role as a foundational text of Vaiṣṇava theology and devotionalism, we must not forget that what makes the poem unique from the perspective of the intellectual history of India is its identification as the ādikāvya, "the first poem." As the framing narrative about the composition of the poem, the upodghāta, makes very clear, the contribution of Vālmīki, his genius, in fact, lies in his inspired transformation of the edifying but terse tale told by the ṛṣi Nārada into the grand prototype of the mahākāvya, which was to become the premier literary genre of classical India.

Now the designation of the Rāmāyaṇa as the original kāvya upon which all subsequent literary production was to be modeled has significant implications for our understanding of the poem's reception and the way in which it is framed by both the Bāla- and Uttarakāṇḍas. This is clear in the way the work as a whole is structured around its performance at Rāma's fateful aśvamedha. For, as suggested below, the epic, like several of its parts,[25] has a broadly annular structure with its central narrative framed by elaborately technical descriptions of the work and its performance by the twin bards, Rāma's sons, Lava and Kuśa.[26] These passages devote much energy to describing the technical aspects of the musical performance and especially to the powerful emotional response it produces in those who hear it.[27] Critical to this response is the concept of rasa, which, from the time of the ancient treatise on drama, the Nāṭyaśāstra, to the later literary theorists following the tradition of Ānandavardhana and Abhinavagupta, came to be regarded as critical to the aesthetic reception of poetry.[28]

Generally speaking, rasa, as it came to be understood and theorized by rhetoricians and connoisseurs of Sanskrit literature, is the aesthetic "flavor" or the enjoyment stimulated by successful literary compositions. Each of the eight or nine individual rasas is said to be connected with one of the basic underlying emotions that are, as it were, hardwired into the psychoemotive apparatus of the human mind. This concept is clearly well known to the author who composed the opening frame of the Rāmāyaṇa, as there the poem is said to be replete with all of the standard catalog of rasas, seven of which are mentioned by name.[29]

It must be recalled here that according to the account of how Vālmīki came to compose his great literary masterpiece, the first truly poetic utterance issued from the sage's mouth when he was overcome with grief upon witnessing the death of a krauñca, or sarus crane, at the hands of a hunter and hearing the piteous cries of its mate.[30] The key element in the aestheticization of the raw emotion of grief, śoka, so that it becomes śloka, or poetry, in the episode appears to be the conformance of the sage's spontaneous outcry in the form of a curse to the canons of the literary and musical arts. As Vālmīki himself, upon reflection, tells his disciple,

> Fixed in metrical quarters, each with a like number of syllables, and fit for the accompaniment of stringed and percussion instruments, the utterance that I produced in this access of śoka, grief, shall be called śloka, poetry, and nothing else.[31]

So although there are eight (or according to some authorities nine) basic, fixed emotive states, sthāyibhāvas, each with its corresponding rasa, the poem tells us that the very first and most influential of all literary works derives from its author's shared feeling of grief for the irredeemable bereavement of the krauñca hen.[32]

Important here is the generally accepted rule among the theoreticians of rasa that major poetic works such as the Rāmāyaṇa should exhibit a variety of the literary sentiments but that they should also have at their core one sustained principal rasa, the pradhānarasa. Among the first and perhaps the greatest of these theorists of rasa were the ninth-century Kashmiri author Ānandavardhana and his commentator, the brilliant polymath Abhinavagupta. These scholars appear to have been the first to systematically examine the great ancient epics from the standpoint of śokārtasya pravṛtto me śloko bhavatu nānyathā //

[32] Indeed, the association of grief and its corresponding aesthetic sentiment, karuṇarasa, with the legend of the creation of the ādikāvya is so firm that the greatest playwright of the Rāma story, Bhavabhūti, suggested that karuṇa is the substratal rasa of which all the others are merely momentary transformations. In the third act of his Uttararāmacarita, his character, the river goddess Tamasā, says:

> There is really only one aesthetic response (rasa) and that is the sense of bereavement. But because of various contributing factors it becomes divided and appears in different forms. It is just like water, which, although it may assume the form of eddies, bubbles, and waves, is still all just water.

rasa theory. For them, the poem is, as its opening frame suggests, saturated with the karuṇarasa, the sentiment deriving from the terminal loss of a loved one.

On this matter Ānandavardhana writes:

> When one, single principal rasa is integrated in a poetic composition, it enhances the substance (of the work) as well as its great beauty. If one were to ask, "As in which one?" I would respond, "As in the Rāmāyaṇa or in the Mahābhārata." For in the Rāmāyaṇa, the ādikavi [Vālmīki] himself aphoristically sets forth the sentiment of bereavement by saying, "Grief was transformed into poetry." And in the course of composing his poetic composition, he carried that same (sentiment) through right up to the terminal separation from Sītā.[33]

Thus we see that from the important perspective of the indigenous critical reception of the Vālmīki Rāmāyaṇa as a specifically literary masterpiece, the final happy reunion of Rāma with his beloved Sītā would have undermined the poetic intention of the author and the proper relishing of the aesthetic flavor (rasa) of the piece. In the same way a happy ending would have subverted the purpose of the author and the proper response of the audiences of the Mahābhārata. This is so because, according to these great Kashmiri literary savants, śāntarasa, the literary sensibility of tranquility derived from the emotion of vairāgya, revulsion with the misery of the world, is the pradhāna, or principal, rasa of the Mahābhārata. The latter is illustrated for them by the great epic's closing with the wretched end (virasāvasāna) of the work's heroes, the Vṛṣṇis and the Pāṇḍavas.[34]

Thus one can see that for the literary, as opposed to the religious, tradition the Uttarakāṇḍa, with its account of the final separation of Sītā and Rāma on earth, is the emotively and aesthetically appropriate ending to a poem whose very inspiration was the feeling of grief and loss, and which is marked throughout by passages of lamentation for lost

That the karuṇarasa is intended, and that to maintain this poetic sentiment there must be a final, irreversible loss of Sītā, and that thus one is not to imagine here the sentiment of (temporary) separation of lovers, the vipralambhaśṛṅgāra rasa, is made clear by Abhinavagupta's comment: "By the use of the word 'terminal' in the sense of lacking any hope or expectation, he (Ānanda) rules out any suspicion of [the sentiment of] love in [temporary] separation (atyantagrahaṇena nirapekṣabhāvatayā vipralambhaśaṅkāṃ pariharati)" Dhvanyālokalocana on Dhvanyāloka 4.5.

friends and lovers.[35] It is true, as one may argue, that the rasa-based analysis of the poem on the part of scholars like Ānandavardhana and Abhinavagupta comes many centuries after the composition of the work itself. But if on these grounds one were to argue for the spuriousness of the Uttarakāṇḍa, then one would have to do the same for the important framing of the epic in the Bālakāṇḍa where the emotional tone of the entire work is first set.

Given all of the above, it seems inescapable that, although much of the Uttarakāṇḍa, like much of the Bālakāṇḍa, may well have been added to the core narrative of Rāma, the great monumental epic poem ascribed to the poet-seer Vālmīki, as it reached its more or less final form no later than the first centuries of the common era, must have contained both its current first and last books. To argue, as some still do, whether on the basis of linguistic, metrical, or subjective grounds, that, as an admittedly later addition to the completed Rāmāyaṇa as we know it, the Uttarakāṇḍa should be excised from the epic as in some contemporary translations,[36] is to miss the point about the epics. Both the Rāmāyaṇa and the Mahābhārata are organic, living texts that grew over centuries into the forms in which they have survived in their various recensions and subrecensions. From the beginning of western scholarship on these great works, scholars have attempted to excise portions that, for one reason or another, they believed to be inauthentic or that they simply did not like.[37]

The critical editions of both poems, although far from perfect, do succeed in bringing us as close as modern philology and the surviving manuscripts can to the archetypes of the poems. Reconstruction beyond that point is a tempting but vain and misleading effort and can only result in the excision of much material that is in fact essential to the structure of the works. In the case of the Vālmīki Rāmāyaṇa this would lead to the athetization of not only the Uttarakāṇḍa, as in Parameswaran's translation, but also of the Bālakāṇḍa and much other material as well, as in the Brockingtons' interesting exercise in text reconstruction. In terms of its massive influence across languages, cultures, religious traditions, nations, and centuries, the Rāmāyaṇa is unquestionably among the greatest stories ever told. Like all great stories, it has a beginning, a middle, and an end. The Uttarakāṇḍa, like it or not, is that end.[38] Poets and performers over the millennia worked to shape the epic poem to the point where it was most aesthetically and emotionally satisfying to their audiences and themselves. It is not for us to amputate the head and/or the feet of their creation and then call the mutilated trunk a work of art.

[38] Again, these comments are specific to the Vālmīki Rāmāyaṇa and, to some extent, to the later purāṇic and literary versions that follow the ādikavi's outline of the story. The larger Rāmakathā proved to be a broadly mutable and adaptable story tradition across the languages and cultures of South and Southeast Asia. Poets, playwrights, performers, and religious teachers felt very free to modify the story through the addition, modification, revalorization, and deletion of episodes and sections, large and small. Some used this freedom to reshape the epic tale by eliminating the Uttarakāṇḍa or its most controversial episodes, and this was a choice that, for them, made perfect sense. It has, however, no bearing whatever on the status of "Vālmīki's" Uttarakāṇḍa or the overall shape and structure of the ādikāvya, "first poem."

5. Who Knows the Uttarakāṇḍa?

Aside from the technical issues summarized above, there are a number of reasons why authors of some of the innumerable texts that recount the tale of Rāma have tended to reduce, edit, or excise sections of the Uttarakāṇḍa or even the entire book itself. Some readers have even argued that the book is a spurious appendage to the true Rāmāyaṇa and that it should not be considered a part of the poem at all.

There are several reasons for this. Among these the most important is that there is a perceptible difference in the way in which Rāma is portrayed in the book compared with his representation in the preceding kāṇḍas. This is especially so in regard to two particular episodes that became increasingly controversial over time and the way in which the Rāmāvatāra came to be perceived and revered from the medieval period onward by devotional movements centering on this divinity.[1] One might think here, for example, of the immensely popular and influential Rāmcaritmānas of the sixteenth-century poet-saint Tulsīdās, a work that appears to be based largely on the fourteenth- or fifteenth-century Adhyātmarāmāyaṇa. Tulsīdās's work, like its apparent source, ends its account of the career of Rāma with his consecration and a description of his utopian reign. Consider, too, the controversy, only a few decades back, over the screening of episodes from the book in Ramanand Sagar's Doordarshan serialization of the epic.[2]

One of the most frequently cited arguments for the idea that the Uttarakāṇḍa is a very late addition to the epic poem hinges on an examination of just which ancient versions of the Rāmakathā include its episodes or appear to be aware of them. The issue is a complex one and is made more so first because of the well-known difficulty of ascertaining even relative literary chronologies for ancient Indian texts let alone absolute chronologies. Also, the inevitable argumentum ex silentio that must often be applied here is notoriously difficult to prove. One must therefore carefully consider the probable relative chronology of each text adduced and the probable reasons for the inclusion or omission of the Uttarakāṇḍa or any of its episodes. Thus arguments for the lateness of the Uttarakāṇḍa and for its not being a part of the Rāmāyaṇa as it was originally conceived have frequently been based on the evidence of the other books of the poem and on the presence or absence of the book or any of its episodes in other ancient versions of the story of Rāma. Let us turn first to the discussion of the internal evidence of the poem as it has come down to us today.

One point often raised in support of the idea that the original poem of Vālmīki did not include an Uttarakāṇḍa is that in virtually all manuscripts of the work, the sixth book, the Yuddhakāṇḍa, is followed by one or another version of a phalaśruti, that is to say, a passage detailing the material and spiritual benefits accruing to those who hear, read, or recite the Rāmāyaṇa. Such passages are frequently placed at the end of Indian religious texts, and therefore it has been argued that the original poem must have ended with the Yuddhakāṇḍa.[3] However, this cannot be taken as in any way conclusive. The accomplishment of the Rāmāvatāra's mission through the slaying of Rāvaṇa and the auspicious consecration of Rāma as a universal righteous monarch at the inauguration of a millennial age could well be seen as reason enough for scribes to append phalaśrutis at that point. Certainly the Yuddhakāṇḍa does mark the culmination of the actual heroic deeds of Rāma both as the righteous and exemplary son who willingly accepts exile to keep the truth of his father's word and as the valiant slayer of rākṣasas and defender of dharma. More perhaps to the point, as we have noted in our translation of the Yuddhakāṇḍa, the texts of the phalaśrutis there are late, very labile, and scattered among the manuscript traditions. One cannot base any strong conclusions on such flimsy evidence.[4]

Another telling issue that has been raised is the fact that the noteworthy events described in the Uttarakāṇḍa, events as dramatic as the abandonment of Sītā and the execution of Śambūka, are not mentioned in the Saṃkṣiptarāmāyaṇa told to Vālmīki by Nārada at 1.1.8–76.[5] On the other hand, the passage does clearly allude to Rāma's departure, after his

[3] See 6.116.84–90 and notes. Vaidya (1971, p. xxxi) refers to the Yuddhakāṇḍa as "the last Kāṇḍa of the real and original Rāmāyaṇa." See, too, Bulcke 1960, pp. 40–41; Brockington 1984, p. 314 and 1998, pp. 391; R. Goldman 1984, p. 44; and Goldman and Goldman 2009, p. 96.

[4] One might note here that the Uttarakāṇḍa has its own highly confused manuscript tradition of phalaśrutis. If, indeed, the book had been added to the epic later, no one involved in that process seems to have been concerned by the existence of the two sets of such passages. In fact, it could be added that the opening sarga of the epic, the so-called Saṃkṣiptarāmāyaṇa as narrated in bare outline by Nārada to Vālmīki, also has its own brief phalaśruti at 1.1.77–79. Söhnen[-Thieme] 1978 has suggested that the Saṃkṣiptarāmāyaṇa (which also fails to mention any of the events of the Bālakāṇḍa, including Rāma's marriage to Sītā) was derived from a somewhat different version of the Rāma story.

eleven-thousand-year rule, for the Brahmaloka. This detail is only to be found in the Uttarakāṇḍa.[6]

The Bālakāṇḍa as we know it also shows considerable evidence of knowledge of the Uttarakāṇḍa at other points in its upodghāta, or preface. At the conclusion of the list of the episodes in Rāma's career that Vālmīki included in his great poem we find a reference to the abandonment of Sītā.[7] The passage also refers to the events that had not yet taken place during Rāma's sojourn on earth, events that the poet rendered in the latter portion of his poem.[8] One presumes that the reference here is to the period beginning twelve years after the abandonment of Sītā and ending with Rāma's ascension to the heavenly world. For that is the point at which Vālmīki is supposed to have composed the poem and taught it to Sītā's sons, who were his disciples. This appears to be a direct reference to the Uttarakāṇḍa itself.[9] Finally, the entire fourth sarga of the upodghāta (1.4) in which Vālmīki teaches his composition to his disciples Lava and Kuśa, who are clearly identified as Rāma's sons, and in which the latter sing it before the king himself, shows that its author was fully aware of the story of Sītā's abandonment and of her living and giving birth in Vālmīki's ashram. Indeed, the episode of the boys' command performance in the presence of their father is nothing other than a highly condensed version of the events of sargas 84–86 of the Uttarakāṇḍa, thus lending an annular structure to the entire epic story that can be said to both begin and end with this episode.[10]

Finally, there is the well-known tradition, recorded mainly in the southern recension of both the Bāla- and Uttarakāṇḍas, that specifies the length of the entire work to be twenty-four thousand ślokas, which are then divided into five hundred sargas, which together constitute six kāṇḍas plus the Uttarakāṇḍa. These numbers, especially the number of verses, came to be the standard representation of the extent of Vālmīki's poem and are a critical element in the tradition that the Vālmīki Rāmā-

[9] Some readers prefer to understand the ambiguous term uttara here in its sense of "excellent" and as applied to the entire poem. See, for example, Parameswaran, n.d. On the issue of the name of the Uttarakāṇḍa, see 7.88*.16,20,23,25 and also 7.89, *App. I, No. 13, 54–55 and notes.

yaṇa is in fact an expansion of the deeply revered, twenty-four-syllable Gāyatrīmantra.[11]

But the really complex issue in assessing the relation of the Uttarakāṇḍa to the rest of the Rāmāyaṇa is the determination of which other early retellings of the Rāma story do and which do not contain evidence of their authors' being aware of the kāṇḍa or its contents, and if they do not, why this may be so. For there are two principal reasons that might explain why a given version of the Rāmakathā would omit mention of the events of the kāṇḍa or would appear to be ignorant of them. The first of these is that of chronology, and it is the one that has formed the basis of much of the debate over the dating of the kāṇḍa relative to the rest of the poem. If we assume, and this point, too, is contested, that Vālmīki's is the earliest textual version of the Rāma story,[12] the argument is that a text that knows the Rāma story but does not include or refer to the events of the Uttarakāṇḍa must have been composed after the composition of an original Rāmāyaṇa that lacked an Uttarakāṇḍa but before the composition and inclusion of the kāṇḍa. In order to consider this argument, it is necessary for us to know the earliest reference to the substance of the Uttarakāṇḍa in any text other than the Vālmīki Rāmāyaṇa itself. And this question is inevitably complicated by the difficulty of dating Indic literary texts from the earliest period up until at least the middle of the first millennium C.E.

One of the oldest versions of the Rāma story to refer explicitly to the events narrated in the Uttarakāṇḍa is the celebrated Paumacariya of the Jain scholar Vimalasūri, which has been dated variously at points within the first two or three centuries C.E. Kulkarni notes, "The Uttarakāṇḍa, although a later addition, was known to the author of Paumacariya."[13] Probably even earlier is the Saundarananda of the Buddhist poet Aśvaghoṣa, generally thought to have been composed around the first century C.E. In it the poet mentions the two sons of Sītā as the spiritual disciples of Vālmīki.[14] As many have noted, it is also clear that Kālidāsa

[12] Various texts have been put forward as being older than, or even the source for, Vālmīki's poem. Candidates suggested have been the Rāmopākhyāna of the Mahābhārata, the Dasaratha Jātaka, and so forth. On the debates over these texts, see R. Goldman 1984, pp. 32–39.

was aware of the Uttarakāṇḍa in general and specifically of its accounts of Sītā's pregnancy, Rāma's killing of Śambūka, his abandonment of Sītā, Śatrughna's defeat of Lavaṇa, and the birth of Lava and Kuśa, as can be seen in the fourteenth and fifteenth sargas of his Raghuvaṃśa.[15]

So much for the terminus ante quem for the composition of the Uttarakāṇḍa. Based on the evidence of the Paumacariya and the generally agreed upon date of that text, we know for certain that the kāṇḍa was composed no later than sometime in the second or third centuries C.E. and probably considerably earlier. This brings us to the second line of argumentation against the genuineness of the Uttarakāṇḍa as an original part of the Vālmīki Rāmāyaṇa, that based on the omission of the kāṇḍa or its events from other versions of the Rāma story. Several scholars have argued that the kāṇḍa must not have been a part of the original epic poem because it and its episodes are not included in various textual and sculptural sources that narrate or illustrate the life of Rāma. When it comes to texts later than the Paumacariya, it is highly dubious that authors who omit the kāṇḍa can be said not to have known it. Thus it would appear that these authors omit the episodes narrated in the kāṇḍa intentionally for one reason or another, reasons we cannot always know. In these cases it is likely that the authors did not accept or approve of the kāṇḍa because of its themes or because the representation of its characters was dissonant with their own and thus inconsistent with their purposes. One example would be the well-known seventh-century poem, the Bhaṭṭikāvya. This is an elaborate śāstrakāvya, or instructional poem, that retells the story of Rāma while providing instruction in grammar and rhetoric through its examples. Its account of the life of Rāma ends with his consecration and does not include the material of the Uttarakāṇḍa. Now, it is surely beyond the range of possibility that Bhaṭṭi did not know Vālmīki's epic, including its seventh book. So why did he omit it? One cannot say with certainty, but one must consider that just like other famous poets such as Bhāravi, Māgha, and Śrīharṣa, who wrote great mahākāvyas based on episodes from the Sanskrit epic literature, Bhaṭṭi was free to narrow and shape his theme as seemed to best fit his purpose. The works of these other poets omit large amounts of material from their epic sources, and it is natural to expect that Bhaṭṭi would do the same. The actual title he gave his work was the Rāvaṇavadha (The Slaying of Rāvaṇa), and this suggests that he intended that his poem should end with the death of Rāvaṇa and the immediately subsequent consecration of Rāma. A similar case can be made with regard to the Rāma plays attributed to Bhāsa, each of which focuses on a specific episode in the hero's life with neither occasion for nor interest in referring to the Uttarakāṇḍa.

To turn to another type of later rendition of the Rāma story, we can look at the important medieval religious works that form the textual basis for the spiritual traditions of Rāmabhakti. Texts such as Adbhutarāmāyaṇa and the Adhyātmarāmāyaṇa, as well as Tulsīdās's immensely influential Avadhi Rāmcaritmānas, which is heavily derivative of the latter of these, similarly omit the episodes included in Vālmīki's Uttarakāṇḍa, although here this is no doubt because the kāṇḍa's contents, most particularly its account of the abandonment of Sītā and her being made to give a public oath of her fidelity to Rāma, were felt to be out of keeping with the emerging devotional representation of Rāma and Sītā.

Thus the argument for the lateness or spuriousness of the kāṇḍa cannot be settled simply by listing Rāmāyaṇa-themed works that either include or exclude episodes from it. Whatever age one cares to assign to the book—either absolute or relative to the other books of the epic—it cannot reasonably be asserted that the authors of versions of the Rāma story writing after the first century C.E. did not know the book as an integral part of Vālmīki's monumental poem.

But what of works thought to be even earlier than, say, Aśvaghoṣa? The most important text in this category is, of course, the Mahābhārata. As has been noted many times before, the Mahābhārata gives ample evidence of being familiar with the Rāmāyaṇa, including the Uttarakāṇḍa.[16] The greatest scholarly attention on the part of those who have explored the problem of the Uttarakāṇḍa's relationship to the Mahābhārata has been, naturally, focused on the Rāmopākhyāna, the latter work's major retelling of the history of Rāma, which occupies nineteen adhyāyas of the great epic's third book.[17]

[16] For a detailed discussion of the many references to the Rāmāyaṇa in the Mahābhārata and its supplement, the Harivaṃśa, including many to the Uttarakāṇḍa, see Raghavan 1973, pp. 2–33. Examples of episodes from the Uttarakāṇḍa mentioned in the Mahābhārata include references to Rāma's departure for heaven with his followers at the Gopratāra tīrtha (MBh 3.82.63–64), Hanumān's boon of living as long as the Rāmāyaṇa is current (MBh 3.147.37), Rāma's killing of Śambūka and the revival of the brahman boy (MBh 12.149.62), Rāma's aśvamedha (MBh 14.1.9, see, too, Introduction, "Structure," pp. 119–25), and so forth. For a fuller discussion of the interrelation of the two epics, and especially the Mahābhārata's incorporation of material from the Rāmāyaṇa, see Brockington 1998, pp. 473–81.

It is apparent that the Mahābhārata's modified and condensed, but, nonetheless extensive, retelling of the Vālmīki Rāmāyaṇa is aware of the latter's Uttarakāṇḍa, just as is the rest of the Mahābhārata. This is clear from the fact that the history, as it is narrated there by the sage Mārkaṇḍeya, begins, after a very terse mention of Rāma's lineage, as does the Uttarakāṇḍa, with a genealogy of the rākṣasas and a condensed history of Rāvaṇa and his brothers.[18] And yet, although the following chapters give a fairly detailed account of Rāma, his trials and his triumphs, we find in them no mention of any of the actions of Rāma in the Uttarakāṇḍa. And so there is no account of the killing of Śambūka and absolutely no hint of the abandonment of Sītā. But again, the question that needs to be asked here is would Mārkaṇḍeya as the narrator of the Rāmopākhyāna have had a particular reason for excluding the events of the Uttarakāṇḍa from his account of Rāma's life? We believe that it is evident that he would have. The Rāmopākhyāna, like many other upākhyānas, or secondary narratives, of the Mahābhārata, is related not merely for the diversion of its immediate audience, in this case the Pāṇḍava brothers. Rather, they are often hortatory tales of legendary heroes and heroines who were exemplars of certain virtues or who had suffered and overcome difficult circumstances similar to those faced by Yudhiṣṭhira and his brothers. Thus, for example, the Nalopākhyāna,[19] the famous tale of King Nala, who, like Yudhiṣṭhira, had lost his kingdom and his wife, is narrated by the sage Bṛhadaśva to console and exhort the lamenting Pāṇḍava.[20]

Mārkaṇḍeya similarly relates the Rāmopākhyāna to Yudhiṣṭhira in order to console the king immediately following the abduction of the Pāṇḍavas' wife, Draupadī, by Jayadratha.[21] In the aftermath of this event Yudhiṣṭhira once again complains to a visiting sage about his misfortunes, including the assault on his wife and his forced and miserable exile in the forest.[22] In response the sage tells him the saga of the heroic prince Rāma, who suffered a far more grievous abduction of his wife and had to fight a great war to recover her. The purpose of Mārkaṇḍeya's tale is to cheer Yudhiṣṭhira, who has now recovered Draupadī, and to encourage him through the example of Rāma, who won his war and at last regained his kingdom. Clearly, in his account the events following Rāma's consecration would not only be beside the point but, had he included an account of the abandonment of Sītā, it would actually have subverted his purpose. Many epic narratives are told multiple times throughout the great poems, and often they vary considerably in their retellings depending on the specific contexts and circumstances peculiar to the particular narrators and their audiences.[23] The Rāmopākhyāna is actually one of the clearest examples of this. We believe that the omission of some of the events of the Uttarakāṇḍa from this particular version of the Rāmakathā, as in the case of many later ones from all over southern Asia, can tell us nothing about the textual history of the kāṇḍa but only something about the sensitive nature of its subject matter, particularly from the standpoint of Yudhiṣṭhira.

Despite the extensive scholarship on the Rāmāyaṇa in general and on the Uttarakāṇḍa in particular, some of which is discussed above, the status of the Uttarakāṇḍa as an integral, original, and authentic part of the Vālmīki Rāmāyaṇa continues to be debated. Critiques of the Uttarakāṇḍa and arguments about its relative lateness and inferiority when compared with the other books of the epic continue to appear and not only in the writings of professional Indologists. For example, over the past several years we have been carrying on a correspondence by e-mail and mail with a retired expatriate Indian mathematician who is both admiring and yet sharply critical of our translation. This scholar, M. R. Parameswaran, is a serious and learned reader of the epic and has devoted himself to proving that Vālmīki's Uttarakāṇḍa is not only later than the other books of the Rāmāyaṇa, a fact that few contemporary scholars would dispute, but is, in fact, a spurious addition to the original poem, or, as he calls it, a "Pretender Kāṇḍa."[24] Recently, Parameswaran has published his own condensed translation of the critical edition, one that entirely excises the Uttarakāṇḍa.[25]

The question of the thematic and temporal relation of the Uttarakāṇḍa to the central five kāṇḍas of the epic poem, is, as in the case of the Bālakāṇḍa, not as simple as it is often thought to be. Like the Bālakāṇḍa, the Uttarakāṇḍa is a composite work consisting of a number of discrete sections, which differ linguistically, stylistically, and thematically from one another and in some cases from the other books. Thus, it appears that the book as we have it is not the work of a single author or even of a single period, and it may well be that, as with the Bālakāṇḍa,[26] some of its older portions may have been composed closer in time to the intervening five books than others and may have in fact formed part of the biography of Rāma as it was originally conceived.

[24] Parameswaran, n.d. Parameswaran offers a number of pointed critiques of the Uttarakāṇḍa, several of which are in line with the findings of earlier scholars and which point to the book's being a later addition to the epic.

[25] Parameswaran 2012. Parameswaran marshals many arguments against the Uttarakāṇḍa's being considered a genuine part of the original poem. Some of these on characterological, stylistic, and other grounds have been discussed here and elsewhere. We agree with some of his points and disagree with others. We cannot respond here to all of his observations but refer the interested reader to his as yet unpublished essay on this theme. John and Mary Brockington (2006), too, in their translation of what they believe to be the oldest stratum of the epic text omit the entire Uttarakāṇḍa (as well as the Bālakāṇḍa).

[26] On the relationship of the Bālakāṇḍa to the so-called central books of the epic, books 2–6, see S. Goldman 2004.

6. The Problem of the Uttarakāṇḍa

Since at least the time of Hermann Jacobi,[1] Rāmāyaṇa scholars—with a few exceptions—have argued that the Uttarakāṇḍa of the Vālmīki Rāmāyaṇa, much like considerable portions of its Bālakāṇḍa, is distinctly of later composition than the bulk of the intervening five books of the poem as it has come down to us. More recently, the relative dating of the Uttarakāṇḍa with reference to the other books of the poem, as determined by linguistic, metrical, rhetorical, and thematic analyses, has been argued out in detail by scholars such as M. V. Kibe, Ananda Guruge, Asim Kumar Chatterjee, D. K. Kanjilal, Muneo Tokunaga, and in the exemplary work of John Brockington.[2] The debates over the Uttarakāṇḍa are not, however, as in the case of similar arguments over the Bālakāṇḍa, exclusively about the relative chronology of the kāṇḍa. For various reasons, as we shall outline below, a related debate continues as to whether the Uttarakāṇḍa should even be considered a genuine part of the Rāmāyaṇa at all.[3]

It is undeniable that at least some substantial portions of the book show clear signs of lateness when compared with other portions and with the preceding books. Moreover, some important, highly revered, and influential versions of the Rāmakathā produced from late medieval times onward essentially excise the most critical and controversial episodes of the kāṇḍa. Further, some admirers and devotees of the Vālmīki Rāmāyaṇa and its divine hero have found the book distasteful for several reasons. Nonetheless, whatever the rationales—scientific, religious, or emotional—offered for the idea of rejecting the claim of the Uttarakāṇḍa's belonging to an original Vālmīki Rāmāyaṇa, the book has been uniformly transmitted as an integral part of the manuscripts of the epic in all of its recensions and subrecensions and has been received as such by all commentators on the text. In addition, it has been carefully integrated into the narrative structure of the larger poem and provides its [3] Compare Brockington 1984. Brockington and Brockington 2006, on the basis of John Brockington's ascription of the first and last kāṇḍas to the final stage of the epic's composition, excise both the kāṇḍas from their translation. audiences with critical information about the characters and events of the central epic story. Finally, it provides a satisfying and theologically vital closure to the story of the life of the great Vaiṣṇava avatāra, Rāma, in the same way as major, roughly contemporary epic texts such as the Mahābhārata and the Harivaṃśa do for their respective heroes, the Pāṇḍavas and Kṛṣṇa. For these and other reasons, the Uttarakāṇḍa, in all of its textual complexity and whatever may be its rhetorical and characterological defects in the eyes of some critics, must be considered a part—even if a somewhat later one—of the monumental poem of the ṛṣi and ādikavi Vālmīki. Let us now turn to the various features of the Uttarakāṇḍa that differentiate it from the kāṇḍas that precede it.

LINGUISTIC AND METRICAL FEATURES

Any analysis of the Sanskrit epics or any sections of them must be predicated on the understanding that these are ultimately great syncretic works that have been put together, added to, and modified by countless anonymous hands in many regions and scripts of India over the course of the millennia during which the monumental poems have been current. This certainly holds true for the Rāmāyaṇa and especially its Bālakāṇḍa and Uttarakāṇḍa, which, in addition to their accounts of the life and deeds of Rāma and his family, contain a variety of purāṇic narratives that, like the upākhyānas of the Mahābhārata, are thematically or didactically relevant to the poem's main story.[4] These episodes, which may appear in some versions of the text and not in others, have no doubt been added at various periods in various regions. Thus, it is safe to say that one cannot meaningfully speak of either of these two books as integral works produced at one time by a single author.

Nowhere in the Rāmāyaṇa is this more evident than in the case of the Uttarakāṇḍa. As the book has come down to us, it can be said to consist of three basic textual segments. The first of these, which has been discussed in detail above, is the sage Agastya's elaborate account of the history of the rākṣasa race and the career of its most notorious scion, Rāvaṇa, as well as the sage's shorter narration of the birth and childhood adventures of Hanumān. This segment accounts for roughly the first half of the kāṇḍa. The second segment, which is relatively small in comparison, consists of the account of the lives of Rāma, Sītā, and Rāma's brothers from the time of Rāma's consecration until his departure from the earth to resume his heavenly form as Lord Viṣṇu. This material is recounted in fairly small, often widely separated, groups of sargas throughout the book's second half. The third segment, interspersed with the second, is to be found in the series of illustrative, hortatory, or exemplary narratives, many of which are versions of narratives found in the Mahābhārata and purāṇas. In addition to these three segments, found in virtually all the recensions of the poem, there are a number of additional narratives, some of which add episodes to the history of Rāvaṇa and some of which narrate judgments rendered by Rāma in his capacity as king and chief magistrate of his realm. These are found in some versions of the southern recension and, in part, in the so-called Bengal recension edited by Gorresio. These are generally regarded by some commentators and editors as prakṣipta, or interpolated, and therefore spurious. These narratives, many of which we have translated in a separate section in an appendix at the end of this volume, will also be discussed separately below.[5]

Several scholars have noted that the text of the first of these three segments, that is to say, the histories of Rāvaṇa and Hanumān, differs somewhat linguistically, metrically, and stylistically from the material in the second half of the book. For one thing, the sargas in the first half are significantly longer than those in the second. As Brockington has observed, the average length of the former is nearly twice that of the latter.[6] He also notes that the first thirty-six chapters are composed in a somewhat more ornate style than the last sixty-four and have a higher proportion of rhetorical figures, long compounds, and taglines in longer meters.[7] In fact, the whole passage describing the genealogy of the rākṣasas and the career of Rāvaṇa is, unlike the following sections of the book, rather densely and often finely figured, with its author or authors showing a flair for simile, natural description, and the occasional extended metaphors that are reminiscent of the more charming passages in books 2 through 6.[8] Brockington further observes that, on the other hand, the material dealing directly with Rāma and his family differs little stylistically from the generally prosaic purāṇic legends with which the story is interspersed.[9] For example, the first section's descriptions of battle are quite comparable in language and tone to those in the Yuddha-

[6] Brockington 1998, p. 392.
[7] Brockington 1998, p. 392. Brockington further observes that the stylistic qualities of the book's first half are not very "dissimilar from the elaborated passages" of what he regards as the next oldest stage of the poem's composition (the second stage). He thus appears to suggest that the section devoted to the history of Rāvaṇa and the rākṣasas as well as of Hanumān might be older than the remainder of the book.
[8] Some of the better examples of this can be found in sarga 5 with its description of the three terrifying sons of Sukeśa, in sarga 26 with its rendering of the beauty of the moonlit night on Mount Kailāsa, and in sarga 31 with its richly figured portrait of the Vindhya range and the Narmadā River.

kāṇḍa.[10] All of this, in turn, may suggest that the latter two segments of the text are of a similar age and provenance to each other while differing from the first segment.

In his close analysis of the shift in the caesura in the triṣṭubh verses of the Rāmāyaṇa, Tokunaga notes that his evidence indicates that, as others have argued on other grounds, the Bāla and Uttara form a set of kāṇḍas that is later than any of the other kāṇḍas.[11] He also provisionally suggests that, based on the Uttarakāṇḍa's slightly higher proportion of the vipulā 1 metric form and a lower proportion of triṣṭubh and jagatī,[12] the Bāla is actually later than the Uttara.[13] This suggestion is at odds with most scholarly thought that reverses this relative dating; however, it is important to stress again that both kāṇḍas show evidence of being themselves composite works with various sections incorporated at different times.

Despite the occasional passages of elevated rhetorical style, especially in the first segment of the book, what has been less widely observed is just how inferior some elements of the style and composition of the kāṇḍa really are when compared to the rest of the poem.[14] In many cases, the grammar is defective, omitting a finite verb or some other significant verbal element, such as a grammatical object, and so on. In such cases, the commentator, reader, or translator is required to supply the missing element in order to make sense of the passage.[15] There is gender disagreement (liṅgabheda), as at 7.26.16, and there are examples of extremely awkward syntax, as at 7.58.6.[16] Such infelicities are quite numerous and the list could easily be extended.[17]

One feature of the Uttarakāṇḍa that has not, to our knowledge, been noted is its authors' lexical choices as compared to those of the author(s) of the other kāṇḍas. One very striking example of this is to be found in the enormously common expressions encountered throughout the poem for speech, largely found in the formulaic expressions of the narrator. Throughout the epic, by far the most common term for "speech" in referring to the words of one or another of the characters is vacanam, which [13] Tokunaga 1993, pp. 544–541. Tokunaga's language here is a bit confusing, but if one studies his charts, it is clear that this is what he is suggesting.

[14] For example, M. R. Parameswaran, who is, for several reasons, unremittingly hostile to the very inclusion of the Uttarakāṇḍa in the poem, observes in a personal communication that "Valmiki's Ramayana is superbly planned and executed with great poetic skill. The U-K lacks the poetic quality, dignity, unity and high moral standpoint that one finds in the Ramayana proper" (Parameswaran, n.d., p. 1).

[17] We have attempted to note all such infelicities in our annotation.

occurs more than 560 times. A synonym for vacanam in these constructions, bhāṣitam, is encountered only sporadically throughout the first six kāṇḍas. Thus, there are no such occurrences in the Bālakāṇḍa, two in the Ayodhyākāṇḍa (2.27.33; 2.31.28), one in the Araṇyakāṇḍa (3.12.12), four in the Kiṣkindhākāṇḍa (4.27.45; 4.35.16,20; 4.48.12), three in the Sundarakāṇḍa (5.28.20; 5.56.71; 5.65.1), and only one in the massive Yuddhakāṇḍa (6.51.21).[18] In the Uttarakāṇḍa, however, the situation is quite different. Although instances of vacanam are still more common than bhāṣitam, the latter term occurs twice as many times in the Uttara as in the all the previous six kāṇḍas combined. There are twenty-one occurrences of the term in the kāṇḍa, as opposed to eleven in kāṇḍas 1–6. Moreover, the occurrences of this term are not evenly distributed throughout the book. There are no occurrences of the term in the first thirty-eight sargas, which constitute more than half of the text of the kāṇḍa. Whereas the occurrences of vacanam outnumber those of bhāṣitam by a ratio of approximately 25:1 in the first six kāṇḍas, the ratio is approximately 3:1 for the entire Uttarakāṇḍa and only 1.5:1 for sargas 39–100, the section dealing with Rāma and his family. Clearly these striking statistics strongly suggest that at least the second half of the Uttarakāṇḍa was composed by a different hand or hands than the earlier portions of the text. This finding is consistent with Brockington's observation, based on length of sargas, poetic style, and presence or absence of tag verses in longer meters.[19] In our annotation, we have identified a number of additional notable lexical issues;[20] however, further studies of this sort may provide additional clues to the textual and intertextual history of the kāṇḍa.

LITERARY AND RHETORICAL ISSUES

A significant part of the mystique of the Rāmāyaṇa, apart from its religious importance, is the tradition, first introduced in the epic's second sarga, that the work is the world's first poem (ādikāvya) and its author, the first poet (ādikavi). As such the work is considered to have [18] It is interesting to note that the second half of the Uttarakāṇḍa has almost as many occurrences of the term bhāṣitam as the entire Mahābhārata. There we find only twenty-nine (six in the Ādiparvan; three in the Araṇyaparvan; one in the Sabhāparvan; two in the Virāṭaparvan; six in the Udyogaparvan; four in the Śāntiparvan; five in the Bhīṣmaparvan; and two in the Droṇaparvan). This in part arises from the differing narrative style of the two epics.

[19] See Brockington 1998, p. 392. The absence of the term bhāṣitam in both the Bālakāṇḍa and in Agastya's account of the histories of Rāvaṇa and Hanumān is somewhat intriguing. Compare Antoine (1975), who identifies a narrative connection between the history of Rāvaṇa and that of Viśvāmitra as told in the Bālakāṇḍa.

[20] See, for example, notes to 7.6.14; 7.33.6,22; 7.46.9,11–12; 7.69.16; etc.

established a standard of poetic excellence that later authors could only strive to achieve.[21] With this in mind, it is instructive to compare the literary qualities and rhetoric of the Uttarakāṇḍa with those of the preceding books of the epic, as this may provide us with yet another tool for exploring the complex relationship of the kāṇḍa to the rest of the poem. As we, too, have observed earlier, despite the Rāmāyaṇa's unparalleled reputation and the fact that it contains many passages of great beauty and emotional profundity, much of it can hardly be described as poetic. Indeed, many passages consist of unadorned and rather prosaic narratives or even uninspiring lists of personal names, plants, weapons, architectural features, and so forth.[22] Nonetheless, in many passages the poet shows a great capacity for charming description, striking poetic figuration, and a profound ability to convey deeply felt emotion. Vālmīki is especially adept in his frequent and powerful use of simile.[23] It is thus instructive to examine the text of the Uttarakāṇḍa with an eye to determining how it compares with the best poetry of the preceding books in terms of its poetic and rhetorical quality.

The issues outlined above, such as grammar, diction, and syntax, are not the only areas in which the Uttarakāṇḍa shows marked difference and deficiency when compared with books 1 through 6. Its rhetoric, too, suggests that its author may have lacked the poetic skills of his predecessors. The alaṅkāras, or rhetorical figures, particularly the use of upamā, or simile, a figure that is highly refined in the other books, are often awkward at best and at worst seem to be defective or to be based on a poor understanding of the standard, received mythology. The kāvyadoṣas, or poetic flaws, like the grammatical ones, are numerous. Consider the following examples:

At 7.3.31, we find the following tag verse:

sa devagandharvagaṇair abhiṣṭutas tathaiva siddhaiḥ saha cāraṇair api / gabhastibhiḥ sūrya ivaujasā dhṛtaḥ pituḥ samīpaṃ prayayau śriyā vṛtaḥ //

[21] The prologue of the work describes it as the ultimate recourse of poets (paraṃ kavīnām ādhāram—1.4.20). Vālmīki's self-proclaimed boast of being the first author of what we would term belles lettres was apparently widely accepted by other poets fairly early on, as we see, for example, in the early Buddhist poet Aśvaghoṣa's statement to that effect at Buddhacarita 1.43 (vālmīkir ādau ca sasarja padyaṃ jagrantha yan na cyavano maharṣiḥ). Compare also Kālidāsa's famous observation in the introduction to his Raghuvaṃśa (1.4) that he can take on the vast subject of Rāma's lineage only because the great poet(s) of old (pūrvasūribhiḥ), that is to say, Vālmīki and others, have pioneered the path.

[22] See, for example, Goldman and Goldman 1996, pp. 34–37.

[23] See R. Goldman 1984, pp. 94–116; Goldman and Goldman 1996, pp. 76–78; and Goldman and Goldman 2009, pp. 20–25.

> Haloed with splendor and lauded by the hosts of gods and gandharvas, who were accompanied by the perfected beings and celestial bards, he resembled the sun haloed with radiance, together with its rays, as he approached his father.

As elsewhere in the Uttarakāṇḍa, this verse presents a defective rhetorical figure in its complex simile. The major problem is that in comparing Vaiśravaṇa, who is being praised by "the hosts of gods and gandharvas," with the sun, which is simply accompanied "with its rays," there is no participle modifying the upamāna, "the standard of comparison," here sūryaḥ, "the sun," corresponding to the participle abhiṣṭutaḥ, "lauded," which modifies the upameya, "the subject of comparison," here saḥ, "he [i.e., Vaiśravaṇa]." In any case, the parallelism is awkward, as it is hard to understand how the sun would be "praised" by its rays. This less than deft use of alaṅkāra is characteristic of the style of the Uttarakāṇḍa, especially in its tag verses.

And, at 7.7.1 we have another awkward figure:

> nārāyaṇagiriṃ te tu garjanto rākṣasāmbudāḥ /
> avarṣann iṣuvarṣeṇa varṣeṇādrim ivāmbudāḥ //

> Just as storm clouds pelt a mountain with torrential rains, thundering storm clouds in the form of rākṣasas pelted that mountain in the form of Nārāyaṇa with torrents of arrows.

Here, the verse is rhetorically awkward in its superimposition of a simile, here "the clouds raining down on a mountain with torrents of rain," upon a metaphor, which contains the same terms, "rākṣasa–storm clouds raining down on Nārāyaṇa-mountain with torrents of arrows."

Again at 7.63.8, Śatrughna, pleading with Rāma to be permitted to return to Ayodhyā, describes his condition when apart from his brother as follows: mātṛhīno yathā vatsas tvāṃ vinā pravasāmy aham, which literally would be rendered as, "Like a calf without a mother, I live abroad without you." Here we have a case of what is termed liṅgabheda, or inappropriate gender alignment, in which Rāma, as the upameya, is likened to a feminine upamāna, a cow.

Because of the various issues mentioned above and the fact that the kāṇḍa's focus shifts here and there while the flow of the narrative of Rāma's later years is frequently interrupted by secondary didactic and exemplary narratives, we feel that the Uttarakāṇḍa is in many ways more difficult and less pleasurable to read from an aesthetic point of view than the preceding six books.[24] Certainly, the metrical and rhetorical qualities of the Uttarakāṇḍa, when compared with those of the poem's other kāṇḍas, tend, in our opinion, to support the received wisdom that holds that many portions of the book are relatively later additions to what ultimately came to be transmitted as the various recensions of the Vālmīki Rāmāyaṇa.

cepts, plan and execution of the U-K are all poor, and the text is a hodge-podge of purana-like stories."

7. The Controversial Episodes: The Uttarakāṇḍa and Its Critics

No study of the Uttarakāṇḍa would be complete without addressing two critical episodes in its account of the later years of Rāma, the Sītātyāga, "the abandonment of Sītā," and the Śambūkavadha, "the slaying of Śambūka." These events have significantly shaped the receptive history of the book and, indeed, the entire epic from at least the medieval period. The controversies raised by these episodes have only become more stark and heated in modernity with the rise of various social movements and forms of identity politics in India. These include regional, caste- and class-based, feminist, and Marxist readings of the Rāmāyaṇa, which focus on one or both of these episodes, representing them as revelatory of the regressive social and political ideologies represented by the epic.

THE SĪTĀTYĀGA, "THE ABANDONMENT OF SĪTĀ"

No other single incident in the Rāma story, as it has been narrated by the ādikavi Vālmīki, has been as controversial as the hero's reluctant decision to banish his beloved and innocent queen on the strength of unfounded rumors circulating among his subjects. Indeed, this episode, it seems clear, has cast a dark shadow over the entire Uttarakāṇḍa and led to numerous efforts—from antiquity to the present day—on the part of poets, playwrights, theologians, exegetes, filmmakers, religious teachers, and writers to rationalize, reinterpret, condemn, modify, and even excise this episode. It has even led some to deny the authenticity of the entire kāṇḍa or even to eliminate it from the monumental poem itself and from many of the later versions of the Rāmakathā.

Before examining some of the more salient of these efforts, it is necessary to understand Sītā's banishment and Rāma's motives for ordering it in terms of the cultural milieu in which the poem was created. We can then begin to consider how this episode came to be read in various contexts and periods at different points in the epic's long history of influence.

To begin with, one must note that the episode is not entirely isolated in the larger poem, for it is thematically closely linked to what is probably the next most controversial episode in the epic: Rāma's harsh verbal censure of Sītā at the very moment of their reunion in the Yuddhakāṇḍa and the shocked and distraught Sītā's decision to subject herself to an ordeal by fire, an agniparīkṣā.[1] Here, as in the account of Sītā's subsequent abandonment, it needs to be made clear that, regardless of Rāma's harsh words and cruel actions, he never for a moment actually doubts his wife's fidelity and utter innocence.[2] In the Yuddhakāṇḍa, he simply makes an initial public show of his adherence to the unyielding code of his patriarchal society, knowing all along, it appears, that the event will culminate—as it of course must—in the spectacular demonstration of Sītā's chastity through her emergence, unscathed, from the blazing fire and the supererogatory testimony of Agni, the fire divinity himself, the ultimate witness of people's inner lives. In the Uttarakāṇḍa, Rāma makes no effort to conceal his profound grief over his cruel and underhanded abandonment of Sītā and his self-inflicted separation from her.

In both of these disturbing episodes the issue is not so much about Sītā's fidelity, which all authors and audiences of the Rāmakathā take as a given, as it is about the public's apprehension of Rāma's character as a dharmic husband and monarch. The popular scandal (lokāpavāda), when it is brought to light in the Uttarakāṇḍa, is not directed at Sītā but at Rāma as a man who—so the public sees it—has taken back into his house a woman who has been held in the house of another man, the lustful rākṣasa Rāvaṇa. In both cases Rāma acts against his own personal desires in order to protect his precious reputation from accusations of corruption. Kālidāsa will later eloquently explain Rāma's decision to send Sītā away in just these terms:

> For men whose greatest treasure is their good reputation, that reputation is of greater importance than their own bodies, much less mere objects of the senses.[3]

So it is precisely Rāma's undying love for and faith in Sītā that highlights the gravity of his renunciation for the sake of his royal duty, that is to say, the sacrifice of the personal for the political.[4]

[1] See Yuddhakāṇḍa sargas 103–104 and notes. Other than these two episodes concerning Rāma's treatment of Sītā following her abduction and return and the execution of the śūdra ascetic Śambūka, only the manner in which Rāma kills the monkey king Vālin has drawn sharp criticism of Rāma's actions. On this, see Lefeber 1994, pp. 45–50; and R. Goldman 1997 and 2004.

[2] See, e.g., Rāma's speech to Agni after the fire ordeal at 6.106.11–20.

[3] RaghuVa 14.35: api svadehāt kim utendriyārthād yaśodhanānāṃ hi yaśo garīyān /
Note, however, how here, Sītā is relegated to the status of a mere object of pleasure, something of little weight in comparison with her husband's reputation.

[4] In this light, Rāma's sacrifice of his and his wife's happiness for the sake of rājadharma makes him a kind of cultural hero for a culture of renunciation. Compare the counterexample of the 1936 abdication of the British throne by King Edward VIII for the sake of

If we confine ourselves to the context of Vālmīki's view of royal conduct and gender relations, blocking out any consideration of changing social mores over the course of the centuries since the composition of his epic, Rāma's actions in regard to Sītā would probably not originally have appeared to be as egregious as they do to us from the perspective of modernity. Certainly such criticism of Rāma's treatment of Sītā as Vālmīki's characters can express is heavily muted and, in part, actually silenced. The most powerful critique is uttered by Sītā herself in her moving and emotional speech to Rāma in the Yuddhakāṇḍa just prior to her entering the fire.[5]

When it comes to the much more critical moment in the Uttarakāṇḍa at which Rāma decides that he must sacrifice Sītā to save his reputation as a righteous king and an exemplar of proper conduct for his subjects,[6] he appears to anticipate criticism and even opposition on the part of his younger brothers, and he acts immediately to forestall it. Summoning his brothers to inform them of his plan, he first tells them, "Do not think of objecting to it."[7] Then, once he has disclosed his orders for Sītā's banishment on the pretext of a pleasant overnight excursion to the ashrams along the Ganges, he sternly tells them:

> "Nor must I be contradicted in any way with regard to Sītā. For if I were to be opposed, it would give rise to my most extreme displeasure.
> "I bind you to an oath, swearing by my arms and my life, you who might speak in the midst of my words in an effort somehow to conciliate me.

"the woman I love" in a culture that was becoming increasingly steeped in notions of romanticism and personal fulfillment.

[5] 6.104.1–19. At this point the gods appear and gently rebuke Rāma for not realizing his own and Sītā's divinity and thus for apparently doubting her chastity. But there is no direct critique of his harsh words. Yet, by the time of the influential Adhyātmarāmāyaṇa, the author acknowledges that Rāma's harsh words to the illusory Sītā (māyāsītā), words that led her to enter the fire in order to demonstrate her purity, should not have been spoken.

> rāmo 'pi dṛṣṭvā tāṃ māyāsītāṃ kāryārthanirmitām /

> But when Rāma spied the illusory Sītā, who had been created for this purpose, he said to her many words that should not have been spoken.

[6] Note that the townspeople express their fear that because the king has taken back Sītā after she has been manhandled and imprisoned by Rāvaṇa, they will now have to put up with such dissolute behavior on the part of their own wives (7.42.19). Compare, for example, the well-known later story of the rajaka (Hindi—dhobi) found, for example, at Padmapurāṇa (ĀnSS) 4(Pātālakhaṇḍa).56–58. For a unique interpretation of the exile of Sītā and her relationship with Vālmīki and the earth goddess, see Benoît 1999, pp. 1692–93.

> "If you gentlemen are obedient to my commands, then you must respect me. This very day Sītā must be taken away from here. You must carry out my instructions."[8]

Two things are worthy of notice here. The first is that, having taken this dramatic and heartrending decision to exile his wife, Rāma seemingly cannot bring himself to confront her directly with the terrible news of her fate. Instead, he instructs Lakṣmaṇa to pretend to take her on the pious excursion that she had requested and had been promised. Only when they have crossed the Ganges is he to reveal the shocking truth to her. The second is that Rāma appears to have every expectation that even his unfailingly subservient younger brothers will object to, if not actually resist, his dreadful command.

Even Sītā, although shocked and desolated by her abandonment, can find, in her despair and grief, no grounds to criticize her husband in the way that she had at the time of her ordeal by fire. Grieving for her own cruel fate, she nonetheless appears to approve of Rāma's actions in countering the slanderous accusations on the part of his subjects. She tells Lakṣmaṇa that he is to bear the following message to the king:

> "I do not grieve for my own body, bull among men. But, your majesty, you must act righteously toward the people in such a way that you avoid their criticism, O delight of the Raghus."[9]

Also, at the very last moment of her earthly sojourn, when, after twelve years of exile, the queen is brought back to her husband and instructed to give yet another testimony as to her innocence, she simply and uncomplainingly takes an oath of her utter fidelity to Rāma before disappearing into the bosom of the earth, her mother.[10]

The closest thing to direct criticism of Rāma's act of abandonment is articulated by Lakṣmaṇa when, after leaving the weeping Sītā in the wilderness, he says to his charioteer Sumantra:

> "Earlier, because of my father's words, he [Rāma] dwelt in the very fearsome and deserted Daṇḍaka wilderness for nine years and five.
> "Still, much more painful than that is his banishment of Sītā after hearing the criticism of the townsmen. It seems cruel to me.
> "Moreover, charioteer, what practice of righteousness has been accomplished in subjecting Maithilī to this act—so destructive to one's reputation—at the instigation of the townsmen with their baseless allegations?"[11]

[8] 7.44.18–20.
[9] 7.47.12.
[10] 7.88.10.
[11] 7.49.6–8.

Here, for the only time in the epic, Rāma's treatment of Sītā is described as "cruel (nṛśaṃsa)." Even more startling perhaps is the fact that Lakṣmaṇa describes his brother's actions, motivated by a desire to restore and preserve his reputation, as in fact "destructive to his reputation (yaśohara)."

The poem admits, moreover, a further hint of criticism of Rāma's actions on the part of its author himself, the seer Vālmīki, who will shelter Sītā and her sons during their exile and who will later authoritatively testify to her fidelity. When the sage enters Rāma's sacrificial assembly with Sītā, he presents her to her husband with the following mild rebuke:

> "Here, Dāśarathi, is Sītā, of strict vows, who practices righteousness. Even though she had done no wrong, she was abandoned by you near my ashram.
> "Sītā will give proof of her innocence to you of solemn vows, Rāma, you who are fearful of the malicious rumors among the people. You must permit her to do so."[12]

That Rāma himself understands this to be something of a rebuke for improper behavior is apparent when, addressing the seer, he begs forgiveness, pleading:

> "Moreover, Vaidehī had already given proof of her innocence long ago in the presence of the gods. But although I knew Sītā to be innocent, brahman, I nonetheless abandoned her out of fear of the people. Therefore, please, sir, forgive me."[13]

Finally, of course, Sītā's ultimate decision to reject Rāma's desire to take her back after she is once again proven to have been faithful both by the testimony of the inerrant seer and through her public "truth act" and to instead enter the earth with her mother can also be seen as a silent but powerful rebuke.[14] This rejection leaves Rāma both desolate and furious. He actually threatens to destroy the earth should she not yield up his wife.[15]

Rāma's harsh words to and banishment of the blameless Sītā, as well as his killing of the śūdra ascetic Śambūka, have provoked several responses in the later literature. These have been basically of two types. One is an ethical critique, which has been articulated first in a number of older Sanskrit literary texts based on the Rāmakathā and, in modern times, through a number of emergent identity politics movements advocating for class, regional, gender, and ideological causes. The second response, focused more narrowly on the Sītātyāga, can be generally characterized as religious in motivation. This latter response generally takes the form of the elision, denial, rationalization, amelioration, or modification of the disturbing episode. Major examples of the first type with reference to the abandonment of Sītā can be found in two of the older, highly influential Sanskrit literary treatments of the events of the Uttarakāṇḍa, Kālidāsa's Raghuvaṃśa and Bhavabhūti's Uttararāmacarita.

In the former, Rāma's decision to send Sītā away, as in the Uttarakāṇḍa, meets with a sort of passive resistance on the part of his brothers. Caught between their reluctance to carry out such a cruel deed and their inability to contradict their elder, they remain silent and immobile. As the poet puts it:

> Not one of the brothers was able either to stop their lord, who had expressed this extremely cruel intention with regard to Janaka's daughter, or to obey him.[16]

For Kālidāsa, even Sītā herself is not above questioning Rāma's conduct in abandoning her. Although she is, in keeping with well-established cultural norms, unwilling to criticize her husband and will ultimately take the blame for her exile upon herself, she does make bold to instruct Lakṣmaṇa to inquire of Rāma as follows:

> "You must ask the king in my words, 'Is it appropriate for one of noble birth and deep learning that, on the basis of public gossip, you have abandoned me even though I was shown to be pure in the fire right before your very eyes?' "[17]

Then, too, Kālidāsa's Vālmīki speaks rather more forcefully of his anger toward Rāma than even the Vālmīki portrayed in the Uttarakāṇḍa. When he first encounters the abandoned queen in the forest he tells her:

> "Even though he extracted that thorn in the side of the three worlds, and even though he is true to his vows and never boastful, I am furious with the elder brother of Bharata because of his baseless and foul treatment of you."[18]

Commenting on this verse, Mallinātha remarks that its meaning is that this fault obscures all of Rāma's virtues. He does, however, quickly observe that the sage's censure of the hero is for the sake of conciliating Sītā.[19]

If anything, some later poets who take up the story of Rāma are harder on him in this respect even than Kālidāsa. This is certainly the case with Bhavabhūti. In the poet's famous drama the Uttararāmacarita, which deals exclusively with the abandonment of Sītā and its aftermath, the harshest critic of Rāma's treatment of his loving and innocent wife is none other than Rāma himself. In the play's first act alone, the hero describes himself as a cruel person whose actions are disgusting,[20] and compares himself to a deceptive butcher,[21] an outcaste, a poisonous tree,[22] and an ungrateful miscreant.[23] Later in the play he calls himself a merciless sinner[24] and someone who has done a great wrong.[25]

But Rāma is not the only one of Bhavabhūti's characters permitted to disparage his treatment of his wife. For example, the forest divinity Vāsantī, encountering Rāma in Act 2, speaks quite sharply to him. She asks him how he could have been so cruel[26] and why he did such an impermissible thing.[27] She also addresses him in verse as follows:

> "Ah, hard-hearted man, they say that fame is dear to you. But what infamy could be more terrible than this?"[28]

Janaka, too, Sītā's adoptive father, is shown to express his anger at her treatment:

> "Ah! The transgressiveness of the townsmen! Ah! The rash behavior of King Rāma! As I brood continually on the horrible stroke of this thunderbolt of an outrage, the time has come for my wrath to blaze forth instantly either with my bow or with a curse!"[29]

Then, too, Bhavabhūti, unlike Kālidāsa, feels free to significantly alter the dénouement of Sītā's exile. Perhaps out of his discomfort with the received story or simply in keeping with the canons of Sanskrit drama, which eschew unhappy endings, the poet ends his play with the happy reunion of the separated couple once Sītā's fidelity has been publicly attested to by the infallible ṛṣi Vālmīki, who is represented as a playwright himself.[30]

From these few examples it seems clear that the account of the banishment of Sītā sits somewhat uneasily with some of the many noteworthy poets who composed works on the life of Rāma, starting with the ādikavi himself. As with many other writers, hearers, and readers of the numerous versions of the Rāmakathā, the kavis seem to exhibit a marked ambivalence with regard to the episode, wavering between their veneration of Rāma as a prime exemplar of righteous conduct and their own discomfort with, if not to say repugnance for, his cruel and unjust treatment of his beloved wife.

But concern with the theme of Sītā's exile as represented in the Uttarakāṇḍa is hardly confined to the world of the poets who seem uneasy about fitting it into the aesthetic matrix of the romantic, that is, into the standard binary of saṃbhoga and viprayoga śṛṅgāra, or love in union and in separation.[31] Of far greater significance is the treatment of the theme in the emerging medieval Vaiṣṇava devotional literature on the story, theology, and worship of Rāma and Sītā.[32] To the poets, theologians, and commentators of the Vaiṣṇava saṃpradāyas that focus their primary devotion on Sītārāma, Vālmīki's rather stark portrayal of Rāma's episodes of harsh speech and action directed toward the goddess Sītā comes to be viewed as unpalatable and in need of different representation or even outright excision. In well-known medieval devotional versions of the [31] As noted above, the overarching aesthetic mood, or pradhānarasa, of the Rāmāyaṇa is the painful one of karuṇa. In fact, Bhavabhūti, who takes his cue, no doubt, from the epic's framing narrative of the creation of poetry, was so moved by the theme of endless separation that he has one of his characters argue that the aesthetic distillation of the emotion of grief is the fundamental rasa of which all the others are merely epiphenomena. See Introduction, "Work," p. 61, note 32.

Rāmāyaṇa, several of which are technically regarded as portions of various purāṇas, such treatment of the two critical incidents, Sītā's ordeal by fire and her banishment, come to be characteristic of widely influential popular vernacular versions of the epic. Thus, for example, in the Adhyātmarāmāyaṇa, generally thought to be a part of the Brahmāṇḍapurāṇa and widely recognized as a major source for Tulsīdās's massively influential Rāmcaritmānas, Sītā's fire ordeal is represented as a ruse whereby the princess can conceal herself in the fire on the advice of Rāma, who, unlike in Vālmīki's portrayal, is omniscient and always fully aware of his own divinity. Accordingly, Sītā employs her own supernatural powers of illusion to create a simulacrum of herself. It is this that Rāvaṇa abducts and holds captive. Thus the agniparīkṣā becomes merely a device for the illusory princess (māyāsītā or chāyāsītā) to enter the fire while the real goddess emerges from it unbeknownst to anyone other than Rāma and herself. The text puts it this way:

> Now, Rāma, fully aware of what Rāvaṇa was up to, said to Sītā in private, "Listen to my words, Jānakī.
> "Rāvaṇa is going to approach you in the guise of a mendicant. You must put in your place a simulacrum of yourself and then enter the leaf hut.
> "On my instructions you are to remain in the fire in an invisible form for a year. Once Rāvaṇa has been slain, you shall come back to me as before."
> When she had heard the words that Rāma had spoken, she did just that on the spot. Setting an illusory Sītā outside, she disappeared into the fire.[33]

At the time of the now deceptive ordeal, the fire god, Agni, as in Vālmīki's poem, emerges from the burning pyre carrying Sītā and addresses Rāma:

> Then (Agni), the eater of oblations and witness of the worlds, said to the foremost of the Raghus, the remover of the suffering of those who come to him for refuge: "O Hari, Lord of the Raghus, please accept the goddess Jānakī, whom you deposited in me earlier in the forest after having first contrived an illusory daughter of Janaka in order to take the life of ten-faced [Rāvaṇa].

"The ten-faced one has been slain, along with his sons and kinsmen, and thereby, O Lord, the burden of the earth has been removed. That one bearing the form of her likeness, which had been created for that purpose, has now, having accomplished its purpose, disappeared."

Then Rāma, the husband of Śrī, delighted, having taken back the exceedingly delighted Jānakī and having worshiped Agni the purifier, placed Śrī, the mother of the three worlds, who was eternally conjoined with him, on his lap.[34]

In this representation, the agniparīkṣā thus serves merely as a ruse to foil Rāvaṇa in his attempt to abduct Sītā and yet still provides the necessary pretext for killing him. Also, it importantly functions to protect the goddess Śrī in the form of Sītā from the insult of being manhandled and abducted by the monstrous rākṣasa lord. In many quarters this has become the generally accepted understanding of the episode as it came to be widely circulated in such popular devotional versions of the Rāma story as Tulsidās's Rāmcaritmānas.[35] In this way, what Vālmīki represents as Sītā's terrible ordeal comes to be generally understood as a moment of divine play in which both she and Rāma are the agents and no censure or blame is to be laid at the feet of either divinity.

But the Uttarakāṇḍa's account of the later banishment of Sītā is another matter entirely and one that has not sat well with many post-Vālmīki authors of the Rāmakathā. Authors and scholiasts have evolved a number of strategies for confronting the challenges that the episode presents. One of these is a form of revisionism. An early example of this that has been mentioned above is that of Bhavabhūti. He does, of course, make the episode central to his magnum opus, the Uttararāmacarita, and plumbs the emotional depths of the profound suffering of both Sītā and Rāma. Still, he uses his poetic freedom to provide both figures with rationales for having to endure the pain of separation. Thus, when Rāma receives the advice of his now-absent guru, the sage Vasiṣṭha, the latter makes it clear that Rāma is still young and new to the kingship, a notion that will be used later on to explain what the poet regards as an error caused by inexperience and the absence of his wise elders.[36] The sage's strongest injunction is that Rāma must devote himself wholly to the conciliation of his people if he hopes to attain renown.

> "We are detained by our son-in-law's [Ṛṣyaśṛṅga's] sacrifice. You are a mere child and your kingship is new. You must be devoted to the conciliation of the people, for it is through that alone that you will attain your true treasure, glory."[37]

Rāma's response, which foreshadows the abandonment of Sītā and indeed the entire narrative of the play, is to heroically declare that:

> "For the propitiation of the people I would, without the least agitation, give up love, compassion, happiness, and even Jānakī herself."[38]

But, far from objecting to Rāma's declaration of his willingness to give her up if need be in order to keep his subjects happy, Sītā, hearing these prophetic words, boasts, "That is exactly why my husband is the leader of the Rāghavas!"[39] In this way the poet draws Sītā, too, into the governing ideology of statecraft that underlies the Rāmāyaṇa, that is to say, that in an ideal polity the public good must always outweigh the ruler's personal happiness. Thus, making Sītā in a way complicit in her own abandonment becomes one way of softening the apparent harshness of Rāma's decision in the Uttarakāṇḍa. This approach, as we will see below, has also been taken by some modern interpreters of the tale of Rāma and Sītā.

One very simple and radical way of dealing with the episode of Sītā's abandonment and with the many complex emotional, characterological, and theological issues that it raises is to simply excise it from the narrative. From antiquity onward a significant number of retellings of the [36] See, too, Bhavabhūti's dialogue between Vāsantī and Ātreyī in the śuddhaviṣkambhaka of Act 2, where the former asks the latter how such a terrible thing as the banishment of Sītā could have happened while the purohita Vasiṣṭha, his wife Arundhatī, and the queen mothers were still living. Ātreyī explains that all the elders were off at Ṛṣyaśṛṅga's ashram at the time.

Rāmakathā conclude the tale with the consecration of Rāma as king in Ayodhyā, omitting the entire episode or even the entire Uttarakāṇḍa for one reason or another. As we have noted above, such omissions have been seen by scholars in some cases as an indication that the kāṇḍa is largely a later addition to Vālmīki's original epic.[40] But whether the kāṇḍa is later than the poem's central portions or not, a complex question discussed above,[41] the omission of some of its episodes, particularly that of the banishment of Sītā and its resolution, is an unreliable factor upon which to base questions of chronology. Thus, for example, one might consider the well-known Rāmopākhyāna, discussed in detailed above.[42]

By the same token, a number of Hindu versions of the Rāma story composed in the first millennium, versions found in or associated mainly with Vaiṣṇava purāṇas, also omit much of the contents of the Uttarakāṇḍa, including the repudiation of Sītā, mainly, as we believe, on theological grounds. Thus, for example, the Adhyātmarāmāyaṇa, a deeply devotional text important to the Rāmānandi tradition, omits any mention of criticism of Sītā or Rāma. This text is, as noted above, regarded as a principal source for the Rāmcaritmānas of the Vaiṣṇava sant-poet Tulsīdās, a work that has virtually defined the Rāmāyaṇa for hundreds of millions of Hindi speakers in North India. Some versions, such as the Adbhutarāmāyaṇa, have, in addition to their Vaiṣṇava theme, a strongly Śākta element in which Sītā herself is hymned as the Great Goddess, revealed in a terrifying form reminiscent of Mahākālī, accorded her own sahasranāmastotra, or hymn of a thousand names, and even shown to reveal her cosmic form to Rāma in a manner similar to that in which Kṛṣṇa reveals his aiśvararūpa to Arjuna in the Bhagavadgītā.[43] In such versions it is quite clear that the disturbing tale of Sītā's repudiation would be out of place and highly inappropriate.

A number of purāṇic and folk versions of the Rāmāyaṇa in India that do include an account of the banishment of Sītā introduce into the tale thematic elements that tend to relieve Rāma of any element of choice and hence any personal responsibility for the repudiation of his wife. According to the most common trope in the Indian epics and purāṇas, characters are driven to do or suffer certain things either because of the power of impersonal fate (daiva) or because of a curse (śāpa) uttered by a powerful being whom one has injured or offended. This last element, the power of the curse, is deployed in some later additions to the Uttarakāṇḍa text, in some commentaries, and in retellings of the story.

Perhaps the earliest germ of this idea as an explanation for Sītā's banishment can be seen at Uttarakāṇḍa, sarga 50. There the charioteer and counselor Sumantra attempts to console the desolate Lakṣmaṇa as the two journey back to Ayodhyā after abandoning Sītā on the bank of the Ganges. He tells the prince a story about a long-past conversation between the seer Durvāsas and the late King Daśaratha during which the latter asks the former to tell him about his son Rāma's future. The omniscient sage tells the king that for a certain reason (kasmiṃścit kāraṇe) Rāma will abandon both Sītā and Lakṣmaṇa (verse 12).

The reconstructed text of the critical edition leaves the reason for the abandonment unclear. However, most of the texts of the southern recension and the devanāgarī manuscripts collated for the edition insert a passage of eighteen lines immediately before the prophecy of Durvāsas.[44] In this passage, the seer recounts a version of the purāṇic legend according to which the sage Bhṛgu, enraged at Viṣṇu's beheading of the sage's wife, who had been assisting the asuras, the enemies of the gods, curses the divinity not only to be born into the world of men (i.e., to undergo avatāra) but while there to experience a long separation from his wife.[45] In order not to further offend a brahman sage and for the benefit of the worlds, Viṣṇu graciously accepts the curse. The commentator Nāgeśabhaṭṭa (Ct) carries this argument still further, claiming that in the Padmapurāṇa, Rāma himself tells Lakṣmaṇa that he had earlier been cursed by none other than Vālmīki and that it is this latter curse alone, and not the scandal raised by the people about Sītā's alleged conduct and his having taken her back, that has forced him to abandon her.[46]

An interesting and entertaining example of the use of the curse motif to absolve Rāma of any culpability for banishing his wife is found in the Padmapurāṇa in a story that holds Sītā wholly responsible for her own exile and suffering. According to this tale, Sītā, as a young woman, overhears a pair of parrots talking admiringly of Rāma and Sītā and their future marital felicity. She has the birds captured and, upon questioning them, learns that they had been at the ashram of the sage Vālmīki where they heard him teaching the Rāmāyaṇa (then a chronicle of events that were yet to take place) to his disciples. Sītā is enchanted to know that the story is about her and her future husband and begs for further information, which the parrots provide after extracting a promise from Sītā that she will release them once they have complied. But the princess then goes back on her word and says she will keep the female bird captive until their tale of her happy marriage proves true. The female, who is pregnant, begs to be freed and vows to return once her chicks have been raised. But Sītā is unyielding. The male bird also pleads for his mate's freedom but is similarly refused. The loving pair, who cannot live apart, is thus separated. The female then dies cursing Sītā to similarly suffer painful separation from her husband during her pregnancy, while the male, angry and grief stricken, plunges into the Ganges, vowing to be reborn in Ayodhyā as the lowly washerman who, in many well-known versions of the Rāma story, is the one whose harsh treatment of his errant wife sets the example of "honorable" conduct that, through the gossip of the people, forces Rāma to banish Sītā.[47]

[45] For the complete episode, see App. I, No. 7, following notes to 7.50.10. This is a variant of the tale found in the Matsyapurāṇa (47.94–113) and Padmapurāṇa ([ĀnSS]2 [Bhūkhaṇḍa].121), which ascribes all of Viṣṇu's incarnations to this curse. Here it has clearly been adapted specifically to fit the Rāmāvatāra in general and the banishment of Sītā in particular.

[46] On this interesting passage, see note 10 to App. I, No. 7, following notes to 7.50.10.

Of all the premodern efforts to confront and defuse this controversial episode, probably none is more carefully wrought or more interestingly argued than that put forward by the nineteenth-century Rāmāyaṇa commentator Śivasahāya (Cr), author of the Rāmāyaṇaśiromaṇi. Śivasahāya has what appears to be a unique explanation of Sītā's exile, subsequent return, and final descent into the earth. His interpretation of the whole affair, from the moment Rāma decides to send his wife away to the forest until her final descent into the earth, her mother, is a revisionist one that sheds an interesting light on the exegetical lengths to which some sectarian readers will go to spare Sītā any hint of scandal and to absolve Rāma from any suspicion of harshness toward his beloved wife.

In brief, Śivasahāya's explanation of the episode is as follows. Rāma does not send Sītā away because of any malicious gossip concerning her residence in the house of Rāvaṇa or his having taken her back into his own. Rather, Rāma, realizing that his wife is pregnant, is concerned that, should he keep her by his side, he might be tempted to engage in sexual intercourse with her. This would be improper and in violation of the śāstras on two grounds. First, he claims that intercourse with a pregnant woman is prohibited by the law books. Second, he argues that Rāma is just about to undertake a number of major śrauta rituals during which, as the yajamāna, or sacrificial patron, he would be in a state of dīkṣā, or initiatory purity, during which he would be obliged to remain celibate. Thus the apavāda, the scandal, that Rāma fears has nothing whatever to do with Sītā's captivity in the palace of Rāvaṇa or his having taken her back afterward. It is a fear of the real censure he might incur if he should indulge in sexual intercourse during Sītā's pregnancy. Because of this, and because Sītā had herself requested that she be permitted to visit the holy ashrams of the sages on the banks of the Ganges, Rāma sends her away for a time.[48]

When, after twelve years, Vālmīki brings Sītā and her sons to the Naimiṣa forest at the time of the aśvamedha, Rāma requires, in addition to the unimpeachable testimony of her innocence on the part of the sage, that she take a śapatha, or oath, in public, swearing to her utter fidelity. Once again Śivasahāya refuses to accept that Rāma would demand, or that Sītā would need to offer, any such assurance of her virtue. Instead, he puts forward an original rereading not only of the episode but of the very term śapatha, "oath." Unlike the other commentators who take the term as a simple noun formed by primary derivation from the verbal root √śap, "to swear an oath or utter a curse," and the suffix -atha,[49] Śivasahāya reads the term as a tatpuruṣa compound made up of the terms śam, "auspiciousness," and patha, "way or path." He sees the former as a reference to Sāketa, the eternal and blissful heavenly world of Rāma. Thus, in Śivasahāya's reading, which he repeats whenever the term śapatha occurs in the text, Sītā does not take an oath at all. She simply takes the path to Sāketa. That is to say, she just slightly precedes her husband on the way to their eternal, heavenly abode.[50]

Given the complex receptive history of the abandonment of Sītā, the Sītātyāg, as it is known in Hindi, and its situation at the intersection of the highly sensitive areas of religion and gender, it is hardly surprising that the controversy the episode has provoked should have become only more intense in modernity. Critiques of Rāma for his treatment of Sītā have come from scholars, political activists, authors, feminists, and, through the work of social scientists, a spectrum of ordinary people, chiefly women. A few examples will suggest the range and type of these critiques. The Right Honorable V. S. Srinivasa Sastri, an illustrious Indian politician, freedom fighter, educator, and orator, delivered a famous series of thirty lectures on the Rāmāyaṇa at the Madras Sanskrit Academy in 1944, which were later published by the Academy.[51] He spoke of approaching the poem with reverence and regarded it as "one of the greatest epics that ever were composed by man" and of "the manifold excellences of his [Rāma's] character."[52] Nonetheless, when it comes to the episode of the public scandal and the repudiation of Sītā, he wrote:

> [I]n such a situation a woman whom you otherwise honour and love and adore and hang all your jewels upon and allow to dominate your whole life—well, a woman whom you treat with all this consideration, when however she is weighed in the balance of real values in a crisis like this, sinks into the position of indriyārtha, a means of gratifying our senses, no more. Now Rama decrees that Sita should be banished. This time Rama sinks lower and lower. Not only does he, against the testimony of his own conscience, agree to banish Sita but he does it secretly. He does not tell her.[53]

In the twentieth century, a tradition of animosity toward the Rāmāyaṇa in general came to be a part of the rhetoric of the emerging Dravidianist political movement under the leadership of E. V. Ramasami Naicker (EVR), also know as Periyar. For him the epic was actually a polemical account of the destruction of a virtuous and heroic Dravidian king, Rāvaṇa, by an invading and occupying force of North Indians led by a hypocritical and reprehensible figure, Rāma. The critique of the epic and its hero was acted out in spectacular and highly controversial public demonstrations in which the popular North Indian performances of the Rāmlīlā, in which the deeds of Rāma are celebrated, and which typically end with a great conflagration of a giant effigy of Rāvaṇa, is inverted and performed as the Rāvaṇalīlā, accompanied by the burning of images of Rāma.[54] EVR's rationalist and egalitarian critique of the Rāmāyaṇa is very broadly based, as he saw the epic tradition as imposing a hierarchical, caste-ridden, patriarchal, elitist, and brahman-dominated vision of society through the spurious divinization of an ordinary and not particularly admirable character as its central hero.[55] EVR harshly criticized virtually all of the significant characters in the epic drama for what he saw as their various character defects. But he reserved his most severe condemnation for Rāma himself. He cites numerous incidents in which he believed Rāma to have acted improperly or immorally, but he focused sharp criticism on the hero's treatment of Sītā. In other words, for EVR, the worst behavior of Rāma is concentrated in the final chapters of the Yuddhakāṇḍa and, above all, in the Uttarakāṇḍa. Paula Richman writes:

> Rāma's treatment of his wife, Sītā, draws particular criticism from E.V.R. because he takes it as emblematic of Rāma's oppression of those less powerful than himself. After her grueling and terrifying captivity in Lanka, Rāma subjects Sītā to a despicable ordeal and then still refuses to accept her back. As E.V.R. comments, "Even though Vālmīki proclaimed the chastity of Sītā, Rāma did not believe it, so she had to die." For E.V.R., this hostile attitude toward women is part and parcel of the North Indian worldview. The manner, glorified in North Indian texts, in which Rāma drove his wife to submit to such ordeals helps to keep Indian women in a state of subjugation.[56]

The Rāmāyaṇa has also, not surprisingly, been the object of a Marxist critique, which, like the critique of EVR, is directed toward, among other things, inequalities of class and gender. Once again, these two issues come into the clearest focus in the Uttarakāṇḍa. An interesting example of this is the thoroughgoing criticism of the poem by the Marxist author Ranganayakamma. Her book, Ramayana, the Poisonous Tree: Stories, Essays and Foot-Notes,[57] retells Vālmīki's epic, setting it in a Marxist history of human civilization and subjecting it to Ranganayakamma's rather caustic commentary. She writes:

> Rama doubted Sita in Lanka, after the confirmation that Sita was a chaste woman, both of them came happily to Ayodhya, celebrated the coronation and lived happily—while the story was proceeding like this, why did the poet create a scene of Rama abandoning Sita? To show how virtuous a kin [sic] Rama was and how fairly he ruled the kingdom. To say, "Rama respected public opinion (while abusing those people!). He abandoned even his wife and protected the tradition, which guides the people. See what a good king Rāma is!"
> However, the people (those who ridiculed) did not ask him "to abandon Sita again." They asked, "Why did he bring her at all? How did he do such an unmanly act?" According to the words of the people, bringing Sita home was tantamount to losing manliness. If he had kept her with him for some time and abandoned her because some one said something, can he regain manliness?[58]

[57] Ranganayakamma 2004. The title, Ramayana, the Poisonous Tree, is perhaps meant to be itself an ironic critique of the Telugu work Srimad Ramayana Kalpavrushamu ("The Glorious Ramayana: A Wish Granting Tree") by Viswanadha Satyanarayana. It may also have been chosen to echo Rāma's own self-denigrating characterization as a poisonous tree of evil fruit (durvipākaṃ viṣadrumam) at UttaRāC 1.46.

When, following the account of the repudiation of Sītā, Rāma begins to narrate a series of stories to Lakṣmaṇa in order to illustrate the importance of a king's taking care of the people's business,[59] Ranganayakamma makes a sarcastic aside, "(How comfortable life is after abandoning the wife! Rama is living on telling story after story!)."[60]

Even though the massively popular Rāmcaritmānas of Tulsīdās omits the Uttarakāṇḍa episodes narrated by Vālmīki, widely circulated and inexpensive "bazaar copies" of the work often append a seventh Lav-Kuś-kāṇḍa, in which the tale of Sītā's exile is narrated. It is thus generally well known to North Indian audiences.[61] This knowledge has made it possible for contemporary social scientists, journalists, and activists to survey ordinary people as to their response to Sītā's treatment at the hands of Rāma, a figure whom they otherwise admire deeply and hold in great reverence.

A good example of the kind of responses that people, mainly women, give to interviewers is to be seen in the essay, "Yes to Sita, No to Rama: The Continuing Hold of Sita on Popular Imagination in India," by the scholar-activist Madhu Kishwar, one of the founders of Manushi: A Journal about Women and Society.[62] Kishwar interviewed women from a variety of socioeconomic and religious backgrounds, all of whom worked outside the home, asking them to talk about their feelings toward Sītā. In response to the issue of the heroine's banishment, she received a number of variations on the theme of disapproval of Rāma as a husband because of the way in which he subjected Sītā to both the agniparīkṣā and the Sītātyāga. One respondent, a brahman woman from a family of Rāmabhaktas, said:

> Sita is undoubtedly an ideal wife according to the norms of our society, but I feel she should have rebelled more. She should have refused even the first agniparīksha. How dare Ram doubt her integrity in the first place! I don't think it was in deference to social opinion that he subjected her to such a humiliation, because even before anyone else said anything, he insulted her for being a captive of Ravan—as if she chose it. It is because he had these unworthy doubts in his mind that the second time round he got swayed by the comment of a mere dhobi (washerman). The condition in which he abandoned her [she was pregnant then], and the way he did it can by no means be called dharma. It was cruel and foolish. I fail to understand why they call

> Ram maryādā puruṣottam. He certainly failed in his maryādā as a husband.[63]

Another woman, a college Sanskrit teacher, observed:

> So enamoured was he with the idea of being considered an ideal king that he did not even treat his wife with elementary consideration—a wife who was completely devoted to him, had surrendered herself so totally to him, and who was altogether flawless. Tulsi tries to be too smart in attempting to exonerate Ram by depicting him as casting away only a shadow Sita—not the real one. I personally even object to the first agniparīksha.[64]

These samples of longer and additional comments that Kishwar's respondents made show that some contemporary women share much the same critiques of this episode as are found in older texts extending back to the epic period itself.

A rather dramatic demonstration of the impact of Vālmīki's Uttarakāṇḍa and its controversial representation of Rāma's repudiation of Sītā is to be seen in the social and political conflict that erupted in the late 1980s over the concluding episodes of the wildly popular Doordarshan television serialization of the Rāmāyaṇa, Ramanand Sagar's multi-episode Ramayan. Despite several extensions of the much-beloved serial in response to popular demand and the requests of Sagar himself, the series, largely based on the version of Tulsīdās, was not originally designed to include the Uttarakāṇḍa, as it was anticipated that the representation of the repudiation of the beloved and revered goddess-heroine Sītā might offend Hindus. The omission of the kāṇḍa, however, proved to be equally offensive to sanitation workers belonging to low-caste groups who identify strongly with Vālmīki, who plays a major role in the book as the sage who shelters Sītā, nurtures and educates her twin sons, and finally brings them all back to Ayodhyā where he testifies to Sītā's fidelity and the twins' legitimacy. According to some legends and popular tradition, Vālmīki was himself originally of humble social origins. Thus he takes the role of a patron saint for some Dalit groups, particularly the safai karamchari workers who, calling themselves Bālmīks, have even adopted his name under the influence of Hindu reform movements. In order to pressure the government-run television company, the workers went on a "brooms down" strike in the summer of 1988 that suspended refuse collection in Delhi and several other cities across North and Central India. Their case was supported by a large group of Scheduled Caste Members of Parliament while a lawsuit was filed against Sagar, Doordarshan, and the Ministry of Information and Broadcasting. This in turn led to court hearings in which it was ruled that the series could continue and thus could screen the sequence of Sītā's abandonment and her being sheltered by Vālmīki.[65]

The incident is quite remarkable and gives ample evidence of how the thematic of the Uttarakāṇḍa, which raises deeply felt and closely imbricated issues of caste, gender, religion, and politics, continues to stir passions in contemporary India. Also interesting is the way in which Sagar managed to negotiate these issues in such a way as to minimize the possibility of giving offense to any of the parties to the dispute. Although the screening of the Uttarakāṇḍa episode of the abandonment of Sītā succeeded in placating the Dalit groups who were offended by its omission of those scenes in which Vālmīki plays a leading role, the question remained as to how to represent the slander directed against Sītā and her being deceitfully sent into exile without arousing the anger of religious groups and also of those feminists who see in the Rāmāyaṇa, and especially in its closing sections, a charter for the objectification, subjugation, and oppression of Indian women.

Sagar's resolution was, in a way, reminiscent of that of Bhavabhūti who, as noted above, represents Sītā as supportive of Rāma's placing his public duty over his personal, emotional life. The British journalist Mark Tully, who spent two days at Sagar's Vrindavan Studios in Umargaon during the filming of the series, addresses this matter as follows:

> When I was in Umargaon, Ramanand Sagar was wrestling with feminist problems in the last section of the Ramayan. He was thinking of placating the feminists by making Sita take the decision to go into exile herself. "Sita notices that Ram can't take any decision, and so she asks him what is wrong. He replies that people are saying that she is not pure. She tells him that the people are fools, but Ram says, 'They are our people.' Then Sita says, 'I will not stay and bring disgrace on this great family.' Ram's brother Lakshman then tries to pacify her by saying, 'We will cut their tongues out.' So Sita replies, 'That's the men's way of doing things. We have ways of making people feel ashamed so that there is a permanent change in them.' Eventually, after her exile, the people of Ayodhya go out and beg her to come back. She tells them, 'You do not deserve me,' and asks Mother Earth to swallow her up. So she is the winner, not the loser, as the feminists seem to think."[66]

From the above sampling of the history of the reception of the Uttarakāṇḍa's episode of the banishment of Sītā, it should be clear that the episode has been the subject of variation, revision, rationalization, excision, and controversy from its beginning through the purāṇas, the kāvya literature, Sanskrit commentaries, vernacular Rāmāyaṇas, and modern studies and reworkings of the Rāma story in a variety of media.

In recent years a number of authors, translators, and scholars have produced their own versions of the epic tale from which, for one reason or another, the episode of the abandonment of Sītā, or even the entire Uttarakāṇḍa, has been omitted. One example, a scholarly one, is Rāma the Steadfast: An Early Form of the Rāmāyaṇa,[67] a partial translation of the critical edition of the Vālmīki Rāmāyaṇa by the well-known Sanskrit scholar John Brockington and his wife, Mary. In this volume, the authors seek, on philological grounds, to render what they believe to have been the earliest surviving core of the epic poem. In keeping with general scholarly opinion, this involves the excision of even passages admitted to the critical edition, not to mention, of course, the entire Bāla- and Uttarakāṇḍas.

A different approach has governed the choice of M. R. Parameswaran, as seen in his recent work Rāmāyaṇa: A Condensed Version of Valmiki's Epic.[68] Without discussion or apology, Parameswaran offers concise and readable selections from the first six kāṇḍas of the epic poem, making no reference whatever to the Uttarakāṇḍa or its contents. However, in many personal communications with us, and in a forthcoming publication, he has made it clear that he does not regard the Uttarakāṇḍa, which he refers to dismissively as the "Pretender Kāṇḍa,"[69] as a genuine part of Vālmīki's poem. He makes no secret of his devotional approach to the Rāmāyaṇa, dedicating his translation "to our divine parents Rama and Sita." Aside from the usual philological understanding that the kāṇḍa is a somewhat later addition to the poem—a notion that also applies to the Bālakāṇḍa—Parameswaran makes it clear that what he objects to is what he sees as the poor moral character ascribed to the epic hero in the book.

A very interesting and incisive contemporary analysis of the continuing impact of the Rāmāyaṇa with particular reference to the abandonment of Sītā and its resonance in the sense of masculinity on the part of modern India's elite men can be found in the novelist Rana Dasgupta's dark and mordant account of post-partition Delhi in his Capital: The Eruption of Delhi.[70] Musing on his observation that, of all the various self-revelatory messages one sees inscribed on the rear windows of the capital's automobiles, the most common is the simple name "Rāma," Dasgupta offers a critical take on the Rāmāyaṇa and the characterization of its hero. After noting that Rāma, of course, represents an ideal of power and virtue, and a symbol of renewed Hindu dominance, he writes:

> But it is possible that Rama appeals to Delhi drivers not only because of his martial power, and the fantasy he holds out of Hindu recovery. Perhaps he also holds a more intimate appeal.
> The cliché about Rama is that he is the perfect man, the incarnation of all virtues. . . . What is striking about this wisdom is that it seems, on first sight, to fit so poorly with the stories we actually know about Rama, in which he seems like a deeply flawed and fragile man.
> Though he will fight fanatically for the recovery of his wife—because he understands the offence of a broken rule—when she comes home to him he hates her, not for what she has done but what has been done to her. It is dangerous to be loved by a man like this: he may raise armies for you when you are stolen away, but when you are by his side he is plagued by suspicions and spite. He is haunted by the idea that others may not have denied themselves as he has, by visions of the extravagant pleasures that they might enjoy.[71]

Dasgupta concludes his discussion of Rāma by speculating as to why one does not also see the name of the other great Vaiṣṇava hero Kṛṣṇa as frequently on the car windows. He observes, in part:

> Like Rama, Krishna is a warrior and a man of wisdom and moral seriousness, but he also has all the humour, eloquence and breadth of spirit that Rama lacks. He is unabashed about his sensuousness and his desires: his love for women is erotic and overpowering, and he knows the poetic ache of yearning for a lover far away. Like Rama, Krishna is beautiful, but women who desire him end up not with their noses cut off[72] but loved and serenaded by the music of his flute.[73]

In fact, the influence of Rāma on the Indian sense of masculinity that Dasgupta points out, and its implications for real-world gender relations, has had and continues to have serious consequences. In this vein let us conclude our discussion of the receptive history of Sītā's abandonment with a personal anecdote that illustrates the connection linking the social message of the Uttarakāṇḍa, its effects in the real world, and literary efforts at reform. Some twenty-five years ago we were cohosting a Rāmāyaṇa conference at the Central University of Hyderabad. There we met a gentleman from Pune who told us that he had been a civil servant in Bombay back in the late 1940s and early 1950s. At that time, he said, there was a large encampment of Hindu and Sikh women in the Maidan who had been repatriated through the agency of a binational commission after having been abducted and taken across the border during the chaos of Partition. They had, however, been rejected by their families, who cited Rāma's banishment of Sītā as their justification for their refusal to take back their abducted wives, sisters, and daughters. Many of these women, so our informant tearfully told us, were ultimately forced into prostitution or beggary. This human tragedy so upset him that he wrote his own revised version of the epic in Marathi, a version that did not include the repudiation of Sītā.

THE ŚAMBŪKAVADHA, "THE KILLING OF ŚAMBŪKA"

Second only to the abandonment of Sītā, the summary execution of the śūdra ascetic Śambūka has proven to be a source of unease among some audiences of those versions of the Rāmāyaṇa that include some form of the Uttarakāṇḍa. Although, as indicated above, several of the figures in the epic are shown to exhibit disquiet or even great sorrow over Rāma's banishment of his queen, neither the poet nor any of his characters appear to feel any remorse for the killing of this individual, nor do the commentators make any special efforts to justify it.

The episode is clearly an important one for the author of the Uttarakāṇḍa as four full sargas are devoted to the circumstances leading to the deed, to its actual performance, and to its consequences.[74] In these chapters we learn that a brahman appears at the gateway to Rāma's palace bearing the corpse of his young son. According to the often-repeated glorification of Rāma's ideal reign, no bad things, whether social, natural, or political, can occur under his benign rulership. Now the death of a child before that of its parents is one of the calamities that, as several of the epic's descriptions of Rāma's utopian reign stress, should not occur during his kingship.[75]

As the perfection of the kingdom is indexed to the perfection of the king, the brahman reproaches Rāma for his dereliction of duty and demands that he restore the child to life.[76] Rāma duly summons his counselors to advise him. The divine seer Nārada, after discoursing on which of the four varṇas, or social classes, are and are not permitted to engage in religious austerities in each of the four yugas, or cosmic eons, informs the king that somewhere in his realm a lowly śūdra must be so engaged, thus violating the dharma of the current age, the Tretā Yuga. He ascribes the untimely death of the child to this violation and instructs Rāma to take forceful action to put an end to it and so restore the boy to life.[77]

Accordingly, Rāma gives instructions for the preservation of the child's body and, summoning the flying palace Puṣpaka, makes a complete aerial survey of his realm. Surveying the southern region, he spies an ascetic performing fierce austerities. Approaching him, Rāma inquires as to the man's reason for his self-mortification and asks him to which of the four varṇas he belongs.[78] Still hanging upside down in his practice of austerity, the man tells Rāma that he is performing this act with the goal of attaining heaven in his earthly body. He says that his name is Śambūka and that he is a member of the lowest of the four varṇas, the śūdra class. Before Śambūka can even finish his speech, Rāma draws his sword and beheads him. As soon as Śambūka is killed, the gods assemble, praising Rāma for this deed as showers of blossoms fall from the heavens. They offer Rāma a boon in recompense for what they regard as a highly virtuous act. He requests only that the dead child should be restored to life, and the gods inform him that the child, in fact, had already been restored to life at the very moment that the śūdra was killed. Rāma then goes on to visit the ashram of the great sage Agastya, who also praises him for his virtuous deed.[79]

This disturbing episode is evidently meant to shore up the varṇāśrama system that is central to the vedic-brahmanic conception of the idealized hierarchical society celebrated as the Rāmarājya and may, as some have argued, reflect the hardening of social attitudes of a period of composition later than that of the central books of the poem. Thus, as has been observed by Brockington, in the Ayodhyākāṇḍa we find the episode of Daśaratha's deathbed recollection of having accidently killed a śūdra ascetic narrated without criticism of such a person's engagement in religious austerities. On the other hand, here, in the final book of the poem, such a practice causes calamity, and it is deemed necessary and indeed praiseworthy for Rāma to execute the culprit. Brockington takes the episode to indicate an "enormous shift in attitudes and the increase in rigidity of the varṇa system."[80]

A particularly strong response to the episode is to be found in an article by Asim Kumar Chatterjee, who notes:

> The present writer strongly feels that the story of the assassination of this innocent Śūdra ascetic by Rāma is an invention of some bigoted Brāhmaṇa poet who had inveterate faith in the infallibility of the Smṛtis. It is utterly inconsistent with the character of the broad-minded Rāma, who is described elsewhere as a sincere friend of the Niṣāda chief Guha . . . The whole episode . . . appears to be the work of a vainglorious, caste-conscious fanatic who had no faith in the unconquerable spirit of man.[81]

The episode is known to the Mahābhārata, where it is mentioned very briefly that a brahman boy had been restored to life when, in keeping with dharma, the śūdra Śambūka had been slain by Rāma of true valor.[82] The story is also known to the purāṇas that narrate the events of the Uttarakāṇḍa, but their accounts, like that in Vālmīki's version, are told very simply and straightforwardly with no criticism of Rāma, no praise of the śūdra, and no attempt to rationalize what is seen as a highly justified execution of a sinner. Thus, for example, the Padmapurāṇa devotes some sixty verses to the episode, which follows the Uttarakāṇḍa very closely and represents Rāma as deserving nothing but praise and boons for his deed.[83]

But, as in the case of the abandonment of Sītā, it is the early poets who begin to express some concern at what appears to be at best an excessively harsh and violent action on Rāma's part. In doing so they employ what come to be two very common and related tropes in the poetic and devotional literature, those of the liberation through death of a cursed divinity and of the exaltation of even an evil and degraded being through death at the hands of a divinity.

Kālidāsa, for example, treats the episode in an eleven-verse passage in the fifteenth sarga of his Raghuvaṃśa in which he concisely summarizes it, closely following Vālmīki's version. But the poet adds something that is absent from the original. He takes up the question of the afterlife of the beheaded śūdra, stating:

> The śūdra attained the highest realm of the virtuous, because his punishment had been administered by the king himself, and not because of his difficult austerities, which were in violation of his own proper sphere of action.[84]

Mallinātha, commenting on the verse, cites a verse from the Manusmṛti, according to which those who commit sinful acts are, when punished by kings, purified and attain heaven just as do the virtuous who perform good deeds.[85]

Given the enormous scope of Kālidāsa's literary epic, the attention he pays to the episode is fairly impressive. It cannot, however, be compared to the elaborate treatment afforded it in the vastly more focal Uttararāmacarita of Bhavabhūti, who devotes virtually the entire second act of the play to the event and its aftermath. In the prologue (śuddhaviṣkambhaka) to the act, the ascetic woman Ātreyī, in conversation with the forest divinity Vāsantī, provides a condensed and only slightly modified version of Vālmīki's account of the complaint of the grieving brahman and Rāma's search for the errant śūdra.[86] But once Rāma arrives to carry out the execution, the tenor of the story begins to change significantly. From the outset, it is clear that unlike in the Uttarakāṇḍa, where Rāma appears eager to carry out his duty as a dharmic king and exhibits no sign of concern or compassion for the hapless Śambūka, Bhavabhūti's hero is deeply conflicted and reluctant to carry out his grim task. As he enters the stage, his sword drawn, he is described as filled with pity (sadayotkhātakhaḍgaḥ). Moreover, as in the case of Sītā's banishment, as represented in the play, Rāma is also filled with a kind of self-loathing for the terrible act he feels obligated to perform. He says:

> "O my right hand! Go ahead and bring down my blade upon the śūdra sage as a life-giving drug for the brahman's child. After all you are a limb of Rāma, who was keen to banish Sītā when she was fatigued with her advanced pregnancy. So where is your compassion?"[87]

Striking Śambūka with hesitation (kathaṃcit prahṛtya), he says, ironically, "This is truly a deed worthy of Rāma."[88]

But it is in the aftermath of the execution that the poet truly revalorizes the entire episode. For no sooner has the śūdra been slain than he reenters the stage, now transfigured as a celestial personage (divyapuruṣa), who prostrates himself and sings the praises of Rāma. He claims that the restoration of the dead child to life has redounded to his own elevation since deaths that ensue from contact with the virtuous bring one to salvation.[89]

Rāma now blesses the transformed śūdra so that he can truly enjoy the desired result of his severe austerities (tad anubhūyatām ugrasya tapasaḥ paripākaḥ).[90] Śambūka does not depart immediately for his newly won heavenly world but remains onstage for the remainder of the act, leaving only briefly to offer his respects to the sage Agastya and to carry the latter's invitation to Rāma. Indeed, the poet even has the redeemed śūdra recite five of the play's most beautiful verses, descriptive of the landscape of the Daṇḍaka forest and of the regions of Janasthāna and Pañcavatī.[91]

Bhavabhūti's representation of Rāma's reluctance and self-reproach with regard to the execution of Śambūka, and especially his transfiguration of the despised renegade śūdra, who brings death and disorder to Rāma's supposedly utopian realm, into a blessed heavenly being is a fairly radical move away from the social vision of the Uttarakāṇḍa. This move is so striking that G. K. Bhat, in his introduction to his translation and annotation of the play, goes so far as to see the playwright as speaking out against the stringency of the varṇāśrama system. He remarks:

> The episode is a side-reflection on the iniquities of the caste system. And in showing the self-condemnation and disgust of Rāma in killing a "Śūdra sage," Bhavabhūti may be indicating his personal sympathy for Śambūka and his disapproval of the rigour of the caste system.[92]

Bhat's point here is debatable. However, what does seem clear is that, like Kālidāsa but even more strongly, Bhavabhūti is uncomfortable with the Uttarakāṇḍa's representation of Rāma as a ruler who heartlessly beheads a humble, low-caste person who is engaged in spiritual discipline in a vain hope of attaining salvation.

A genuinely revalorized version of the Śambūka episode is to be found in the interesting Ānandarāmāyaṇa, attributed to Vālmīki himself and dated to between the fourteenth and seventeenth centuries.[93] This interesting reworking of the Rāma story has, according to Vidyut Aklujkar, as one of its goals "revitalizing the concepts of justice and society in light of contemporary concerns."[94] In this version, which, as Aklujkar notes, has been "revised in the light of bhakti and karma-vipāka,"[95] the crisis of the death of the brahman boy begins to reach epidemic proportions with no fewer than seven deaths of people of various ages and social classes, and of both genders being attributed to the wrongful asceticism of the śūdra. Of note here is that, in the case of the brahman child, Sītā, who in Vālmīki's account had already long been sent away by the time of the incident, intervenes to promise the grieving parents of the dead child that she would give up her own son, Lava, should Rāma fail to revive their son.[96]

Whereas Vālmīki's Rāma summarily executes Śambūka the moment he learns of his varṇa status, in the Ānandarāmāyaṇa version, Rāma "explains to him compassionately how only the three classes of Brahmin, Kshatriya and Vaishya are entitled to tapas."[97] Rāma explains that he is obliged to kill Śambūka in order to restore the seven dead to life but says that he is actually pleased with the śūdra's asceticism and offers him a boon. In a distinctly devotional twist to the story, Śambūka asks that śūdras gain access to heaven. Rāma grants this wish, telling him that they should recite the Rāmanāma, or the name of Rāma, which they ultimately do through their familiar greeting of "Rām Rām." Promising that upon death Śambūka will attain Viṣṇu's heavenly realm, Vaikuṇṭha, Rāma finally executes him.[98]

This version of the episode, which appears to owe much to Bhavabhūti's interpretation, similarly serves to show that beyond the context of Vālmīki's Uttarakāṇḍa and its commentators, the literary and religious traditions were uncomfortable with Rāma's seemingly heartless execution of the śūdra ascetic and the way in which it seemed out of keeping with the general devotional representation of Rāma as a paragon of compassion for even the lowliest of his subjects.

Whatever the case, it is certain that the episode has become one of the central targets of criticism by scholars and social and political activists in the modern world with its contemporary ethos of egalitarianism. This is especially so on the part of representatives of traditionally lower-caste groups who have been discriminated against, exploited, and marginalized throughout the history of South Asian civilization. These groups, today referred to with designations such as Dalits, Scheduled Castes, Scheduled Tribes, Bahujans, Adivasis, and Backward Castes, naturally and with good reason identify with such lower-caste and tribal epic figures as Śambūka, Ekalavya, and so forth, and tend to see in the epic texts themselves the charters for their own oppression and marginalization.

In the case of E. V. Ramasami (EVR), the leader of the Dravidian movement, Richman notes, after discussing his critique of Rāma's treatment of Sītā:

> E.V.R. reserves his greatest outrage, however, for Rāma's treatment of Śūdras, the lowest group in the four-part brahmanical caste ranking and one of the major audiences of his pamphlet. He notes that Rāma killed a Śūdra named Śambūka because he was performing asceticism, which the Vedic tradition prohibits to those not twice-born (that is, Śūdras and Untouchables). Rāma murdered this Śūdra in order to revive a Brahmin boy who had died—that such an untimely death should strike a Brahmin family signaled that somewhere someone (in this case Śambūka) was committing an offense against dharma. After summarizing this incident, E.V.R. extrapolates from it to present-day South India. "If there were kings like Rāma now, what would be the fate of those people called Śūdras?" he asks, implying that Śūdras would never be safe from murder if such a king still ruled. Since over 60 percent of South Indians are regarded as Śūdras, at least by Brahmins,

E.V.R. stirs the rage of a good number of his readers by emphasizing this event.[99]

The Marxist critic of the Rāmāyaṇa, Ranganayakamma, too, naturally focuses on the killing of Śambūka. As is her practice, she provides in separate sections of each page a more or less accurate version of Vālmīki's account, as well as her own rather expanded account. In the latter, she introduces a lengthy dialogue between Śambūka and Rāma in which the śūdra argues for human equality while Rāma defends the elitist status quo of varṇāśramadharma. The author renders (in part) this debate as follows:

> [Śambūka] "I believe that all human beings are equal in worshipping the god."
> [Rāma] "Are you so independent? Are human beings equal before god? Never. Among human beings, Sudras are the lowest. They are base people who ought to live by serving the upper Varnas (castes). If all Sudras defy the oldest tradition and expect a life of penance, who will serve the upper castes?
> "If all the Sudras attain this otherworldly knowledge, what will they have to do with worldly duties? Who are the Brahmins? Who are the Sudras?
> "Fool! All your attempts will go to waste. All scriptures declare loudly that there is no place for a Sudra in the worlds."
> [Śambūka] "What is the sin of the Sudras, my lord?"
> [Rāma] "To be born a Sudra!"
> [Śambūka] "I cannot agree."
> [Rāma] "Why? Not agreeing with the scriptures and not accepting them without any doubt, do you dare to argue and question them?"
> [Śambūka] "O king! Will a Sudra himself accept without question the scriptures that debase, insult and harm a Sudra?"[101]

Ranganayakamma may well have gotten the idea of staging this debate and making Śambūka an advocate and activist avant la lettre, as it were, for human dignity and equality from a Tamil play by one Tripuraneni Ramaswamy Chowdary entitled Sambuka Vadha, which she renders as Murder of Sambuka.[102] Ramaswamy's play, which Ranganayakamma summarizes at length and critiques,[103] offers an interesting and instructive window into the conflicting drives toward tradition and modernity that converge in the episode for contemporary writers who read Vālmīki's Uttarakāṇḍa. In the play Śambūka is no longer simply an isolated rogue śūdra who performs forbidden penances in a remote wilderness in an effort to breach the heavenly gates. Here, according to Rāma's guru, Vasiṣṭha, Śambūka has become the leader of a rebel movement who plans to build an ashram close to Ayodhyā where, like the Buddha, he will gather non-brahman disciples, refute the Vedic scriptures, and then send his converts around the country to preach the doctrine of equality between śūdras and Aryans.[104]

Interestingly, Rāma is portrayed as supportive of Śambūka's movement, asking, "Is it not proper that all our subjects have equal rights?" Ranganayakamma herself is far from impressed by Rāma's conversion:

> How are Rama's answers? What does he mean by equal rights when there have been caste distinctions for a long time in the kingdoms of his father and forefathers! Is it not because of the absence of such rights that Sambuka was defying old rules for the sake of rights? Though he knew that Sambuka was defying the existing rules and organizing a movement demanding equal rights on a par with Aryans, will Rama say, "All people should have equal rights, shouldn't they?" From where did this socialist Rama come in the period of the Ramayana? Is Ramaswamy not aware that Rama was an Aryan king, that he became hostile to Dravidians and waged battles and that he was determined to destroy Rakshasas? Will such Rama say he would give equal rights to the Sudras (Dravidians) under his rule?[105]

Vasiṣṭha presses Rāma to uphold the immemorial rules of varṇāśramadharma, and, deeply conflicted, Rāma promises to do so by imposing strict new laws that would impose harsh penalties on those who violate the rules of social hierarchy. But the guru is not satisfied. He demands the death penalty for the errant śūdra and Rāma agrees to carry it out, summoning Śambūka to a tribunal that will judge his guilt and impose punishment. The śūdra declines to appear before the tribunal and the reluctant king goes to his ashram to debate with him further. Once again Rāma is persuaded by the righteousness of Śambūka's cause and comes away determined to grant all his subjects equal rights. Vasiṣṭha is furious at Rāma's failure to execute a śūdra whom he believes is virtuous and innocent of any wrongdoing. Finally, regarding it as imperative for him to obey his guru's orders, Ramaswamy's Rāma, much as in his portrayal in the Uttararāmacarita and the Ānandarāmāyaṇa, reluctantly beheads the śūdra revolutionary. Ramaswamy actually paraphrases Bhavabhūti's verse that Rāma addresses to his own right hand when he beheads Śambūka, leading Ranganayakamma to interject sarcastically, "(perhaps his right hand alone sent Sita to the forest!)."[106]

Ramaswamy's play reflects very clearly the controversial nature of this episode from the Uttarakāṇḍa. Deeply discomfited by the inescapable literary tradition of Rāma's execution of an innocent low-caste man, and yet determined to uphold Rāma as an ideal king, the playwright creates a peculiar characterization of the hero as at heart a liberal democrat striving to be a constitutional monarch who is, however, bullied into a terrible act against a reformer by his ultraconservative guru. Thus, the playwright tries (not very successfully, as Ranganayakamma shows) to resolve the tensions between regarding Rāma, on the one hand, as a compassionate and just ruler and, on the other, as a harsh enforcer of the stringent rules of varṇāśramadharma. His solution is to make heroes of both Śambūka and Rāma while placing the blame squarely on the brahmanical establishment, as represented by the Ikṣvākus' purohita, Vasiṣṭha.

In light of the complex and conflicted reception of the two episodes discussed above, it becomes clear why the Uttarakāṇḍa, alone among the seven kāṇḍas, has provoked so many varied and passionate responses in the works of poets, commentators, purāṇic bards, religious teachers, social activists, and scholars throughout its long, receptive history. In most cases the modifications, revisions, and even excision to which the kāṇḍa has been subjected can be seen as having been inspired by concern, disquiet, or even outright revulsion at the light that the episodes, as first represented in Vālmīki's Uttarakāṇḍa, shed on the characterization of Rāma, a characterization that, with a few exceptions, appears to contrast with that found in the previous six kāṇḍas.

8. The Structure of the Uttarakāṇḍa

As noted above, the Uttarakāṇḍa, like the Bālakāṇḍa, is commonly understood to be a late or spurious book consisting of an eclectic collection of "virtually independent episodes."[1] For this reason, the kāṇḍa has suffered neglect on the part of many scholars. Moreover, the vast majority of scholarship that has been directed toward the kāṇḍa has been focused on specific references that support larger examinations of comparative dating, geographic and ethnic identifications, language, episodes, and the like;[2] examinations and comparisons of specific sections or individual episodes found in the kāṇḍa;[3] or examinations of the structural relationship of the kāṇḍa to the Bālakāṇḍa.[4] There has, however, been little scholarship devoted exclusively to analyzing the kāṇḍa as a discrete entity,[5] while those scholars who have undertaken such studies have done so largely in an attempt to establish whether or not the book is a "genuine" or spurious part of the epic.[6]

Camille Bulcke, in his 1960 article "The Rāmāyaṇa: Its History and Character," echoes the general scholarly dissatisfaction with the book with reference to its so-called purāṇic episodes but expands his critique to include the narrative structure of the entire kāṇḍa, noting, "The style and composition of both the Bālakāṇḍa and the Uttarakāṇḍa stand in sharp contrast to the other books of the Rāmāyaṇa. Both are sadly lacking in unity and development of plot."[7] Bulcke is so dissatisfied with the first and last books that rather than summarizing them, as he does with the middle five, he divides them into sections, arguing, "since the two spurious books lack unity, their contents will be listed and square brackets will be used to indicate later additions."[8] With this understanding,

[1] See Introduction, "Rākṣasas," p. 36, note 2 and Brockington 1998, p. 381. See also Bulcke 1960; Sen 1968; R. Goldman 1984, pp. 21–22; and Thapar 2013, p. 221. The other reason often raised concerning the lateness of the Uttarakāṇḍa is the pervading Vaiṣṇava tone of the book. See Introduction, "Theology," pp. 169–86. See Agrawal 1975, who argues against this.

[7] Bulcke 1960, p. 40.

[8] Bulcke 1960, p. 45.

Bulcke divides the Uttarakāṇḍa into seven distinct sections as follows in his own words:[9]

1. Sargas 1–36: [The histories of Rāvaṇa and Hanumān.]
2. Sargas 37–52: Departure of the guests the day after Rāma's coronation. The repudiation of Sītā, who is abandoned in the vicinity of Vālmīki's hermitage.
3. Sargas 53–59: [The purāṇic stories of Nimi and Yayāti.]
4. Sargas 60–72: The story of Śatrughna; his two visits to Vālmīki's hermitage, once when Sītā's twins are born and again twelve years later when he hears the twins recite the Rāmāyaṇa.
5. Sargas 73–82: [The episode of Śambūka, the Śūdra, killed by Rāma for practising asceticism against his caste-rules.]
6. Sargas 83–99: The horse-sacrifice of Rāma; singing of the Rāmāyaṇa by the sons of Sītā; Sītā's oath and disappearance into the earth.
7. Sargas 100–101[sic 110]: The conquests of the sons of Lakṣmaṇa and Bharata. Tragic death of Lakṣmaṇa. The settling of Kuśa at Kuśāvatī and Lava at Śrāvastī. The departure for heaven of Rāma, Bharata, Śatrughna and the inhabitants of Ayodhyā.

It is no accident that the very divisions that Bulcke identifies, as well as the material he omits from his list, serve to reinforce his opinion that the Uttarakāṇḍa lacks structural or narrative unity.[10] In avoiding a syntactically integrated summary, he appears to negate the possibility of such a summary for the book, while the itemization serves to substantiate the fragmented nature of the narrative while delegitimizing any claim of a cohesive structure.

In contrast to this approach, a few scholars have advanced the opposite position, arguing for the narrative integrity, in whole or in part, of the Uttarakāṇḍa. Early on, even Hermann Jacobi, who was one of the first to argue that the book was not part of the original Rāmāyaṇa, recognized that the opening section of the Uttarakāṇḍa, that is, the section containing the history of Rāvaṇa, which he called the Râvaṇeïs,[11] was an independent unit. In his monograph, Rāma and the Bards: Epic Memory

[9] Bulcke 1960, p. 48. It is interesting that Bulcke reserves this method of summarizing the contents for the first and last books only. For the remaining books, he briefly retells the narrative in paragraph form. This provides a subtle, yet powerful way to reinforce the content of his argument, that of a clear difference between books 2–6 and the first and last books. See Bulcke 1960, pp. 45–48.

[10] In the first section, for example, Bulcke omits the fact that both Rāvaṇa's and Hanumān's histories are narrated by Agastya in response to Rāma's questions (Rāvaṇa's history: 7.1.24–26; 7.2.1; 7.4.1–8; 7.34.44; Hanumān's history: 7.35.1–15; 7.36.45–46).

[11] Based on intertextual evidence and metrical considerations, Jacobi (1893, p. 74) argues that probably the Uttarakāṇḍa, but certainly the Râvaṇeïs, predates the Rāmopākhyāna of the Mahābhārata. See also Brockington 1998, p. 392.

in the Ramayana, Robert Antoine, perhaps influenced by Jacobi's understanding, looks to identify "something of the vision which inspired the ancient bards and fascinated their listeners."[12] He identifies this section of the Uttarakāṇḍa (sargas 1–34 in the critical edition) and that of the Viśvāmitra episode from the Bālakāṇḍa (sargas 50–64) as two opposing representations of the "attitudes to life, two different sets of values."[13] In so doing Antoine carefully analyzes both passages as coherent and parallel narratives. Understanding both the first and the last books as narratively integral to the larger vision of the epic poet, he sees the poet's vision as one that invites "us to look far above the human scene in order to discover the timeless standards of the cosmic order."[14] According to Antoine, this vision, which he calls "vertical," encouraged the poem's audience to look beyond the human condition to the supramundane. For him, this original "vertical" vision of the epic poet was eventually replaced by one that he understands as "horizontal," "according to which the human situation counts for itself and seeks its fulfillment within purely human limits."[15] It is this shift on the part of the epic's audiences over time from one worldview to another that Antoine feels gave rise to the later tradition's discomfort with, misunderstanding of, and attempts to rewrite and silence parts of the epic.[16] While Antoine has not dealt specifically with the narrative structure of the Uttarakāṇḍa as a whole, his analysis presupposes that the final book is critical to the underlying mythic structure of the entire epic. Moreover, he clearly understands the history of Rāvaṇa to be in juxtaposition with and an inversion of the Viśvāmitra episode of the Bālakāṇḍa, and he argues for a narrative logic in the episode based on the parallelism of the two episodes.

In a similar vein, Jagannath Agrawal rejects the view that the Uttarakāṇḍa is either spurious or a mismatched assortment of episodes and instead understands that the book is a logical and integral part of the epic.[17] He argues:

> So far as the legends contained in this book are concerned, they are a logical necessity for the proper completion of the poem, and cannot be dubbed as interruptions to the narrative. If we examine the Uttarakāṇḍa in the light of authentic ancient literary tradition, we shall find that far from being spurious, this book constitutes an integral part of the Rāmāyaṇa, which bereft of this, would remain incomplete.

Agrawal, however, never really provides a satisfactory or detailed argument in support of his ideas. He notes generally that a number of episodes, such as the abandonment of Sītā and the birth of Kuśa and Lava, are integral to the Rāma narrative itself and that Kālidāsa and Bhavabhūti drew upon the Uttarakāṇḍa and understood it as an essential part of Vālmīki's Rāmāyaṇa.[18] And while, as we shall see below, external evidence will be a valuable tool in understanding the Uttarakāṇḍa's structure, Agrawal never addresses what must be understood to be the most important issues: whether the kāṇḍa has an inherent structural logic of its own, and if so, how its logic functions within the book and the epic at large.

Madeleine Biardeau, in a closing essay to the Gallimard translation of the Gujarati Printing Press Edition of the Vālmīki Rāmāyaṇa, which she directed with Marie-Claude Porcher, is one of the few who presents a totalizing interpretation of the Uttarakāṇḍa, reading it, in part, as a response to the advent of Buddhism in North India and placing great emphasis on the role of Śatrughna as the last warrior of his lineage and of Sītā as the goddess of earth.[19] While Biardeau makes some interesting and challenging associations in her analysis, and one must applaud her efforts in this respect, she is somewhat selective in her choice of episodes to include, thus providing a less than satisfactory picture of the structure of the kāṇḍa.

Virtually all the other books of the epic have a clear structural logic.[20] Should the same not be true for the Uttarakāṇḍa? The Uttarakāṇḍa's narrative appears to allow for a number of ways to understand its structure. Most basically and yet only partially satisfying is the position that the book can be understood to respond to a "natural curiosity felt by the audience" to know what happened after Rāma's consecration.[21] As noted earlier, one might also argue that much as the history of Kṛṣṇa starts with his birth and finishes with his death, similarly, there is a cultural expectation that Rāma's history, too, should encompass his entire life span.[22] This expectation, of course, explains those events that are directly tied to the Rāmacarita, such as the abandonment of Sītā, the birth of Lava and Kuśa, and the end of Rāma's career. But arguably both the curiosity and expectations are external and hypothetical.

That the Uttarakāṇḍa is structurally intimately linked with the larger epic narrative is clear.[23] The annular structure of the entire epic with its frame story of Lava's and Kuśa's recitation of the Rāmāyaṇa, first described in the opening sargas of the Bālakāṇḍa,[24] is dependent on the Uttarakāṇḍa, where we are told that their performance takes place during Rāma's aśvamedha.[25] Moreover, the narrative proper of the life of Rāma as told by Vālmīki begins, more or less, with the aśvamedha performed by Daśaratha[26] and now ends with Rāma's own aśvamedha. The events that transpire at Rāma's sacrifice temporally frame the epic itself as a literary composition whose public performative history for all intents and purposes begins with the singing of the poem by Rāma's twin sons before the king.[27] This performance must be the very same one described more elaborately at the end of the poem during Rāma's aśvamedha.[28] In this way, the account of the singing of the work by the sons of Rāma to their father both begins and ends the poem as a work of literature.

Rāma's aśvamedha culminates in Sītā's vow of fidelity and return to the earth.[29] It has been argued that this second demonstration of fidelity by Sītā is integral to the internal logic of the larger epic.[30] While both the recitation and Sītā's oath of fidelity allow us to situate the kāṇḍa within the larger epic and to appreciate that at some point in the epic's history such an integration was felt necessary, neither episode, in and of itself, advances our understanding of a unique internal structure that can be identified as underlying the Uttarakāṇḍa's narrative.

In any reading of the Uttarakāṇḍa, the aśvamedha sacrifice of Rāma must be considered a central moment. For in addition to its providing a conclusion to the framing narrative of the larger epic, the aśvamedha marks both the moment of the reintegration of the nuclear family and its final dissolution. It is only upon the conclusion of the sacrifice that Rāma's kingdom is free from further crises and that he can rule as a perfectly righteous king for thousands of years. Moreover, the aśva- medha marks a major temporal shift in the narrative from one of the past to one of the present and the future.[31] Given these factors, we must ask what makes the aśvamedha so important, and how, if at all, the rest of the narrative is linked to this central event. Rather than assuming, like Bulcke, that the kāṇḍa is largely fragmentary, let us attempt to examine it as a cohesive structure and rational narrative. In such an effort, it would not be unreasonable to look to the central event of the book, the aśvamedha, to help us in our analysis.

TRANSGRESSION AND EXPIATION: BRAHMAHATYĀ

Even if modern scholars and audiences have failed to fully appreciate or identify an internal logic for the Uttarakāṇḍa, this was not always the case. That both the epic, consisting of all seven kāṇḍas, and the Uttarakāṇḍa on its own were traditionally conceptualized, received, and interpreted as a unified narrative by some of its audiences is clearly evidenced in texts that date back at least to the time of Kālidāsa. There is some evidence of this in the Mahābhārata as well, where the Rāmacarita is known, as is the Uttarakāṇḍa, although there are only scattered references to the latter.[32] And while the Mahābhārata's Rāmopākhyāna relates only the lineage of the rākṣasas, both the Padmapurāṇa and Kālidāsa's Raghuvaṃśa not only know the events of the entire Uttarakāṇḍa but incorporate them fully into their own narratives.[33]

Of these, the treatment of the Uttarakāṇḍa narrative in the Padmapurāṇa and the Mahābhārata's allusion to it in the Āśvamedhikaparvan supply important clues as to how the Uttarakāṇḍa was received by at least some of its audiences. What is striking about both passages is the contexts in which they occur, and it is these very contexts, that may, in fact, be a clue to how the tradition has understood the final book's narrative structure.

In the Āśvamedhikaparvan, as the narrative opens, Yudhiṣṭhira, having attended the funerary rites for Bhīṣma, is despondent, and his senses are overcome. As he physically sinks down in his depression, Kṛṣṇa, supporting him, urges him to give up his grief. Nevertheless, Yudhiṣṭhira, tormented, fallen to the ground, and repeatedly heaving deep sighs, is unresponsive. Seeing their brother and king in such a state, the remaining Pāṇḍavas sink down, surrounding him, overwhelmed with grief. Dhṛtarāṣṭra attempts to console Yudhiṣṭhira, urging him to let go of his grief and rule the kingdom. Kṛṣṇa, too, urges him to take up the responsibilities of kingship, but Yudhiṣṭhira wishes instead to renounce the world, as he can find no peace since he caused the death of his grandfather, Bhīṣma.[34] He begs Kṛṣṇa,

> O crusher of your enemies, please decree some action by which I would be released from this inauspicious deed and through which my mind would become pure.[35]

Kṛṣṇa attempts to console him, reminding him that a king who carries out his duty properly will not suffer and reassures him that he has done no wrong, even addressing him as "sinless one" (anagha—14.2.19). His efforts are in vain. In turn, Vyāsa attempts to convince Yudhiṣṭhira to abandon his grief, but then he realizes that the despondent king is not yet mature enough to understand that he has done no wrong. He suggests yet another strategy:

> "Finally, you consider yourself to have committed sinful acts. Now hear in reference to that how a sin might be removed, Bhārata.
> "Yudhiṣṭhira, men who have committed sins always atone through austerities, sacrifices, and charity.
> "By sacrifice, austerity, and charity, overlord of men and tiger among kings, men who have committed evil actions are purified.
> . . . . . .
> "Bhārata, O lord of men, Yudhiṣṭhira, you [should] offer a rājasūya, an aśvamedha, a sarvamedha, or a naramedha.
> "According to prescription, you must sacrifice by means of an aśvamedha [vājimedha], abounding in sacrificial fees, having much wealth, food, and desirable objects, just as Rāma Dāśarathi did."[36]

Critical here is that Yudhiṣṭhira, despite the objections of his kinsmen and Kṛṇṣa, feels the weight of a terrible sin, the killing of his revered elders. Vyāsa suggests that the most efficacious expedient to rid himself of this sin is to perform a sacrifice, and despite the mention of various options, only one sacrifice seems to be viable, the aśvamedha. Thus, a clear connection is established between the transgression and expiation by sacrifice.

That Yudhiṣṭhira should be told specifically that he should perform an aśvamedha sacrifice just like Rāma Dāśarathi at first might appear somewhat opaque. Neither the Bālakāṇḍa nor the Rāmopākhyāna mentions Rāma's aśvamedha, and the reference appears to be to the performance of this rite in the Uttarakāṇḍa. It seems clear then that the author of this section of the Āśvamedhikaparvan is familiar with the Uttarakāṇḍa's account of Rāma's aśvamedha, and it seems fairly clear from the context that the author understood that Rāma's sacrifice was offered as expiation of some transgression.[37] But what is Rāma's transgression?

This opening passage of the Āśvamedhikaparvan is not the first in which Yudhiṣṭhira's depression over his actions has engaged the epic poets. In the Śāntiparvan we have already been told that Yudhiṣṭhira is burning with grief as he recalls his slaughter of his relatives out of his greed for the kingdom.[38] Here, too, Vyāsa unsuccessfully attempts to console the depressed ruler, who continues to grieve over his slain kinsmen and who remains inconsolable about the carnage he oversaw. So distraught is Yudhiṣṭhira that, in addition to the slaying of his own kin, See Hiltebeitel (2001, pp. 68–69, 72–73), who briefly takes up the topic of Yudhiṣṭhira's depression over his transgressions and the aśvamedha sacrifice as a means of expiation. Cf. Brockington 1998, pp. 74–75.

[37] Daśaratha's aśvamedha in the Bālakāṇḍa, too, seems to be offered for the expiation of an unnamed transgression (see 1.13.39,44). Once this is removed, Daśaratha can then offer a second, specific rite, the putreṣṭi, so that he might acquire sons. The aśvamedhas of Yudhiṣṭhira in the Āśvamedhikaparvan and Daśaratha in the Bālakāṇḍa show clear similarities. Compare Bālakāṇḍa 13.4–7,15–22,25cd,29–31 with Āśvamedhikaparvan 90.20–22,24–30,34cd; 91.3–5. Brockington (1998, pp. 154, 480, 483) understands the similarities to arise from a similar source rather than borrowing. See, too, Koskikallio 1993.

> "It is clear that we will incur the sin of killing women, for dharma is subtle. In slaying our friends, we have committed an unending sin, and we shall fall into hell headfirst."[39]

Much as in the Āśvamedhikaparvan, Vyāsa advises that Yudhiṣṭhira undertake an aśvamedha for the expiation of his perceived transgressions.[40] But here, rather than calling to mind an earthly example, like that of Rāma Dāśarathi, Vyāsa reminds Yudhiṣṭhira of Indra's one hundred sacrifices,[41] although here there is no mention of any transgression on Indra's part or any specific sacrifice. However, a few ślokas farther on, Vyāsa once again urges Yudhiṣṭhira to carry out a sacrifice, saying, "Perform the aśvamedha (lit., vājimedha) sacrifice just as did victorious Indra long ago."[42] Here there is still no direct transgression mentioned on the part of Indra; however, the simile ties Indra directly to the aśvamedha sacrifice.

Elsewhere in the Mahābhārata the transgressions of Indra are made more explicit. J.A.B. van Buitenen takes up this issue in the introduction to his translation of the fifth book of the Mahābhārata, the Udyogaparvan. In his analysis of the Indra and Vṛtra story found at Mahābhārata

5.9–18 and, in particular, at 5.9–10, he carefully traces the mythic development of this epic narrative, drawing our attention to the fact that Indra has committed two transgressions for which he suffers guilt and seeks atonement. The first of these is brahmahatyā, or the slaying of a brahman, as he had slain Triśiras, the son of Tvaṣṭṛ.[43] The second crime is his killing of Vṛtra, who was created by Tvaṣṭṛ in revenge for the death of Triśiras. Although Vṛtra is never identified explicitly as a brahman in this passage, Indra is clearly despondent over his killing of Vṛtra, especially in that it involved deceit.[44] Earlier, when asked if he has no fear of the sin of brahmahatyā, Indra states that he will later act in such a way as to purify himself.[45]

The use of the aśvamedha as an expiation for transgressions, and specifically for brahmahatyā, is known at least from the Taittirīyasaṃhitā, where an explicit connection between them is stated:

> Truly, he who offers the aśvamedha sacrifice makes Prajāpati whole. He alone becomes whole. Indeed, this is the expiation for everything, this is the remedy for everything. Truly, by this even the gods overcame sin, and by this they overcame brahmahatyā. Whoever offers the aśvamedha sacrifice, he overcomes all sin, he overcomes brahmahatyā.[46]

Although Yudhiṣṭhira suffers guilt from the annihilation of his kinsmen, brahmahatyā does not, despite the death of Droṇa, appear to be among his transgressions. On the other hand, Indra's suffering is directly associated with this transgression. Thus, the illustrative use of Rāma Dāśarathi's aśvamedha in the Āśvamedhikaparvan seems to indicate that the tradition understands Rāma's transgression to be tied to an inappropriate or unethical killing. Unlike Yudhiṣṭhira, who is grieving over the virtual annihilation of his entire clan, Rāma has only slain rākṣasas, the chief among whom Rāvaṇa, the son of Viśravas, is clearly by descent a brahman.[47]

[47] Introduction, "Rākṣasas," pp. 51–52. Note, too, how, after killing Rāvaṇa, Rāma insists, despite Vibhīṣaṇa's reluctance, on performing for his foe a formal vedic funeral rite (Yuddhakāṇḍa sarga 99). Compare this with Rāma's and Lakṣmaṇa's unceremonious casting of the body of the rākṣasa Virādha into a pit, even though he was, in fact, a gandharva who had been cursed to take on the form and lifestyle of a true rākṣasa (Araṇyakāṇḍa 3.18–26).

While the Mahābhārata's reference provides only a suggestion that Rāma has committed a serious transgression, the Padmapurāṇa is quite specific in its assigning of sin to Rāma. The Padmapurāṇa's Pātālakhaṇḍa retells in great detail the narrative of Rāma's aśvamedha, expanding it to include a number of episodes that are not found in Vālmīki. However, the narrative's basic outline remains much the same as that in Vālmīki, and a close examination of its version of a number of critical passages can help us understand how its authors conceived of the structure of the Uttarakāṇḍa.

The first seven adhyāyas of the Pātālakhaṇḍa narrate the departure of Rāma from Laṅkā, his return to Ayodhyā, his coronation, and a description of the Rāmarājya, all of which in Vālmīki's epic occur in the closing sargas of the Yuddhakāṇḍa.[48] In the opening passage we learn two things of import: 1) that the story of Rāma destroys sins, an idea commonly found even within the Rāmāyaṇa itself,[49] and 2) that although the story of Rāma's aśvamedha has already been told once, it needs to be told again at length, and that it, too, is said to destroy sins.[50] Much as in the Uttarakāṇḍa's narrative, Agastya arrives at Rāma's court.[51] Rāma, curious, asks the sage, "Who was he, this Rāvaṇa, tormentor of the gods, whom I killed?"[52] Agastya then narrates Rāvaṇa's genealogy and how the gods petitioned Viṣṇu to rid the world of the demon.[53] At the conclusion of Agastya's narrative, Rāma, choking with tears, falls to the earth.[54]

Agastya questions Rāma as to why he has collapsed in despair, and the answer is most telling:

> "Alas! Behold the ignorance of deluded and evil-minded me, in that I, deluded by my desire, slew him who was born into a brahman family."[55]

Rāma's sense of guilt is overwhelming, and he is absolutely convinced that there is no possible recourse for him, as he has committed the most heinous sin of slaying a brahman.[56] Much as Kṛṣṇa and Vyāsa try to convince Yudhiṣṭhira that he has committed no transgression, Agastya, too, attempts to console Rāma, reminding him of his true nature as the Lord and assuring him that no sin can accrue to him.[57] Rāma is still not convinced and begs:

> "Tell me of some vow, donation, sacrifice, place of holy pilgrimage, or great propitiation, such that my transgression would be burned away and by which my untainted fame would then purify the world."[58]

Agastya responds, making clear once again Rāma's transgression and the appropriate mechanism through which expiation might be achieved:

> "Rāma, great hero, you who grant grace to the world! Listen to the advice I will give you for the removal of the sin of brahmahatyā. He who would offer an aśvamedha transcends all sin."[59]

What has only been suggested in the Mahābhārata is now made explicit in the Padmapurāṇa. Just as Vyāsa advises Yudhiṣṭhira to perform an aśvamedha to remove the guilt he suffers from slaying his kinsmen, Agastya tells Rāma to perform an aśvamedha to alleviate his sense of guilt. The Pātālakhaṇḍa narrative then tells a much expanded and quite detailed version of the events leading up to and including Rāma's aśvamedha, occupying the first sixty-eight adhyāyas of the khaṇḍa.[60]

Although Vālmīki's Uttarakāṇḍa makes no explicit reference to Rāma's suffering any guilt whatsoever, let alone that of brahmahatyā, the structure of the kāṇḍa itself strongly suggests that there was an implicit assumption of a sense of guilt underlying the narrative. In this light, several seemingly random sections of the Uttarakāṇḍa's narrative reveal themselves as structurally connected. The very long narrative, with a detailed genealogy of Rāvaṇa's family and his own rise to power, provides crucial information that helps to rationalize the aśvamedha. The genealogy clearly provides Rāvaṇa's maternal and paternal ancestry. As discussed in detail earlier,[61] Rāvaṇa's father, Viśravas, is a brahman, and Rāvaṇa himself is only one-eighth rākṣasa by blood. And while Rāvaṇa is never explicitly called a brahman in Vālmīki's epic, he is frequently referred to by the patronymic Paulastya and "the son of Paulastya (paulastyatanaya, paulastyanandana)."[62] The patronymic occurs throughout the epic. Pulastya is identified as the son of Brahmā Prajāpati and is a brahman-seer (brahmarṣi).[63] According to the Uttarakāṇḍa, Pulastya marries the daughter of Tṛṇabindu, a royal seer (rājarṣi).[64] She then gives birth to a son, Viśravas.[65] Despite his mother's brahmanical lineage, Viśravas is, apparently, only identified with his patriline. He is virtuous and devoted to vedic recitation and "a bull among sages." When it is time for him to marry, Bharadvāja, a brahman-seer, gives him his daughter Devavarṇinī in marriage.[66] Their son, Vaiśravaṇa, is "endowed with all the virtues of a brahman (sarvair brahmaguṇair upetam)."[67] Vai-

[66] 7.3.1–4.

[67] 7.3.5. While Vaiśravaṇa is clearly identified as a brahman here, he is not normally associated with brahmans. After he undergoes severe penances, Brahmā grants him a boon. He chooses to become the lord of wealth and a world guardian, along with Yama, Indra, and Varuṇa. He then is given a flying palace called Puṣpaka and the city of Laṅkā as his dwelling (7.3.6–31). After this boon is granted and he is elevated to the status of a divinity, his brahmanic heritage is itself completely backgrounded and the very choice of his boon seems at odds with his earlier self-control and self-restraint. Note that at 6.98.12 and 6.105.1 Vaiśravaṇa is called a rājā, "king." The Mahābhārata has a somewhat different version of the story. What is of interest is that Pulastya has a son Vaiśravaṇa (i.e., Kubera), who is devoted to his grandfather. This enrages Pulastya, who then creates a "second self," Viśravas, out of his anger. It is from the anger-generated Viśravas that Rāvaṇa then is born (3.259.1–15). It appears that the author or authors of the Mahābhārata story were uncomfortable with Rāvaṇa and Kubera Vaiśravaṇa having the same śravaṇa, of course, is the elder half brother of Rāvaṇa. Thus, while never explicitly identifying Rāvaṇa as a brahman, Vālmīki's epic clearly understands Rāvaṇa's patrilineal ancestry to be brahmanic.

In this light, both the detailed history of Rāvaṇa's maternal ancestry and the somewhat unusual circumstances of his mother's marriage to Viśravas become narratively relevant to the larger concerns of the kāṇḍa and the epic. While the narrative is at pains to provide a detailed account of the rākṣasa lineage, it is clearly only Rāvaṇa's that is of major concern. The story of his mother's marriage and birth makes it clear that Rāvaṇa's rākṣasa nature is only fractionally genetic and largely acquired, for his mother Kaikasī is cursed to give birth to rākṣasas by Viśravas.[68]

That these concerns with Rāvaṇa's status motivate, at least in part, the narration is further reinforced by Rāvaṇa's own marriage to Mandodarī. Here, Rāvaṇa encounters Maya, son of Diti, roaming the forest with his daughter, Mandodarī. After introducing himself and his daughter, and providing a brief history of his family and the reason for his sojourn in the forest,[69] Maya asks Rāvaṇa to identify himself, and:

> Addressed in this fashion, the lord of the rākṣasas courteously said this: "I am Daśagrīva by name, the son of Paulastya."[70]

Maya's reaction is immediate:

> Now, no sooner had Maya learned that Daśagrīva was the son of a brahman-seer, than, delighted, he decided to give him his daughter in marriage right then and there.
> Smiling, the daitya lord said these words to the lord of the rākṣasas: "Your majesty, here is my daughter, the maiden named Mandodarī, who was borne by the apsaras Hemā. Please accept her as your wife."[71]

Daśagrīva's identification of himself only through his patronymic paulastyatanaya, "the son of Paulastya," is telling in its brevity, especially as it contrasts with Maya's fairly detailed account of himself. But for Maya the name alone conveys all that is necessary: Rāvaṇa is the son of a brahman-seer and would therefore make a suitable husband for his daughter, Mandodarī. Maya assumes that Rāvaṇa is a brahman, and this appears to have been Rāvaṇa's intention. The assumption is correct insofar as it goes.

> For, Rāma, Maya was unaware of the curse that Daśagrīva had received from his father, who was so rich in austerities. Therefore, recognizing that his lineage derived from his grandfather, Maya gave her to him in marriage.[72]

These lines thus reinforce both Rāvaṇa's brahmanic lineage and the fact that he has been cursed by his father.[73]

Once it is clearly established that by birth Rāvaṇa, like his half brother, is a brahman and that his state of being a rākṣasa is acquired, the narrative following upon the genealogy gives evidence that not only reinforces the wickedness of Rāvaṇa's behavior but chronicles his rise to power and his assuming the lordship of the rākṣasas.[74] Rāvaṇa's rise to power parallels that of his older half brother, Vaiśravaṇa. Both must first undertake great austerities, and, by virtue of the powers obtained from those austerities, lordship is acquired.

Thus the Râvaṇeïs, originally hypothesized by Jacobi to be an independent unit inserted into the Uttarakāṇḍa, on narrative grounds can be understood to be part of a much larger narrative concern of the Uttarakāṇḍa and one that rationalizes, in part, Rāma's aśvamedha. For despite the fact that Rāvaṇa is never explicitly called a brahman, the Uttarakāṇḍa clearly and indisputably understands that his lineage and heritage is brahmanical and implicitly assumes that he is a brahman, even as it understands that fact as an incomplete representation of his history. But why is the establishment of Rāvaṇa's brahmanical lineage so important to the kāṇḍa? To find an answer, we must look to a story that immediately precedes Rāma's aśvamedha, some forty-two sargas following the end of Rāvaṇa's history.

INDRA'S BRAHMAHATYĀ AND RĀMA'S AŚVAMEDHA

At sarga seventy-five, in an effort to convince Rāma to perform the aśvamedha in lieu of the more destructive rājasūya, Lakṣmaṇa relates to him the tale of Indra's aśvamedha.[75] Prior to this the text is silent as to why Rāma desires to perform a sacrifice of any type. Yet, as we saw above, much as Vyāsa has advised Yudhiṣṭhira,[76] Lakṣmaṇa tells Rāma:

> "The great sacrifice, the aśvamedha, purifies one of all sins. May this foremost of sacrifices, which is both incomparable and sanctifying, please you."[77]

[72] 7.12.18.
[73] Technically, of course, it is Kaikasī who was cursed (7.9.16–20).
[74] 7.11.40; 7.12.1.
[75] Uttarakāṇḍa sargas 75–77.
[76] See note 40 above (MBh 12.34.26: aśvamedho mahāyajñaḥ prāyaścittam udāhṛtam).
[77] 7.75.2.

The sin from which Rāma needs to be purified is not mentioned. Instead, we are told the story of Indra's aśvamedha. It is clearly no accident that this story is located here, for much like the Śāntiparvan episode discussed above, when calling to mind previous exemplary performances of the aśvamedha, Indra's is foremost. The narrative, while generally following other accounts of the Indra and Vṛtra myth, has telling deviations. Vṛtra, engaged in severe austerities, is causing distress among the gods, in particular, Indra. Indra approaches Viṣṇu and requests that he destroy Vṛtra.[78] Viṣṇu refuses to do so, as he is bound by affection to Vṛtra, but promises Indra the means by which he might destroy the asura. Viṣṇu divides himself into three parts, giving one-third to Indra, one-third to Indra's vajra, and one-third to the earth.[79] Indra then slays Vṛtra with his vajra but immediately incurs the sin of brahmahatyā. What is merely implicit in the Mahābhārata's version becomes explicit here.

> Nonetheless, even as Indra fled, the sin of brahmahatyā pursued him and fell upon his limbs. Then misery took hold of Indra.[80]

Indra, afflicted with the sin of brahmahatyā, becomes unconscious and insensate.[81] Finally the gods come to Indra's aid:

> When they saw thousand-eyed Indra, dazed by the sin of brahmahatyā, they placed that lord of the gods at their head and performed the aśvamedha.
> Then, O lord of men, a very grand aśvamedha proceeded for the sake of the purification of great Mahendra from the sin of brahmahatyā.[82]

Lakṣmaṇa concludes his didactic tale, reminding Rāma of the power of the aśvamedha and urging him:

> "For such is the power of the aśvamedha, O delight of the Raghus. Therefore, immensely fortunate king, you should offer sacrifice with the aśvamedha."[83]

The author of this passage directly ties the necessity of Rāma's performance of an aśvamedha to the need to expiate a transgression. The example of Indra's aśvamedha explicitly marks Indra's transgression as brahmahatyā. The Uttarakāṇḍa has gone out of its way to identify Rāvaṇa as a brahman, and it appears that Rāma, having killed him, must undergo expiation too. The Uttarakāṇḍa's author, unlike those of both the Mahābhārata and the Padmapurāṇa, is uncomfortable with acknowledging Rāma as having committed any transgression, let alone that of brahmahatyā. Clearly, that Rāma has committed just such a transgression underlies the author's understanding of the kāṇḍa and makes comprehensible both the inclusion of the genealogy and history of Rāvaṇa and the story of Indra's aśvamedha.

TRANSGRESSION, ILĀ/ILA, AND THE AŚVAMEDHA

Might Rāma suffer from anxiety for reasons other than the slaying Rāvaṇa? Once again the Uttarakāṇḍa appears to avoid any depiction of emotional reactions on Rāma's part aside from his grief after sending Sītā away and his sorrow and anger following her entrance into the earth. This is, of course, in keeping with the epic's representation of Rāma as largely a self-controlled and self-restrained figure.[84] But a closer examination of the events as portrayed in the Uttarakāṇḍa can help us identify other concerns of the narrative that might help further reveal its structural logic.

Following immediately upon Agastya's narrative to Rāma and the departure of the sages from Ayodhyā at its conclusion,[85] the remaining dignitaries and guests at Rāma's court take their leave and return to their own kingdoms.[86] Rāma is left in the company of his brothers, whereupon Bharata describes the condition of the realm now that Rāma is king.[87]

> "Extraordinary things are seen when you are ruling the kingdom. Again and again nonhuman creatures are speaking.
> "More than a month has passed since there was any illness among the people, and death has not befallen even the aged creatures, Rāghava.
> "Women are giving birth to sons, and the men have splendid bodies. Joy abounds among the people who dwell in the city.
> "At the proper time, Vāsava sends down rain that is like the nectar of immortality. And the winds blow softly to the touch, giving pleasure.

[85] Uttarakāṇḍa sargas 1–36.
[86] Uttarakāṇḍa sargas 37–39. Presumably these guests, including various kings, monkeys, and rākṣasas, were guests at Rāma's coronation and stay on to hear Agastya's stories.
[87] 7.40.13–18. Immediately preceding this, Rāma dismisses his flying palace Puṣpaka (7.40.2–12).

"And, lord of men, the people in the city and the folk in the countryside say, 'May such a king be ours forever.' "[88]

Now that his kingship is secured and his kingdom is flourishing, Rāma temporarily retreats from public life at the court and engages in more personal pleasures. The scene is striking in the Uttarakāṇḍa context as Rāma at long last enjoys the pleasures of married life. With its elaborate description of the aśoka grove and the wine and dancing women, the passage is evocative of the erotic sentiment.[89] The scene culminates with Rāma recognizing that Sītā "was endowed with an auspicious glow,"[90] that is to say, pregnant, and asking Sītā what she would like. She responds that nothing would please her more than to go to the banks of the Ganges and visit the seers who dwell there.[91]

Immediately following upon this, Rāma returns to his audience hall, now filled with courtiers, who engage in telling him various types of stories. Rāma presses one of his attendants, Bhadra, to tell him what the people are talking about, especially concerning the royal family.[92]

Structurally these sargas are significant, marking multiple transitions as well as cleverly reintroducing a number of thematic concerns of both the kāṇḍa and the epic. The kāṇḍa itself opens following upon Rāma's consecration, and Agastya's narrative occurs within the confines of the court and further draws upon the events and characters of the previous books, particularly the Sundara- and Yuddhakāṇḍas. The leave-taking and dismissal of the various figures marks a transition from that magical world of rākṣasas and divine monkeys back into a more mundane world, that of family, duty, gossip, and the like, the very world from which Rāma was first banished and sent to the forest. Soon upon his return to the city, Rāma embarks upon a romantic interlude in the aśoka grove. And much like his father, Daśaratha, this expression of and succumbing to his natural sexual feelings for his beloved wife leaves Rāma vulnerable to gossip and censure.[93] In his audience hall, Rāma is no longer surrounded by the august seers and holy men, his trusted simian and rākṣasa companions, or even his brothers. Rather, he is accompanied only by boon companions and storytellers, who are present for the diversion of the king. Here Rāma for the first time is exposed to the world of ordinary people.

It is certainly no accident that the list of Rāma's courtiers includes names largely unknown elsewhere in the epic.[94] They are described only briefly and in terms that are somewhat unusual, highlighting only their ability to tell amusing stories.[95] Their storytelling abilities seem to mark them as intermediaries between the royal court and the world beyond it. The fact that Rāma asks one among them, Bhadra, to tell him specifically about what the people are saying reinforces this position. At the same time the fact that they tell all kinds of kathās, or stories, of a mundane nature sets them apart from the seers and royal ministers. Bhadra appears to be Rāma's only link to what is being said by his subjects. And yet Rāma realizes that Bhadra's own status might lead him to be less than forthcoming:

> Addressed in this fashion by Bhadra, Rāghava spoke these words: "You must tell me everything, truthfully, leaving out nothing.
> "Once I hear what the residents of the city say is good and what is bad, I will continue the good and not perpetuate the bad.
> "You must tell me confidently, without fear and without anxiety, just what the people of the city and folk in the countryside are saying."[96]

Rāma's emphasis on truthfulness and his reassurances that Bhadra should have no fear or anxiety reinforce both Rāma's concern and Bhadra's somewhat tenuous position. These very words also foretell a story that is both truthful and unpleasant. It then turns out that what Bhadra reports are accusations concerning Rāma's own inability to control his sexual desires, the very transgression that his own father committed.

> Addressed in this fashion by Rāghava, Bhadra, his mind composed, cupping his hands in reverence, replied to great-armed Rāma in these well-chosen words:
> "Listen, your majesty, to what the people are saying—at the crossroads, in the markets, on the highways, and in the parks and woodlands—about what is good and what is bad. They say:
> " 'Rāma accomplished the all-but-impossible bridging of the ocean, which no one—not even the gods and dānavas together—had ever done before.

> " 'Thus he slew unassailable Rāvaṇa, along with his troops and his mounts, and brought the monkeys and apes, along with the rākṣasas, under his sway.
> " 'But then, after having slain Rāvaṇa in battle and having recovered Sītā, Rāghava put his anger behind him and brought her back once more into his own house.
> " 'What sort of pleasure could be produced in his heart through the enjoyment of Sītā, since earlier Rāvaṇa, clutching her to his side, had forcibly carried her off to Laṅkā?
> " 'And how can Rāma not despise her who was taken to Laṅkā and, what is more, placed in the aśoka grove under the control of the rākṣasas?
> " 'Now we shall have to put up with this from our own wives as well. For people always follow what the king does.'
> "And that, your majesty, is what—in many different ways—the city residents are saying in all the cities and provinces."[97]

The narrative here reintroduces one of the most pervasive themes of Vālmīki's epic and one that is continually negotiated throughout the Uttarakāṇḍa: sexual transgression and its consequences. Here Rāma is confronted with a situation similar to the one that his father, Daśaratha, faced in the Ayodhyākāṇḍa. There, Daśaratha is so infatuated with Kaikeyī that he willingly succumbs to her demands and disregards his duty to his kingdom.[98] It is Daśaratha's very unwillingness to sublimate his sexual desires to his social and political responsibilities that leads not only to his own destruction but to his family's disintegration. There Rāma accommodates his father's actions by accepting his own exile, even though it may be unjust. But now, in the Uttarakāṇḍa, it is Rāma himself who is confronted with a similar dilemma. Sītā, long-suffering and innocent, is, of course, much more sympathetic than Kaikeyī, making Rāma's decision all the more heart wrenching. Nevertheless, Rāma, who has just now truly become a householder entitled to his own sexual life, is immediately confronted with its consequences. That Rāma is considered at fault for having sexual desires toward Sītā is made explicit by Satyatīrtha (Cs), who in his comments explaining verse 7.42.16 notes, "Rāma puts the anger born from the touch of another man [i.e., Rāvaṇa] aside, that is to say, he takes no notice of it because of his powerful sexual desire for that wanton woman [i.e., Sītā]."[99] Thus, the common people criticize him for taking Sītā back. As king, he is the exemplar of normative and culturally sanctioned behavior, and his actions will be emulated by others. Sītā's innocence or purity is not at issue. Rāma has two choices: to follow his father's path or set, once again, an example of his own self-control by subordinating his own personal emotional life to his duty as a righteous king. Rāma clearly chooses the latter. Rāma takes immediate action, one that again repeats his earlier willingness to place duty before self, but at the same time is so disquieting to both traditional and modern audiences.

This is not to say, however, that Rāma, even though resolute, is not in emotional turmoil about his decision. Upon hearing about the rumors, Rāma is emotionally devastated, but he sends for his brothers. Informing them of the rumors, he says:

> "And in my heart of hearts I knew that illustrious Sītā was pure. So then, taking Vaidehī, I came to Ayodhyā.
> "But now there is this grave allegation against me, and there is sorrow in my heart. There is severe criticism on the part of the people of the city as well as of the countryside.
> "Any person whose infamy is bruited about among the people falls into the lowest hells so long as that gossip is repeated.
> "For infamy is condemned by the gods, while fame is honored among them. And every undertaking of the great is made for the sake of fame.
> "Moreover, alarmed by the fear of criticism, I would abandon my life itself, or even you, bulls among men, what to say of Janaka's daughter?
> "That is why you gentlemen have been forced to see me fallen into an ocean of sorrow. Moreover, I cannot imagine any agony greater than this."[100]

It is Rāma's fear of censure by the people that motivates his actions. Rāma's words also indicate that he worries that the infamy that results from these rumors will lead him to the lowest hells, literally, the lowest worlds (adhamāṃl lokān). Rāma's immediate reaction is to remove the source of the rumors, giving rise to his decision to abandon the now-pregnant Sītā. With Sītā, the motivating factor for the disquiet among the townsfolk gone, he hopes to cut off the root cause of the criticism of the public.

Perhaps more telling of the moral dilemma that Rāma faces than his own words and reactions are Lakṣmaṇa's words to Sītā. Throughout the epic Lakṣmaṇa has been used as a kind of foil to Rāma, and here, it appears, there is no exception.[101] Rāma, in fact, unable or unwilling to tell Sītā of his decision to send her away, uses the pretext of her dohada, or pregnancy wish, as an opportunity to send her out of the kingdom. The irony of the situation is poignant. Rāma uses the very marker of his sexual engagement—her pregnancy—as the driving force to abandon her on the grounds of her having been the sexual object of another. Rāma himself will not take her but rather deputes his younger brother to act in his stead. Lakṣmaṇa, while obediently acting as his older brother's agent, is not wholly averse to criticizing Rāma's actions. He tells Sītā:

> "Death would be better for me today, or what would be still better than death would be if I were not to be enjoined to such a task that is condemned by all the world."[102]

Here, Lakṣmaṇa expresses the very inverse of Rāma's earlier statement. While Rāma's taking Sītā back has caused rumors, the actions Rāma now takes are neither blameless nor honorable. Clearly the abandonment of Sītā is considered to be an action condemned by the world (kārye . . . lokanindite), and Lakṣmaṇa, and by extension Rāma himself, as the one who gave the order, will be censured by the people (lokasya vacanīkṛtaḥ).[103]

Rāma thus incurs criticism for both his actions: accepting Sītā back and abandoning her. The first is mitigated by his abandonment of Sītā and is, more often than not, understood as the sole directionality of criticism toward Rāma. But the Uttarakāṇḍa additionally critiques his abandoning her and assigns to Rāma, through his surrogate, that blame. That Rāma is unhappy over his treatment of Sītā is made clear in the Uttarakāṇḍa; however, he also is resigned to it. Upon Lakṣmaṇa's return to the palace, he enters his audience hall to find Rāma sitting "dejected on his splendid throne." Lakṣmaṇa, deeply distraught, now consoles his elder brother and exhorts him to abandon "this feeble mental state" and not torment himself. Rāma agrees with Lakṣmaṇa and claims that he is content in his decision and that his brother's words have soothed his torment.[104]

The issue arises though as to whether Rāma suffers guilt over his behavior toward Sītā and if so where it is evidenced in the Uttarakāṇḍa. Vālmīki's epic in general is at pains to distance Rāma from such feelings[105] and the Uttarakāṇḍa exaggerates this distance. While the Mahābhārata depicts Yudhiṣṭhira as virtually incapable of action because of his feelings of guilt, Rāma gives evidence of no such inner struggles. While Rāma grieves over his decision, he is also stoic and resigned that he has done what he had to do.[106]

Nevertheless, while not explicitly stated, the Uttarakāṇḍa's narrative seems to assume that Rāma feels that his actions with respect to Sītā require some sort of expiation, but expiation for what transgression? Immediately following upon the story of Indra's brahmahatyā and that god's performance of the aśvamedha as an expiatory rite (sargas 75–77), there is the story of King Ila and his aśvamedha (sargas 78–81). While Lakṣmaṇa is the narrator of Indra's transgressions, Rāma himself narrates the story of King Ila. This story in the form it appears in the Uttarakāṇḍa is quite unique, although variant versions of it are found in the Mahābhārata and various purāṇas.[107] This fascinating story, with its focus on sexuality and gender identity, seems out of place in the normally prudish Rāmāyaṇa with its emphasis on propriety. For other than its telling of Ila's aśvamedha, there is apparently little that ties it to the Uttarakāṇḍa. So what is it about the story that interests the authors and audiences of the Uttarakāṇḍa and why has an aśvamedha been included in the story?

The story begins with King Ila, who is the son of Kardama Prajāpati. One day, out hunting in the forest with his troops, the king wanders into the area where Śiva was making love to Pārvatī. Śiva had turned himself into a woman in order to please the goddess. Any male creature who entered that region would become female. Thus Ila finds himself and his attendants turned into women. Ila, now Ilā, distressed and realizing that this was the work of Śiva, takes refuge with the god and is granted a boon, any boon but that of manhood. Ilā then propitiates Pārvatī, who grants half of the boon, according to which, with that half, Ilā can choose a month of manhood and become Ila, and during the following month Ila must live as the woman Ilā. Thus, every other month Ila becomes Ilā (sarga 78). Now Ilā one day discovers Soma's son Budha, who was performing austerities. Budha sees Ilā and makes her his wife, and they make love for a month. After one month, Ila wakes up a man but has no memory of his life as Ilā. Budha asks him to stay, and Ila is willing. Ila, thinking that his retinue has been killed (they, in fact, have been turned into kiṃpuruṣa women; 7.79.23–24), no longer desires to rule and wishes to turn his kingdom over to his son, saying:

> "For I cannot bear to go there and speak those dreadful words to the happy wives of my retainers, O sage of immense blazing energy."[108]

Budha promises that if Ila will stay for one year, he will do something beneficial for the king (7.80.20). Ila agrees. According to the boon, he then spends the following months, shifting monthly from male to female. After nine months, Ilā gives birth to a son, Purūravas.[109] Thereafter, Budha summons other illustrious sages and performs an aśvamedha for Ila dedicated to Śiva. Upon its completion the divine couple are appeased and grant Ila his manhood once again. Rāma ends his tale, saying:

> "For such is the power of the aśvamedha, O bulls among men, that Ila, having been a woman, regained his manhood and other things that were difficult to obtain as well."[110]

At this point Rāma undertakes his own aśvamedha.

The story of Ila/Ilā, as noted, is unusual in a number of ways, but it is clear that Rāma feels it is primarily illustrative of the power of the aśvamedha to restore manhood. Since the aśvamedha is to be undertaken by Rāma, it appears that he envisions his manhood to be threatened or compromised and in need of restoration. Prior to this in the Uttarakāṇḍa, there has only been one incident where Rāma has been associated with any sexualized behavior: the events in his aśokavana and the subsequent pregnancy of Sītā. It is only after this that Rāma is made aware of the rumors among the townsfolk, and it is only then that Rāma takes action. The first, abandoning the now visibly pregnant Sītā, removes any visual reminders of his own sexuality, and the second, the aśvamedha sacrifice, will expiate any transgressions associated with it and restore his manhood, which had been called into question by his subjects.[111] It is certainly no accident that Rāma now employs a golden (kāñcana) image of Sītā in his sacrifice as a surrogate for a wife (7.82.17–19), for, pure, static, and silent, she can now pose no threat to him or his reputation.

[109] For a discussion on how the commentators conceptualize this process, see notes to 7.80.23.
[110] 7.81.24.
[111] Recall that the people fear that they will now be governed by their wives as they perceive Rāma to be.

That Rāma's aśvamedha is, in part, an attempt to free him from allegations of sexual transgression, is further reinforced by Sītā's very appearance at the sacrifice and the dénouement of that appearance. Vālmīki has sent Rāma's sons, Lava and Kuśa, to recite their father's poem. Rāma recognizes the two boys as "Sītā's sons."[112] That they are identified only through their maternal heritage is significant. Rāma does not explicitly acknowledge them as his sons, thus once more raising potential doubts as to Sītā's purity. When confronted with the physical evidence of his offspring, who look exactly like their father,[113] Rāma summons Sītā, demanding that she once more testify to her purity. Sītā, now a mother, is no longer a sexual threat and can once again be acknowledged. Nevertheless, Rāma will only allow her in his presence if she is willing to swear an oath to her purity and only if Vālmīki will support her. Such an oath, of course, is a means to verify the paternity and thus legitimacy of the two boys; thus Rāma announces:

> "If Sītā be of untainted conduct or if she has expiated her sin, then let her, with the permission of the great sage, demonstrate her purity here.
> "Then, after having determined the will of the sage and the intentions of Sītā, who may be eager to give some proof of her innocence, report to me at once.
> "Tomorrow morning, for the sake of clearing my name as well, let Janaka's daughter, Maithilī, take a solemn oath here in the midst of the assembly."[114]

Rāma's words indicate that he considers Sītā a locus of impropriety. She can only be accepted back so long as she no longer poses a threat. The narrative neutralizes this threat in two ways: first by transitioning her from a sexually viable object to a mother, and second by having her swear to her fidelity and allowing that oath of fidelity to function as the mechanism through which she can no longer pose a threat to the patriarchal world. That this occurs during the aśvamedha, which has been marked twice in the text as a rite of purification,[115] serves to reinforce that Rāma considers his own display of sexuality with a woman whose purity has been explicitly questioned as a transgression in need of ex-

[115] Recall, too, that in the Bālakāṇḍa, Daśaratha must perform an aśvamedha in order to purify himself in general of whatever unidentified lapse has prevented him from fathering a son. It is only after that rite is complete that his specific putrakāmeṣṭi can take effect.

piation. That the final resolution of the expiation is the complete and absolute removal of the very object that is the source of transgression reveals itself finally as the only way that Rāma can be considered fully purified.[116]

PUBLIC DUTY AND PRIVATE DESIRE

The kāṇḍa's concerns with the tension between public duty and private desire continue to haunt the narrative.[117] At sarga 51, Lakṣmaṇa returns to find Rāma dejected after giving his orders to have Sītā banished. Lakṣmaṇa reminds him that he, a strong and wise man, should never grieve.[118] Rāma, somewhat reassured, expresses his concern that he has neglected his duties as king.

> "Four days have passed, gentle brother, during which I have not issued any instructions as to what needs to be done. This pierces me to the vitals, Saumitri.
> "Summon the officials, household priests, ministers, and the men and women who would petition me about something they would have me do, bull among men.
> "For a king who does not carry out the people's business day after day will, after death, be hurled into a terrible hell. Of this there is no doubt."[119]

Rāma then tells Lakṣmaṇa a series of three stories, which at first seem at best remotely connected to the narrative.[120] But, upon closer examination, the tales can be seen as reflective of the very struggle that Rāma himself has been confronting. Rāma gives voice to his own concerns through his telling of these stories and uses them to rationalize his actions. The three narratives—the story of King Nṛga, the tale of King Nimi and the births of Agastya and Vasiṣṭha, and the history of King Yayāti—are all found in texts other than the Rāmāyaṇa, although in each case, much like the story of Indra and Vṛtra and that of Ila/Ilā, they occur here in substantially different forms. Each story tells of a king who in some way neglects or offends a brahman and of the consequences that the transgressor suffers for his neglect. Rāma's words allow the audience, here represented by Lakṣmaṇa, to be made aware of his concerns that his own inattentiveness might lead to unintended consequences.

According to the Uttarakāṇḍa account,[121] King Nṛga is a pious king, devoted to brahmans. One time he gives ten million gold-adorned cows, along with their calves, to brahmans. One poor brahman's cow, along with her calf, wanders off and inadvertently joins the larger herd. The brahman searches long and far for his missing cow, finally discovering her in the home of another brahman. Calling his cow by name, he begins to lead her home, only to be confronted by the second brahman. The two begin quarreling over which one is the rightful owner of the cow, finally agreeing to let the king resolve the matter. Nṛga, however, for reasons left unspecified by the text, keeps the two waiting for an audience for many days. Both brahmans, enraged at the inattentiveness of the king, curse him to become a lizard and live in a burrow for a long time.[122] The story as told here directly reflects the larger narrative. A king, engaged in private affairs, neglects his public duty and is punished for his neglect. The narrative increases the severity of that neglect by making its object brahmans. This theme is then repeated in the following two stories, where kings come into conflict with brahmans and suffer as a result. The reasons for Nṛga's neglect are left unstated—although it is clear that the activities that preoccupy him occur in private.

> "Remaining at the gateway of the king's palace for many days and nights, and yet not receiving an audience with Nṛga, they became furious."[123]

Nṛga remains inside the palace and does not permit entrance, calling to mind Rāma's own seclusion in the aśokavana adjacent to his antaḥpuram with Sītā at sarga 41. The reasons for the neglect or transgres-

[121] While the story of King Nṛga is not widespread, it is known in at least two other versions, one from the Mahābhārata, and one from the Bhāgavatapurāṇa. Both are framed as salvific narratives at the hands of Kṛṣṇa Vāsudeva. The first, found in the Anuśāsanaparvan of the Mahābhārata (13.69), is narrated by Bhīṣma. The second version is found in the Bhāgavatapurāṇa at 10.64.1–30. The Bhāgavata follows the general narrative and focus of the story found in the Anuśāsanaparvan but, as would be expected, is more elaborate and specific than either of the previous narratives.

[122] 7.51-1*.7–7.51-2*. The curse will end when Viṣṇu takes birth as Kṛṣṇa. This is one, if not the only, reference to Kṛṣṇa in the Rāmāyaṇa, and it raises interesting questions of intertextuality. The Mahābhārata story, however, does not have the king keeping the two brahmans waiting at the gates but rather assigns fault to the king for unwittingly giving the cow, who accidently became part of the herd, to the second brahman.

[123] 7.51-1*.16 (= App. I, No. 8, lines 31–32). See S. Goldman 2015b.

sions brought about by the behavior of both Nimi and Yayāti are less obscure.[124]

The story of Nimi,[125] like that of Nṛga, focuses on a struggle between a king and a brahman. The story occurs in two sections, both of which are popular throughout the tradition, but are not necessarily narratively linked.[126] King Nimi, desiring to perform a long sacrificial session, asks the brahman sages Atri and Vasiṣṭha to perform the sacrifice for him. But the latter has already committed to perform a sacrifice for Indra. Nimi, apparently not able to wait, chooses Gautama to take Vasiṣṭha's place. Vasiṣṭha, having completed Indra's sacrifice, returns to carry out Nimi's rite and discovers that Gautama has already completed it. Enraged, Vasiṣṭha demands to see Nimi. But Nimi, having completed his sacrificial duties, has gone to sleep. Vasiṣṭha, even more enraged, curses Nimi, saying:

> "Since, O king, having treated me with contempt, you chose someone else, your body shall be devoid of consciousness."[127]

But before the curse can take effect, the enraged Nimi likewise curses Vasiṣṭha:

> "While I was sleeping unawares, you, perverted by anger, unleashed upon me the fire of your curse, which was like a second rod of Yama.
> "Therefore, brahman-seer, your body, too, with its radiant splendor shall, no doubt, be rendered devoid of consciousness."[128]

Clearly both Nimi, as the vaṃśakara, or dynast, of the lineage of Janaka and a son of Ikṣvāku, and Vasiṣṭha, as the family priest of the Ikṣvākus, are linked to the royal family of Ayodhyā. The dangers inherent in a king disregarding his duty, especially in reference to brahmans, are again foregrounded. Here, Nimi's transgression is more explicit: he ignores Vasiṣṭha because he, Nimi, is sleeping. Nevertheless, both Nimi and Nṛga neglect brahmans in order to participate in an activity that is clearly understood to be private.[129]

[129] It is noteworthy that the stories that precede and follow it—that of Nṛga and that of Yayāti, respectively—are both known to the Mahābhārata, while Nimi's tale is not.

Nimi's and Vasiṣṭha's adventures continue, with some very interesting twists. As expected, both men become bodiless. Vasiṣṭha petitions his father, Grandfather Brahmā, and begs that he might have another body. Brahmā tells Vasiṣṭha that he must enter the semen released by Mitra and Varuṇa, but that he will not be born from a womb. Vasiṣṭha then goes to the abode of Varuṇa, where Mitra and Varuṇa are sharing rule. Mitra has also come to Varuṇa's abode. Now Varuṇa happens to see the apsaras Urvaśī and desires to make love with her. He propositions her, and even though she is pleased at his offer, and although she loves Varuṇa more than Mitra, she is already promised to Mitra. Varuṇa then deposits his semen in a pot. Urvaśī then goes to Mitra, who is now furious, and asks her why she did not reject Varuṇa since she was already promised to him. He curses her to descend to the world of the mortals and become the wife of Purūravas. From the pot, which is filled with semen from both Mitra and Varuṇa—the semen of Varuṇa is said to go in first, and the semen of Mitra's, which apparently has first been in Urvaśī, second—two brahmans are born. The firstborn is Agastya, who, upon emerging, tells Mitra that he is not his son (since Varuṇa's semen was in the pot first). Then Vasiṣṭha emerges, who is born of the semen of both Mitra and Varuṇa.

As we look at the story of Nimi in its larger context, we can understand that the episode is located here because it is a mechanism through which the anxieties of the main narrative are displaced and replayed.[130] The curse of Nimi by Vasiṣṭha is not unexpected, as sages are wont to curse kings who fail to comply with their wishes, and the preceding story of Nṛga has a very similar curse motif. Of special note here is that the curse seems not so much to arise from the choosing of another priest to perform his sacrifice but rather from Nimi's being asleep and keeping the enraged sage waiting—a theme carried over again from the preceding story of Nṛga. The underlying dereliction is more clearly articulated in the Padma and Matsya versions of the narrative, where the king is not just resting, but is, in fact, distracted due to "playing dice" with his women.[131] That sexual transgression is apparently at the core of the curse plays to the sexual anxieties of the main narrative of the Uttarakāṇḍa, where Rāma has just distracted himself a few sargas prior to this, in his own aśokavana with Sītā. It is only following the highly encapsulated episode in the aśokavana that questions begin to arise as to Sītā's sexual purity and the propriety of Rāma's taking her back.

[130] And not, for example, near the story of Urvaśī and Budha, with which parts of it are aligned.

[131] 7.51-4*–7.51.5* (= App. I, No. 8, lines 124–212). This part of the narrative is known to the ViṣṇuP (4.5.11–12); ViṣṇuDhaP (1.117.21–28); BhāgP (6.18.5–6; 9.13.6); and MatsyaP (60.2–31), but there is no mention of the Nṛga story in the Matsyapurāṇa; PadmaP (ĀnSS) 5(Sṛṣṭikhaṇḍa).22.23–40; etc.

This anxiety of sexual purity is once again brought out in the story of Urvaśī and her troubled relationship with Mitra and Varuṇa. She is clearly ambivalent concerning her relationship with Mitra, to whom she is already promised, admitting that she loves Varuṇa more. Nevertheless, she is unwilling to accept Varuṇa's proposition because of her promise to Mitra. On the other hand, she promises to keep Varuṇa fixed in her heart. Mitra understands that Urvaśī has betrayed him and curses her for her wicked behavior. She must become an "outcaste" from the world of the gods and live in the human world. Rāma's own anxieties about Sītā's behavior in the aśokavana of Rāvaṇa and the people's criticism of him for taking her back lead him similarly to exile her.

Finally, the question of paternity and legitimacy is foremost in the minds of both the audience and author of the story of Nimi. Whose offspring are Agastya and Vasiṣṭha—born from one receptacle and two sources of semen? What is only most delicately suggested for most of the epic is much more explicit here. Rāma's anxiety concerning the paternity of the child or children that Sītā is carrying is clearly articulated in his abandonment of her at this particular juncture and the somewhat complex and anxiety-fraught emergence of Agastya and his claim that he is not Mitra's son are expressions of these concerns. Moreover, the birth of the strange "twins" Agastya and Vasiṣṭha, with its problematizing of paternity, appears to parallel the birth of Sītā's twins.[132] Nimi's tale becomes an articulation of and reaction to male anxieties of sexuality and paternity, anxieties that can be seen to drive much of the narrative of the kāṇḍa. Again, that this tale is told by Rāma is a narrative mechanism with which the authors are able to express very real concerns while at the same time avoiding directly implicating Rāma or Sītā in any transgressive behavior.

The third tale that Rāma tells, the story of King Yayāti,[133] is well known to both the Mahābhārata and the Matsyapurāṇa.[134] The version told here is relatively short, demonstrating some significant differences from those other versions. In this account, King Yayāti is said to have two wives: the daitya princess Śarmiṣṭhā, daughter of Vṛṣaparvan, and Devayānī, daughter of the brahman Uśanas Kāvya. Devayānī, however, was not loved by the king.[135] Each wife has a son: Śarmiṣṭhā had Pūru, who, like his mother, was most beloved by his father, and Devayānī had Yadu. Yadu is so miserable because of his father's neglect that he wishes to commit suicide.[136] Devayānī seeks help from her father, the powerful Bhārgava sage, Uśanas Kāvya. The sage, enraged at his son-in-law, curses him to take on extreme old age:

> "Since, lacking self-control, the son of Nahuṣa has treated me with contempt, he shall attain decrepitude and become withered with extreme senescence."[137]

Once decrepit, Yayāti begs both of his sons to take on his old age. Yayāti's motivation for wanting his youth back is made explicit: he has not had his fill of sexual delights.[138] First he asks Yadu, who refuses. He then asks Pūru, who accepts. Yayāti, young again, performs thousands of sacrifices, and after a very long time, takes back his old age. He then rewards Pūru with kingship and punishes Yadu, cursing him to become a rākṣasa.

Note here, again, the story combines the two key concerns that Rāma has expressed in his previous narratives: disregard of a brahman, here through the affront to his daughter, combined with some sort of lapse, here clearly a sexual one. That Yayāti is fonder of the daughter of the king of the daityas than he is of the daughter of a brahman is the transgression. The affront to Devayānī is no different from an affront to Uśanas Kāvya. Here, of course, the narrative harks back to Rāma's own familial situation, where, as the dutiful son, he endures sacrifice and hardship on his father's behalf and eventually is made king. Similarly, the son who fails to submit to his father's command is cursed and disinherited, while the son who accepts his father's command is not, but instead is consecrated. For Rāma, the story is not about the fate of the sons but rather the example that Yayāti provides for kshatriya behavior. Rāma concludes his story with what is for him its moral:

> "And thus, according to the code of the kshatriyas, Yayāti tolerated the curse unleashed by Uśanas, as Nimi did not.
> "I have now told you everything, gentle brother. Let us grant audiences to all those who have legitimate business so that there is no dereliction such as there was in the case of Nṛga."[139]

Rāma's words provide some insight into the traditional understanding of the story. The story of Yayāti as told in the Uttarakāṇḍa version is intended to reiterate the concerns of the previous episodes. Here Yayāti's dereliction is made more explicit: he is a king who, by engaging in a private, that is, sexual, activity, offends a brahman and is cursed for that behavior. While Rāma's words are fairly explicit as to the narrative's purpose—it is to be considered the counterexample to Nimi—the story itself presents a more nuanced representation of the king's transgression.

RĀJADHARMA

It is thus no accident that as soon as Rāma ends his stories, two incidents occur, both of which highlight transgressions against brahmans. The first is the somewhat lengthy narrative of the killing of Lavaṇa by Śatrughna, and the second is the killing of the śūdra ascetic by Rāma. Both stories concern themselves with brahmans' suffering from a wrong that has occurred while Rāma is ruling. Since such offenses against brahmans can only occur when the king is negligent of his royal obligations or when he has committed some transgression, the narrative assumption is that Rāma is, in fact, guilty of one or both. Rāma, so concerned that his own questionable actions—the slaying of Rāvaṇa and his momentary neglect of the kingdom—might cause him to incur guilt, must now directly confront two evidences of transgression during his supposedly utopian reign.

The first of the episodes, the slaying of Lavaṇa, is rather lengthy, occupying some twelve sargas (52–63), including accounts of Śatrughna's two visits to Vālmīki's ashram. This stop at the sage's ashram provides two moments in the narrative that are critical to the main story but are rather tangential to the slaying of Lavaṇa. For as Śatrughna begins his journey to Madhurā, he spends a night at Vālmīki's ashram,[140] and it is that very night that Sītā gives birth to Kuśa and Lava (sarga 58). On his way back to Ayodhyā, some twelve years later, he hears the two boys sing the Rāmāyaṇa (sarga 63).

Perhaps equally critical to the narrative logic of the Uttarakāṇḍa is Śatrughna's slaying of Lavaṇa. Sages living on the banks of the Yamunā approach Rāma with tales of a terrible rākṣasa named Lavaṇa,[141] who is oppressing them. Before even knowing the reason for their visit, Rāma promises them that he is at their command (7.52.11–12). The sages tell Rāma of the evil son of Madhu and how he inherited a lance given to his father by Śiva that makes him invincible (sarga 53). The sages have come seeking Rāma's protection and Rāma asks his brothers who will undertake the task. Bharata offers, but then Śatrughna begs that he be sent, since his elder brother had already suffered so much. Rāma agrees and Śatrughna is dispatched to slay Lavaṇa, which he successfully does. He then establishes the city of Madhurā, where he rules for twelve years before returning once again to Ayodhyā, again stopping at Vālmīki's ashram. At Rāma's command he returns again to rule in Madhurā before rejoining Rāma in his final journey.

[140] When Śatrughna arrives at Vālmīki's ashram, he is appropriately greeted, housed, and fed. Śatrughna then, spying some sacrificial implements, inquires as to whom they belong. Vālmīki then narrates to him the story of King Mitrasaha (sarga 57). The story, like a number of others in this kāṇḍa, is rather gory. It tells of a king who, having killed one of two rākṣasas, is then tricked into offering Vasiṣṭha human flesh. Vasiṣṭha, not realizing what has happened, curses Mitrasaha to become an eater of human flesh. When Vasiṣṭha discovers what has happened, he limits Mitrasaha's curse to twelve years, and the king becomes known as Mitrasaha Kalmāṣapāda (see notes to 7.57.34). While this story has much of interest, it appears, with its focus on the demonic, gluttony, and exile, here to anticipate Śatrughna's own upcoming adventures with Lavaṇa rather than reflecting the kāṇḍa's primary concerns, which focus on Rāma.

[141] Lavaṇa's genealogy is not as transparent as that of other rākṣasas in the Uttarakāṇḍa, as the heritage of his maternal grandfather, Viśvāvasu, is not given. See notes to 7.53.16.

Not uncommonly, the tale of Lavaṇa is regarded as somewhat of an afterthought—largely unconnected to the larger narrative of either the epic or the kāṇḍa—to provide Śatrughna, who has been a peripheral figure throughout the entire epic, a role in the drama. The episode, however, viewed from the concerns that Rāma has just voiced, makes manifest those very concerns. In a perfect kingdom, sages would not be suffering from such an evil creature as Lavaṇa. Immediately prior to Rāma's retiring to the aśokavana in sarga 41, Bharata gives voice to the ideal conditions in Rāma's kingdom (7.40.12–17), where death does not even afflict the old.[142] Such things happen only when the king has neglected the kingdom. The fruits of Rāma's momentary lapse manifest themselves by allowing space for such an evil creature as Lavaṇa to not merely exist but to thrive.

The very appearance of the rākṣasa Lavaṇa, whose name echoes Rāvaṇa's and whose strength is said to be even greater than that of the late king of the rākṣasas, harks back to Rāma's own encounter with the demonic. Rāma is haunted by Agastya's revelations concerning Rāvaṇa's lineage and its implications, that is, that he has slain a brahman. Now, as if to reinforce that transgression, Rāvaṇa's doppelgänger appears and once more threatens dharma. The narrative additionally understands that Rāma has perhaps also committed a second transgression that is sexual in nature. This is also echoed in the episode, as it frames the entire episode with the birth of Sītā's sons and the revelation of them as the bards of the Rāmāyaṇa. The juxtaposition of the birth of the twins and the oppression of the sages provides ample evidence of the fruits of harming a brahman and neglect of the kingdom.

Following Śatrughna's return to Madhurā, a brahman again comes to Rāma's court. This time a tragedy has occurred within the kingdom. The brahman's child has died, and he lays the blame squarely at Rāma's feet:

> "I have never before seen or even heard of such a dreadful thing as an untimely death in Rāma's realm.

[142] 7.41.14cd (jīrṇānām api sattvānāṃ mṛtyur nāyāti rāghava). See, too, note 88 above.

> "Without a doubt, it must be that there is some great misdeed on Rāma's part. Your majesty, you must restore this child to life as he has come under the sway of death."[143]

Moreover,

> "Subjects who are not governed according to law perish through the transgressions of their king. And when the king is one whose conduct is unrighteous, people die before their time."[144]

The narrative continues with the well-known but highly controversial episode of the killing of the śūdra Śambūka, who is understood to be inappropriately performing austerities. The brahman has clearly voiced the belief that such counternormative activity could only arise when the king has committed a transgression. The story leaves no doubt that Rāma's own behavior has created the circumstances in his own kingdom that would give rise to such a dreadful result: the death of a brahman boy, and Rāma blames himself:

> "It was through my transgression that this child, the brahman's only son, whose time had not come, was led by Kāla to the abode of Vaivasvata."[145]

Once again the narrative, which has just witnessed the birth of Rāma's own sons, now tells of the death of the son of a brahman. The narrative both maps anxieties over sexuality and transgression against a brahman onto the body of the brahman child and holds Rāma directly responsible for his death.[146] While it is Rāma's swift and unhesitating execution of Śambūka that has given rise both in antiquity and in modernity to the discomfort with the story, for the original audience, the tragedy most probably lay in the untimely death of the brahman boy and the acknowledgment of Rāma's culpability in that death. Rāma himself takes action to remove the offending śūdra ascetic, thus restoring the necessary equilibrium through which the boy can be revivified. However, so long as [146] Many manuscripts insert a passage (1085* following notes to 7.64.9) that has the old brahman blame his own impending death on Rāma, calling it brahmahatyā:

> "Like a man without a protector, I will die here at the royal gate together with my wife. Now, Rāma, I hope you are happy since you have incurred the sin of killing a brahman!"

Rāma remains tainted by his own transgressions, the kingdom is at risk. Thus, he will undertake to perform the aśvamedha so that he might purify himself, both from his slaying of Rāvaṇa and from his momentary lapse from his duties as king. Both the narratives of Lavaṇa and of the śūdra Śambūka fulfill a crucial narrative function by demonstrating that Rāma's actions have real-life consequences for his subjects. At the same time both reflect different societal threats to the kingdom, the first from the outside and the second from within. The narrative of Lavaṇa, hauntingly imitative of the main epic story, establishes a threat to Rāma's rule from the outside, where the monstrous and unknown reside, while Śambūka poses an internal threat, one that strikes at the very fabric of varṇāśramadharma. Both must be contained for the kingdom to survive.

THE VISIT TO AGASTYA'S ASHRAM

After the slaying of Śambūka, but before Rāma returns to Ayodhyā, he, urged by the gods, visits the ashram of Agastya.[147] This interlude, along with the stories of King Śveta and King Daṇḍa that Agastya tells Rāma, is among those that Bulcke silently omits from his list. The stories themselves are generally thought to be among those randomly inserted into the Uttarakāṇḍa, and they have received little scholarly attention.[148] A closer examination reveals that the passage, like the others discussed above, is both necessary and structurally integrated with what precedes and follows it. One's attention is immediately drawn to the locus. Rāma has arrived at the ashram of Agastya. Agastya has already participated extensively, if somewhat indirectly, in the Uttarakāṇḍa's narrative. For he first appears, as noted above, as the leader of the sages who visit Rāma following his coronation, and it is in his voice that the entire histories of both Rāvaṇa and Hanumān are narrated to Rāma.[149] Now once more we encounter Agastya, again as narrator. The scenario is inverted: Rāma now visits Agastya, and the locus is no longer the audience hall in Ayodhyā but the ashram of Agastya.[150] Only the narrator remains the same. Agastya tells Rāma two stories, each of which, as we will see, reiterates themes the kāṇḍa has already articulated.

Agastya greets Rāma, congratulating him for the killing of the śūdra and the restoration of the brahman's son to life.[151] Agastya begs Rāma to honor him by accepting a bejeweled ornament fashioned by Viśvakarman.[152] Rāma does so and asks how the sage came to be in possession of this jewel. The episode is reminiscent of Rāma's earlier visit to Agastya's ashram in the Araṇyakāṇḍa, where the sage gives Rāma a bejeweled bow fashioned by Viśvakarman.[153] The giving of something of value by a sage to a king is unexpected, and while the Uttarakāṇḍa passage does not mark any discomfort with it, the Padmapurāṇa version of the episode clearly does.[154]

In the Padmapurāṇa, Rāma, having killed Śambūka, identified only as "the śūdra," is despondent over the sins he has committed, telling Agastya:

> "Upon seeing you, I will shake off my sins, without doubt."[155]

Agastya offers Rāma the ornament, which here, too, is described as fashioned by Viśvakarman.[156] Rāma is hesitant, objecting to the impropriety of his taking a gift from a brahman. He says:

> "O blessed and wise brahman, accepting a gift from you is prohibited. How would a kshatriya, knowing this, accept [a gift]?"[157]

Again, where the Uttarakāṇḍa is silent, the Padmapurāṇa is direct and explicit. While the critical text of the Uttarakāṇḍa does not explicitly acknowledge any discomfort on the part of Rāma, the epic itself does suggest such concern in the Araṇyakāṇḍa. At Araṇyakāṇḍa 11.26, Agastya greets Rāma in accordance to the rules laid down for ascetics under such circumstances. As he prepares to give Rāma the divine bow, he rationalizes:

> "To be sure, Kākutstha, an ascetic who mistreats a guest is destined to feed on his own flesh in the other world, like the man who bears false witness."[158]

While Rāma expresses no concerns over the accepting of gifts from the sage, Agastya's words clearly do. Transgression is the central concern of both the Araṇyakāṇḍa and the Padmapurāṇa passages. The two passages, however, identify different transgressors. For the Araṇyakāṇḍa the would-be transgressor is the ascetic, who does not honor the guest, while the Padma passage is concerned with the impropriety of a kshatriya receiving a gift from a brahman, thus identifying the recipient as the potential transgressor. While the Uttarakāṇḍa avoids a direct identification of either a transgression or a transgressor, the narrative that follows makes both explicit.

The story of King Śveta, perhaps one of the most unusual in the epic corpus, is known outside the Rāmāyaṇa and is apparently, as noted above, the episode to which Agastya is referring in the Araṇyakāṇḍa.[159] Once, in a bygone Tretā Yuga, Agastya, while performing severe austerities, wandered about in an uninhabited region of a forest. He discovered there a lovely lake and an ashram:

> And near that lake, there was a great and marvelous ashram. It was ancient and extremely sacred. But it was devoid of ascetics.[160]

Going down to the lake in the morning, the sage spies a corpse lying in the water. The corpse exudes a vital glow and had not decayed. As he looks upon the corpse, a divine vehicle with a divine being in it descends. The celestial being alights and begins to eat the corpse. Upon finishing his meal, he bathes. Agastya then asks the divine being who he is and why he is eating the flesh of the corpse.[161] Śveta then relates his own history and how he has come to suffer such a fate. Long ago, he was the eldest son of Sudeva, the king of Vidarbha, and he ruled his kingdom righteously for one thousand years. Anticipating his own end, Śveta retired to the forest where he undertook austerities at the very same lake for three thousand years and then ascended to the Brahmaloka. Upon his arrival there he discovered that, despite his divine state and locus, he was not free from hunger and thirst. He begged Grandfather Brahmā to tell him why:

> "But Grandfather Brahmā said to me: 'Your food, son of Sudeva, will be your own sweet flesh. You must eat that perpetually.
> 'While you were performing severe austerities, you nourished merely your own body. What is not sown, extremely wise Śveta, can never grow.

[159] The Padmapurāṇa is so enamored of the story that it tells it twice: PadmaP (ĀnSS) 5(Sṛṣṭikhaṇḍa).31.102–191 and 5.33.60–132.
[161] See sarga 68.

> 'You did not give even the smallest donation in that forest frequented by creatures. It is because of that, my child, that, even though you have reached heaven, you are afflicted by hunger and thirst.
> 'Now you must eat your own splendid body that has been well nourished with food and which will taste like the nectar of immortality. It will satisfy your hunger.' "[162]

Śveta's transgression is now made known, and we are told that it is only Agastya's arrival at the lake that will release the king from its consequences:

> "For, gentle Śveta, he [Agastya] is able to save even the hosts of the gods, what to say of you, great-armed king, who are subject to hunger and thirst."[163]

Śveta is rescued and, as a token of his appreciation, gives Agastya the jewel.[164] The narrative thus makes it quite clear that Śveta, who, although he has been a model king and performed the most severe austerities, has, nevertheless, failed in his obligations to others. He is a transgressor, and it is only the brahman sage Agastya who can save him. The story here foregrounds Śveta's own behavior—his dereliction of his duty to others while engaged in activities that, even if righteous, benefit only himself—and its consequences, while it backgrounds the very concerns that both the Araṇyakāṇḍa story and the Padmapurāṇa articulate. The absence of brahmans, the cultural voice of morality, serves to enhance Śveta's own moral lapses, while the arrival of Agastya reestablishes a path for dharma, which will allow for Śveta's final liberation. Śveta's story reminds the audience of Rāma's own situation, for he too has ruled his kingdom righteously and will soon realize his earthly sojourn is near its end. But, as Agastya has reminded him, transgressions, even if unrecognized or unacknowledged, still have negative consequences. And absent a means or mechanism through which those transgressions might be neutralized, even the most righteous still suffer for their lapses.

Once Agastya has finished his tale of Śveta, Rāma questions him as to how the forest surrounding Śveta's ashram became desolate. Agastya responds with the story of King Daṇḍa. The narrative again reverts back to a Kṛta Yuga long ago. At that time Manu established his son Ikṣvāku in his kingdom, commanding him to protect his subjects with the daṇḍa, "the rod of punishment." Ikṣvāku has one hundred sons, the youngest of whom, from childhood, was ignorant and disobeyed his elders. As a result he was called Daṇḍa. Realizing his son's defects, Ikṣvāku gave him a kingdom between the Vindhya and Śaivala mountains, where Daṇḍa establishes a capital city named Madhumanta and chooses Uśanas as his purohita, or domestic priest.[165] Despite his father's dire predictions, Daṇḍa's kingship is, at least initially, benign and his subjects are content:

> "And thus the king, together with his purohita, ruled that kingdom, which was filled with happy people, as if it were the kingdom of the gods in heaven."[166]

Daṇḍa rules his kingdom, "which was free from all troubles" for "many tens of thousands of years."[167] But even though his kingdom flourishes, Daṇḍa is still dull-witted (mandātmā) and lacks self-control. One day, in the month of Caitra,[168] he visits the ashram of his guru, Uśanas. There he sees the sage's daughter, Arajā,[169] whom he apparently has never met before. Daṇḍa is so infatuated with her that, unable to control himself, he violently assaults and rapes her.[170] Uśanas returns and discovers that his daughter, who waits for him on the outskirts of the ashram, has been violated and, with the fire of his anger, he curses Daṇḍa:

> "Since this fool has committed such a sin, so dreadful to contemplate, he must therefore reap the fruit of his evil act.
> "In seven nights this stupid king, who performs such evil acts, will meet his death, along with his retainers, troops, and mounts.
> "With an immense dust storm, Indra, the chastiser of Pāka, will parch that fool's kingdom for a hundred leagues all around.
> "Every living thing that is here, both fixed and moving, will be completely destroyed by that immense dust storm.
> "After seven nights, every living thing throughout the length and breadth of Daṇḍa's realm will become invisible as if made of dust."[171]

Nevertheless, the victim in this suffers as well, for:

[167] 7.71.2.
[168] Caitra is the first month of spring, roughly corresponding to mid-March through mid-April, and is the month that is associated with increased sexual passion.
[169] The name Arajā means "without taint or dirt." The name also has a strong resonance with the term arajāḥ (fem.), "one who has not yet had a menstrual period." See notes to 7.71.8.
[170] 7.71.4–17. In addition to the multiple layers of meaning and symbolism found in the name Daṇḍa, the phallic resonance here is unmistakable. See Glucklich 1988; and notes to 7.70.5.
[171] 7.72.6–10.

> After he had spoken to the sages in this fashion, he said this to Arajā: "You must stay here in the ashram, you stupid girl, engaged in profound meditation.
> "This lake, however, will remain brilliantly clear for the distance of a league around. Enjoying it without anxiety, Arajā, you must wait here for the proper time.
> "And whatever creatures may come to dwell for the night in your vicinity will be forever spared from the dust storm."[172]

Agastya ends his narrative by explaining to Rāma:

> "This is that very realm of Daṇḍa lying between the peaks of the Vindhya and Śaivala mountains. It was cursed by the brahman-seer long ago when that violation of righteousness had been committed.
> "And ever since that time, Kākutstha, it has been called the Daṇḍaka forest, while the area where the ascetics stayed likewise became 'Janasthāna.' "[173]

Thus, the narrative, in part, is understood to be a rationale for the name of the desolate forest and outpost haunted by the rākṣasa forces of Khara and Dūṣaṇa in the Araṇyakāṇḍa.

A careful examination of the episode, however, reveals a structural and narrative logic that places it within the frame of the concerns of the Uttarakāṇḍa. The choice of the Bhārgava Uśanas, normally the purohita of the asuras, to be Daṇḍa's purohita is intentional as it highlights the obvious comparison of Daṇḍa with the demonic. Perhaps not as obvious but nevertheless implicit in the presence of Uśanas is his often vexed and challenging relationships with women, particularly his daughters.[174] The other main occurrence in the Uttarakāṇḍa of the figure of the Bhārgava sage Uśanas Kāvya has been in the story of Yayāti,[175] where the sage's daughter Devayānī is treated poorly by her husband. Here, too, a daughter of Uśanas is central to the narrative. Both of these episodes concern similar themes of transgression carried out against a daughter of Uśanas. Both stories represent the principal victim to be Uśanas and not his daughters. Arajā is, in fact, understood to be complicit in the transgression. Her father addresses her as "stupid" (durmedhe) and, after ordering the remaining inhabitants to abandon the ashram, commands her to remain in the ashram "engaged in profound meditation." He tells her that she must wait here "for the proper time," although the phrase is not elaborated upon.[176]

A particularly striking and somewhat unusual feature of this narrative, and one found elsewhere in the Uttarakāṇḍa, is that it contains an explicit rape.[177] While sexually motivated abductions are common in the epic tradition, they generally do not include descriptions of physical penetration.[178] Daṇḍa's attack on Arajā is fairly graphic, similar in violence only to that of Ahalyā by Indra and Rambhā by Rāvaṇa.[179] Why then does Agastya tell Rāma this story at this particular point in the kāṇḍa? If, as argued above, the story of Śveta is to remind Rāma that even minor transgressions against brahmans can lead to the most extreme negative results, the story of Daṇḍa surely forces Rāma, and by extension the narrative's audience, to confront through the extreme example what the text only suggests: that Rāma's own inability to control his sexuality could well lead to his kingdom's destruction. That Rāma would take back Sītā, who had been abducted by what can only be described as a sexual predator and serial rapist, must raise questions of his judgment. The context makes it virtually impossible not to compare Arajā to the kāṇḍa's other women who have been sexually assaulted, or, as in the case of Sītā, are suspected of being assaulted. And while the perpetrator is punished, the victim is as well. Arajā is exiled, promised a limit to her punishment by being told to "wait here for the proper time." Sītā, too, manifesting the very signs of sexual activity, has been exiled and sent to a desolate forest, which is near an ashram. Up until this point in the narrative, there has been no indication of any potential reintegration of the royal family. It is only after this story that Rāma will undertake his aśvamedha, during which Sītā will be summoned to the sacrificial assembly to provide further testimony of her fidelity in the presence of a brahman, Vālmīki, thus providing for Sītā the very thing that Uśanas has promised Arajā, "the proper moment" for redemption.

Thus Rāma's visit to Agastya's ashram marks an important transitional point in the kāṇḍa. That Agastya is the narrator provides a frame that at once harks back to his narration at the opening of the kāṇḍa, while at the same time it frames the events in the book up until the aśvamedha, wherein the events of the past conflate with those of the present, and project those of the future. Moreover, through his narratives Agastya provides a brahmanic voice for the kāṇḍa. Additionally, these two narratives, that of Śveta and Daṇḍa, reiterate, in different voices and with different aims, the two recurrent themes of transgression with which the book is clearly concerned—transgressions against brahmans and sexual transgressions. Both narratives suggest the future: the eventual end of Rāma's reign and his ascension to heaven, and, in a most subtle manner, the possibility of an end to Sītā's exile in the forest.

[178] See, for example, Rāvaṇa's attack of Vedavatī told at sarga 17.

[179] Rāvaṇa, for example, rapes Rambhā at sarga 26. The narrative there clearly parallels the story of Daṇḍa's rape of Arajā and Indra's rape of Ahalyā at 7.30.19–41, especially verse 27. In the story of Ahalyā as told in the Bālakāṇḍa the sexual violation is not made explicit (see 1.47.15–1.48 and notes).

Rāma understands that for the kingdom to be safe, he must take action. He undertakes a purificatory rite in the form of the aśvamedha. But once the rite is undertaken, Rāma hears his own sons sing his tale, and he is, once again, drawn into his past. One last time Rāma summons Sītā. But now, for Rāma, Sītā is no longer a sexual object or threat to his kingship. Not only has Sītā been physically distanced from Rāma, contained, as it were, by the ascetic world of Vālmīki's ashram, but she has undergone a transition from wife to mother. Sītā can no longer function as Rāma's wife. Thus it comes as no surprise that rather than rejoining her husband, Sītā, attesting to her own purity, calls upon her own mother to take her back.

> "As I have never even thought of any man other than Rāghava, so may Mādhavī, the goddess of the earth, open wide for me."[180]

Sītā's final words are concise but poignant. She says nothing to her husband but only calls to Mādhavī. By this very act Sītā both instantiates the cultural imperative and resists it. For as she swears to her fidelity to her husband, she rejects him and the conditions under which he has summoned her.

Once Sītā has departed on her own terms, Rāghava is mad with grief and threatens to destroy the earth. But Rāma's outburst is short-lived and he is soon appeased by Brahmā, who reminds him once again of his true nature.[181] Rāma, as if to further solidify his turning away from carnal concerns, replaces Sītā with a golden image, pure, silent, and immobile. It is only at the conclusion of the aśvamedha sacrifice that Rāma, finally purified from all human transgressions, is ready to ascend to heaven.

CONCLUSION

Thus the narrative of the Uttarakāṇḍa takes its audience through a journey of Rāma's kingship from the first days of his consecration to his final days on earth. First he is made aware of Rāvaṇa's lineage, which gives rise to concerns of brahmahatyā. Then Rāma, in the absence of his advisers, removes himself from his kingly duties and participates in private enjoyments. This provides the opportunity for rumors to surface with regard to his own ability to place kingship above his personal affairs. Once made aware of such accusations, he rejects the private and devotes himself to his royal obligations. That he is aware of his own neglect of his royal duties and is concerned about his own transgressions is evidenced in a series of stories that he tells of kings who have neglected brahmans and thereby suffered negative consequences.[182] Once these concerns are aired, events occur in the kingdom that indicate that Rāma's own transgressive actions, whether of omission or commission, have had consequences. The aśvamedha is determined to be the most appropriate vehicle for the expiation of the very transgressions with which the kāṇḍa has concerned itself—brahmahatyā and neglect of rājadharma, especially when the latter arises from sexual activity. This is further reinforced by two stories that immediately precede the sacrifice: that of Indra and that of King Ila. Finally, Rāma resorts to the performance of an aśvamedha to purify himself, much in the fashion that Yudhiṣṭhira seeks to purify himself through the same rite. It is only at the conclusion of the aśvamedha that Rāma is released from any hint of earthly transgressions and is ready to ascend once more to heaven.

The Uttarakāṇḍa thus can be understood as having a very specific and integrated narrative logic that reinforces cultural imperatives of proper behavior, that is, a societal responsibility to maintain rājadharma and varṇāśramadharma, especially when a monarch is confronted by personal desires and needs. Moreover, like the so-called purāṇic additions to the Bālakāṇḍa, which can be seen to articulate the sexual anxieties of an adolescent male, the Uttarakāṇḍa can be understood to reflect the anxieties of the adult male world, especially those around sexuality and paternity. An understanding that the book's narrative structure is logical and intentional, and that it was meaningful to its intended audience, moreover, allows the work's modern readers, many of whom have been quick to dismiss this book as chaotic and unrelated to the rest of the poem, to understand why it has survived from antiquity in the hearts and minds of those who have preserved and transmitted Vālmīki's monumental epic.

9. Historicity and Sovereignty in the Uttarakāṇḍa

Anyone who possesses even the most passing familiarity with the story of the Rāmāyaṇa in virtually any of its innumerable renderings throughout South and Southeast Asia must know that central to the epic narrative is the great war at Laṅkā described in enormous detail in the Yuddhakāṇḍa, by far the largest book of the Vālmīki Rāmāyaṇa. However, the account of the siege of Laṅkā is quite different from the renderings of battles in epic poems such as the Mahābhārata or, to wander farther afield, the Iliad. For although these latter epics freely admit divine characters and miraculous events into their histories, both basically chronicle wars between two rival human armies.

The war at the heart of the Rāmāyaṇa is strikingly different. Here Rāma and his devoted younger brother Lakṣmaṇa are the only humans present in either of the vast hosts that fight to the death on the killing fields outside the walled citadel of Laṅkā. The remainder of Rāma's forces consist of a handful of rākṣasa turncoats and an astronomical number of semidivine monkeys who have been mustered by Rāma's ally, the vānara king Sugrīva. The opposing army consists entirely of supernaturally powerful rākṣasas under the command of a monstrous ten-headed, twenty-armed demon king.

Rāma is the prince and future king of a kingdom that is represented as having virtually imperial sway over north-central India and that is being administered in his absence by his devoted younger brother Bharata. Nonetheless, despite the fact that he is confronted with the necessity of staging an overseas invasion of a heavily fortified island kingdom ruled by a powerful warrior king and protected by a vast and heavily armed force of expert fighters, Rāma, a master of the military arts (dhanurveda), is content to rely on an army of semicivilized simians. These troops, who are frequently described as an undisciplined mass prone to flight, are said to fight mainly with their fangs and claws (dantanakhāyudha) and are armed only with sticks, stones, and the occasional discarded rākṣasa weapon. At no point during his long search for his abducted wife and his lengthy preparations for the impending war does Rāma appear to send word back to Ayodhyā requesting professional troops with serious armaments from Kosala and its vassal states to assist him in confronting the rākṣasa army, which is complete with the four traditional divisions of the ancient Indian army—infantry, chariots, cavalry, and elephants.[1]

[1] On the constitution of the traditional Indian army, see notes to 6.3.24 and 7.25.33.

After a prolonged and sanguinary struggle during which Rāma and his forces are repeatedly driven to the point of defeat and death by the supernaturally powerful forces of the demon-king and especially his son, the terrifying sorcerer-prince Rāvaṇi (Indrajit), Rāma, with the assistance of various supernatural allies of his own, including Garuḍa, Hanumān, Vibhīṣaṇa, and Indra, is eventually victorious.

It is a wonderful, widely known, and deeply beloved story. But what is far less well known is the Uttarakāṇḍa's obscure gesture to try somehow to historicize the events of the Laṅkan war by introducing a more prosaic suggestion of Rāma's having had, or, one should say, almost having had, a large force of regular human troops to aid him in his campaign.

In the kāṇḍa's thirty-seventh sarga, we find Rāma bidding a fond farewell to his vassals, kings who, it now seems, had been recruited, along with their armies, by Bharata to form an expeditionary force to support Rāma's invasion and siege of Laṅkā:

> After he had dismissed his friend [King Pratardana], Rāghava, smiling, addressed this sweet-syllabled speech to the lords of the earth who had come willingly.
> "Through your strength of character, you gentlemen have maintained your unshakable affection for me. Your righteousness is ever unwavering, and you are always true.
> "And it was through the might and blazing energy of you great kings that the evil and evil-minded lord of the rākṣasas was slain.
> "It was through the blazing energy of you gentlemen that Rāvaṇa, together with his hosts, his sons, and his kinsmen, was slain in battle. I was merely the proximate cause of that.
> "It was great Bharata who assembled you gentleman upon hearing that Janaka's daughter had been abducted in the wilderness.
> "A very long time passed while all you great kings were here making preparations. Now you must resolve to depart."
> Filled with the greatest delight, the kings replied to him: "Thank heavens you have been victorious, Rāma, and that your reign has been established!
> "Thank heavens Sītā has been recovered! Thank heavens your enemy has been vanquished! This was our greatest desire, and this is our greatest glory, in that we see you, Rāma, victorious, after having slain your enemies. And how like you, Kākutstha, that you praise us.
> "For only those worthy of praise know how to utter praise such as this. Let us now take our leave and depart. But you, sir, will always remain in our hearts. And, great king, may your affection for us endure forever."[2]

Nothing before or after this in the poem suggests that such an armada had been assembled or, for that matter, that Bharata knew anything about his sister-in-law's abduction, his brother's trials, or the war at Laṅkā—indeed, about anything that had happened to Rāma after his, Bharata's, return to Nandigrāma in the Ayodhyākāṇḍa—before Hanumān informs him about all of this just prior to Rāma's return to Ayodhyā in the Yuddhakāṇḍa.[3] Nonetheless, in their glosses on these verses, the commentators Govindarāja (Cg), Mādhava Yogīndra (Ck), Maheśvaratīrtha (Cm), and Nāgeśabhaṭṭa (Ct), each of whom is deeply dedicated to verifying the historicity of the epic, all conscientiously accept this revisionist history of the Laṅkan war and interpret the passage to show that King Pratardana, along with Bharata, had made major military preparations to assist Rāma in his war against Rāvaṇa. This news is rather striking in light of the fact that no mention is made in the Yuddhakāṇḍa of Pratardana or any other human king offering any assistance whatever to Rāma.[4] Despite this and despite the fact that no mention of such a force is to be found elsewhere in the poem, the commentators understand that, in order to aid Rāma in his campaign to recover his abducted wife, Bharata has assembled a host of loyal warrior kings (in some manuscripts as many as three hundred) who had apparently spent several years in Ayodhyā preparing for battle. The commentators offer no explanation as to why this vast host never joined the battle or why it never even set out from Ayodhyā. The oddity of this passage is further heightened by the text itself. For even the kings who are supposed to have been marshaled as allies of Rāma seem puzzled by the whole episode. As they make their way back to their respective kingdoms, they lament that they never got to face Rāvaṇa in battle, and they seem to complain that Bharata summoned them too late for them to have been of any assistance.

But those protectors of the earth, filled with the pride of their might, said: "We never got to see Rāvaṇa standing before us in battle.

"Bharata assembled us belatedly and to no purpose. For otherwise, we kings would have doubtless slain the rākṣasas there.

"For, protected by the might of Rāma's arm and Lakṣmaṇa's too, we would have happily fought without a care on the far shore of the sea."

[3] Yuddhakāṇḍa sarga 114. Benoît (1999, p. 1691) takes the account of Bharata's recruitment of an expeditionary army of allies at face value despite the fact that it is clearly an afterthought on the part of the Uttarakāṇḍa's author. See sarga 37 and notes.

> Discussing these and thousands of other matters, those kings, great chariot-warriors, entered their own kingdoms."[5]

This curious episode is not the only one in which the author of the Uttarakāṇḍa makes some belated efforts to rewrite the political and military history of Kosala in the Tretā Yuga. The fact is that the Vālmīki Rāmāyaṇa seems to represent the Kosalan rulers as something like high kings if not as cakravartins, or universal monarchs.[6] Nonetheless, the preceding books of the epic make no clear territorial claims for the Kosalan state beyond the region surrounding its capital city of Ayodhyā—not when they describe the idealized reign of Daśaratha[7] nor in their depiction of Rāma's legendary ten- (or, in some passages, eleven-) thousand-year utopian reign, as, for example, at Yuddhakāṇḍa sarga 115. In the first six books the only suggestion that the Kosalan king holds sway over subordinate or vassal rulers comes in a mere two verses found in the late framing narrative of the Bālakāṇḍa,[8] where we learn that Daśaratha had expanded an already great realm and that his city was filled with crowds of neighboring kings who came to pay tribute. In other words, Kosala appears to be represented as a competitive regional power able to exert its authority only to a limited degree beyond its borders and into the realms of its sāmanta, or neighboring or tributary, princes.[9] At no point does the poem describe or even mention any military campaign or territorial expansion on the part of Daśaratha, not even in connection with the performance of his aśvamedha, which is so elaborately described at sargas 11–13 of the Bālakāṇḍa, despite the fact that this rite is commonly associated with the ritual legitimation of conquest.

Compare this avoidance of the critical state function of expansion through military conquest with the elaborately described military campaigns and imperial reach of the Lunar Dynasty king Yudhiṣṭhira as recorded in the Mahābhārata in conjunction with his performance of the rājasūya and aśvamedha rites in the Sabhāparvan and Āśvamedhikaparvan, respectively. The military expeditions of the rājasūya are said to have left the Dharmarāja Yudhiṣṭhira in control of an empire that extended from Antioch in the West to China in the East,[10] while Arjuna's conquests in the Āśvamedhikaparvan bring all of India under Yudhi-ṣṭhira's sway.[11] This is entirely consonant with the Indic concept of the cakravartin and is indeed perhaps the original textual model for that concept, one which, in turn, may have been derived from early contact with the Achaemenid and Hellenistic empires.

However, just as the authors of the Uttarakāṇḍa seem suddenly to find it beneath the dignity of their hero that he, a prince and heir apparent of the legendary Solar Dynasty, should, even in exile, have to march off to war supported only by a pack of monkeys, they also appear to feel it inappropriate that his long-awaited and ideal kingdom should be confined to the region between the Sarayū and the Ganges. And yet, as we will demonstrate shortly, despite their desire to represent Rāma as a true dharmarāja and cakravartin, ruling over, in effect, the entire earth, just as we see Yudhiṣṭhira represented as doing in the Mahābhārata and other kings as doing in the later kāvya and praśasti literature, they no doubt are also cognizant of and influenced by Vālmīki's construction of Rāma as a merciful monarch who conquers only when his righteous anger is provoked and never simply to acquire tribute or territory.[12] In what we believe to be an attempt to negotiate these two opposing ideals of Hindu kingship, the Uttarakāṇḍa authors indulge in an awkward dance around the critical issue of the agonistic nature of the two great śrauta rites associated with the political power of the king: the royal consecration, or rājasūya, and the ritualized subjugation of neighboring kingdoms through the means of the aśvamedha.

Readers familiar with the Mahābhārata will recall that Yudhiṣṭhira's first act as king after he has subjugated and laid waste to all rival kingdoms is to perform a grand rājasūya, the purpose of which is to ritually confirm his new status as the cakravartin.[13] Then, too, after his victory over his enemies in the civil war of the Bhāratas, the despondent king, grieving over his having slain so many of his kinsmen, is urged by Vyāsa to purify himself and once again assert his suzerainty over all other kings and their territories by performing the aśvamedha.[14] In the performance of this rite, a war party follows a consecrated stallion in its wanderings for a year, giving battle to or demanding the surrender of every king into whose territory the horse wanders. Arjuna, appointed to lead his brother's forces, duly circumambulates the earth in the hoofprints of the horse, defeating and subjugating the world once again in the name of the newly reestablished universal monarch.[15]

[12] Cf. Pollock 1991, pp. 15–67. Note that Rāma's campaign in Laṅkā is by no means a war of conquest or territorial expansion. The battle is fought to destroy the evil Rāvaṇa and to recover the abducted princess Sītā. Once those goals are accomplished, he turns the intact realm of Laṅkā over to Rāvaṇa's brother, the virtuous rākṣasa Vibhīṣaṇa. See 6.100.9–16 and notes. See, too, R. Goldman 2008.

In the Uttarakāṇḍa as well, Rāma, having newly established himself as king and demonstrated his adherence to brahmanical codes of righteousness (dharma) through his actions to quell the scandal among his subjects and his summary execution of the śūdra ascetic Śambūka, decides that he must ritually validate his accession to the throne through the performance of a rājasūya. This would thus be similar to what Yudhiṣṭhira does upon his accession to the throne of Indraprastha in the Mahābhārata.

Rāma tells Bharata and Lakṣmaṇa:

> "I have faithfully accomplished this unsurpassed task for the twice-born brahman. And therefore, Rāghavas, I now wish to firmly establish the bulwark of righteousness.
> "I wish to perform the unsurpassed rājasūya rite together with both of you, who are my second selves, for in this lies everlasting righteousness.
> "For it was by sacrificing with the rājasūya rite, accompanied by excellent oblations and excellent subsidiary rites, that Mitra, destroyer of his foes, attained the position of Varuṇa.
> "And it was by sacrificing with the rājasūya rite in accordance with righteousness that Soma, who knew righteousness, attained fame among all the worlds and an eternal domain.
> "You must carefully consider with me what would be best at this time, and you must state prudently what would be beneficial in the time to come."[16]

But in the Mahābhārata, Yudhiṣṭhira performed his rājasūya only after the completion of a prolonged and very sanguinary military campaign involving the slaughter of many kings and their armies. Nothing at all like this has occurred in the Rāmāyaṇa. Rāma has merely conducted a punitive campaign against the demonic king who had abducted his beloved wife. Even after his total victory in that conflict, he shows no interest whatever in occupying or annexing the conquered territory. Instead, he merely consecrates his slain enemy's brother on the Laṅkan throne and, taking nothing from that fabulously wealthy kingdom but the loan of a flying palace, returns home to rule in peace. This is not conquest but merely, to use a modern idiom, regime change.[17]

Bharata, however, as the spokesman for the Uttarakāṇḍa author, understands immediately what is at stake in light of the traditionally violent context of the rājasūya, on the one hand, and of his brother's peaceful and compassionate nature, on the other. He sets himself immediately to the task of dissuading Rāma from his plan, saying:

> "In you, noble brother, resides the highest righteousness. On you rests the entire earth, the bearer of wealth. And in you, great-armed prince of measureless valor, abides glory.
> "Just as the immortal gods look upon Prajāpati, all the great kings, those protectors of the earth, look upon you as the lord of the world as do we as well.
> "And the people regard you as their father, immensely powerful king. Rāghava, you are the refuge of all living beings on earth as well.
> "Therefore, your majesty, how can you undertake such a sacrifice, which would witness the destruction of the royal lineages of the earth?
> "For in the performance of that [rite], your majesty, the annihilation—like the universal destruction—of all men on earth who have attained manly valor will come to pass.
> "Tiger among men, you who are of unequaled valor through your virtues should not destroy the earth for it is already under your sway."[18]

Rāma needs little persuasion and is evidently relieved by Bharata's intervention:

> When truly valorous Rāma had heard that speech of Bharata, which seemed to consist of the nectar of immortality, he experienced unequaled delight.
> And he said these splendid words to the increaser of Kaikeyī's joy: "I am indeed pleased and gratified by your words this day.
> "These words in conformity with righteousness, which you have boldly uttered, tiger among men, will be the salvation of the earth.
> "Because of your excellent speech, knower of righteousness, I will surely desist from that intention of mine, which was to perform that foremost of rites, the rājasūya."[19]

[18] 7.74.9–14. Again, the epic offers no explanation of how the earth came to be under the sway of Rāma or his father.
[19] 7.74.15–18.

Lakṣmaṇa now joins the conversation, proposing that instead of the massively destructive rājasūya rite, Rāma should perform the other great ritual of sovereignty, the aśvamedha. But in putting forth his rationale for this substitution, Lakṣmaṇa makes no mention of this rite's equally agonistic and sanguinary associations. Instead, he dwells on the ritual's power, as discussed above, to purify its patron as famously demonstrated when, as a consequence of his having slain great Vṛtra in mythic times, Indra, smitten by the debilitating sin and pollution of brahmahatyā, was purified and restored to his senses through a performance of the aśvamedha.[20] Rāma takes Lakṣmaṇa's advice and performs the rite, but although it is described over eight chapters,[21] there is no explicit mention of any military campaign or conquest associated with it. Instead, the text is content merely with alluding to Lakṣmaṇa's guarding of the sacrificial horse during its wanderings.[22] Interestingly, however, many later purāṇic, literary, and folk versions of the Rāmakathā will revert to the normative understanding of the context of the aśvamedha and insert a passage in which Rāma's sacrificial horse is the object of contestation between its escorts and rival kshatriyas. In these versions Rāma's twin sons, while still dwelling in Vālmīki's ashram, engage in battle with the warrior and with the army appointed to accompany the horse.[23] It is also quite noteworthy here that the other elaborately described aśvamedha in the Rāmāyaṇa, which was performed by Daśaratha at sargas 8–13 of the Bālakāṇḍa, similarly makes no mention whatever of any conflict or conquest during the consecrated horse's yearlong wanderings.[24]

[20] See sargas 75–76. For a detailed discussion of the purificatory function of Rāma's aśvamedha, see Introduction, "Structure," pp. 119–30.

[22] At 7.83.1–2, Rāma says that he will release a piebald stallion and places Lakṣmaṇa in charge of it. At 7.83.9, the horse is said to wander about under the protection of Lakṣmaṇa.

[23] This episode is a popular one found in many versions of the story. The Padmapurāṇa, for example, devotes more than fifty chapters to Rāma's aśvamedha and the numerous adventures of the horse and its protectors during its wanderings. In this version, the horse's escort is under the command of Śatrughna. When the horse finally wanders into the ashram of Vālmīki, it is captured by Lava, who destroys its accompanying army and duels with Hanumān and Śatrughna himself until the latter knocks him out of action. At this point Kuśa enters the battle and defeats Śatrughna. See PadmaP (ĀnSS) 4(Pātālakhaṇḍa).10–64. As for the poets, Bhavabhūti makes a version of the episode the theme of more than two full acts of his Uttararāmacarita, where Lava drives off the army that Rāma has sent to guard the horse and holds off its commander, who, here, is said to be Candraketu, Lakṣmaṇa's son. See UttaRāC Act 4.27 through Act 6. Kālidāsa makes no allusion to the episode in his Raghuvaṃśa.

[24] The text does mention the sacrificial horse under the guardianship of strong men (1.11.11–14) and its return after the prescribed period of one year (1.13.1) but has noth-

Given all of this, one would think that the author of the Uttarakāṇḍa would be content to portray King Rāma as a pacific and righteous monarch, more of a cakravartin in the spiritual and moral sense of the term than in its political sense. Besides, Rāma, in Bharata's rather vague terms, is already a ruler who holds the whole earth under his sway, a sway for which the text has given no history or explanation. But, in fact, the author of the kāṇḍa is unwilling to wholly abandon the idea of Rāma as a conquering cakravartin. Once again, as with the imagined armada of the three hundred kings mustered for a war at Laṅkā that it would never see, the Uttarakāṇḍa, in its closing half, provides an interesting, if belated, account of conquest and territorial expansion on the part of Rāma and his brothers.

Although, as we have noted, Rāma is never again shown to personally engage in warfare after his conquest of the rākṣasa city of Laṅkā, this does not mean that he could not still employ his kinsmen to extend the influence and territorial control of the Kosalan state. The first example of such a move is narrated, again with several digressions, over eleven sargas of the Uttarakāṇḍa.[25] Here, the sages who live along the banks of the Yamunā and their spokesman, the Bhārgava ṛṣi Cyavana, petition Rāma for aid to protect them from the depredations of the terrible and immensely powerful demon Lavaṇa. In response, Rāma deputes his brother Śatrughna, who hitherto in the long epic has had only a minor role at best, to destroy the monster. After a heroic battle, he does so. The episode is, as noted above, a minor reprise of Rāma's own history of the destruction of the fearsome Rāvaṇa who, with his rākṣasa hosts, had similarly preyed on brahman sages. The difference here is that Rāma now instructs his brother to found a city and a kingdom at the site of the battle and consecrates him as king of the new political formation of Mathurā, called Madhupurī or Madhurā in the Uttarakāṇḍa.[26] In this way the Doab heartland of the Śūrasenas at Mathurā is represented as becoming a sāmanta, or client state, of Kosala. After twelve years of ruling his new kingdom, Śatrughna returns to Ayodhyā to see his beloved brother but is told, rather sharply, that it is inappropriate for a king to ing to say of the events during the horse's wanderings. Daśaratha's aśvamedha is performed in order to free the king of some unspecified obstacle to his producing an heir to the throne and serves to clear the way for the king's subsequent putrakāmeṣṭi, a rite whose specific purpose is the fulfillment of the desire for a son. On this, see our translation and annotation to Bālakāṇḍa sargas 11–13. See, too, S. Goldman 2004.

[25] See sargas 53–63. See, too, Introduction, "Structure," pp. 145–46 for a discussion of this episode.

leave his kingdom and that he must betake himself—after only five days—back to Madhurā, where he is to remain and rule.[27]

Then many years later, just as the whole book and, indeed, the entire epic are within a few brief sargas of their end, the author quickly inserts two further episodes of territorial conquest for the Ikṣvākus in order to provide a kingdom for each of the sons of Bharata and Lakṣmaṇa. In three short chapters totaling a mere fifty-eight ślokas, the text describes two additional wars of conquest and annexation.[28] First we learn that Rāma's maternal uncle Aśvapati Yudhājit of the Kekeyas sends a messenger to Ayodhyā to request him to invade, subdue, and occupy the rich and beautiful country of the gandharvas, which lies along the banks of the Indus. Once he has done so, Rāma is to found two capital cities in the region. Delighted at the prospect of the military campaign against thirty million powerful gandharvas, Rāma immediately resolves to send out an army led by Bharata and the latter's two sons, Takṣa and Puṣkala, to annihilate the gandharvas and take their land. Bharata, his two sons, and Yudhājit duly proceed to the country of the gandharvas where, after a tremendous weeklong battle described in but a single verse, Bharata instantaneously annihilates all thirty million gandharva warriors with the saṃvartāstra, or the terrifying weapon of Kāla himself. Following this stunning and bloody victory, Bharata founds two splendid eponymous capitals, Takṣaśīlā and Puṣkarāvatī, for his sons, Takṣa and Puṣkara, respectively, in the land now known as Gāndhāra (presumably in memory of the slaughtered gandharvas). This hasty account, which is crafted to provide etymologies for the well-known geographical names Gāndhāra, Takṣaśīlā, and Puṣkarāvatī, appears to have been designed largely to further enhance the imperial pretensions of the Sūryavaṃśa by extending the reach of the Kosalan monarchy to what would today be Pakistan and Afghanistan.[29]

When Rāma learns of the success of this campaign of conquest, he is delighted but, perhaps, disturbed by its massive and unprecedented violence. Nevertheless he decides to expand his dynasty's territorial reach still further. He tells Lakṣmaṇa to find yet another large and well-endowed country over which he, Rāma, can set his devoted brother's two sons, Aṅgada and Candraketu, as rulers. This time, however, he insists that the conquest be carried out in a kinder, gentler fashion than had been the case in Gāndhāra. He instructs Lakṣmaṇa, [29] 7.90–91. As part of her analysis of the Uttarakāṇḍa, Biardeau (1999, pp. 1701–4) discusses these accounts of conquest in terms of her ongoing efforts to relate the kāṇḍa to both the Mahābhārata and the advent of Buddhism in the northwest of the subcontinent.

Bharata now recommends the delightful country of Kārāpatha as a likely target for this gentle subjugation. There is no description at all of the way in which the conquest is accomplished, but in short order Rāma is able to consecrate Aṅgada in the charming city of Aṅgadīyā in the west and Candraketu in the northern city of Candrakāntā, said to be in the country of the Mallas.[31] The latter city may be the site of the contemporary city of Multan in Panjab, Pakistan.[32] The commentator Nāgeśabhaṭṭa (Ct), in keeping with the constant tenor of the Uttarakāṇḍa, suggests that Rāma plays no direct part in the conquest, assigning that task to his junior brothers, Bharata and Lakṣmaṇa.[33]

How are we to interpret these passages that cast Rāma in the role of a sort of cakravartin, or universal monarch, who controls three hundred sāmanta monarchs and sets his brothers and nephews, in the manner of Napoleon, to subjugate and rule new provinces of his empire? Judging from the belated, terse, and rather sketchy nature of these episodes, it is apparent that they must be among the very latest additions to this last book of the epic. This seems especially clear in light of the fact, discussed earlier, that this characterization of Rāma as an expansionist conqueror willing to countenance the extermination of whole populations is quite alien to the way he and his rule are represented elsewhere in the poem.

These appear to be rather jarring and unexpected efforts to turn Rāma, the paragon of virtue, restraint, and compassion, into a conquering hero capable of condoning the slaughter of thirty million gandharvas who have not offended him in any way simply to provide kingdoms for his nephews. This seems rather unlike the Rāma who, earlier, on the verge of death and defeat and the destruction of his army, his brother, and himself, refused to permit Lakṣmaṇa to deploy another weapon of mass destruction in order to exterminate the entire pestilent race of the rākṣasas on the grounds that such a genocide would violate dharma.[34]

[32] See notes to 7.92.9.
[33] See notes to 7.92.7. Śatrughna divides his conquered kingdom of Madhurā between his two sons. Subāhu receives Madhurā while Śatrughātin is sent off to rule in Vaidiśa (7.98.7–11). Rāma's own two sons, Lava and Kuśa, are similarly provided with kingdoms of their own, but this does not appear to involve the conquest of new territories. Rāma gives Kosala to Kuśa, to be ruled from the eponymous city Kuśāvatī, which is located on the slopes of the Vindhya mountains. Lava is established in the northern kingdom, with its capital Śrāvatī. See 7.97.7–19 and notes; and 7.98.3–6 and notes.

The passages seem, in fact, to constitute a strange epilogue to an epilogue, the purpose of which is to create, in an abrupt and unconvincing fashion, a new Rāma quite unlike the Rāma of the earlier kāṇḍas.

Given all of this, we believe that these brief, awkward, and generally poorly written passages may well have been inserted by an author seeking to recreate the image of the Rāmāyaṇa's hero more in the light of the idealized world conqueror held up as an ideal in the Mahābhārata as illustrated in that epic's Sabhā- and Āśvamedhikaparvans. Indeed, it appears not unlikely that these authors were familiar with the Mahābhārata's construction of the dharmarāja Yudhiṣṭhira as a cakravartin who legitimizes his rulership and his conquests through the critical ritual performances of the rājasūya and the aśvamedha rites. They thus frame the closing acts of Rāma's career by invoking the two rites, which, in keeping with Rāma's compassionate nature, have been stripped of their military and territorial implications. In this way, it appears sufficient for Rāma to simply contemplate performing the rājasuya while permitting himself to be dissuaded from its actual performance by Bharata. Similarly, in the case of the aśvamedha, although Rāma does perform the sacrifice, he does so, like his father, Daśaratha, in the Bālakāṇḍa, simply for the sake of purification and without any clearly described military or political components.

10. The Theology of the Uttarakāṇḍa

The account of the incarnation, or avatāra, literally, the descent, of the Supreme Deity Lord Viṣṇu as the warrior prince and dharmic king Rāma as it is narrated in the Bālakāṇḍa is widely known. The process and outcome of the Lord's human birth are clearly stated and easily grasped.[1] The episode is but one particularly prominent example of the widely articulated Vaiṣṇava topos of the incarnation of the Lord in order to save the gods, cows, brahmans, the virtuous, and dharma in general from some powerful demonic being and thus fits well into the overarching Vaiṣṇava theology of the avatāra as a recurrent agent of universal salvation. This doctrine is most famously stated by Rāma's successor incarnation, Kṛṣṇa, in the Bhagavadgītā:

> yadā yadā hi dharmasya glānir bhavati bhārata /
> abhyutthānam adharmasya tadātmānaṃ srjāmy aham //
> paritrāṇāya sādhūnāṃ vināśāya ca duṣkṛtām /
> dharmasaṃsthāpanārthāya saṃbhavāmi yuge yuge //[2]
> "Whenever, O Bhārata, there is a decline of righteousness and a corresponding increase of unrighteousness, I take on an embodied form.
> Thus, in age after age I take birth in order to protect the virtuous and annihilate the wicked."

In the Vālmīki Rāmāyaṇa, Lord Viṣṇu, in response to an appeal from the gods for relief from the oppression of Rāvaṇa, consents to incarnate as a human being, thus enabling him to circumvent the terms of the rākṣasa's boon, which immunized him against death at the hands of all superhuman beings.[3] Then, during the course of a ritual being performed on behalf of King Daśaratha in order to grant his wish for a son and heir, a splendid, celestial being suddenly appears and presents the king with a vessel filled with a divinely infused milk and rice pudding, or pāyasa. He instructs the king to feed the pāyasa to his three wives, informing him that they will then produce the sons for the sake of which he has been performing sacrifices.[4] The precise distribution of the pāyasa, which we are to understand is infused with the divine energy, or tejas, of Viṣṇu, is a bit unclear, leading to some commentarial discussion,[5] and the accounts of it vary in some later versions of the Rāmakathā; but the basic idea remains the same throughout. The king's wives, Kausalyā, Kaikeyī, and Sumitrā, become impregnated through the ingestion of their respective portions of the pāyasa and give birth to four splendid sons: Rāma, Bharata, and the twins, Lakṣmaṇa and Śatrughna. Each of the brothers is understood to incarnate the share of Viṣṇu's energy proportional to the amount of the pāyasa consumed by his respective mother except, of course, for the twins, who, because of the way in which Sumitrā's portion or portions are ingested, share her allotment of the divine energy equally between them. The episode may strike the Western lay reader as strange, but it is fully in keeping with the motif of oral impregnation that is found frequently in the Indian epic and purāṇic literature.[6] An alternate method used by Viṣṇu to impregnate human females is described in the first book of the Mahābhārata, where it is said that when the Lord consented to be born on earth, he plucked from his head two hairs, a black one and a white one, which, when implanted, respectively, in the wombs of the Yādava noblewomen Devakī and Rohiṇī, became the embryos of Kṛṣṇa and Balarāma, respectively.[7] In both cases we see the production of a composite incarnation consisting of a set of brothers through the division of some portion of the God's essence and the distribution of the portions in two or more human wombs. The concept and the process are straightfoward and easy to understand. On the other hand, in that same opening book of the Mahābhārata, we find a rather different explanation of the births of Kṛṣṇa and Balarāma. At 1.61.91 it says simply that the immensely powerful Baladeva [Balarāma] is, in fact, a portion not of Viṣṇu per se but rather of the cosmic serpent lord Śeṣa (śeṣasyāṃśas tu nāgasya baladevo mahābalaḥ).

Now an avatāra according to Vaiṣṇava theology is a time-bound phenomenon. Once the incarnation of the Lord has fulfilled his divine mission in the world, he must return to his primordial abode in his original form. In other words, the avatāra, having been born like a human being, must also at some point die like one. For each descent or incarnation, that is to say, the apparent taking on of an earthly body by the Supreme Lord, there must be an ascent or what we might call an "excarnation,"

[5] See notes to 1.15.25–27.

[6] Examples include the stories of the births of Matsyagandhā/Satyavatī and Matsya at MBh 1.57.36–54, Jarāsandha at MBh 2.16.27–45, and Viśvāmitra and Jamadagni at MBh 12.49.6–29.

[7] MBh 1.189.31. However, compare MBh 1.58.51, where Viṣṇu simply agrees to Indra's request to incarnate with a portion of himself (aṃśenāvatarasveti tathety āha ca taṃ hariḥ). There no mention is made of the technique of incarnation.

that is to say, the giving up of that material body. In the epic and purāṇic literature, this latter process is described in detail only in the cases of the two most important of the Vaiṣṇava avatāras, those of Rāma and Kṛṣṇa.

In order to put the ending of the Rāmāvatāra, as it is represented in the Uttarakāṇḍa, in a larger theological context, let us examine briefly the account of the death of Kṛṣṇa as it is described in the Mausalaparvan, the sixteenth book of the Mahābhārata. Following the self-destructive internecine battle of his own clan, the Yadus, and the death of his older brother, Balarāma, Kṛṣṇa realizes that the time for his passage (saṃkramaṇa) from the world of mortals has come. Entering a yogic trance, he sits in meditation until a hunter named Jarā, "Old Age," mistaking him for a deer, shoots him in the sole of his foot, the only vulnerable point of his body. Rushing up to claim his prey, the hunter finds a person with many arms clad all in yellow, that is to say, in the standard iconographic form of Viṣṇu. The divinity then ascends to his own immeasurable realm (sthānam . . . svam . . . aprameyam), filling heaven and earth with his glory. In the heavenly world, he is reverentially welcomed by the gods, seers, siddhas, and the other celestial beings.[8] Put simply, just as Viṣṇu had descended from his celestial abode to aid in the restoration of dharma on earth, he now, upon the completion of his mission, ascends once more to his heavenly abode.

Let us now turn to the Mahābhārata's treatment of the end of the incarnation of the other portion of Viṣṇu, Kṛṣṇa's older brother Rāma or, as he is often called to distinguish him from the hero of the Rāmāyaṇa, Balarāma or Baladeva. For this will introduce some of the less straightforward issues that arise in the Rāmāyaṇa's account of the end of the Rāmāvatāra and the debate it will provoke among the epic's commentators. According to the Mausalaparvan, Balarāma precedes Kṛṣṇa in his departure from his earthly body. And, contrary to what one might expect in light of the story of the two brothers' births mentioned above, his departure is quite different in its nature and its destination from that of Kṛṣṇa. Leaving the city of Dvārakā, Balarāma proceeds to a deserted spot where, like Kṛṣṇa, he enters a yogic trance. But as he abandons his human body, a gigantic, white serpent with a thousand hoods issues from his mouth and enters the ocean, where it is worshipfully received by the ocean divinity Sāgara, the lord of the waters Varuṇa, and many of the great nāgas, or serpent lords.[9]

This account of the death of Balarāma clearly follows an alternate version, now generally regarded as the standard one, according to which Balarāma is an incarnation not of Viṣṇu directly but of the great serpent-lord Śeṣanāga, also known as Ananta, upon whom the Supreme Lord reposes in the cosmic ocean between the periodic creations of the phenomenal universe. This version is certainly well in place by the date of the Bhāgavatapurāṇa, which emerges among the various purāṇic accounts of the life of Kṛṣṇa as the locus classicus of the story. Near the beginning of the tenth book of the Bhāgavata, which is devoted to the biography of Kṛṣṇa and his brother, we learn that the seventh manifestation of Viṣṇu known as Ananta enters the womb of Devakī and that the Lord, realizing her fear of her murderous brother Kaṃsa, instructs Yogamāyā to remove that manifestation, now called Śeṣa, from her womb and implant it instead in that of her co-wife, Rohiṇī.[10] Evidently, between the composition of the Mahābhārata's Ādi- and Mausalaparvans, the latter account of the birth of Kṛṣṇa and Balarāma was coming to be regarded as the preferred one, at least on the part of the sixteenth book's author.

[9] MBh 16.5.11–15.

We will return below to this interesting version of the birth story of the avatāra in which, instead of a single divinity dividing himself, so to speak, into multiple earthly individuals, partially differentiated aspects or companions of the Lord take the forms, respectively, of the different members of the composite divine hero. With this in mind, let us turn to the Uttarakāṇḍa's account of the end of the Rāmāvatāra and to the various ways in which the medieval and early modern commentators on this seminal text have understood the episode, which, for them, emerges as a critical and contentious theological problem.

The end of the career of the incarnations of Rāma and his three brothers begins in the ninety-fourth sarga of the Uttarakāṇḍa when Kāla, Death or Time, having arrived at Rāma's court in the guise of an ascetic to serve as a messenger of Brahmā, informs Rāma that his life span as a human, which he had set for himself at eleven thousand years,[11] was now complete and that he should, if he so wishes, now return to the heavenly world where he is sorely missed by the gods.[12] Rāma graciously agrees to Brahmā's request. He tells Kāla:

> "Bless you. I shall return from whence I have come. You have come here in accordance with my heart's desire. I have no hesitation in this regard.
> "I must attend to all the needs of the gods, who are my obedient subjects, and now, at the end of everything, I will do as Grandfather Brahmā says.[13]

[10] BhāgP 10.2.4–8.
[11] On the vexed issue of the length of Rāma's rule, see notes to 6.116.82,90; 7.41.17; 7.89.5; etc.

One might well inquire at this point as to why the author of the passage felt it necessary to have Brahmā send a message to Rāma, who is understood to be the omniscient Nārāyaṇa, to remind him that it is time for him to end his earthly sojourn, which has continued for many millennia after the slaying of Rāvaṇa, unlike that of Kṛṣṇa, which ended no more than thirty-six years after the accomplishment of his avatāric mission. This is but one of several complex issues in the Uttarakāṇḍa's representation of Rāma's final days on earth and his ascension to his heavenly abode. The germ of this curious incident is perhaps to be found in a critical difference in the representation of the two great Vaiṣṇava incarnations, Kṛṣṇa and Rāma. On the one hand, the former appears to be always possessed of full awareness of his own divinity, even occasionally displaying it openly to others, friend and foe alike, as the occasion may present itself.[14] Rāma, on the other hand, as depicted by Vālmīki at any rate, is characterized as incapable of fully understanding his true, divine nature because of the particular conditions set by Rāvaṇa in claiming his boon from Brahmā. It is that particular, purposeful nescience that led the hero to express puzzlement when, after the slaying of Rāvaṇa, the assembled gods lauded him as the Supreme Divinity. He says to them:

> "I think of myself only as a man, Rāma, the son of Daśaratha. May the Blessed Lord please tell me who I really am, to whom I belong, and why I am here."[15]

But the condition that Rāma must remain unaware of his true nature became otiose after the death of his demonic foe, and so the gods feel free to praise him as the Supreme Lord he truly is. It would seem, however, that the authors here, although they now refer to Rāma openly as Lord Viṣṇu, may still be somewhat constrained by the thematic of the earlier kāṇḍas and so introduce the theme of the divine messenger just to gently remind, as it were, the Lord of his earlier agreement.

The next move in the drawn-out account of the visarjana, or release, of the avatāra occurs in the ninety-sixth sarga. There, Lakṣmaṇa, Rāma's hitherto inseparable brother and co-incarnation, who, having been presented with a situation in which he must choose between his own death and the destruction of his entire lineage, honorably chooses the former. Rāma, who has vowed to put to death anyone who should interrupt his colloquy with Kāla, and who is therefore unable to break his own word, reluctantly banishes his beloved brother, banishment being, as he says, the moral equivalent of execution to a virtuous man.[16] Lakṣmaṇa then immediately proceeds to the banks of the Sarayū River where, shutting off his senses and his breathing, he enters a profound yogic trance in which, retaining his earthly body, he is transported by Indra to the heavenly realm.[17] There the gods and seers receive and worship him as he becomes once more the fourth part of Viṣnu (viṣṇoś caturbhāgagatam).[18] This seemingly momentous event is quickly passed over by the poet in a scant four verses. There are no snakes coming out of mouths or dramatic entries into the waters here. Nonetheless, it is easy to see, given the close similarity between Lakṣmaṇa's departure from the world and that of Balarāma in the Mausalaparvan of the Mahābhārata, how the two episodes are thematically related, even if their chronological relation is unclear.[19]

But consider how some of the commentators understand the passage. Satyatīrtha (Cs) explains that it is through the grace of Rāma as well as the intensity of Lakṣmaṇa's meditation on Rāma that Lakṣmaṇa's body came to be adorned with an array of one thousand hoods.[20] Satyatīrtha's understanding is evidently that Lakṣmaṇa, like Balarāma, has returned to his original form as the primordial serpent lord, Śeṣa, although there is absolutely no hint of this in Vālmīki's text. Satyatīrtha continues, saying that, after having taken Lakṣmaṇa, who still possessed his earthly body, Indra entered the highest heaven, which lay along his way. In substantiation of this, he quotes the Padmapurāṇa, which states, "Having abandoned his human condition, he took on his previous form."[21] Satyatīrtha further quotes his revered Śrīmat Madhva, who states, "He became Śeṣa, the great-hooded serpent."[22]

As might be expected, the poet's statement that Lakṣmaṇa "had returned to his state as the fourth part of Viṣṇu" provokes considerable analysis on the part of the commentators. The question of the various portions of Viṣṇu represented in the members of his composite incarna-

[19] Biardeau (1999, pp. 1707–8) sees the death of Lakṣmaṇa as parallel not to that of Balarāma but rather to that of Kṛṣṇa himself. One must understand, however, that Biardeau has a rather elaborate theory involving her idea that Rāma serves symbolically in the sacrificial setting as King Soma and that Lakṣmaṇa, through his matronymic epithet Saumitri, which she subjects to a rather original, if not to say highly questionable, etymology, is "the savior of Soma" (Biardeau 1999, pp. 1637, 1707).

tion reignites an earlier theological discussion on the part of the commentators that first emerges in the Bālakāṇḍa. But, interestingly, none of the commentators alludes here to the passages in the Bālakāṇḍa where the portions of Viṣṇu as represented by the sons of Daśaratha are ascribed to the differential apportionment of the pāyasa infused with Viṣṇu's energy that was consumed by their mothers. Nor do they revert to their own earlier debates on the subject.

Mādhava Yogīndra (Ck) explains as follows:

> [The word] caturbhāga means the fourth part. Virāṭ Viṣṇu, who rests upon Śeṣa, in his inherent form, is possessed of four portions through his consisting also of Śeṣa, Suparṇa, and Viṣvaksena. And in his incarnations, as has been previously explained [by Ck], [Viṣṇu] acquired Lakṣmaṇa, who was his portion Śeṣa, belonging to the incarnated Lord Brahmā, through his preeminence. Because of this, as a result of his [Lakṣmaṇa's] eternal connection with the form of the Lord who rests on Śeṣa, that union persists even in the incarnation. It is this meaning that is intended in the Yuddhakāṇḍa, where Suparṇa says, "I am your companion and you will come to know this for yourself." He [Suparṇa] is Bharata.[23]

Nāgeśabhaṭṭa (Ct) quotes a version of Yogīndra as above, including the latter's identifications of the specific portions of Viṣṇu that incarnate as Rāma's brothers. He then notes, however, that Yogīndra's analysis contradicts the version of the Padmapurāṇa.[24] Nāgeśabhaṭṭa says:

> [The word] caturbhāga means the fourth part. In this regard, Yogīndra says: "Virāṭ Viṣṇu, who rests upon Śeṣa, in his inherent form, is possessed of four portions through his consisting also of Śeṣa, Suparṇa, and Viṣvaksena. In regard to this, the portion of Śeṣa is Lakṣmaṇa, the portion of Garuḍa is Bharata, and the portion of Viṣvaksena is Śatrughna." But this contradicts the Padmapurāṇa. For there, it was earlier shown that Bharata and Śatrughna are endowed with the portions of

> [Viṣṇu's] conch and discus [respectively]. And Garuḍa's coming to Rāma's side in his own inherent form is stated in the Yuddhakāṇḍa, and this, too, is in contradiction [with what Yogīndra says].[25]

Govindarāja (Cg), one of the most highly regarded Śrīvaiṣṇava commentators on the epic, offers an explanation that is similar to that of Yogīndra. He makes the same identifications of the portions of Viṣṇu as does Yogīndra, noting only that this is an esoteric doctrine. It is, however, because of this, he continues, that in various purāṇas Lakṣmaṇa is well known as an incarnation of Śeṣa. Thus, he concludes, we are to understand that Viṣṇu Sarveśvara ("Lord of all") divides himself into four divisions consisting of Ananta, Garuḍa, Viṣvaksena, and Viṣṇu.[26]

Śivasahāya (Cr) somewhat elliptically explains:

> The meaning is this: "The four portions of Viṣṇu, the Lord of the Ocean of Milk, constitute the totality of his portions."[27]

In what appears to be a partial critique of Yogīndra (Ck), Satyatīrtha (Cs) approaches the question from two perspectives. One is associated with the Pāñcarātra theology, according to which Viṣṇu multiplies himself not through the familiar avatāras but through his fourfold vyūhas, Vāsudeva, Saṃkarṣaṇa, Pradyumna, and Aniruddha. The other is drawn from the Vaiṣṇava purāṇas. He argues as follows:

> The fourth part has the form of Saṃkarṣaṇa, who has entered into Lakṣmaṇa. Pradyumna and Aniruddha, who have the forms of the discus and conch, are his beloved Bharata and Śatrughna. As it says in the Padmapurāṇa, "Therefore I will be born to you after dividing myself into four parts. I shall be born together with my couch [i.e., Śeṣa], my wife [i.e., Lakṣmī], and my attributes [i.e., the conch and discus]. On the subsequent day, Bharata, who is in essence [the conch] Pāñcajanya, was born to Kaikeyī. Somewhat later, Lakṣmaṇa, who was in essence [the serpent] Ananta, was born to Sumitrā. And, my dear, so was Śatrughna, who was in essence [the discus] Sudarśana. The [last] two were born at the same time. And so both Bharata and Śatru-

The departure of Rāma himself is a grander and more elaborate affair described in the two closing sargas of the kāṇḍa and thus of the poem. In the first of these we learn that, after having settled his worldly, political affairs, and having granted permission to his brothers, allies, friends, courtiers, and subjects, with the exception only of Hanumān and Vibhīṣaṇa,[29] to follow him into the next world, Rāma leads a grand and solemn ritual procession from Ayodhyā to the Gopratāra tīrtha on the banks of the Sarayū River. The ritual in question is the "rite of departure for the next world (mahāprasthānika vidhi)." One is, of course, reminded of the penultimate book of the Mahābhārata, the Mahāprasthānikaparvan, in which the five Pāṇḍava brothers, themselves amśāvatāras of various Vedic gods, together with their joint wife, Draupadī, begin their last, dismal trek from this world to the next.[30] Rāma's actual departure for the next world is described in the epic's closing sarga. As one might have expected after seeing how the commentators deal with the death of Lakṣmaṇa, Rāma's departure becomes the object of considerable theological discussion and debate.

One element in the complexity and length of the extended exegeses of the commentators is the lack of specificity on the part of the poet in describing what actually happens when Rāma leaves his human body and in the identification of the state or place he enters once he has done so. The scholiasts also disagree as before on the nature and destiny of Rāma's brothers and of his other followers and devotees. The discussions are extensive and often complex, and we have discussed them in some detail in our annotation.[31] However, the commentators' observations constitute an early and important window into the development of the Rāmāyaṇa and Rāma as critical elements in the rise of the Vaiṣṇava saṃpradāyas in both North and South India. These observations also provide insight into the theological argumentation that, as in the case of the Kṛṣṇaite saṃpradāyas, attempts to create integrated mythological, theological, and philosophical structures spanning all genres of texts from the vedas to the purāṇas. We will therefore try at least to touch upon some of the major issues and interpretations put forward by the various commentators in support of their respective philosophical and sectarian positions.

The exegetical difficulties that underlie the seemingly straightforward narration of the short final sarga of the critical edition first appear in its sixth verse. Arriving at the bank of the Sarayū River, Rāma is greeted by the creator divinity, Brahmā, who is accompanied by the hosts of the gods and celestial seers. Brahmā addresses him saying, "Come, Viṣṇu, bless you. Fortunately you have come, Rāghava." But to what, precisely, do the names Viṣṇu and Rāghava refer here? And where is it that Brahmā is asking Rāma to come to? Yogīndra (Ck), who, it must be noted, unusually enough, is a devotee of Brahmā to which the deity Viṣṇu, in his view, is to be subordinated, understands Brahmā to be addressing Rāma as Viṣṇu, Rāghava, and himelf [Brahmā]. He glosses:

> O Viṣṇu! O you who took on a [bodily] transformation of Viṣṇu to favor the world! O Brahmā! O Rāghava! Fortunately you have come this day, that is to say, you have come at the time for the release from the embodiment consisting of the calamities and sufferings of humans, which [bodily] transformation you took through your celestial yoga. Blessings be to you, that is, let there be auspiciousness. Please come this very day to the Brahmaloka.[32]

Nāgeśabhaṭṭa (Ct), as he often does, largely repeats or paraphrases Yogīndra's comments but appears here to draw the line at agreeing that Rāma is being called back to the Brahmaloka. He evades, for the moment at least, the question of where Rāma, as Viṣṇu, will go, saying merely, "The meaning is [please come] to that world from whence you came to the world of men."[33] Satyatīrtha, again citing his beloved Padmapurāṇa, believes that Rāma is simply being invited to take recourse to the highest abode (paraṃ dhāma samāśrayeti pādmokteḥ) without attempting to specify what or where that might be.

The following verse, number seven, only seems to make the issue murkier still. Brahmā continues:

> "Please, O Lord of immense blazing energy, return with your godlike brothers to your own essential Vaiṣṇava form, which is the eternal Brahman."[34]

The commentators, after a series of complex arguments centering on the use of the plural form "brothers (bhrātṛbhiḥ)," focus on the crux of the verse, that is, the phrase "your own essential Vaiṣṇava form (svakāṃ tanum/ vaiṣṇavīm)," which would literally be rendered as, "your own Vaiṣṇava body." Not surprisingly, the commentators disagree sharply as to how to interpret the term tanu, "body or form." Varadarāja (Cv), the earliest known commentator on the poem, understands the term to refer to the abode of Viṣṇu either in his familiar iconic, four-armed (aupendra) form or as Padmanābha, the form from whose navel the lotus containing the Creator Brahmā emerges at the beginning of a cosmic age.[35] Yogīndra (Ck) takes the phrase as the starting point for a lengthy discussion of what he sees as the successive transformations of Rāma and his brothers through various stages and forms up to the highest state, which is that of Brahman. He supports his notion of transformations with a series of quotes from various vedic sources. He glosses, "You must enter your own form, that is to say, that form that belongs to Brahman and consists of pure knowledge"[36] Govindarāja (Cg), raising again the sectarian problem of the residual forms of Rāma and his brothers, takes a completely different approach. He understands the term tanu to apply collectively to the separate forms that the four ascended brothers, Rāma, Lakṣmaṇa, Bharata, and Śatrughna, will assume, respectively, in heaven. As before, for him, Rāma will be Viṣṇu; Lakṣmaṇa, the great serpent Śeṣa; Bharata, the lord of birds, Garuḍa; and Śatrughna, the rather obscure figure Viṣvaksena.[37] Nāgeśabhaṭṭa (Ct) understands the term "body" metaphorically to refer to Viṣṇu's proper abode, which is as extremely dear to him as his own body,[38] while Śivasahāya (Cr), as elsewhere, takes the phrase to refer to Viṣṇu's eternal abode, the heavenly city of Sāketa. The commentators similarly disagree as to the sense of the phrase tad ākāśaṃ sanātanam, which we have translated, in agreement with Nāgeśabhaṭṭa, as "the eternal Brahman." Other glosses are "pure spiritual liberation" kaivalyam (so Varadarāja) and "Vaikuṇṭha, or the highest heaven" (so Govindarāja).

In the ninth verse, Brahmā further problematizes the issue by asking Rāma to enter of his own accord whichever form (lit., "body") he wishes (yām icchasi mahātejas tāṃ tanuṃ praviśa svayam), and in the tenth verse, Rāma, at last and together with his younger brothers, bodily enters the blazing energy proper to Viṣṇu (viveśa vaiṣṇavaṃ tejaḥ saśarīraḥ sahānujaḥ). As before with the phrase svakāṃ tanum/ vaiṣṇavīm, the commentators engage in various, and sometimes protracted, technical discussions as to the theology of the transformation of Rāma. Yogīndra (Ck), citing Taittirīyasaṃhitā 1.7.4, where it is stated that the vedic sacrifice indeed is Viṣṇu (yajño vai viṣṇuḥ), understands the term tejaḥ, "blazing energy," here to be that which takes the form of the sacrificial fire.[39] He argues that what this really means is that Rāma, in bodily form, like a yogin engaged in the sacrifice to Brahman, entered the sacrificial fire.[40] Nāgeśabhaṭṭa (Ct), in a similar vein, explains: "He entered the blazing energy of Viṣṇu, that is to say, the form of [the embodied four-armed Viṣṇu] Upendra, which consists of blazing energy like that of the sacrificial flame."[41] By this, Nāgeśabhaṭṭa claims, it is suggested that Viṣṇu's body, which in fact consists of pure blazing energy, through divine illusion (māyā) was taken to be an actual human body by those possessed of [actual] human and other bodies.[42] Śivasahāya (Cr) understands the phrase to refer to Viṣṇu's heavenly realm Vaikuṇṭha, which consists of the blazing energy that is connected with Viṣṇu.[43]

Finally, then, in whatever form and to whatever specific location each of the commentators envisions, Rāma ascends. Then, just as in the case of the end of the Kṛṣṇāvatāra noted above, Viṣṇu is joyfully welcomed back by the heavenly hosts.

> Then, once he had returned to his form as Viṣṇu, the divinities—including the sādhyas, the hosts of the Maruts together with Indra, led by Agni, and accompanied by the celestial hosts of seers, the gan-

Then Viṣṇu of immense blazing energy said to Grandfather Brahmā . . . [44]

But, not wholly unexpectedly, even the seemingly simple proper noun Viṣṇu in this passage cannot pass the scrutiny of the commentators unanalyzed and unscathed, as it were. Because of the confusing issue of the various transformations posited of Viṣṇu by the commentators, several of them feel called upon to parse the name itself. On verse 11, Nāgeśabhaṭṭa (Ct), glossing the variant viṣṇumayam, explains, "that God, consisting of Viṣṇu, who had attained non-difference with respect to Upendra,"[45] while at verse 14, he clarifies, "[The name] 'Viṣṇu' refers to Rāma of immense blazing energy whose body has transformed into the body of Viṣṇu."[46] Govindarāja (Cg), commenting on verse 14, similarly glosses, "Viṣṇu, that is, Rāma, who has attained the state of Viṣṇu."[47] But Śivasahāya (Cr), in keeping with his own unique reading of this entire passage, explains the compound viṣṇumayam in verses 11–12 to mean "Rāma, the God eternally endowed with play, reached the close proximity of Viṣṇu, who was a fragment of Bharata, who also consisted of Viṣṇu,"[48] and in his comments on verse 14, he offers, "Viṣṇu, that is to say, is Bharata (viṣṇur bharataḥ)." [49] Yogīndra (Ck), hewing to his Brahmā-oriented theology, glosses, "[The name] 'Viṣṇu,' [refers to] the Lord Hiraṇyagarbha, who has transformed into the body of Viṣṇu, and who is of immense blazing energy and consists chiefly of consciousness and light."[50] Satyatīrtha, in his comments to verse 14, glosses, "Viṣṇu, who had concealed within himself the body of the leader of the Raghus (Rāma)."[51]

Unlike the account of Kṛṣṇa's ascension, however, this is not the end of the story. And it is precisely here that we see the opening out of these epic and purāṇic narratives into the burgeoning and diversifying world of bhakti devotionalism with its doctrines of the extension of the salvific effects of devotion even to the lowest of creatures. One must keep in mind here the fact that, according to the Uttarakāṇḍa's narrative, Rāma does not ascend to the heavens alone or even in the exclusive company of his three co-incarnations, his brothers. On the contrary, he is accompanied in his departure from the mortal world by the majority of his monkey and rākṣasa allies, the entire human population of Ayodhyā, and even its animals. A majority of the manuscript traditions actually include a passage according to which even the normally immobile and inanimate objects in the city follow Rāma as well.[52]

Nāgeśabhaṭṭa (Ct), alone among the commentators, bravely attempts to explain how insentient and immobile objects are able to follow Rāma. He says, "The following on the part of immobile objects is made possible through the arising [in them] at that moment of the capacity of consciousness and action through the compassionate gaze of Lord Rāma."[53] So, in keeping with the critical element in popular bhakti traditions that holds that the Lord takes care to ensure the salvation of even the least among his devotees, we see that once Rāma has returned to his primordial state as Viṣṇu, his very first thought is to request the following of Brahmā:

> "Please, O Lord of firm vows, grant heavenly worlds to all of these hosts of people.
> "For all these resolute devotees, who have abandoned their bodies for my sake, have followed me out of love and are therefore worthy of my devotion."[54]

Brahmā replies in the following interesting words, which bring the great epic to its close.

> When Lord Brahmā, patriarch of the world, had heard those words of Viṣṇu, he said: "All these who have accompanied you shall go to the worlds known as the Sāntānikas.
> "Even an animal that abandons its life breaths while thinking upon Rāma with devotion shall surely also dwell in Santāna, which is endowed with every virtue and is just next to the Brahmaloka.

This move toward the inclusivity, the democratization, if you will, of the Lord's saving grace is not, however, without its own difficulties, especially from the more hierarchically oriented commentators. Several of them, including Nāgeśabhaṭṭa (Ct) and Yogīndra (Ck), express concerns as to why Rāma has urged Brahmā to elevate to the loftiest of realms, the Brahmaloka, people and other creatures who would not normally be considered worthy of such a destination. Govindarāja (Cg), not one to mince words, notes that these verses respond to the question: "How can these people who are utterly devoid of knowledge of Brahman reach the Brahmaloka?"[56]

Rāma's rationale for the salvation of his followers is that they were so devoted that they gave their lives for his sake (tyāktātmānaś ca matkṛte). In part this refers, as noted by Yogīndra, to the monkeys who followed Viṣṇu in his incarnation as Rāma and sacrificed their lives in battle on the killing fields of Laṅkā. But others read the phrase differently. Nāgeśabhaṭṭa (Ct) glosses, "They have abandoned their bodies for my sake because of their inability to endure separation from me,"[57] while Śivasahāya (Cr) understands, "For my sake they abandoned their worldly activities."[58]

The tension between the exclusivist varṇāśramadharma perspective and that of the inclusivist bhakti movement is resolved here in an interesting way. According to Brahmā's declaration, despite Rāma's request and their professed inability to endure separation from the Lord, Rāma's, devoted followers, human, animal, and inanimate, do not, in fact, seem to accompany him to his highest abode, however that might be identified according to the different commentators.

Instead, most of them are elevated to the celestial regions known as Santāna or the Sāntānikas, which, as Brahmā describes it or them, is or are "just next to the Brahmaloka." Rāma's faithful allies the vānaras, who were fathered on female monkeys by the gods and various other heavenly beings, will, we learn, return to merge with the various beings of whom they are aṃśas, or portions. The phrase "just next to the Brahmaloka (brahmalokād anantare)" is particularly provocative to the commentators. For them the critical issue is exactly where the Sāntānikas are in relation to the highest heaven, Viṣṇu's abode. For Yogīndra (Ck), the term here refers to the four subordinate divisions of the Brahmaloka, which surround the pradhāna, or principal realm, of that world. The pradhāna is the only realm in which liberated souls attain sāyujya, or complete intimate union or identification with the Lord.[59] Govindarāja (Cg) envisions a place that is contiguous with, but somehow above, the Brahmaloka.[60] Nāgeśabhaṭṭa (Ct) understands the spatial proximity of Santānaka to the Brahmaloka to be suggestive of the fact that the inhabitants of the former will, in the due course of time, experience total liberation together with Brahmā.[61] In other words, for Nāgeśabhaṭṭa these realms are a kind of proving ground or waiting area for entry into the Brahmaloka and the enjoyment of full liberation. Śivasahāya (Cr), however, believes that the Santānas are to be found in Sāketa, which is situated in close proximity to the Brahmaloka, that is to say, to the Goloka, which is the eternal heavenly world of Kṛṣṇa and the cowherds.[62] In this he participates in a significant trend in medieval and later North Indian Vaiṣṇava theology toward the "Kṛṣṇification" of Rāmaite devotionalism, which reaches its apogee perhaps in the doctrine of esoteric texts such as the Bhuśuṇḍi Rāmāyaṇa and the practice of such groups as the Rasik Sādhus of Ayodhyā. Here Rāma and Sītā's courtly Sāketa with its Pramadāvana is constructed as a parallel to Kṛṣṇa and Rādhā's eternal, rustic Goloka and its ever-vernal Vṛṇḍāvana.[63]

Thus, the closing chapters of the Uttarakāṇḍa, with their account of the ending of Rāma's avatāra, or earthly sojourn, Lord Viṣṇu's excarnation, as it were, provide the stimulus for a far more sophisticated theological debate among the poem's commentators, representatives of various Vaiṣṇava and other saṃpradāyas, than did the account of the Lord's incarnation in the Bālakāṇḍa or, indeed, than the parallel events in the career of Śrī Kṛṣṇa as depicted in the Mahābhārata and subsequent purāṇic texts. And in this account and the commentaries on it, we see an early example of the inclusive tendency in Vaiṣṇava bhakti traditions according to which all true devotees of the Lord, regardless of their social station, will attain union with or proximity to Him at the end of their lives on earth. What, finally, are we to make of the closing chapters of the closing book of the great epic narrative of Vālmīki? For one thing, however we may reconstruct the genetic history of the monumental poem and understand its ascription to a single legendary poet-seer, this book and these chapters are almost certainly not of a piece—chronologically, stylistically, thematically, or theologically—with what we understand to be the core of the work. We have discussed a number of these aspects of the Uttarakāṇḍa elsewhere, but we have tried here to focus on the somewhat ambiguous but nonetheless interesting and significant theology of the Uttarakāṇḍa's closing chapters and the complex and conflicting interpretations it provoked on the part of the work's largely Śrīvaiṣṇava commentators who, collectively, represent the earliest receptive and interpretive community whose thinking is accessible to us today.

As obscure and esoteric as their commentaries may seem to us today, and as inaccessible as some of them may now be, there can be little doubt that each of them was, at least at one time, an influential voice for the members of one of a number of particular interpretive communities, such as Śrīvaiṣṇavism and the saṃpradāya of Madhvācārya. Some of these traditions, like Yogīndra's apparent Brahmaism, may not have survived into modernity. In any case, a comparative analysis of the different commentators and their varying "schools," as it were, provides us with a sense of how the various saṃpradāyas and subschools of the medieval Rāmaite form of Vaiṣṇava devotionalism, North and South, may have originated. It also shows us how these commentators derived their ideologies, not only from Sanskrit works such as purāṇic versions of the Rāma story, the Adhyātmarāmāyaṇa, and the Ānandarāmāyaṇa but also perhaps from the major vernacular versions of the Rāmakathā, such as the popular and massively influential Rāmcaritmānas of Tulsīdās.

11. The Rāmāyaṇa and the Gāyatrīmantra

As we have been observing in our annotations throughout the previous volumes of this translation, there is a well-established tradition among some of the epic's receptive communities that the text of the poem is both physically and spiritually a grand expansion and exposition of the famous and widely revered and recited ṛc, Ṛgveda 3.62.10,[1] invoking the solar divinity Savitṛ. This mantra is popularly known as both the Gāyatrīmantra, after the vedic meter in which it is composed, and the Sāvitrīmantra, for the divinity who is invoked in it. The stanza is recited each morning to this day as a religious duty by millions of Hindus and, in graphic form and commercial musical recordings, has become part of the popular culture of modern India. The gāyatrī meter consists of three pādas, or metrical quarters, of eight syllables each, for a total of twenty-four syllables.[2]

According to the tradition mentioned above and exemplified in the Rāmāyaṇa commentaries, principally in those of Maheśvaratīrtha (Cm) and Govindarāja (Cg), the syllables of the mantra are spaced out in the epic poem in their proper order before each one thousand of the work's traditionally enumerated twenty-four thousand ślokas. Thus, it is characteristic of Govindarāja (Cg) to note in his comments to the work that a specific syllable in the verse he is addressing is the corresponding syllable of the Gāyatrīmantra, and we have noted this in our annotation. In addition, Govindarāja (Cg) several times observes that a verse containing a syllable of the mantra marks the first verse of a succeeding group of a thousand ślokas. Thus, for example, in his commentary on critical

[1] Reverence for the gāyatrī meter and, in all likelihood, the mantra, which came to be known by its name, is quite old. In the Bhagavadgītā's long list of Kṛṣṇa's vibhūtis, or God's divine manifestations as the principal member of every class of beings (BhagGī 10.20–39), he identifies himself as the gāyatrī among the vedic meters (gāyatrī chandasām aham—BhagGī 10.35). Similarly, the Manusmṛti identifies the mantra as the most excellent of all (sāvitryās tu paraṃ nāsti—ManuSm 2.83). Many manuscripts collated for the critical edition of the Harivaṃśa include a passage that regards the gāyatrī to be the "mother of the vedas," first created by Brahmā, who then created the four vedas that arose from it (tato 'srjad vai tripadāṃ gāyatrīṃ vedamātaram / akaroc caiva caturo vedān gāyatrisaṃbhavān // HariVaṃ, App. I, No. 41, lines 487–488).

[2] Actually, the first of the mantra's three pādas, or metrical quarters, as it is recited, is hypometric, having only seven syllables. However, as a metrical reconstruction of the verse shows, the seventh syllable of the pāda, "-ṇya," should be reconstructed as two syllables, "-ṇi-" and "-a-." See van Nooten and Holland 1994, pp. iii and 169.

edition 5.25.14 (= GPP and KK 5.17.14), he observes, "Twelve thousand verses have been completed. This verse, which should be understood as [containing] the thirteenth syllable of the Gāyatrī, is the first verse of the thirteenth group of one thousand [verses]."[3]

This way of marking the location of the syllables of the mantra follows from the identification by Maheśvaratīrtha (Cm) and Govindarāja (Cg) and the esoteric tradition they are expounding of viewing the Vālmīki Rāmāyaṇa as an expansion and exposition, a vivaraṇam as Govinda puts it, of the sacred stanza. Ideally, then, the mantra and the kāvya should be coterminous, beginning and ending with the same syllables, respectively.[4] However, Govindarāja (Cg) appears to make an exception to this principle at the end of the epic by locating the mantra's final syllable in what he apparently takes to be the closing verse of the poem. This would seem to leave a gap of two thousand verses between the mantra's final and penultimate syllables.[5] In any case, there is no disagreement among the commentators as to the identification of the mantra's opening syllable, as all sources agree that this syllable of the vedic text, ta(t savitur vareṇyam . . .), is the same as that of the poem, which, in all recensions, begins ta(paḥsvādhyāyaniratam).

This system of syllabic enumeration, which serves to further invest ṛṣi Vālmīki's poem with the status, sanctity, and authority of the vedas, seems at first glance to be a rather simple and elegant one. Indeed, it is easy to follow the syllables as they are mentioned and numbered by the commentators and to track them from the beginning of the poem, along with those of the vedic hymn. But when we come to the end of the great epic in the Uttarakāṇḍa, it appears that this straightforward scheme becomes somewhat problematic.[6]

[4] For an elaborate discussion of this tradition and an examination of the distribution and location of the syllables of the Gāyatrī across the various recensions of the poem, see B. N. Bhatt 1976. Another, much less elaborate discussion of the Gāyatrī in, or as, the Rāmāyaṇa is to be found in K. S. Ramaswami Sastri's Studies in Ramayana in his section entitled "The Riddle of the Gayatri Ramayana" (1944, book 1, p. 18) and his appendix 3, "Gayatri Ramayana—One Version" (1944, pp. 197–201).

[5] See note 14 below.

[6] Of course, the actual identification of syllables other than the first is made problematic by the considerable textual variation of the Rāmāyaṇa across its numerous recensions and subrecensions. This can be easily seen by consulting B. N. Bhatt 1976. Compare also Ramaswami Sastri 1944, pp. 197–201, where he provides two alternative lists of the Rāmāyaṇa verses that are said to contain, respectively, the syllables of the Gāyatrī. Ramaswami Sastri's second alternative, "Another Version" (pp. 199–201), corresponds to the list given in VSP (vol. 3, final pages 1–2, following p. 1308).

An example of this method of counting and identifying the syllables can be found in a list provided by the anonomyous editor of the 1934–1935 Veṅkateśvara Steam Press edition (VSP) of the Vālmīki Rāmāyaṇa, which follows the text of Govindarāja (Cg), who is, as noted above, one of the principal exponents of the Rāmāyaṇa as Gāyatrī schema. In introducing the table of correspondences, the editor states the following in Sanskrit:

> In this [poem] the great seer Śrī Vālmīki has placed, in proper sequence, the twenty-four syllables of the Gāyatrī, one by one, in the first verse of each of the groups of one thousand verses in the Śrīrāmāyaṇa, which contains twenty-four thousand verses. Here are listed the twenty-four verses that are marked by the syllables of the Gāyatrī.[7]

This is a neat and simple schema. Following it, the editors of the VSP locate the syllable "-yā[t]," the last syllable of the mantra, in the poem's verse 7.67.10 (critical edition), which occurs, depending on the edition, some thirty chapters before the end of the poem. In other words, this reading leaves several hundred and perhaps nearly a thousand verses of the epic, according to the traditional count, without any syllable of the sacred mantra. So, according to this system of counting, the poet runs out of syllables of the Gāyatrī well before the end of his poem. Therefore, although the epic poem and the vedic mantra of which it is an expansion begin together, they end at different points, thus undermining the idea of a perfect mapping of one text onto the other.

But the VSP schema[8] is not, in fact, exactly the same as the one followed by Maheśvaratīrtha (Cm) and Govindarāja (Cg).[9] It is evident that

[7] iha tāvac caturviṃśatisahasraśloke śrīrāmāyaṇa ekaikasyāḥ sahasraślokyā ādimaśloka ekaikam akṣaram iti krameṇa gāyatryāś caturviṃśaty akṣarāṇi śrīvālmīkimaharṣiṇā vinyastāni. ta ime gāyatryakṣarāṅkitāś caturviṃśatiślokā likhyate. (We have restored the proper sandhi.)

[8] B. N. Bhatt (1976), who also follows the tradition of Maheśvaratīrtha (Cm) and Govindarāja (Cg) for the southern recension, gives a chart for that recension that is the same as the VSP's. But he, too, appears not to notice Govinda's (Cg's) shift of the last syllable as discussed below. Ramaswami Sastri (1944, book 1, p. 18) remarks that "Anyhow the first letter of the Gayatri is the first letter of the poem also. The other letters are found after every 1,000 verses, though not always in the thousand and one verse or as the first letter of a verse." This is what Govindarāja (Cg) actually seems to do although it is out of keeping with his statement that the syllables mark the beginnings of the groups of a thousand verses.

[9] Govinda's (Cg's) schema is recorded in his comments on 1.1.1 in VSP, vol. 1, p. 9. Maheśvara's (Cm's) similar comments in his commentary on that verse are on pp. 5–7 of the same volume.

the latter, who never fails to note the occurrence of a syllable of the Gāyatrī, was committed to a schema in which both the poem and the hymn were coterminous. Govindarāja (Cg), apparently followed by the editor of the VSP, understands that the verses of the Gāyatrī, starting with the first, are to be seen as each marking the beginning of a set of one thousand ślokas. He says:

> In keeping with the enumeration of the Śrīrāmāyaṇa, which was undertaken according to the numbering of the syllables of the Gāyatrī, and according to the count of twenty-four thousand verses, the syllable ta had to be used at the commencement of the first group of a thousand [verses]. And thus [we see] the usage of the word tapaḥ [to begin the poem] even though there are other words that express the highest truth [brahman].[10]

As a result, in Govindarāja's (Cg's) and the VSP's schema, in which the syllables of the Gāyatrī begin the epic's sets of a thousand verses, the ordinal number of the Gāyatrī syllable is, in all cases other than the first, one integer higher than the corresponding number of the set of a thousand verses. Given this, if one wants to perfectly bracket Vālmīki's poem with the first and last syllables of the Gāyatrī, it is clear that one will either end up, as in the VSP version, with a thousand final verses unmarked by the Gāyatrī or require an imagined twenty-fifth syllable of the latter to mark the end of the twenty-fourth set of a thousand verses and thus the end of the epic poem itself.

This problem goes seemingly unnoticed by the commentators throughout the great mass of the epic text. But a final reckoning of the problem has to be made as one approaches the end of the poem. It is interesting to see how Govindarāja (Cg) negotiates the problem. His account of the syllables of the mantra is almost entirely identical with, and is no doubt the source of, the list given in VSP. As noted above, it is Govindarāja's (Cg's) practice throughout the bulk of his extensive commentary to identify the Gāyatrī syllables as they occur in the Rāmāyaṇa text and to give their respective sequential numbers as well as—but with less regularity—the numbers of the sets of a thousand verses preceding each of these syllables. He does so fairly regularly up to and including the first verse of the Uttarakāṇḍa (7.1.1) in which he marks the syllable pra- in the word pratinanditum as the twenty-first syllable of the Gāyatrī (the [10] Govindarāja (Cg) on 1.1.1: asya śrīrāmāyaṇasya gāyatryakṣarasaṃkhyānusāreṇa caturviṃśatisahasragranthasaṅkhyayā pravṛttatvāt prathamasahasropakrame takāraḥ prayoktavya iti satsv api brahmavācakeṣu śabdāntareṣu tapaḥśabdasyaiva prayogaḥ. Cg goes on to list a number of the benefits of using the syllable "ta-" (first) in literary works.

"pra-"of pracodayāt).[11] He does not, however, mention the number of the now-concluded thousand verses here, nor does he for the remainder of the poem.

Govindarāja (Cg) does not give a number for the next syllable of the mantra, -co-, which occurs in the word pracodayan in his variant reading to line 1 of 423* following 7.22.6 of the critical edition,[12] but this is the twenty-second syllable of the mantra. He similarly refrains from numbering the next syllable, the syllable "-da" in the word pramumoda of verse 7.40.1. This corresponds to the twenty-third syllable of the mantra, where it follows -co- in the form pracodayāt. On these verses he simply notes, respectively, "Here -co- is [from] the Gāyatrī," and "Here the syllable "-da" in the word pramumoda is a syllable of the Gāyatrī."[13] But here is where Govinda's numbering schema begins to become problematic and to depart from the one given in VSP. He next notes that the syllable "-yā[t]," as found in the word tvayā in verse 7.67.10, is said (by others) to be the twenty-fourth syllable of the Gāyatrī.[14] In ascribing this identification to "others," Govinda (Cg) is indicating that he does not accept it. Govindarāja's (Cg's) rejection of the occurrence of this syllable "-yā[t]" in 7.67.10 as representing the twenty-fourth and final akṣara of the Gāyatrī is, we believe, based on the issue mentioned above. Accepting this identification would leave the final thousand verses of the poem without a syllable of the mantra.

In his effort to place the twenty-fourth and final syllable of the mantra in a corresponding final śloka of the Rāmāyaṇa, Govindarāja (Cg) locates the critical syllable in a verse that belongs properly to the phalaśruti of the poem, one that was very probably the last, or at least one of the very last, verses of his particular text. This verse, relegated to the critical apparatus by the editors of the critical edition as 1539* following 7.100.26, the final verse of the critically reconstructed text, appears as KK 7.111.11, while its second half is numbered as GPP 7.111.11cd and VSP 7.111.10cd. In it we find the verbal form amanyata, the penultimate syllable of which

[12] The critical reading here is saṃcodayan. This is the first half of 7.22.7 in GPP and 7.22.8 in KK and VSP.

[13] Govindarāja (Cg) on 423*, following 7.22.6 (= KK 7.22.8): atra co iti gāyatrī; Govindarāja (Cg) on 7.40.1 (= 7.41.1 GPP): atra pramumodeti dakāro gāyatryakṣaram.

[14] Govindarāja (Cg) on 7.67.10 as represented in GPP and KK: atra tvayety atra yeti gāyatryakṣaraṃ trayoviṃśam ity āhuḥ. However Cg's comment as it is rendered in the VSP edition has him attributing the numbering of this syllable as the Gāyatrī's twenty-fourth to other, unnamed scholars (atra tvayety atra yeti gāyatryakṣaraṃ caturviṃśam ity āhuḥ). Whatever the source of the discrepancy among the editions, it is clear to us that the editor of VSP is quoting Cg correctly. For by no stretch of the imagination could anyone regard "-yā[t]" as the twenty-third syllable of the Gāyatrī.

is "-ya-." It is this that Govindarāja (Cg) takes to be the final syllable of the Gāyatrī. This, according to him, places the final syllable of the mantra in the final verse of the poem. He then once again affirms that the Rāmāyaṇa is indeed an expansion of the sacred mantra.[15] This identification on Govinda's (Cg's) part is slightly problematic in that he is taking the laghu, or prosodically light syllable "-ya-," to stand for the Gāyatrī's guru, or prosodically heavy syllable "-yā[t]." In this way, the identification is at variance with that of the preceding twenty-three Gāyatrī syllables of the poem, all of which share the same vowel length and prosodic weight as their corresponding syllables in the mantra itself. Nonetheless, we believe that Govinda (Cg) was willing to make this small sacrifice because of two virtues of his identification of 1539* that are lacking in 7.67.10.[16] First, as noted above, the selection of the former makes the initial and final syllables of the Gāyatrī correspond to the initial and final verses of the epic, thus better justifying Govinda's (Cg's) claim that the Rāmāyaṇa is a perfectly formed expansion of the mantra. Second, the content of the verse chosen by Govinda (Cg) truly marks the closure of the narration of the poem in the most auspicious terms possible. It reads:

> The son of Pracetas [Vālmīki] composed this tale that confers long life, together with its epilogue and its account of what was yet to come, and Brahmā himself approved of it.[17]

[15] Govindarājā (Cg) on VSP 7.11.10: atra yakāro gāyatryakṣaram. tena gāyatrīvivaraṇaṃ rāmāyaṇam iti sūcitam. This final sentence is found in the commentary of Cg only in GPP and VSP, not in KK.

[16] Another compromise would be with the schema of placing a Gāyatrī syllable at the beginning of each set of a thousand ślokas. By placing the twenty-fourth syllable in 1539* it would appear that Cg has silently accepted a gap of some two thousand verses between syllables twenty-three and twenty-four.

> etad ākhyānam āyuṣyaṃ sabhaviṣyaṃ sahottaram /
> vyadhāt pracetasaḥ putras tad brahmāpy anvamanyata //

(= KK 7.111.11, VSP 7.111.10 both with hypermetric kṛtavān for vyadhāt). Govindarāja's (Cg's) closing comment on the final pāda of the verse, his summation, as it were, of his entire commentary on the Rāmāyaṇa is as follows: "Even Brahmā—the word 'even (api),' is used in the sense of primacy here—approved, that is to say, accepted, the Rāmāyaṇa. That is to say, he recited it constantly. The syllable '-ya-' in this verse is a syllable of the Gāyatrī. And this suggests that this is an exposition of the Rāmāyaṇa. (tad rāmāyaṇaṃ brahmāpy anvamanyata. apiḥ prādhānye. anvamanyatāṅgīkṛtavān. sadā paṭhati smety arthaḥ. atra yakāro gāyatryakṣaram. tena gāyatrīvivaraṇaṃ rāmāyaṇam iti sūcitam.)"

Finally, it is to be noted that the idea that the Rāmāyaṇa is, in fact, the expansion and exposition of the Gāyatrīmantra comes to be included in the southern recension's version of the poem's phalaśruti. There we find the half verse:

> And this unsurpassed Rāmāyaṇa is the very essence (svarūpa) of the Gāyatrī[mantra].[18]

The origin of this idea is, of course, a matter of speculation. Ramaswami Sastri quotes this half verse, identifying it as belonging to the poem's last sarga and suggesting that it may have sparked the theory.[19] But the verse is clearly part of a southern phalaśruti and is more likely to be a late product of the theory than its actual origin.

> gāyatryāś ca svarūpaṃ tad rāmāyaṇam anuttamam /

[19] Ramaswami Sastri (1944, book 1, p. 18) also refers to a "famous verse" in which it is said that the veda took the form of the Rāmāyaṇa when God incarnated as Rāma. He does not, however, identify the verse.

[20] As written in the saṃhitā text and as recited, pāda a has only seven syllables so that the entire mantra has in fact twenty-three syllables. The Rāmāyaṇa commentators, however, clearly understand the term váreṇyaṃ to be read as four syllables váreṇiyaṃ, as in the van Nooten and Holland metrical reconstruction.

12. The Text, Commentaries, and Translations of the Uttarakāṇḍa

THE TEXT

Our objective over the course of this project has been to translate the critical edition of the Vālmīki Rāmāyaṇa, published by the Oriental Institute, Baroda, between 1960 and 1975. While a thorough discussion of the critical edition has been given in our general introduction to the Bālakāṇḍa and need not be repeated here,[1] the nature and complexity of the Uttarakāṇḍa and U. P. Shah's editing of this book necessitates that we revisit the issue, specifically focusing on concerns that are unique to the last book of Vālmīki's great masterpiece.

G. H. Bhatt, the general editor of the critical edition and the principal editor of the first book, the Bālakāṇḍa, was heavily influenced by V. S. Sukthankar's work and based his principles of critical reconstruction of the Vālmīki Rāmāyaṇa on those established by Sukthankar for the Mahābhārata.[2] Sukthankar, originally trained as a mathematician at St. John's College, Cambridge (1903–1906), found his way to the University of Berlin, where between 1911 and 1914, he worked under the supervision of Heinrich Lüders. Both Sukthankar and Lüders were heavily influenced and inspired by the work of Moriz Winternitz, especially in the methodology of preparing critical editions.[3] Sukthankar brought his training in text reconstruction with him when, in 1925, he became the general editor of the critical edition of the Mahābhārata, a project that was being carried out at the Bhandarkar Oriental Research Institute, Poona, and eventually published in nineteen volumes (1933–1966). From the beginning Sukthankar recognized the difficulties in the reconstruction of the epic text.

While Sukthankar based his reconstruction on the classical philological model,[4] he cautioned his readers concerning the difficulties confronting the creation of a critical edition of the great epic. For, as he noted, the reconstruction of a critical edition like those found in the classical tradition (i.e., the Greek and Roman corpus) presupposes both the possibility of assembling all possible versions of a text as well as the presumptive existence of one original written archetype.[5] Neither of these is possible for the Indian epics. Moreover, Sukthankar warned his audience:

> Our first thought would be to attempt to explain the additions or omissions as the result of conscious editorial revision, or of clerical error, or partly of one and partly of the other. But the frequent differences in sequence, especially when no material gain is perceptible in either arrangement, rather support the explanation . . . that both recensions are, in final analysis, "independent copies of an orally transmitted text."[6]

With this caution, Sukthankar concluded that very likely a "true" reading, especially if it is a lectio difficilior, or an archaic form, could well be one that is poorly attested, perhaps occurring only in one or two manuscripts.

Following the lead of the Bhandarkar Oriental Research Institute, the Oriental Institute, M. S. University of Baroda, took up the creation of a critical edition of the Vālmīki Rāmāyaṇa in 1951 and G. H. Bhatt became its first general editor. Upon his demise in 1965, U. P. Shah succeeded him as general editor. At that time, the first four volumes of the epic (Bāla, Ayodhyā, Araṇya, and Kiṣkindhā) had been published, while volume 5, the Sundarakāṇḍa (1966), and the first part of volume 6, the Yuddhakāṇḍa (1971), were in press.[7] The Uttarakāṇḍa, on which the editing had begun, had not yet reached production stage.

Bhatt was responsible for setting and maintaining the critical principles of the edition, and for the first six volumes his influence was substantial. In his introduction to the Bālakāṇḍa, he clearly laid out his principles for the text reconstruction that had been and were to be employed in the production of the critical edition, giving due credit to Sukthankar for them.[8] Before articulating the seven specific principles that had been followed, Bhatt cautioned us concerning higher criticism. He observed, "The text of the Epic has to be reconstructed solely on the evidence of MSS. without bringing in the question of Higher Criticism."[9]

Following Bhatt's lead, most of the editors of the individual kāṇḍas included sections in their introductions reaffirming and even expanding on these critical principles.[10] Of particular concern for the various individual editors were principles six and seven, which concern the use of the "wavy line" and emendations, respectively. For the Rāmāyaṇa, unlike the Mahābhārata,[11] the "wavy lines" were to be used only when the southern recension shows multiple likely possibilities, and not when the northern and southern recensions differ. Emendations were to be kept to a minimum.

For example, in his introduction to the Ayodhyākāṇḍa, P. L. Vaidya, editor of both the Ayodhyā- and the Yuddhakāṇḍas, noted that there are only seven emendations in his reconstructed text.[12] Moreover, he felt, contra Sukthankar, that wavy lines were not appropriate for substitute passages in the Rāmāyaṇa. He reminded us that for the Rāmāyaṇa, the southern recension had more faithfully preserved the archaic form and should therefore be prioritized.[13] Additionally, Vaidya calculated that if the differences between the northern and southern recensions were to

1. When both the Recensions N and S agree, the text should be accepted.
2. When N and S do not agree, preference should be generally given to S, as it seems to have preserved the text in an older or original form. But when N and S do not agree and when S presents the text in a form which does not suit the context, or which evidently appears to be absurd, preference should be given to the N text.
3. When a passage is omitted in both N and S or either of them, it creates suspicion and should, therefore, be rejected.
4. When a passage is omitted in any version of N or S, and if it is not necessary for the context, it should be dropped.
5. When a passage is omitted in several MSS. (even if not in any entire Version), provided some of the MSS. in question are not closely related, and one cannot have influenced another, it should be dropped as secondary.
6. A wavy line (~~~) is generally used when the MSS. of the same recension are equally divided and keep the point moot. It is not used when S differs from N, as S is generally taken to represent an older form of the text than N.
7. Emendation should be avoided, as far as possible, in favor of interpretation.

[10] Only one editor, D. R. Mankad (1965, pp. xxii–xxiii), did not specifically address the critical principles. P. L. Vaidya did not address the issue in his introduction to the Yuddhakāṇḍa, as he had already taken it up in his introduction to the Ayodhyākāṇḍa (see notes 12 and 15 below).

[13] Compare the Mahābhārata, where the northern recension was considered to be the editio simplicior and the southern recension the editio ornatio. See Sukthankar 1933, p. xxx, xlvii; and Mahadevan 2008.

be marked as uncertain, then for the Ayodhyākāṇḍa alone a full one third of the text would need to be wavy lined.[14] Drawing from his familiarity with the Ayodhyākāṇḍa, he reinforced Bhatt's stance on the use of the wavy line only when the manuscripts of the southern recension were divided and no southern reading was clearly stronger. He was silent on this matter in his introduction to the Yuddhakāṇḍa, but given his use of the wavy line in this book, it is clear that he employed the same standards in the latter.[15]

P. C. Divanji, similarly, in his introduction to the Araṇyakāṇḍa, took up the antiquity of the southern recension and the use of the wavy line.[16] Noting the powerful influence of the South Indian Vaiṣṇava commentators from the thirteenth century (e.g., Uḍāri Varadarāja),[17] Divanji argued that the Rāmāyaṇa has "remained quite safe with all their [sic] archaic features in the hands of these Vaiṣṇavas."[18] Citing Hermann Jacobi's arguments concerning the priority of the southern recension, Divanji concluded: "The Editors of the Critical edition of the Rāmāyaṇa have consequently come to the conclusion that SR is superior to NR and that the SR should form the basis of the critical text of the Epic."[19] He then reaffirmed that the wavy line was to be used only when the southern reading was uncertain.

D. R. Mankad, the editor of the Kiṣkindhākāṇḍa, while silent on the issue of the wavy line and emendations in his introduction, discussed instead the growth of both recensions, emphasizing the northern origin of the poem at its earliest stages. Tracing the growth of the northern recension, he argued: "The first stage evidently is that text which was composed by the ādikavi. It must have been a text quite brief and probably without embellishments—the UR Rāmāyaṇa."[20] Clearly influenced by his understanding of the genetic history of the poem, Mankad used the wavy line in a somewhat different manner from its stated use in earlier volumes. Unlike the usage in the previous volumes and in those that followed, he marked words and phrases as uncertain, both when the northern manuscripts disagreed among themselves and when the southern manuscripts demonstrated similar disagreement.[21]

[15] Vaidya was very sparing in his use of the wavy line, using it only when he felt that the southern reading was uncertain. See, for example, crit. ed. 6.1.6; 6.4.46; 6.8.15; 6.11.7; 6.32.21; 6.53.41; etc.

[17] According to Divanji (1963, p. xxvi), Uḍāli Varadarāja is "earlier than A.D. 1250." Bhatt dated Uḍāli to approximately A.D. 1250. See Shah 1975, p. 655.

Mankad appeared to anticipate G. C. Jhala's expanded use of the wavy line in the Sundarakāṇḍa. In his introduction, Jhala felt obligated to remind his audience, if ever so briefly, that he followed the same principles as Bhatt, but he seemed to slightly modify the use of the wavy line, including some instances in which north and south disagree. He clarified:

> The principles followed in the Constitution of the text of the Sundarakāṇḍa are the same as those which were formulated and enunciated by the late Prof. G. H. Bhatt, the first General Editor of the Rāmāyaṇa, in his Introduction to the Bālakāṇḍa. I should like to add for clarification that when S MSS. are divided among themselves as well as against N MSS. which, too, are not uniform, a reading has been chosen which would reasonably account for the variants in both the recensions."[22]

Nevertheless, Jhala, in his editing of the Sundarakāṇḍa, also used the wavy line very sparingly, marking both instances where the southern reading was uncertain (5.14.26) and where the southern recension was divided and different from the northern (5.17.3).

With this brief background, let us now turn to the matter at hand, the Uttarakāṇḍa and the critical reconstruction of its text. U. P. Shah, who took up the editing of the final book of the epic only after he became the general editor in 1965, did not address the issue of the critical principles in his introduction. However, his editing style, as evidenced by his editorial choices, has clearly left its mark, and, as we shall see, he departed in a number of significant ways from the standards previously set and followed by the earlier editors.

As P. L. Vaidya noted in his introduction to the Ayodhyākāṇḍa, the Malayalam manuscript identified in that volume as M4 is unusual as it sometimes agrees with the northern recension, especially the northeastern recension, and sometimes with the southern recension.[23] Vaidya had intended to use this manuscript in his production of the critical edition

4.3.7; 4.9.16; etc., where southern manuscripts disagree and the readings are marked as uncertain. Compare, too, 4.5.1, where most northern manuscripts read a variant and a few southern variants are noted.

of the Yuddhakāṇḍa but was not able to procure it.[24] Nevertheless, he was clearly perplexed over the nature of this southern manuscript and the unusual and strong affinity that it showed with northern manuscripts. However, he did not further expand on the topic. But the awareness of the unexpected relationship between some southern and northern manuscripts predates Vaidya's concern. The phenomenon was noticed by Sukthankar in connection with the manuscripts of the Mahābhārata in his Prolegomena to the critical edition of the Mahābhārata, where he first identified the seeming anomaly, calling our attention to the close alignment of the Śārada (Ś1) and Malayalam (M6,7) manuscripts.[25] Recently, this same strong association has been used by T. Mahadevan as evidence for his thesis that it was a version of the Mahābhārata close to this Śārada manuscript that was brought into South India by the first wave of brahmans to move to the south at the beginning of the Common Era.[26]

Shah, while noting Vaidya's attention to this manuscript, was silent on Sukthankar's identification of the Malayalam manuscripts as particularly conservative. Nevertheless, he looked to both the Malayalam and Śārada manuscripts for additional textual support, expanding the number of both for his collation of manuscripts for the Uttarakāṇḍa. Thus, rather than the three or four Malayalam manuscripts used in the other volumes, Shah increased the number of these to ten. He noted that originally only three had been collated (M1 = M2 of Bālakāṇḍa; M2 = M2 of Sundara- and Yuddhakāṇḍas; and M3 = M3 of Kiṣkindhā-, Sundara-, and Yuddhakāṇḍas). But he added an additional six Malayalam manuscripts (M4–10), out of which he identified four (M4,8,9,10) as representing "an older version of M" that dates at least to a period before Uḍāli Varadarāja.[27]

Shah's logic underlying his relative prioritizing of these Malayalam manuscripts depends specifically on the similarity between the two older manuscripts—M9, dated Kollam 591 (A.D. 1416) and M10, dated Kollam 688 (A.D. 1513)—and the close affinity of these manuscripts with M4 and M8. Additionally, M8, although later in date (Kollam 1001; A.D. 1826), seems to follow the Vivekatilaka of Uḍāli Varadarāja,[28] thereby leading Shah to conclude that they represented an earlier version of the southern recension codified before A.D. 1250.

Two Malayalam manuscripts used in the collation of the Uttarakāṇḍa, M3 and M6, are identified as mixed, sometimes demonstrating an agreement with the southern recension but at other times having a marked affinity to the northern recension. Shah, far from attaching any importance to these mixed codices, appears to consider them inferior, noting only of M3, that "it betrays contamination by the N recension" and of M6 that "the MS represents the S recension but is interesting for some new readings and is a mixed codex."[29]

Similarly, attention has been drawn to two Telugu manuscripts collated for the Rāmāyaṇa that demonstrate a strong relationship with the northern recension. In his introduction to the Sundarakāṇḍa, Jhala identified both his T2 (Madras, Adyar Library, No. 75597) and T3 (Madras, Adyar Library, No. 74122) as worthy of note in that they demonstrate a strong affinity with the northern readings.[30] Jhala considered the first of these as the more significant, but identified the second as having "not infrequent variants which are common to one or more MSS. of the N recension."[31] He felt that these mixed codices remind us that the southern recension, while representing the older version of the epic, was not closed and not resistant to modifications.[32] Only the second of these (identified as T3 in both kāṇḍas) is used in the collation of the critical edition of the Uttarakāṇḍa. Here Shah acknowledged its strong relationship to the northern recension, but noted only, "hence it is a mixed codex."[33] He assigned no specific importance to this affinity. Shah included in his collation two additional Śārada manuscripts (Ś2 and Ś3) and noted that Ś2 is superior to Ś1, thereby making the addition a valuable one to our understanding of the textual history of the northern recension.[34] Unquestionably, the addition of these manuscripts has added important depth to our understanding of the textual history of the Uttarakāṇḍa, but at the same time the change in focus has also complicated the editing process and provided a slightly different version of the reconstructed text than would have been otherwise generated, skewing its relationship to the other kāṇḍas of the critical edition.

[29] Shah 1975, pp. 17–18.

[30] T2, Madras, Adyar Library No. 75597, has all books except the Uttara and was used in the collation for all previous volumes. T3, Madras, Adyar Library No. 74122, has the last five kāṇḍas—Kiṣkindhā, Sundara, Yuddha, and Uttara—and it was used in the collation of these five books.

NORTHERN AND SOUTHERN READINGS

In general, Shah has followed the previous editors in prioritizing the southern readings in his editing of the critical edition of the Uttarakāṇḍa. But this is not always the case.[35] Thus, numerous examples are found of a northern reading being selected without any clear indication as to the logic behind the choice. For instance, at 7.10.29a, the critical reading atha is primarily a northern one, found in Ś,Ñ2,V2,3,B,D1–5,8,9,12,T3,4,M6 (V1 reads instead tataḥ), while the variant punaḥ, relegated to the critical apparatus, is by and large the southern reading found in Ñ1,D6,7,10,11,G,T1,2,M1–5,7–10. Again, the critical reading at 7.7.7d—rākṣasānāṃ mahāhave (Ś,V,B,D8,9,11,12,T2,4 [D2,5 read rākṣasān sa mahāhave])—is that of the northern recension, while the reading of the southern recension (D1,3,4,6,7,10,T1,3,G,M—rākṣasebhyo [G2,M1 rākṣaseṣv (a)] 'srjac charān) is relegated to the apparatus. Similarly, at 7.11.10d, it is the northern reading (nārhasy evaṃ prabhāṣitum), read by Ś,Ñ,V,B (B2 reads tu for pra), D1,2,3,4,5,8,12,T2,3,M6, that is chosen over the southern reading (nārhase vaktum īdṛśam) of D6,7,10,11,T1,2,G,M1–5,7–10 (M3,5 read nārhasas tvam), which is relegated to the critical apparatus. Consider, too, 7.70.9b, where the critical choice (mānaveṣu vai) is read by only Ñ1,2,D1,3,4,6,7,10,11,T3,4. This reading is largely aligned with the north and west.[36] D6, D7, D10, and D11 generally represent the texts of the commentators and are considered late. While all the commentators consulted are said to follow the southern recension, in the Uttarakāṇḍa, they frequently align with northern manuscripts.

[35] A detailed examination of the various choices of the critical editor is beyond the scope of this introduction. The following examples of the choices of the editors are typical of those found throughout the kāṇḍa. Shah perhaps hints at his methodology in his introduction (1975, pp. 46–47), where he argues that P. L. Vaidya's choice of the southern reading -kaṭaṃkaraiḥ found at Yuddhakāṇḍa 48.39 is incorrect and that the "original reading" was clearly that known to D6,7 (-kaṭaṃkaṭaiḥ) and which appears in variant forms in Ś,Ñ1,B4,D1,3,8,9,12,G2 (the manuscript abbreviations here refer to those found in the preface to the critical edition of the Yuddhakāṇḍa, pp. ix–xi). Left unnoted by Shah are northern variants of Ñ2,V,B2,3,D2,4,13, indicating a north that is strongly divided against itself, and the fact that G2, the lone southern manuscript to share the northern reading, actually reads with the remainder of the south for its final sequence (-karaiḥ), thus giving rise to a virtually united southern reading that stands against a divided north. It is clear that Vaidya has followed the critical principles established by Bhatt and chosen the southern reading, while Shah's reasoning is far less clear. In Shah's defense, the reading preferred by him clearly represents the lectio difficilior. If Shah is correct and kaṭaṃkaṭa- (v.l. kaṭaṅkaṭa) is a Sanskritized word of Dravidian origin, one might question why the reading is found only in northern manuscripts. See, too, 7.4.23; 7.6.7; and notes.

[36] See Shah 1975, p. 21, where he aligns the western manuscripts of D1,3,4 with the north.

This is especially true of D7, D10, and D11.[37] Of the remaining manuscripts only T4 appears to be aligned with the south, although as we will see below in the example of 191* and other places, T4 not infrequently reads with the northern manuscripts.[38] Compare these to examples with similar textual support, but where the southern reading is maintained. Thus, consider 7.10.25d, where the critical text iva raśmibhiḥ is read by T1,2,G,M1–5,7–9, while the variant raśmibhir yathā is read by Ś,Ñ,V, B,D,T3,4,M6. Compare, too, the textual evidence for 191*, following 7.11.14, where the reading of the north (Ś,Ñ,V,B,D2,5,8,9,12,T3,4) has been relegated to the apparatus, and the reading of the south (D1,3,4,6, 7,10,11,T1,2,G,M) is the critical reading in accordance with the critical principles. The evidence of T3, and M3,6—the southern texts that are aligned with the north—appears not to play heavily in the editor's choices, while D1,3,4, or the manuscripts that Shah has identified as constituting the "Western recension,"[39] would appear to be influential in the choices at 7.11.10d and 191* but not at 7.10.25 or 7.11.7d. Such examples are found throughout the kāṇḍa.

UNCERTAIN (WAVY-LINED) READINGS

The standards that Shah employs to mark a reading as uncertain are similarly not always clear. Like the other editors, Shah has used the wavy line fairly cautiously, but the underlying logic is at times hard to determine. Generally, as expected, the wavy line marks readings of the southern recension that are not obvious. When southern readings are divided and no reading is clearly preferable, the chosen reading is marked as uncertain. Shah seems to agree with Jhala in expanding the use of the wavy line to instances where the southern manuscripts are divided among themselves and disagree with the northern recension, which itself is divided. Still, in some cases, the reason for the presence or absence of the wavy line is difficult to ascertain. For example, at 7.8.10a, cotkṛṣya is marked as uncertain. Ś1,Ñ2,V3,D9,M6 read niṣkṛṣya; while Ś2,3,B,D8 read niṣkramya; V1,D1–5, niḥkṛṣya; and D12, niḥkramya. Ñ1,3,V2,3,D4,6,7,10,11,S (except M6) read with the critical. As the critical reading here is that of the virtually unanimous southern reading, with the exception of M6—which aligns with the northern recension—one questions why it is marked as uncertain; while the north is divided, the south, the preferred reading, is not. Again, at 7.9.3c, the word rakṣaḥ is marked as uncertain, despite the fact that Ñ,V2,D1,3,4,6,7,10,11,G,T1,2,4, M read with the critical text, and represent a virtually unanimous southern reading (with the exception only of T3, which aligns with the north). Consider, too, the textual support of the critical reading at 7.13.3d, where the syllables -sama- of kailāsasamam ālayam are marked as uncertain. The critical reading is supported by D1,3,4,6,7,10,11,G,T1,2,M, while Ś,Ñ,V3,B1,2,4,D2,5,8,9,12,T3,4 read kailāsākāram and V1,B3 read kailāsākāra-[mandiram]. V2 omits this verse. Based on very similar textual evidence, the sequence vai hitam at 7.13.12d and the -ddhi at 7.13.29c are also marked as uncertain. The overwhelming evidence supports the southern reading, despite the north being divided, which again leads one to question the use of the wavy line. Yet compare the similar textual evidence at 7.14.6a, where Ś,Ñ,V1,3,B,D,T3,4,M10 read the variant balānām for balasya, but the reading of the southern manuscripts, as expected, is prioritized and not marked as uncertain. But again recall the evidence at 7.11.10d, noted above, where the northern reading is prioritized and not marked as uncertain. In the absence of any clearly stated rationale or defense on the part of Shah, the use of the wavy line in many cases is difficult to either understand or justify.

[37] D6 (Oriental Institute, Baroda, originally in the private possession of G. H. Bhatt, unnumbered. Dated Saṃvat 1832 [A.D. 1776]) follows the text of Cg (Govindarāja), and his commentary is included with the manuscript for all preceding volumes. D7 (Poona, Bhārata Itihāsa Saṃśodhaka Maṇḍala, No. 844, Dated Śāka 1698 [A.D. 1776]), contains the commentary of Cm (Maheśvaratīrtha); D10 (Ujjain, Scindia Oriental Institute, No. 1633, Dated Saṃvat 1888 [A.D. 1831]; D7 = D8 of Kiṣkindhā, = D7 of Sundara, = D8 of Yuddha) contains no commentary. D11 (Jodhpur Palace Library, unnumbered. Dated Saṃvat 1876 [A.D. 1820]) contains the commentary of Ct (Nāgeśabhaṭṭa). Examples of these manuscripts aligning with the north are ubiquitous; see crit. ed. 7.1.14; 7.2.9; 7.3.19; 7.21.14; 7.22.13; 7.23.42; 7.24 passim; 7.38.13a,b,d; 7.38.14a,b; 7.38.15a; etc.

[38] T4 for the Uttarakāṇḍa represents two different manuscripts. For sargas 1–51 of the critical edition, T4 represents an undated manuscript held in the Oriental Institute, Baroda, no. 7261. For sargas 52–100 of the critical edition, T4 represents a manuscript held in the Adyar Library, Madras, no. 75607. This manuscript is of the Uttarakāṇḍa only. Shah (1975, pp. 15–16) understands that this manuscript is more than two hundred years old. Despite Shah's identifying both as representing the southern recension, both versions of T4 not infrequently align with the north.

INFLUENCE OF THE MALAYALAM MANUSCRIPTS

As noted above, the six additional Malayalam (M) manuscripts have left their mark on the critical edition of the Uttarakāṇḍa. Numerous critical readings demonstrate where these manuscripts, especially those identified by Shah as being representative of an older southern recension (M8,9,10), appear to have had an influence on the critical text. Just such an example where these manuscripts have been influential is provided at 7.20.4b. Here the word tārkṣyasy[a] is marked as uncertain. Only T1,G1,3,M2,4,5,7–10 read with the critical edition, while Ś,Ñ,V1,3 (V2 missing),B,D1–4,8,9,12,T2,3,G2,M1,3,5 read tārkṣyeṇ[a]; D5 reads cāraṇ[a]; D5, garuḍ[a]; and D7,10,11,T4, gandharv[a]. Given the mixed southern reading, the term is, in our opinion, correctly marked as uncertain. However, the choice of the critical reading appears to be based on the readings of Malayalam manuscripts, and one could reasonably argue that without these the better reading would probably have been tārkṣyeṇ[a].

Among the Malayalam manuscripts, the most influential in the editing of the kāṇḍa appear to have been M8,9,10. Thus, for example, we find that the reading -saṃśritān at 7.9.29b, which is marked as uncertain, is supported by Ś1,2,Ñ1,3,V1,3,D4,8,9,12,T3,M6,8,9, while T1,2,4,G,M1–5,7,10 read -saṃhitān; Ś3 reads -saṃsthitān; Ñ2,V2,B,D6,7,10,11 read -vatsalān; and D5 has -saṃsthitaḥ. That the term is marked as uncertain is justified as it represents a mixed southern reading against a mixed northern reading and accords with Jhala's expanded definition. But the choice of the critical reading is based on a number of northern manuscripts (Ś1,2, Ñ1,3,V1,3,D4,8,9) and a smattering of southern manuscripts (T3,M6,8,9). As discussed above, T3 and M6 commonly align with the north, but the addition of M8 and 9, both identified as belonging to what Shah understands to represent an older version of the southern recension, seems to be influential in the choice of the editors. Likewise, 7.27.28c demonstrates evidence of the influence, particularly of M8 and 9. The critical reading rakṣasāṃ kīrtim is found only in D5,6,10,T1,2,G1,2,M3,8,9 (V2, G2 missing; B2 omits). Ś,Ñ,V1,3,D1–4,8,9,12,T3,4 read jayam icchūnām (D1,3,4—jayam īpsūnām), while Ñ2,B1,3,4,D5–7,M6 read jayakāmānām, and M1,2,4,5,7,10 read rakṣatāṃ (M10—kāṃkṣatāṃ) kīrtim. The critical reading is, correctly in our opinion, marked as uncertain; however, without the evidence of M8,9, one questions whether this would still have been the choice. A similar, but perhaps not so dramatic, example is the critical reading kasyacit tv atha kālasya found at 7.9.1a and read by Ś,Ñ,V,B,D (except D6),T2,3,M6,8, while D6,T1,G,M1–5,7,9,10 read the variant kenacit tv atha kālena. Again M8 seems to be an influential factor in the editor's choice of the reading.

THE APPENDIX AND PRAKṢIPTA PASSAGES

The editors of the critical edition have relegated a number of passages to Appendix I, Nos. 1–13. This appendix actually consists of three different types of passages that need to be disambiguated in light of the editing of the critical text, as well as the traditional way in which the text of the Uttarakāṇḍa is constituted. The first group are those passages that are traditionally considered to be prakṣipta, or interpolated, passages, which will be discussed below. We have translated them and placed them in an appendix at the end of this volume. These passages are found in Appendix I, Nos. 1, 2, 3, 8 (lines 303–465), and 10. The second group consists of those passages that have been relegated to the appendix by the critical editors, despite the fact that they have universal manuscript support. For reasons discussed below, we have reinserted these passages into the critical text. These are Appendix I, Nos. 8 (lines 1–302), 9, 11, and 13. Note that Appendix I, No. 8 is somewhat confusing, as part of it is traditionally considered a prakṣipta passage (lines 303–465) and part belongs to the text proper (lines 1–302).[40] The final group consists of Appendix I, Nos. 4, 5, 6, 7, and 12. These passages properly belong to the appendix and are translated in the annotation following the notes to the verse after which they occur.

APPENDIX PASSAGES CALLED PRAKṢIPTA

While keeping silent on his principles of textual criticism, Shah, in his introduction, draws attention to the prakṣipta, or interpolated, passages of the Uttarakāṇḍa. These passages are found in a fair number of manuscripts, in many printed editions, and in a number of translations.[41] These prakṣipta passages, which, from at least the time of the commentators, have been traditionally considered to be interpolated into the kāṇḍa, have been appropriately relegated to Appendix I.[42] There are thirteen such sargas, textual evidence for which varies. In general, the first and third sets of prakṣipta sargas are found in most, if not all, northern and devanāgarī manuscripts, as well as in some southern manuscripts, particularly T3, 4,[43] and M3, which, as has been demonstrated above, show an affinity with the north. Additionally, the texts consulted by the commentators are aware of these passages. But, for the most part, the commentators do not accept them as authentic, identifying them as "prakṣipta."[44] Although the normal practice in our translation has been to put such appendices in the notes, the length, unique standing, and popularity of these passages are such that we have separated them out and placed them at the end of our volume in an appendix of our own, [44] Prakṣipta I, sargas 1, 3–5 (= App. I, Nos. 1–2) are found in Ś,Ñ,V1,3,B,D1–4,6–12, T1,3,4,M3; sarga 2 is found in D7,10,11,T3,4,M3. Prakṣipta II (= App. I, No. 3) is found in V3,D7,9–11,T4,M3. Prakṣipta III (= App. I, No. 8, lines 303–465; App. I, No. 10) is found in Ś,Ñ,V,B,D,T3,4,M3. Prakṣipta I, sarga 2 is marked as 15*, and relegated to the apparatus of Appendix I, No. 1. Note that this sarga and those found in Prakṣipta II differ in textual support only by the addition of one northern manuscript, V3, in the latter.

hoping to make them easily accessible, while reinforcing the notion that they are, in fact, later interpolations in the main text.

The first group of these consists of five individual sargas (= App. I, No. 1 and App. I, No. 2). This interpolated section is traditionally placed following sarga 23 of the so-called vulgate, which is also sarga 23 of the critical edition. To avoid confusion, our appendix includes all five interpolated sargas, despite the fact that the second sarga has been relegated to an insert passage in Appendix I, No. 1 [15*] by the editors of the critical edition. These sargas, part of Agastya's narrative, expand the history of Rāvaṇa's conquest and are highly infused with Vaiṣṇava devotionalism in both their content and tone.

The second group consists of five sargas as well (App. I, No. 3) and is traditionally located following sarga 38 of the vulgate (= sarga 36 of the critical edition). In these lengthy passages, which further expand Agastya's narrative, we find the history of the births of Vālin and Sugrīva; Rāvaṇa's desire to seek out Viṣṇu for battle; a Vaiṣṇava stotra, including Viṣṇu's incarnation as Rāma and Lakṣmī's as Sītā; as well as Rāvaṇa's journey to Śvetadvīpa and his defeat and humiliation by the powerful women dwelling there.[45] These passages, except for that of the births of Vālin and Sugrīva (Prakṣipta II, sarga 1), like those of the first group, have a strong Vaiṣṇava tone.

The final group of prakṣipta sargas is a bit more complicated. It consists of three sargas and has been relegated to Appendix I, No. 8, lines 303–465 and Appendix I, No. 10, a passage of 134 lines. These sargas are placed immediately following Lakṣmaṇa's return from abandoning Sītā and consist of a number of cautionary tales that illustrate the consequences of kings neglecting their duty, especially toward brahmans.[46] Upon completing these stories, Rāma urges Lakṣmaṇa to seek out some royal business for him to attend to in his role of king and chief magistrate.[47] When Lakṣmaṇa ventures out, the only petitioner he finds is a dog. The dog has had an unfortunate encounter with the head of a Kaula sect, as a result of which he complains that he has been wrongfully beaten by a mendicant.[48] The third and final sarga of this set (= App. I,

[45] Shah (1975, pp. 24–25) takes particular exception to Prakṣipta II, sarga 4, where he objects to the fact that Agastya tells Rāma a brief summary of the Rāmāyaṇa ("best of kings, hear this tale, which is destructive of even the greatest of sins [tāṃ kathāṃ śṛṇu rājendra mahāpāpapraṇāśinīm—verse 7]"). Shah argues, "Nothing can be more incongruous than the Hero of the story himself being asked to hear his own story which destroys all great sins!"

No. 10) tells the story of an owl and a vulture who call upon Rāma to resolve a property dispute over a hole in a tree that each of them claims as his own.

THE REMAINING APPENDIX PASSAGES

Along with the prakṣipta sargas mentioned above, Shah relegates nine additional passages to Appendix I. As mentioned above, the five passages that appear in Appendix I, Nos. 4, 5, 6, 7, and 12 properly belong to the appendix. As with the starred passages—that is to say, those passages that have been determined as not belonging to the earliest version of the poem—that are known to the texts of the southern commentators, these appendix passages have been translated and placed at the appropriate location in our annotation.[49] The four passages relegated to Appendix I, Nos. 8 (lines 1–302), 9, 11, and 13, which have been reinserted into our translation of the critical text, are much more problematic and require a more detailed analysis.

These last four passages share a common feature in that they are known to all, or virtually all, manuscripts and printed editions consulted in the preparation of the critical edition. Shah's relegation of these passages to Appendix I is based entirely on what is called "Higher Criticism,"[50] the very same criterion that Bhatt had so strongly cautioned against employing in the reconstruction of the critical text. As has been argued elsewhere,[51] Shah's reasons for relegating these passages to the critical apparatus are not based purely on manuscript evidence in accordance with Bhatt's principles, but rather primarily on Shah's understanding of what the internal logic of the narrative should be. Thus he argues, in general, that most of these passages are "incongruous."[52]

Moreover, it seems apparent that as late as the spring of 1972 at least three of the four excised passages in question were intended to be part of the critical edition, and between then and the date of publication in 1975 were relegated to Appendix I. We know this from the dated marginalia in the handwritten devanāgarī transcriptions of the commentaries of Kataka and Uḍāli used in the preparation of the critical edition, copies [49] Thus a translation of App. I, No. 4 (lines 1–46) is found at the beginning of the notes to sarga 37; App. I, No. 5 is found following notes to 7.38.13; App. I, No. 7, following notes to 7.50.10; and App. I, No. 12 following notes to 7.67.13.

Appendix I, No. 8, lines 1–302, is inserted following sarga 51. The textual evidence for lines 7–56,[54] while strong enough to merit inclusion, is not quite as straightforward as that for lines 57–302, where the manuscript evidence universally supports the passage. The first six lines are omitted by a number of northern manuscripts and were therefore, we believe, correctly excluded from the critically reconstructed text. The situation with the remainder of the passage is, however, different. Lines 7–86 tell the story of Nṛga,[55] a righteous king who is cursed to become a lizard.[56] Following upon this story, we are told that of King Nimi (lines 89–123), the heroic twelfth son of Ikṣvāku.[57] While the identification of Nimi as the son of Ikṣvāku is well established,[58] the version of the story as it is told in the Uttarakāṇḍa is not. The Uttarakāṇḍa story transitions into the story of the births of Agastya and Vasiṣṭha from a pot that contains the semen of Mitra and Varuṇa (lines 124–212).[59] This then is followed by a concise version of the well-known epic tale—recounted at length in the Ādiparvan of the Mahābhārata—of King Yayāti and his somewhat complicated relationships with Devayānī, the daughter of [54] Ś1 reads lines 1–64, but they are written in a different hand, while Ś2 and Ś3 omit lines 1–58. D8 and D12 omit lines 1–63. If all of the Ś manuscripts were to omit these first lines, there would be no doubt about their exclusion from the critical text. But since Ś1 technically shows them, one might argue that because they are represented in Ś, they should be included. On the other hand, this argument is weakened by the fact that they are written in a second hand and because "Ś2 is superior in value than Ś1" (Shah 1975, p. 5). Thus, a more conservative interpretation would relegate these fifty-eight lines to an appendix. Compare, however, the evidence found in the apparatus for sarga 51, which shows identical evidence (Ś1 reads in a second hand, while Ś2,3,D8,12 omit; this evidence is also the same for 7.50.17–20), but there is no question of its exclusion from the critical text. However, lines 63–82, known to all manuscripts and editions, describe Nṛga's cave-palace and should properly be in the critical text. See S. Goldman 2015a.

[55] For a discussion of the significance of this story and its thematic relationship to the central narrative, see Introduction, "Structure," pp. 139–42.

[56] As noted above, textual evidence for the narrative beginning with Nṛga ordering the consecration of his son Vasu (line 63 of the appendix) is unanimous. All manuscripts know the passage. If one were to begin the story at line 63, the rationale for Nṛga's becoming a lizard and why he has to take up residence for such a long period of time in a hole, that is, the story of the curse of the two brahmans, would be omitted. The abbreviated narrative would make virtually no sense.

Śukrācārya, and Śarmiṣṭhā, the daughter of Virocana, the king of the asuras (lines 213–302).

These seven sargas that make up the first 302 lines of Appendix I, No. 8 were originally intended to be included in the critical text and were only later taken out as they are marked in the margins of the handwritten devanāgarī transcription of Kataka's commentary as "52" (p. 153), "Cr. Ed. 53" (p. 155), "54" (p. 156), "Cr. Ed. 55" (p. 157) (dated 22-3-72), "Crit. 57" (p. 163) (dated 8-4-72), "Crit. 58" (p. 165) (dated 5-4-72), "Crit. 59" (p. 166) (dated 6-4-72), and so on. There is little doubt that sargas 52–58 here correspond to Appendix I, No. 8 and that what is called in the marginalia sarga 59 (p. 166) equates to the critical edition's sarga 52. The commentator Kataka (Ck) begins his comments at sarga 52.1a with the pratīka "lakṣmaṇasya tv ityādi," just as the first line of Appendix I, No. 8, begins "lakṣmaṇasya tu." What is marked as Crit. 59.1a and 1c in the marginalia of the transcript of Kataka's commentary (pp. 166–67) equates to Appendix I, No. 8, lines 304–306 and sarga 52.2ab. It is also noteworthy that throughout the remainder of the transcript of the commentary, the marginalia number the passages as if they were originally intended to be included among the sargas of the critical edition.

The handwritten devanāgarī transcription of the Vivekatilaka of Varadarāja Uḍāli (Cv) used in the collation of manuscripts and preparation of the critical edition and apparatus also supports this, despite its comments being relatively terse and far apart. As in the case of the transcription of Kataka's commentary, the marginalia here, too, number the sargas of what would become Appendix I, No. 8, lines 1–302, as if they were to have been included in the critically reconstructed text. This numbering is continued throughout the marginalia. So, for example, on page 186, written in the margin is "crit. 69," but the passage actually corresponds to sarga 62 of the critical edition. Additionally, verse numbers have been written in above the appropriate comments. For example, what is marked in the critical edition as Appendix I, No. 8, line 17, is labeled "Crit. 52 9ab" (p. 188). The commentary provides a variant reading of D6,7,10,11 for the line. This comment is noted in the critical apparatus (p. 593). In Appendix I, No. 8, line 48, sukṛtasya hi kāryasya phalaṃ nāvaiti pārthivaḥ, is marked in the transcription of Uḍāli's commentary as [7.52.]24cd (p. 189), where he understands the line to be ākṣepoktiḥ, "an expression of criticism." Again, the marginalia of the commentary identify as Crit. 53 (dated 15-3-72) what the critical edition understands to be Appendix I, No. 8, line 189 (p. 597).[60] Further confirming this is the fact that in Uḍāli's commentary to sarga 50, following the entry identified as [7.50]10cd (p. 186), the margin has been marked as "App" with a vertical line on the left margin, marking the section that is to be relegated to the appendix. This entry corresponds to Appendix I, No. 7, a passage known to Ś,D5–7,9–11,S (except M6), which has been properly relegated to the appendix.[61] The apparatus quotes the commentary of Uḍāli on this passage.[62]

[60] So, too, the commentary on the verses identified as Crit. 54.20 (p. 189) = App. I, No. 8, line 121 (p. 602); Crit. 55.8c (p. 189) = App. I, No. 8, line 145 (p. 604); and Crit. 56.5cd (pp. 189–90) = App. I, No. 8, line 18 (p. 607); etc.

Appendix I, No. 9, a passage of fifty-two lines known to all manuscripts and printed editions consulted, is inserted in the critical edition following 7.63.3ab. In this passage Śatrughna, having slain the demon Lavaṇa (sarga 61), founds the city of Madhurā and dwells there for twelve years as its ruler (sarga 62). Wishing once again to visit Ayodhyā and see Rāma, he undertakes the journey home with a small retinue. On his way he passes Vālmīki's ashram. He stops and spends the night and, during the evening, he and his troops hear the tale of Rāma as it is being sung. The marginalia in the transcript of Kataka's commentary that corresponds to Appendix I, No. 9 is marked as "Crit. 70" (p. 187 = GPP 71). This then corresponds to the critical edition's sarga 63. Following 3ab, the critical edition then relegates fifty-two lines to the critical apparatus despite their universal attestation. The marginalia clearly mark these lines as belonging to the critical text, assigning to them verse numbers.[63] The commentary marked as belonging to 3c begins, "vālmīker ayaṃ vālmīkiḥ sa cāsāv āśramaḥ," and refers to line 1 of Appendix I, No. 9. On page 190 of the commentary, the marginalia is marked as "Crit. 71" (= GPP 72), but the content corresponds to Appendix I, No. 9, line 42 (taṃ śayānam). In all manuscripts and printed editions, this begins the next sarga (= GPP sarga 72). The critical edition has relegated the first eleven lines of this sarga to the appendix (lines 42–52 = GPP sarga 72.1–6ab), thus collapsing into one what had been two sargas in all other versions consulted.

Appendix I, No. 11 and 1127* are two separate, but closely related, sections: an appendix passage of twenty-one lines inserted following 7.67.4, and a starred passage of fifteen lines inserted following 7.67.5.[64] The combined passage tells of the gods giving Rāma boons after he slays Śambūka. Both Appendix I, No. 11 and 1127* enjoy virtually universal manuscript and textual support, being omitted only in B1. Again, it is quite clear that the critical editors originally intended to admit these lines to the critical text, relegating the twenty-one lines to Appendix I, No. 9 following 67.4, and fifteen lines to the apparatus following 67.5 only after the fact. For in the margin of the transcription of the commentary of Kataka, above the appropriate comments, there are written what would have been the roman verse numbers and pādas of the critical edition. Many manuscripts, mainly northern (Ś,Ñ,V,B2–4,D1–5,8,9,12,T3, M6,8), insert a colophon following 7.67.8, and this appears to have been the original intention of the critical editors, as the commentary of Kataka marks a new sarga (p. 205). The marginalia in Udāli's commentary for these lines are sparse. However, it is clear that 1127* was intended to be included in the critical text since 1127*, line 15, is commented upon and numbered "[verse] 11" (p. 200). Additionally, the sarga is marked in the marginalia as "Crit. 76" (p. 200).

[62] Uḍāli's commentary, p. 187; crit. ed., p. 590. Uḍāli understands the ślokas to be spurious and tells us that these nine ślokas are not generally found among the kośas (ity ete nava ślokāḥ prāyeṇa ślokeṣu [sic for kośeṣu]). Note, however, that these same lines are also marked with verse numbers.

Appendix I, No. 13, a passage of fifty-six lines, shows universal textual support, as it is found in all manuscripts and printed editions consulted for the critical edition. The passage is inserted following sarga 88 of the critical edition. Here, when Sītā enters the earth and returns to her mother, Mādhavī, Rāma becomes disconsolate, demanding that the earth goddess give back Sītā and warning her that she shall experience his wrath if she does not comply. Brahmā then appears, and calming Rāma, reminds him that he is an incarnation of Viṣṇu and that he should listen to the remainder of his story. Brahmā explains to Rāma that Vālmīki has rendered everything, including his birth, experiences, and even what is yet to come. The marginalia are either not legible or absent from the commentaries of both Uḍāli (pp. 206–7) and Kataka (pp. 255–60). Neither commentary has its verses marked in the margins, perhaps indicating that at the time of editing the passage may well have been already relegated to the appendix.

EMENDATIONS AND HIGHER CRITICISM

Our goal has been to translate the critical text as it has been reconstructed by the critical editors. And despite the concerns noted above, unless confronted by overwhelming evidence and an inability to make sense of a word or passage, we have largely avoided emending the critically reconstructed text. In those few cases where we have done so, as in the other volumes, we have marked the emendation with an asterisk (*) and have provided a list of such emendations in a glossary. From the beginning of this project we have been confronted with the fact that many familiar and beloved passages of the epic were excised from the critical text based on the manuscript evidence. Thus, in our introduction to the Bālakāṇḍa, Sheldon Pollock, who clearly articulated the principles agreed to early on by the consortium, cautions:

> Perhaps the most dramatic results of the critical edition can be seen in the treatment of interpolated passages. We must bear in mind that committing the versions to writing in no way arrested their growth. New material of a mythological, sectarian, or simply expansive nature continued to be added nearly equally in the different recensions and versions throughout the period of written transmission, just as we suppose happened in the period of purely oral transmission. The principle developed to deal with these interpolations is similar to the one used for the critical edition of the Mahābhārata: A passage missing in any of the recensions or versions as a whole, or in uncontaminated manuscripts of these (in a descending order of probability, with due attention paid to contextual requirements), is suspect and eliminated from the critical text.[65]

Additionally, as in the previous volumes, since many of these passages, especially those found in the versions of the southern commentators, are so familiar to the text's contemporary audiences, we have provided translations of them in our annotation. In the case of the prakṣipta passages, the translations appear in an appendix at the end of the volume.

The critical edition of the Uttarakāṇḍa, however, confronted us with quite a different problem. Substantial and important passages that have universal or near-universal manuscript support were excised on grounds that could not, in our opinion, be justified by any scientific method of text criticism. Pollock once again clearly articulates the goals and methods that we have followed:

> But, of course, although a certain degree of scientific precision can be attained in application of the critical method, manuscript testimony can be inconclusive, and subjective decision is sometimes the only recourse available to the editors. But editors, as one textual critic puts it, "are not always people who can be trusted, and critical apparatuses are provided so that readers are not dependent on them (West 1973, p. 9)." For these reasons we have carefully scrutinized the sources of the constituted text and have never followed it where we felt it was in error. When textual emendation was unavoidable we have emended. But again, given our main task, this has been kept to a minimum, and for the most part, we rest content with registering and explaining our disagreements in the notes.[66]

Despite our concerns over some aspects of the critical editing of the Uttarakāṇḍa, unless confronted by overwhelming evidence and an inability to make sense of a word or passage, in general, we have not emended the critically reconstructed text. However, given their overwhelming textual support, and even to some extent their contextual support, we have, somewhat hesitantly, restored to the critical text those passages relegated to Appendix I, Nos. 8, 9, 11 and 1127*, and 13, as discussed above. With the possible exception of Appendix I, No. 13, it is fairly certain that these passages were all originally admitted to the critical text based on the manuscript evidence, and then at the end of the process, apparently by Shah, relegated to Appendix I. We therefore feel that, in keeping with the critical principles set forth by G. H. Bhatt, this excision of these passages was an error and that they should have been retained as part of the critical text as it was originally reconstructed.

THE COMMENTARIES

Compared to the commentators' intense interest in virtually every aspect of the first six books of the Rāmāyaṇa on which they often write dense, lengthy, and not infrequently contentious essays on such matters as theology and chronology, and frequently propose complex reading strategies involving what they see as the manifest (spaṣṭārtha) and latent (vāstavārtha) meanings of the text,[67] their attention to the bulk of the Uttarakāṇḍa tends to be relatively scattered and episodic. Rarely do they write at any length at all, and when they do, it is mainly to reprise previously debated matters such as the two just mentioned. Some of the commentators, such as Maheśvaratīrtha (Cm), who had taken quite active roles in the earlier debates, appear to drop out of the discussions of large sections of the text or, at any rate, are no longer quoted at length by the editors of the various editions in which their commentaries appear. Moreover, Mādhava Yogīndra (Ck), Govindarāja (Cg), and Nāgeśabhaṭṭa (Ct), who in the previous books had often had quite differing views, here frequently say more or less the same thing on a given verse as if the later scholiast were merely echoing the former.[68] Even the somewhat eccentric Satyatīrtha (Cs) who, in his comments on the earlier kāṇḍas, had delighted in extensively quoting and then ridiculing his rivals "Bhaṭṭa" (i.e., Nāgeśabhaṭṭa [Ct]) and "Tīrtha" (i.e., Maheśvaratīrtha [Cm]) now mentions the former only occasionally and the latter more sparingly still. The previously equally contentious and independent minded Mādhava Yogīndra (Ck) now exercises himself primarily in the case of passages that directly address Rāma's return to his primordial divine form as such passages allow him to return, often at considerable length, to his preoccupation with his Brahmaite theology. What can explain this relative lack of interest?

The answer to this question is to be found, we believe, in the entire problematic of the Uttarakāṇḍa as it has often been viewed by Indian audiences. For one thing, as we have discussed at length above in our section on the controversial nature of some of the book's best-known episodes, many modern audiences of the epic have been disturbed by its hero's actions in killing the śūdra Śambūka and banishing Sītā. Thus, although the modern reader might well expect these portions of the kāṇḍa to draw the greatest critical attention and rationalization on the part of the commentators, in fact it appears that they overwhelmingly prefer to pass over them lightly, avoiding the expected moral questions to focus on secondary issues or to radically reinterpret the substance of the narrative itself. In this way, as we have shown, the commentators seem utterly unconcerned with Rāma's execution of Śambūka as having any moral significance other than its success in restoring the brahman child to life. Instead, they show interest here only in a discussion of the progression and character of the yugas, which make the śūdra's penances a crime.[69] In the case of Sītā's scandal and banishment, most of the commentators again tread lightly with the exception of Śivasahāya (Cr), who deploys his ingenuity and the resources of the Sanskrit language to argue that no such things actually occurred.[70]

As has been noted by previous scholars, the kāṇḍa functions on one obvious level as an extensive epilogue to the epic story proper. To quote Brockington once again, "The Uttarakāṇḍa originated basically as a response to the natural curiosity felt by the audience to hear about the later events in Rāma's life too."[71] But, in fact, relatively little of the book actually deals directly with the events in Rāma's life. To begin with, as we have noted, a bit more than half of the text concerns itself with a lengthy and detailed history of Rāvaṇa and the genealogy of the rākṣasas. There is also a brief recapitulation of the childhood of Hanumān. These two sections have virtually nothing to say about Rāma. The remaining half of the book, apart from the surprisingly few sargas that directly narrate the actions of the epic's central protagonist, Rāma, consists basically of two types of narratives. The first type is concerned with the actions and experiences of Rāma's relatives. These include the lengthy account of Śatrughna's journey to Madhurā, his slaying of the demon Lavaṇa and his founding of a new kingdom, Lakṣmaṇa's and Sītā's journey to the Ganges, the latter's taking shelter in Vālmīki's ashram and the birth of her sons, Bharata's expedition against the gandharvas, and the creation of kingdoms for his sons and those of Lakṣmaṇa. As discussed in detail in the section on structure, the other type of narrative consists of a series of illustrative and cautionary tales, somewhat in the manner of the Mahābhārata's upākhyānas, about a number of legendary figures and narrated by Rāma or to him by various figures, such as his brother Lakṣmaṇa and the sage Agastya. These are interspersed throughout the book so that the actual tale of the final events of Rāma's earthly sojourn, which begins only after his hearing the histories of the rākṣasas and Hanumān, is rather discontinuous. In the end only about a third of the sargas of the kāṇḍa involve Rāma directly as anything other than a narrator or a passive listener. For the most part, if we may judge from the response of the Rāmāyaṇa's commentators, audiences have shown relatively little interest in the episodes in which Rāma figures as a narrator or an auditor and, in fact, with a few exceptions even in some of the events that involve Rāma directly.

There are, we believe, two major reasons for the commentators' relative neglect of the Uttarakāṇḍa when compared with their attention to the earlier books. For one thing, the thrust of the epic story is focused on and directed toward the mission of its hero as the great avatāra of Lord Viṣṇu, who takes human birth in order to destroy the great lokakaṇṭaka, "thorn [in the side] of the world," Rāvaṇa, who was invincible by any other than him. The great mission of the Rāmāvatāra concludes in dramatic fashion with his grand battle with Rāvaṇa, his reunion with his abducted wife, and his long-delayed consecration as king, all of which are elaborately described in the closing sargas of the lengthy Yuddhakāṇḍa. It is there, and in the sargas and kāṇḍas preceding this, that the main fascination with the story lies on the part of its authors, its commentators, and its audiences. In other words, both the exciting narrative and the emotional and theological concerns of the epic are largely concluded at the end of the Yuddhakāṇḍa. Interest in much of what occurs afterward is, by comparison, rather diminished. This much is, however, not unusual in the case of epilogic material appended to a gripping narrative about a popular hero.

As noted in the synopsis,[72] there is, however, one additional factor more or less unique to the Rāmāyaṇa legend that makes it difficult for the hero to engage in gripping or dramatic actions. This is the inauguration, from the moment of Rāma's consecration in the Yuddhakāṇḍa, of the ten-thousand-year (or, in some passages, eleven-thousand-year) utopian period of Rāma's rule, known in modernity as the Rāmarājya.[73] In ushering in and presiding over what is described as a millennia-long period of utter harmony, Rāma, who came to earth to right its wrongs, now, as monarch and chief magistrate of his kingdom, has for the most part deprived himself of anything to do. The problem of kingship during an era of virtual perfection is made particularly clear in several of the prakṣipta passages discussed above, where Rāma has difficulty in finding any problems or complaints among his subjects.[74]

Today the medieval Sanskrit commentaries on the Rāmāyaṇa, with the exception of the widely printed Tilakaṭīkā of Nāgeśabhaṭṭa (Ct) and the Rāmāyaṇabhūṣaṇa of Govindarāja (Cg), are rarely read and largely forgotten outside the world of Śrīvaiṣṇava ācāryas and a few scholars of the epics. But the close and careful reading of them that has been a hallmark and unique feature of the work of our group of scholars, who have labored for years on the translation and annotation of the critical edition of the Vālmīki Rāmāyaṇa, has given us innumerable fresh insights into the aesthetics, realia, social and political ideology, and theology of the epic poem, which is arguably one of the most influential works ever composed.

THE TRANSLATIONS

For our translation and annotation of the Uttarakāṇḍa, as with the Yuddhakāṇḍa, we have read and, as we felt necessary, commented upon in our annotation the translations of, in chronological order, Gorresio (1870), Dutt (1894), Roussel (1903), Shastri (1959), Gita Press (1969 for sargas 1–40), Raghunathan (1982), Gita Press (1998 for sargas 41–100), and the Gallimard edition (1999). There are two differences from the previous volume. The first is that whereas the translator of the Yuddhakāṇḍa for the Gallimard edition edited by Biardeau and Porcher was Brigitte Pagani, the Uttarakāṇḍa of that translation was done by Philippe Benoît. In general, we found Benoît's rendition perhaps somewhat more accurate than Pagani's and somewhat less influenced by Roussel. The other difference is found in Shastri's treatment of the prakṣipta sargas. As we had ample occasion to note in our annotation of the previous volumes, as well as in much of the present work, we found that in many cases Shastri's translation followed Roussel's so closely as to suggest that this work, rather than Vālmīki's text, was his proximate source. Roussel, however, did not translate the prakṣipta passages. In Shastri's rendering of these passages, it seems to us that he relied heavily on Dutt. We should also note that Gorresio's text of the Uttarakāṇḍa, and therefore his translation, correspond much more closely to the southern so-called vulgate text than was the case for kāṇḍas 1–6.

UTTARAKĀṆḌA

Sarga 1

1. Now that the slaughter of the rākṣasas had been accomplished and Rāma had attained sovereignty, all the seers came to felicitate Rāghava.

2. There were those who dwelt in the east: Kauśika, Yavakrīta, Raibhya, Cyavana, and Kaṇva, the son of Medhātithi.

3. And then, together with Agastya, came those who dwelt in the south: holy Svastyātreya, Namucu, and Pramucu.

4. Next, together with their disciples, came those who dwelt in the west: Pṛṣadgu, Kavaṣa, Dhaumya, and the great seer Raudreya.

5. And there were also the seven great seers: Vasiṣṭha, Kaśyapa, Atri, Viśvāmitra, Gautama, Jamadagni, and Bharadvāja.

6. When these great seers, whose radiance was like that of Agni, eater of oblations, reached Rāghava's dwelling, they paused so that their arrival could be announced.

7. So then, hastening at the words of Agastya, the doorkeeper quickly entered the presence of great Rāghava.

8. Rushing in to see Rāma, whose splendor was equal to that of the full moon, he reported that Agastya had arrived together with the seers.

9. When the king heard that the sages, whose radiance was like that of the newly risen sun, had arrived, he then said to the doorkeeper, "Have them enter as they please."

10. Seeing that those sages had arrived, Rāma arose, his hands cupped in reverence, and devoutly bade them be seated.

11. Those bulls among seers then took their places according to their merit on comfortable seats, which were splendidly covered and variegated with gold.

12. Once Rāma had inquired about their well-being, the great seers, knowers of the veda, together with their leaders and their disciples, said these words to him:

13. "All is well with us, great-armed delight of the Raghus, since, thank heavens, we see that you, having slain your enemies, are well.

14. "By no means did Rāvaṇa, the lord of the rākṣasas, present you with a serious challenge. For, armed with your bow, there is no doubt that you could conquer the three worlds.

15. "Thank heavens, Rāma, you have slain Rāvaṇa together with his sons and grandsons. Thank heavens we see you victorious together with your wife.

16. "Thank heavens you have slain those night-roaming rākṣasas Prahasta, Vikaṭa, Virūpākṣa, Mahodara, and the unassailable Akampana.

17. "Thank heavens, Rāma, you struck down in battle Kumbhakarṇa, whom no one in this world exceeded in sheer size.

18. "And thank heavens you engaged in single combat with the lord of the rākṣasas—whom even the gods could not kill—and achieved victory.

19. "The defeat of Rāvaṇa in battle was no great thing. But thank heavens you engaged in single combat with Indrajit Rāvaṇi and slew him.

20. "Thank heavens, great-armed hero, you were freed from that foe of the gods, who rushed onward like Kāla himself, and so you achieved victory.

21. "We were amazed, gentle Rāma, upon hearing that Indrajit had been slain; for he was invulnerable to all beings and wielded powerful illusion in battle.

22. "Having granted us this holy and precious gift, freedom from fear, heroic Kākutstha, dragger of your foes, you are to be congratulated on your victory."

23. When Rāma had heard that speech of the contemplative seers, he was greatly amazed, and, cupping his hands in reverence, he said:

24. "Why is it, sirs, that you pass over those two immensely powerful warriors Kumbhakarṇa and the night-roaming rākṣasa Rāvaṇa only to praise Indrajit Rāvaṇi?

25. "Why is it that you pass over those immensely powerful warriors Mahodara, Prahasta, and the rākṣasa Virūpākṣa only to praise Indrajit Rāvaṇi?

26. "What was his power like? What was his strength? What was his valor? And what was the reason that he surpassed even Rāvaṇa?

27. "I am not commanding you, but if I am permitted to hear it, if it is not a secret, and if you can tell me, I wish to hear it. Please tell me. How did he conquer Śakra and how did he obtain his boons?"

The end of the first sarga of the Uttarakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

1. When the pot-born sage, immensely powerful Agastya, had heard this speech of great Rāghava, he spoke these words:

2. "Listen, your majesty, to how he came to possess his enormous power of blazing energy, how he slaughtered his enemies in battle, and how he came to be invulnerable to his foes.

3. "I shall tell you, Rāghava, about Rāvaṇa's lineage, his birth, and how the gift of boons was conferred upon him.

4. "Long ago, Rāma, in the Kṛta Yuga, there lived the lordly brahman-seer named Pulastya. He was just like Grandfather Brahmā, as he was, indeed, the son of that Lord of creatures.

5. "His virtues in respect to righteousness and conduct need not be rehearsed. All this can be inferred merely from his epithet 'the son of Prajāpati.'

6. "Because of his profound devotion to righteousness, that bull among sages went to the ashram of Tṛṇabindu on the slopes of the great mountain Meru, where he made his dwelling.

7. "That righteous sage, restraining his senses through vedic recitation, practiced austerities. But some young girls, having come to that ashram, distracted him.

8. "For the daughters of the gods and great serpents, as well as the apsarases and the daughters of the royal seers, used to come to that place in the course of their play.

9. "Because those woodlands were so lovely and enjoyable in every season, those young girls would always come to that place to play.

10. "Then, furious, that great sage of immense blazing energy declared, 'Any young girl who comes within sight of me shall become pregnant.'

11. "When they heard those words of the great sage, all the girls who had been coming there were fearful of the danger of the brahman's curse, and came to that place no more.

12. "But the daughter of the royal seer Tṛṇabindu did not hear that and so she went to his ashram and wandered about unafraid.

13. "Now at that very time, that great seer, the son of Prajāpati, shining with radiance through his austerities, was engaged in vedic recitation.

14. "No sooner had she heard the sound of vedic recitation and caught sight of that sage, so rich in austerities, than she grew pallid and showed clear signs of pregnancy.

15. "When she saw the appearance of her body, she was terrified. Thinking, 'What has happened to me?' she went and stood before her father.

16. "Now, when Tṛṇabindu saw her in such a condition, he said, 'How could you have come to have so unseemly an appearance?'

17. "But the young girl, dejected and cupping her hands in reverence, said to that sage so rich in austerities: 'I don't know the reason, father, why I look this way.

18. " 'But earlier I went alone to the heavenly ashram of the contemplative great seer Pulastya to look for my friends.

19. " 'I didn't see that a single one of my friends had come there. But, when I saw the transformation of my appearance, I came straight back here.'

20. "Then the royal seer Tṛṇabindu, shining with radiance through his austerities, entered into meditation and saw that this had come about through the action of the seer.

21. "He realized that this was the curse of the great contemplative sage. Taking his daughter, he went to Pulastya and said this:

22. " 'Great seer, holy one, please accept as alms this daughter of mine, who is adorned with her own virtues and has offered herself willingly.

23. " 'And you should have no doubt that she will constantly devote herself to your service as you are subduing your senses in the practice of austerities.'

24. "Even as that righteous royal seer was saying these words, the twice-born sage, eager to accept the girl, said to him, 'Very well.'

25. "After the king had given her away, he returned to his own ashram. But as for his daughter, she dwelt there, pleasing her husband with her virtues. Then, delighted, that sage of immense blazing energy spoke these words:

26. " 'Bless you, I am greatly pleased with the abundance of your virtues. Therefore, I shall this very day grant you a son who will be my equal in virtues. He shall continue both our lineages and shall be renowned as Paulastya.

27. " 'Since you overheard the vedas as I was reciting them, he shall, no doubt, also be renowned as Viśravas.'

28. "Addressed in this fashion, that young girl, with a delighted heart, soon gave birth to a son, Viśravas.

29. "That bull among sages, Viśravas, endowed with austerity like his father and filled with purity and righteousness, was famed throughout the three worlds."

The end of the second sarga of the Uttarakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

1. "Now, within a short time, Pulastya's son, that bull among sages Viśravas, became established in austerity just like his father.

2. "He was truthful, virtuous, skillful, pure, and devoted to vedic recitation. He was wholly detached from all objects of the senses and was constantly devoted to righteousness.

3. "When the great seer Bharadvāja came to know of his virtuous conduct, he gave him his daughter, Devavarṇinī, to be his wife.

4. "That bull among sages, Viśravas, filled with the greatest delight, accepted Bharadvāja's daughter in keeping with righteousness.

5. "With her, that righteous sage had a truly extraordinary child, filled with power and endowed with all the virtues of a brahman.

6. "When he was born, his grandfather was delighted. Then, in his delight, he chose a name for him, in consultation with the divine seers, saying:

7. " 'Since he is the offspring of Viśravas and because he is so like him, he shall be renowned by the name of Vaiśravaṇa.'

8. "Then, retiring to a penance-grove there, Vaiśravaṇa grew great as one of immense blazing energy, like a fire into which oblations are offered.

9. "While that great sage was dwelling in his ashram, this idea occurred to him: 'Controlling myself, I shall practice righteousness; for righteousness is the highest recourse.'

10. "He performed austerities in the great forest for thousands of years. And after each period of a thousand years, he adopted a different ascetic practice.

11. "Thus he lived in turn only on water, only on air, and then on no sustenance at all. And so, in this fashion, thousands of years passed like a single year.

12. "Then, pleased, Brahmā of immense blazing energy came to his ashram, together with Indra and the hosts of the gods, and said this:

13. " 'I am greatly pleased with you, my child of excellent vows, and with your deeds. Please choose a boon, for I think that you deserve one.'

14. "Vaiśravaṇa then said to Grandfather Brahmā, who stood before him: 'Holy one, I wish to be a world guardian and the keeper of all wealth.'

15. "And so, with a delighted mind, Brahmā addressed Vaiśravaṇa, together with the hosts of the gods, happily saying: 'Excellent.

16. " 'I was just about to add a fourth to the group of world guardians—Yama, Indra, and Varuṇa—the very position that you seek.

17. " 'You shall have this position that I have created, knower of righteousness, and you shall obtain the lordship of all wealth. This very day you shall be the fourth among the world guardians—Yama, Indra, and Varuṇa.

18. " 'And please accept this flying palace called Puṣpaka, as radiant as the sun, to be your vehicle. You shall be the equal of the thirty gods.

19. " 'Farewell! We shall all now depart just as we came. In having awarded you this great boon, my son, we have accomplished our purpose.'

20. "When the gods, preceded by Brahmā, had departed for the heavens, the lord of wealth, prostrating himself in humility, said these words to his father:

21. " 'Holy one! I have obtained a boon from the lotus-born Brahmā Prajāpati. But that god did not ordain a dwelling for me.'

22. " 'Therefore, holy lord, please think of some place for us to dwell, where there would be no harm to any living being.'

23. "When Viśravas, that bull among sages, had been addressed in this fashion by his son, that knower of righteousness spoke these words: 'Listen, knower of righteousness.

24. " 'There is a city called Laṅkā, built by Viśvakarman as a dwelling for the rākṣasas. It is as lovely as Indra's Amarāvatī.

25. " 'It is an exquisite city with gateways of gold and lapis. It was abandoned long ago by the rākṣasas, who were overcome with terror of Viṣṇu. And so it has been emptied of the hosts of rākṣasas, who have all fled to the underworld Rasātala.

26. " 'You should resolve to live there. There will be nothing wrong with your dwelling there, and no one will be harmed by it.'

27. "Then, when the righteous Vaiśravaṇa had heard his father's extremely righteous words, he settled in Laṅkā, which was situated on a mountaintop.

28. "In a very short time, at his command, Laṅkā was filled with thousands of rākṣasas, sons of chaos, who were excited and always happy.

29. "And so the son of Viśravas—that righteous lord of the rākṣasas, sons of chaos—dwelt happily there in ocean-shrouded Laṅkā.

30. "From time to time, taking the Puṣpaka flying palace, the dutiful lord of wealth in great delight would visit his mother and father.

31. "Haloed with splendor and lauded by the hosts of gods and gandharvas, who were accompanied by the perfected beings and celestial bards, he resembled the sun haloed with radiance, together with its rays, as he approached his father."

The end of the third sarga of the Uttarakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 4

1. When Rāma heard the words that Agastya had uttered to the effect that there had been rākṣasas in Laṅkā even before that time, he was astonished.

2. Then, shaking his head in astonishment and gazing fixedly at Agastya, whose appearance was like that of the three sacrificial fires, he spoke:

3. "So, holy one, Laṅkā belonged to the flesh-eating rākṣasas even before that time. Upon hearing this from you, sir, I am astonished.

4. "We had always heard that the rākṣasas sprang from the lineage of Pulastya. But now you have said that their origin was from somewhere else.

5. "Were those rākṣasas more powerful even than Rāvaṇa, Kumbhakarṇa, Prahasta, Vikaṭa, and the sons of Rāvaṇa?

6. "Who was their progenitor, O brahman? What was his name? What was the power of his austerities? And what crime did they commit that they were driven out long ago by Viṣṇu?

7. "Please tell me all about this in detail, blameless sage. Just as the sun dispels the dark, please dispel this curiosity that has been produced in me."

8. When Agastya had heard Rāghava's words, adorned as they were with such refinement, he was mildly astonished, and he said to him:

9. "In the beginning, lotus-born Prajāpati, who was born from the waters, created the waters and then created creatures to protect them.

10. "Oppressed with the fear of hunger and thirst, those creatures stood humbly before their creator, saying, 'What are we to do?'

11. "And Prajāpati, gently smiling, replied to those creatures. That bestower of self-esteem addressed them with these words: 'You must stand guard diligently.'

12. "The creator of beings was then addressed by those who were not hungry, who said, 'We shall stand guard,' and also by the others who were hungry, who said, 'We shall eat.' And he said to them:

13. " 'Let those among you who said, "We shall stand guard," be the "rākṣasas," and let those among you who said, "We shall eat," be the "yakṣas." '

14. "Now among the former, there were two brothers Heti and Praheti. Those two bulls among the rākṣasas were tamers of their foes just like Madhu and Kaiṭabha.

15. "Of the two of them, righteous Praheti did not desire a wife, while Heti made strenuous efforts to get married.

16. "And so the immeasurable and highly intelligent Heti of his own accord married Kāla's sister, the terrifying maiden named Bhayā.

17. "With her, that bull among rākṣasas Heti, foremost of those possessing sons, fathered a son known as Vidyutkeśa.

18. "And Heti's son, Vidyutkeśa, whose radiance was equal to that of a blazing fire and who possessed immense blazing energy, grew like a lotus in the midst of the waters.

19. "When that night-roaming rākṣasa attained the splendid bloom of youth, his father undertook to arrange his marriage.

20. "On his behalf, that bull among rākṣasas, Heti, asked for the daughter of Sandhyā, who was like Sandhyā herself in radiance.

21. "Thinking, 'She must to be given away to someone,' Sandhyā gave her daughter to Vidyutkeśa, O Rāghava.

22. "And the night-roaming rākṣasa Vidyutkeśa, having obtained Sandhyā's daughter, made love with her, just as does magnanimous Indra with Paulomī.

23. "Now after some time, Rāma, Sālakaṭaṅkaṭā became pregnant by Vidyutkeśa, just as a bank of storm clouds becomes laden with water from the ocean.

24. "Then that rākṣasa woman went to Mount Mandara where she gave birth to a child, as lustrous as lightning, the child of the clouds, just as the Ganges gave birth to the child born of Agni.

25. "But no sooner had she given birth to Vidyutkeśa's child, than, eager to make love, she forgot all about the son that had been born to her and made love with her husband.

26. "Abandoned by her, that infant, whose radiance was equal to that of the autumnal sun, put his hand in his mouth and cried like a mighty thundercloud.

27. "At that very time, Lord Hara, mounted on his bull, together with Umā, was passing by through the heavens and spied the weeping rākṣasa child.

28. "Moved by Pārvatī's tenderheartedness, Bhava, the slayer of Tripura, made the rākṣasa child the same age as its mother.

29. "And moreover, in his desire to please Pārvatī, Mahādeva, who is indestructible and unchangeable, made him immortal and gave him a city that could fly through the sky.

30. "And, O prince, for her part, Umā granted this boon to rākṣasa women such that they should conceive and deliver a child at the very same moment and that the child should instantly become the same age as its mother.

31. "Then Sukeśa, having received such divine majesty from Lord Hara, was proud at having received those boons. And because he had obtained that city that could fly through the sky, that highly intelligent rākṣasa, moving through the sky, traveled everywhere, just like Indra, the smasher of citadels."

The end of the fourth sarga of the Uttarakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 5

1–2. "Now, when the gandharva named Grāmaṇī, who was equal in radiance to Viśvāvasu, saw that the rākṣasa Sukeśa was righteous and had received those boons, he gave him, in accordance with righteousness, his daughter named Devavatī, who was like a second Śrī, goddess of fortune, just as Dakṣa gave Śrī herself.

3. “Once she had acquired her beloved husband, who was endowed with lordly power through the gift of those boons, Devavatī was as happy as a pauper who has come into wealth.

4. “With her at his side, that night-roaming rākṣasa looked as splendid as a great bull elephant—a descendant of Añjana—with his cow.

5. “And, Rāghava, the rākṣasa lord Sukeśa fathered three sons with Devavatī. They were the rākṣasas Mālyavān, Sumālin, and Mālin, foremost among the mighty, and they were the equals of the three-eyed lord, Śiva.

6. “They were as imperturbable as the three worlds, and they were as well established as the three sacred fires. They were as formidable as the three mantras and as terrible as the three dreaded diseases.

7. “The three sons of Sukeśa, whose splendor was equal to that of the three sacred fires, continued to grow there like illnesses that have been neglected.

8. “Realizing that their father had obtained boons and enormous lordly power from them, the brothers went to Mount Meru and resolved to perform austerities.

9. “And, O foremost of kings, taking fearsome vows, they practiced fearsome austerities that were terrifying to all beings.

10. “With these austerities—so hard to accomplish in this world and practiced with truth, sincerity, and self-control—they tormented the three worlds, including the gods, asuras, and men.

11. “Then, mounted in a splendid flying chariot, the four-faced Lord Brahmā addressed the sons of Sukeśa, saying, ‘I am the granter of boons.’

12. “Recognizing that Brahmā, who was accompanied by Indra and the hosts of gods, was the granter of boons, they all cupped their hands in reverence and, trembling like trees, said:

13. “ ‘If, O Lord, you are pleased with our austerities and wish to grant us a boon, then may we become unconquerable slayers of our enemies, long lived, powerful, and devoted to one another.’

14. “ ‘It shall be so!’ said the Lord to the sons of Sukeśa. Then Brahmā, who is so fond of brahmans, departed for the Brahmaloka.

15. “Then, Rāma, once they had obtained that boon from him, all those night-roaming rākṣasas became quite fearless through the gift of the boon, and they harried the gods and asuras.

16. "Being slaughtered by them, the thirty gods, together with the hosts of seers and the celestial bards, could find no one to save them any more than can men who have gone to hell.

17. "Then, best of the Raghus, those rākṣasas came together and, in great delight, said to the imperishable Viśvakarman, the foremost of artisans:

18. "'You, sir, are the builder of the mansions of the gods. Please, O highly intelligent lord, build one for us as well, such as our heart desires.

19. "'Whether resting on Himalaya, Meru, or Mandara, please build a great mansion for us, just like the mansion of Maheśvara.'

20. "Then great-armed Viśvakarman told those rākṣasas about a dwelling place that was just like Śakra's Amarāvatī.

21–22. "'On the shore of the southern ocean stands the mountain called Trikūṭa. On its cloudlike middle peak, inaccessible even to the birds and leveled on all four sides by stonecutters' tools, I, instructed by Śakra, have built a city called Laṅkā. It is thirty leagues in breadth, and its ramparts and gateways are of gold.

23. "'You unassailable and most excellent rākṣasas should dwell in that city, just as in Amarāvatī do the gods, the denizens of heaven, together with Indra.

24. "'Once you, surrounded by many rākṣasas, have settled in the citadel of Laṅkā, you will be unassailable by your enemies, O destroyers of your foes.'

25. "When those rākṣasas had heard these words of Viśvakarman, Rāma, they went with thousands of followers to the city of Laṅkā and dwelt there.

26. "Once those night-roaming rākṣasas had taken possession of Laṅkā with its moats and massive ramparts and with its hundreds of golden mansions, they were delighted and dwelt there happily.

27. "At that time there was a gandharva woman by the name of Narmadā, who had prospered through her various virtues. And she had three daughters, who were equal in splendor to the goddesses Hrī, Śrī, and Kīrti.

28. "Although she was not a rākṣasa woman, she happily gave her daughters, whose faces were like the full moon, to those three rākṣasas in order of their age.

29. "And thus were those three illustrious gandharva maidens given by their mother to the three rākṣasa lords under the lunar asterism presided over by Bhaga, the god of marriage.

30. "Once the sons of Sukeśa were married, Lord Rāma, they amused themselves with their wives, just as do the immortal gods with the apsarases.

31. "Mālyavān's wife was the beautiful Sundarī. Now learn of the offspring that he fathered with her.

32. "They were Vajramuṣṭi, Virūpākṣa, the rākṣasa Durmukha, Suptaghna, Yajñakopa, and Matta and Unmatta as well. And, Rāma, Sundarī had a beautiful daughter named Analā.

33. "And Sumālin, too, had a wife, whose face was like the full moon. Her name was Ketumatī, and she was dearer to him than life itself.

34. "Now, your majesty, learn, in due order, of the offspring that the night-roaming rākṣasa Sumālin fathered upon Ketumatī.

35–36. "And these are known as the offspring of Sumālin: Prahasta, Akampana, Vikaṭa, Kālakārmuka, Dhūmrākṣa, Daṇḍa, immensely powerful Supārśva, Saṃhrādi, Praghasa, the rākṣasa Bhāsakarṇa, Rākā, Puṣpotkaṭā, Kaikasī of the bright smile, and Kumbhīnasī.

37. "And as for Mālin, his wife was the beautiful and lovely-eyed gandharva woman named Vasudā. With her eyes like lotus petals, she was equal to the foremost of yakṣa women.

38. "And now, Lord Rāghava, hear from me, as I relate them, the offspring that the younger brother of Sumālin fathered with her.

39. "Those night-roaming rākṣasas, the sons of Mālin, were Anala, Anila, Hara, and Saṃpāti, and they became the ministers of Vibhīṣaṇa.

40. "Then those three bulls among the rākṣasas, arrogant in their strength and valor, surrounded by hundreds of their sons and the night-roaming rākṣasas, harassed the gods—including Indra—the seers, great serpents, and dānavas.

41. "In their overwhelming arrogance at the gift of their boons, those rākṣasas, unstoppable as a mighty gale, tore through the world. Intent and equal to Mṛtyu himself in battle, they constantly destroyed the sacred rites."

The end of the fifth sarga of the Uttarakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 6

1. "Since the gods as well as the seers, so rich in austerities, were being slaughtered by those rākṣasas, they were overwhelmed by fear and took refuge with Maheśvara, the God of gods.

2. "Coming together, the gods cupped their hands in reverence, and, their speech choked with fear, they addressed the three-eyed foe of Kāma and Tripura:

3. " 'O holy Lord of all creatures, harrier of your foes! All creatures are being harried by the sons of Sukeśa, who have become arrogant through the boons of Grandfather Brahmā.

4. " 'Our ashrams, which were places of refuge, no longer offer sanctuary. Śakra has been cast out of heaven, and they disport themselves there as if they were he.

5–6. " 'Crying, "I am Viṣṇu! I am Rudra! I am Brahmā! I am Indra, king of the gods! I am Yama! I am Varuṇa! I am Candra, the moon god! I am Ravi, the sun god!" those rākṣasas, O Lord, arrogant through the gift of their boons and reveling in battle, harry us as do their followers.

7. " 'So please, Lord, grant us protection as we are overcome with fear. Please take on a fearsome form and slay them who are a thorn in the side of the gods.'

8. "When he had been addressed in this fashion by all of the gods, the dark blue lord of the matted locks, being partial to Sukeśa, said this to the hosts of the gods:

9. " 'I shall not slay them, for these asuras are not to be killed by me. However, I shall give you some advice that will surely bring about their death.

10. " 'You must exert yourselves in the following manner, O bulls among gods! You must go for refuge to Viṣṇu. That lord will kill them.'

11. "Then, once they had extolled Maheśvara with cries of 'Be victorious!' they approached Viṣṇu, afflicted as they were by fear of the night-roaming rākṣasas.

12. "Afflicted with fear of Sukeśa's sons, they prostrated themselves and honored the God who bears the conch and the discus. In their agitation, they spoke these words:

13. " 'Through the gift of their boons, O God, the three sons of Sukeśa, who resemble the three sacred fires, have attacked us and usurped our places.

14. “‘Situated on the peak of Mount Trikūṭa, there is a fortified citadel called Laṅkā. With that as their base, those night-roaming rākṣasas harass us all.

15. “‘As a favor to us, please kill them, Madhusūdana. Please make an offering to Yama of their lotuslike faces severed by your discus.

16. “‘For when danger arises, there is none to equal you as grantor of protection for us. Please dispel this danger to us, Lord, as the sun, maker of day, does the mist.’

17. “When he had been addressed in this fashion by the gods, the God of gods, Janārdana, who inspires fear in his enemies, granted protection and said to the gods:

18. “‘I realize that the rākṣasa Sukeśa has grown arrogant through the boon of Lord Śiva. And I also know about his sons of whom Mālyavān is the eldest.

19. “‘I shall slaughter in battle those lowest of rākṣasas, who have transgressed all bounds. You need not be anxious, O gods.’

20. “Addressed in this fashion by the powerful Lord Viṣṇu, the gods all returned in great delight to their respective abodes, praising Janārdana.

21. “Now, when the night-roaming rākṣasa Mālyavān heard about the mission of the wise gods, he said this to his two heroic brothers:

22. “‘I have heard that the gods and seers, desiring to bring about our death, have joined forces and have said this to three-eyed Śaṅkara:

23. “‘“O Lord, the fearsome-looking sons of Sukeśa, arrogant because of the power of the boons they have been given, have put forth their energies and are harrying us at every step.

24. “‘“We have been defeated by the rākṣasas, O lord of Umā, and, for fear of those evil creatures, we cannot even remain in our own homes.

25. “‘“Therefore, for our sake, O three-eyed Lord, please kill them all. O foremost of those who burn! Burn up those rākṣasas by uttering the syllable ‘Hum.’”

26. “‘Addressed in this fashion by the thirty gods, Śiva, the slayer of Andhaka, first listened and then, shaking his head and his hand, said this:

27. “‘“It is not for me to kill the sons of Sukeśa in battle, O gods. However, I will give you some advice that will surely bring about their death.

28. “ ‘ “But Janārdana, who wears yellow garments and holds the discus and mace in his hands, will slay them in battle. You must approach him for refuge.”

29. “ ‘Not having received what they desired from Hara, they respectfully saluted that foe of Kāma and then, proceeding to the abode of Nārāyaṇa, reported everything to him.

30. “ ‘Then the gods, headed by Indra, were addressed thus by Nārāyaṇa: “I shall slaughter the foes of the gods. You need not be anxious, O gods.”

31. “ ‘Thus, O bulls among rākṣasas, Hari has vowed to the terrified gods to kill us. Therefore you must think of some appropriate response.

32. “ ‘For he was the death of Hiraṇyakaśipu and other foes of the gods. This Nārāyaṇa, who desires to kill us, is extremely difficult to defeat.’

33. “Then, when Sumālin and Mālin had heard Mālyavān’s words, they spoke to their elder brother as might Bhaga and Aṃśa to Vāsava.

34. “ ‘We have studied the vedas, given charitably, offered sacrifices, and safeguarded our sovereignty. We have lived a healthy life and have adhered to our proper duties.

35. “ ‘With mighty rivers in the form of our weapons, we have plunged deep into the imperturbable ocean that is the host of the gods. We have always defeated them in battle. For us there is no fear of death.

36. “ ‘Nārāyaṇa, Rudra, Śakra, and Yama—all of them fear to stand before us.

37. “ ‘It is no fault of Viṣṇu that is the cause of this, O lord of the rākṣasas. It is the fault of the gods alone that Viṣṇu’s mind has been stirred up.

38. “ ‘Therefore, this very day, putting forth our energies and surrounded by all of our troops, we shall willingly slaughter the gods on account of whom this trouble has arisen.’

39. “When Mālin and Sumālin and their elder brother, the lord Mālyavān, had declared their plan in this fashion, all three rākṣasas marched forth in a rage to battle, just like Jambha, Vṛtra, and Bala.

40–42. “Then, arrogant in their strength, all the rākṣasas, enemies of the gods, leaving Laṅkā in order to do battle, set out for the world of the gods mounted on chariots, splendid elephants, horses as huge as mountains, donkeys, cattle, camels, dolphins, serpents, crocodiles, tortoises, fish, birds that resembled Garuḍa, lions, tigers, boars, gaur, and yaks.

43. "Meanwhile, all those beings who dwelt in Laṅkā, foreseeing the destruction of the city and anticipating the danger, became despondent.

44. "Then, set in motion by Kāla, dreadful portents swiftly arose on the ground and in the air, presaging the destruction of the rākṣasa lords.

45. "The clouds rained down bones and hot blood. The ocean breached its shore and the mighty mountains shook.

46. "Thousands of malevolent spirits whirled about, dancing and releasing raucous laughter with a sound like that of thunder.

47. "And a great wheeling flock of vultures, spewing fire from their beaks, circled above the rākṣasas like the wheel of time itself.

48. "But disregarding those dire omens, the rākṣasas, arrogant as they were in their strength and snared in the noose of Mṛtyu, did not turn back but marched onward.

49. "The night-roaming rākṣasas Mālyavān, Sumālin, and Mālin preceded them, just as the three sacred fires precede the sacrificial rites.

50. "All the night-roaming rākṣasas placed their faith in Mālyavān, unshakable as Mount Mālyavān, just as all creatures place their faith in the Creator.

51. "Thundering like a great bank of storm clouds, that army of the rākṣasa lords, desirous of victory, under Mālin's command marched upon the world of the gods.

52. "Now, when Lord Nārāyaṇa had heard from a messenger of the gods about the expedition of the rākṣasas, he resolved to fight.

53. "Lauded by the apsarases and the foremost gandharvas and wielding his excellent discus, sword, ploughshare, and the rest, together with the gods, perfected beings, seers, and great serpents, he advanced upon the army of the enemies of the gods.

54. "With its divisions driven back by the wind from Suparṇa's wings, its banners flapping and its weapons scattered, the army of the rākṣasa king was shaken like a dark lord of mountains, its boulders shaken loose.

55. "Then, surrounding Mādhava in their thousands, the night-roaming rākṣasas, whose appearance was like that of the fire at the end of a cosmic era, riddled him with their splendid weapons, sharp and stained with blood and flesh."

The end of the sixth sarga of the Uttarakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 7

1. "Just as storm clouds pelt a mountain with torrential rains, thundering storm clouds in the form of rākṣasas pelted that mountain in the form of Nārāyaṇa with torrents of arrows.

2. "Surrounded by the dark chieftains of the night-roaming rākṣasas, dark and lustrous Viṣṇu resembled a mountain of collyrium shrouded by clouds releasing torrential rains.

3–4. "As locusts swarm into a field of grain and flies enter a mountain, as living beings might plunge into a pot of nectar or crocodiles into the sea, indeed, as all the worlds enter him at the time of universal destruction, so, loosed from the rākṣasas' bows, did those arrows, powerful as thunderbolts and swift as the wind or thought itself, plunge into Hari.

5–6. "With arrows, javelins, broadswords, and iron cudgels, those mountainous rākṣasa lords—the chariot warriors with their chariots, the elephant riders with their elephants, the cavalrymen with their splendid steeds, and the foot soldiers moving through the air—made Hari hold his breath as the exercise of breath control does a twice-born brahman.

7–8. "Harried by the night-roaming rākṣasas, like a mighty whale by shoals of fish, Viṣṇu drew his horn bow, and, in that great battle, with his swift thunderbolt-headed arrows drawn back fully and then released, he cut into pieces no bigger than sesame seeds the bodies of the rākṣasas in their hundreds and thousands.

9. "Driving away that hail of arrows, as does the wind a shower of rain that has sprung up, Viṣṇu, the Supreme Spirit, winded his great conch, Pāñcajanya.

10. "Mightily winded by Hari, that king of conches, born of the waters, sounded with a fearsome roar like a storm cloud at the end of a cosmic age.

11. "The blare of that king of conches terrified the rākṣasas as a lion, the king of beasts, does forest elephants in rut.

12. "The horses could not keep their footing, and the elephants were stripped of all their ardor. The warriors tumbled from their chariots, unmanned by the blare of the conch.

13. "Released from his horn bow, his well-fletched arrows, their heads like thunderbolts, tore through the rākṣasas and plunged into the earth.

14. "Pierced by the arrows loosed from Nārāyaṇa's bow, the remaining fearsome rākṣasas fell like mountains struck by lightning.

15. "Those injurious and inimical rākṣasas gushed forth blood in streams from the wounds inflicted by Adhokṣaja's arrows, just as mountains might a golden stream.

16. "The blare of that king of conches, the twang of the horn bow, and Viṣṇu's war cry drowned out the cries of the rākṣasas.

17–18. "Like the fierce rays of the sun or waves of the ocean, like serpent lords from a mountain or like torrents of water from a storm cloud, so did those arrows—arrows loosed from the horn bow and set in motion by Nārāyaṇa—fly swiftly onward in their hundreds and thousands.

19–21. "Put to flight by powerful Viṣṇu, just like lions by a śarabha, elephants by a lion, tigers by an elephant, leopards by a tiger, dogs by a leopard, cats by a dog, snakes by a cat, or rats by a snake, some of the rākṣasas fled in battle, while others lay sprawled on the ground.

22. "When Madhusūdana had slain thousands of rākṣasas, he made his conch, born of the waters, resound, as the king of the gods does a storm cloud.

23. "Overwhelmed by Nārāyaṇa's arrows and utterly dazed by the blare of his conch, the rākṣasa host broke ranks and fled toward Laṅkā.

24. "When the rākṣasa host, battered by Nārāyaṇa's arrows, had broken ranks, Sumālin covered Hari with a hail of arrows in battle.

25. "Raising a gold-ornamented hand, as an elephant might its trunk, the rākṣasa roared in his excitement like a cloud laced with lightning.

26. "But even as Sumālin roared, Viṣṇu cut off his charioteer's head, with its flashing earrings, so that the rākṣasa's horses ran wild.

27. "The rākṣasa lord Sumālin was dragged away by those horses as they ran wild, just as is a man lacking self-control, by the horses in the form of the senses when they run wild.

28. "Seizing a bow and arrows, Mālin raced forward in battle. Loosed from Mālin's bow, his arrows, adorned with gold, struck Hari and passed through him like birds through Mount Krauñca.

29. "Assailed by those arrows loosed by Mālin in their thousands, Viṣṇu was no more shaken in battle than is a man who has subdued his senses troubled by worldly cares.

30. "Then, twanging his bowstring, the holy creator of all beings, bearer of the sword and mace, released a torrent of arrows upon Mālin.

31. "Those arrows, whose brilliance was like that of the vajra or lightning, struck Mālin's body and drank his blood just as, long ago, the great serpents drank the nectar.

32. “Hari powerfully struck down Mālin’s diadem, chariot, battle standard, bow, and horses, forcing Mālin to retreat.

33. “Robbed of his chariot, Mālin, foremost of night-roaming rākṣasas, seized a mace and with it in hand sprang up, as might a lion from a mountain peak.

34. “With that mace he struck Garuḍa on the forehead in battle, just as Yama, the ender of all things, struck Lord Śiva or as Indra might strike a mountain with his vajra.

35. “Violently struck with that mace by Mālin, Garuḍa, reeling from the pain, forced the god to retreat from the battlefield.

36. “After Mālin had made Garuḍa force the god to retreat from the battlefield, a mighty roar arose from the roaring rākṣasas.

37. “Even though he had been forced to retreat, Viṣṇu, the younger brother of Indra of the bay steeds, hearing the roar of the roaring rākṣasas, hurled his discus in his desire to kill Mālin.

38. “Its radiance, like that of the disc of the sun, lighting up the heavens with its own radiance, that discus, like the wheel of time itself, severed Mālin’s head.

39. “Gushing blood, the fearsome head of the rākṣasa lord fell, just as did Rāhu’s long ago.

40. “Then the gods in their delight released a cry, uttered with all their might, like a lion’s roar, shouting, ‘Well done, O God!’

41. “When Sumālin and Mālyavān saw that Mālin had been slain, they were tormented with grief, and, together with their army, they fled back to Laṅkā.

42. “Once great-minded Garuḍa had recouped his strength and turned back, he was enraged and, with the wind of his wings, drove the rākṣasas before him.

43. “With his thunderbolts in the form of the splendid arrows loosed from his bow, Nārāyaṇa rent the night-roaming rākṣasas, their hair broken loose and flying about, just as great Indra, armed with lightning, might with his thunderbolts.

44. “Their umbrellas shattered, their weapons fallen, their bodies scattered and torn by arrows, their entrails spilling forth, their eyes rolling in terror, the troops seemed to have gone mad.

45. “The screams and flailing of the night-roaming rākṣasas and their elephants—like those of elephants attacked by a lion—were similar to the screams and flailing of those who were slaughtered by the one who was himself a lion long ago.

46. "Covered by the mass of Hari's arrows, those black storm clouds in the form of the night-roaming rākṣasas, dropping their own masses of arrows, fled like black storm clouds driven by the wind.

47. "Their heads severed by blows of the discus, their limbs smashed by blows of the mace, and hacked to pieces by strokes of the sword, the rākṣasa lords collapsed like mountains.

48–49. "Their lotuslike heads were severed by the discus. Their chests were crushed by the mace. Their necks were lopped off by the ploughshare. Their foreheads were shattered by the cudgels. Some were hacked by the sword, while others were struck with arrows. And thus the rākṣasas fell swiftly from the sky into the waters of the ocean.

50. "As they were being hurled down with their necklaces and earrings slipping off, the night-roaming rākṣasas, resembling black storm clouds, completely filled the sky so that it looked as if it were filled with black mountains that were being hurled down."

The end of the seventh sarga of the Uttarakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 8

1. "Now, as the retreating army was being slaughtered by lotus-navelled Viṣṇu, Mālyavān turned back as does the ocean when it has gone beyond its shore.

2. "His eyes red with rage and his diadem trembling, the night-roaming rākṣasa then addressed these harsh words to lotus-navelled Viṣṇu:

3. " 'Nārāyaṇa, you must not know the immemorial code of the warrior, since like some commoner you are slaughtering us, who have been broken and have no heart to fight.

4. " 'O Lord of the gods! A killer who commits the sin of slaying a fleeing foe cannot attain the heaven of the virtuous after death.

5. " 'But if you still crave combat, bearer of the conch, discus, and mace, then here I am. Show me your power! I am watching.'

6. "Then the mighty younger brother of the king of the gods addressed the rākṣasa lord, saying: 'I promised the gods—who were terrified in fear of you—protection in the form of the annihilation of the rākṣasas. This is the fulfillment of that.

7. “ ‘I must always do what pleases the gods, even if it costs me my life. So I will slaughter you all even should you flee to the underworld Rasātala.’

8. “But even as the god, his eyes like red lotuses, was speaking in this fashion, the rākṣasa lord, infuriated, pierced him with his javelin and roared.

9. “Hurled by Mālyavān’s arm and resounding with the sound of its bells, that javelin, now in Hari’s chest, shone like a bolt of lightning shooting from a storm cloud.

10. “But then the lotus-eyed lord, beloved of the javelin-wielder Skanda, pulled out that javelin and taking aim, hurled it at Mālyavān.

11. “Loosed from Govinda’s hand as if hurled by Skanda, that javelin sped onward, heading straight for the rākṣasa, like a blazing meteor heading straight for a mountain of collyrium.

12. “It fell upon the rākṣasa lord’s chest, broad and splendid with the luster of his necklace, like a thunderbolt upon a mountain peak.

13. “His armor pierced by that javelin, Mālyavān fell into a profound stupor. But then, once more coming to his senses, he took his stand like an immovable mountain.

14. “Then, seizing a lance of black iron studded with many spikes, he struck the god firmly in the middle of his chest.

15. “And then that night-roaming rākṣasa, so fond of battle, having struck the younger brother of Vāsava with his fist, stepped back a bow’s length.

16. “Then in the sky there arose a mighty cheer, ‘Well done! Well done!’ After striking Viṣṇu, the rākṣasa also struck Garuḍa.

17. “Enraged, Vainateya drove off the rākṣasa with the wind from his wings, just as a powerful gale might a heap of dry leaves.

18. “Now, when Sumālin saw his elder brother driven off by the wind from the wings of the lord of birds, he turned toward Laṅkā and, together with his troops, fled.

19. “And the rākṣasa Mālyavān, himself having been driven back by the force of the wind from those wings, was filled with shame and, rejoining his troops, also fled to Laṅkā.

20. “In this way, lotus-eyed Rāma, the rākṣasas, their foremost leader slain, were broken in battle time and again by Hari.

21. "Unable to stand against Viṣṇu in battle and overcome with fear, they abandoned Laṅkā and, together with their wives, went to live in the underworld known as Pātāla.

22. "And so, delight of the Raghus, those rākṣasas in the lineage of Sālakaṭaṅkaṭā, renowned for their valor, rallied around the rākṣasa Sumālin and dwelt there.

23. "Now the rākṣasas that you yourself killed, illustrious Rāma, were known as the Paulastyas. But Sumālin, Mālyavān, Mālin, and their followers were all much more powerful than Rāvaṇa.

24. "There is no one, conqueror of citadels, even among the gods, who could kill those rākṣasas other than Lord Nārāyaṇa, the bearer of the conch, discus, and mace.

25. "And you are that God, the eternal four-armed Nārāyaṇa, the unconquerable and unchanging Lord, who took birth in order to slaughter the rākṣasas."

The end of the eighth sarga of the Uttarakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 9

1–2. "Now, after some time, the rākṣasa Sumālin, who with his earrings of burnished gold resembled a black storm cloud, left Rasātala and wandered all over the world of men, taking with him his unmarried daughter, who was like Śrī but for the lotus. Then he spied Kubera, the lord of wealth, going by in the flying palace Puṣpaka.

3. "When the rākṣasa saw him going by looking like an immortal god and resembling Agni, the purifier, he spoke to his daughter, who was called by the name Kaikasī.

4. " 'Your youth is passing, daughter, it is time to give you away. Intent on practicing righteousness, we have made every effort on your behalf.

5. " 'For you, dear daughter, you are endowed with every virtue, like Śrī with her lotus. Still, you have not been chosen by any suitor out of fear of rejection.

6. " 'For all those concerned about their honor, being a father of an unmarried girl is a burden, since, dear daughter, one does not know who might wish to marry the girl.

7. " 'A young girl will always remain a source of suspicion for three families—that of her mother, that of her father, and the one into which she is given.

8. “ ‘Daughter, you must approach that foremost of eminent sages Viśravas Paulastya, born in the lineage of Prajāpati, and ask him yourself to marry you.

9. “ ‘Without a doubt, daughter, you shall have sons who will be equal in blazing energy to the sun and who will be just like the lord of wealth.’

10. “At that very time, Rāma, Pulastya’s son, a brahman resembling a fourth sacrificial fire, was performing the agnihotra rite.

11. “Taking no thought for that fearsome hour out of respect for her father, she approached and stood before the seer, her gaze lowered to her feet.

12. “Looking at that fair-hipped woman, her face like the full moon, the highly illustrious sage, blazing, as it were, with his vital energy, spoke:

13. “ ‘Whose daughter are you, my good woman? Where have you come from and for what reason? What can I do for you? Tell me truthfully, lovely lady.’

14. “Addressed in this fashion, the young girl cupped her hands in reverence and then said: ‘Please determine my intention through your own power, sage.

15. “ ‘But, brahman, you must know that I have come here on my father’s instructions, and that I am known by the name Kaikasī. Please determine the rest for yourself.’

16. “Entering into meditation, the sage said these words: ‘My good woman, I have discovered the purpose that you have in mind.

17. “ ‘However, since you approached me at a fearsome hour, now learn what kind of sons you will bear.

18. “ ‘Fair-hipped woman, you shall give birth to rākṣasas of cruel deeds. They shall be fearsome, fearsome in appearance, and devoted to their fearsome kin.’

19. “Now, when she had heard these words, she prostrated herself and spoke these words: ‘Holy one, sons such as these are not worthy of you, a descendant of Lord Brahmā.’

20. “Then, regarding her concern, the sage said, ‘Your youngest son shall be righteous and worthy of my lineage.’

21–22. “After some time, Rāma, the young girl, who had been addressed in this fashion, gave birth to a horrendous and very fearsome child, who had the form of a rākṣasa. He had ten heads, huge fangs, and he looked like a heap of black collyrium. He had coppery lips, twenty arms, huge mouths, and hair that glowed like fire.

23. "The moment he was born, jackals, their mouths emitting flames, and other carnivorous beasts circled in a clockwise direction.

24. "The god rained down blood, and the clouds made a harsh rumbling. The sun vanished from the sky, and great meteors crashed to the ground.

25. "Then his father, who was the equal of Grandfather Brahmā, gave him his name: 'He was born with ten heads, and so he shall be called Daśagrīva, "Ten Necks." '

26. "Immediately after him was born the immensely powerful Kumbhakarṇa, whom no one in this world exceeded in sheer size.

27. "Then were born Śūrpaṇakhā, with her hideous face, and Kaikasī's youngest son, the righteous Vibhīṣaṇa.

28. "There, in the great forest, they grew to be immensely powerful beings. But among them, it was the cruel Daśagrīva who was a source of terror to the worlds.

29. "And as for the reckless and evil Kumbhakarṇa, he roamed about, terrifying the three worlds and devouring the great seers, who were devoted to righteousness.

30. "But as for righteous Vibhīṣaṇa, never deviating from the path of righteousness, he lived with his senses controlled, practicing vedic study and restricting his diet.

31. "Now after some time, the divine lord of wealth came there in his flying palace, the Puṣpaka, to see his immensely powerful father.

32. "When Kaikasī saw Kubera there, blazing, as it were, with his blazing energy, she, thinking like a rākṣasa, said to Daśagrīva:

33. " 'My son, look at your brother, who is haloed with blazing energy. And then, even though your status as his brother makes you his equal, just look at your own condition.

34. " 'Daśagrīva, my son of immeasurable valor, you must exert yourself so that you will quickly become just like Vaiśravaṇa.'

35. "When powerful Daśagrīva had heard those words of his mother, he was filled with intolerable envy, and he then made this vow:

36. " 'I swear to you truthfully, mother, that I shall soon be my brother's equal or even his superior. So give up this heartfelt anguish.'

37. "Filled with that jealous rage, Daśagrīva formed a resolution and vowed, 'I will attain my desire through asceticism.' Then, together with his younger brothers, he proceeded to the splendid ashram of Gokarṇa in order to accomplish his purpose."

The end of the ninth sarga of the Uttarakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 10

1. Then Rāma asked the twice-born brahman: "How did those brothers of great ascetic vows practice their austerities in the forest and what, O brahman, was the nature of their austerities?"

2. And regarding that, Agastya told Rāma, whose thoughts were focused, about the various righteous practices in which the brothers engaged there.

3. "At that time Kumbhakarṇa, strictly controlled and constantly devoted to righteousness, practiced the austerity of the five fires during the hot season.

4. "During the rainy season, drenched with rainwater, he assumed the heroic posture, and, during the cold season, he remained constantly immersed in water.

5. "In this fashion, ten thousand years passed while he, intent upon righteousness, remained fixed in the path of virtue.

6. "Now as for righteous Vibhīṣaṇa, who was pious and constantly devoted to righteousness, he stood on one foot for five thousand years.

7. "When his vow was completed, the troupes of apsarases danced, a shower of flowers fell, and the gods became agitated.

8. "For yet another five thousand years he gazed steadily at the sun, standing with his arms raised above his head and his mind fixed upon vedic recitation.

9. "In this fashion, ten thousand years passed for Vibhīṣaṇa, whose mind was tightly controlled, as they might for a heavenly being in the Nandana garden.

10. "Now as for their ten-faced brother, he remained without food for ten thousand years. And when each full thousand years was completed, he offered one of his heads into the fire as an oblation.

11. "And so in this fashion, nine thousand years passed for him and nine of his heads entered the fire, eater of oblations.

12. "Now at the end of the tenth period of a thousand years, the righteous rākṣasa was just about to sever his tenth head when Grandfather Brahmā came there.

13. "Greatly pleased, Grandfather Brahmā approached him, along with the gods, and said to him: 'Daśagrīva! My child! My child! I am pleased.

14. " 'So quickly, knower of righteousness, choose whatever boon you desire. Shall I grant a wish for you so that your exertions shall not have been in vain?'

15. "Then, delighted at heart, Daśagrīva, bowing his head, spoke to the god in a voice stammering with excitement.

16. " 'Holy one, there is nothing that living beings constantly fear other than death. Indeed, there is no foe equal to death, and so I choose immortality.

17. " 'Lord of creatures, let me be forever invulnerable to the great birds, mighty serpents, and yakṣas, as well as the daityas, dānavas, rākṣasas, and gods.

18. " 'For, O Lord worshiped by the immortal gods, I do not care about other creatures. Indeed, I regard all creatures such as men as if they were mere straws.'

19. "And, Rāma, addressed in this fashion by the rākṣasa Daśagrīva, the righteous Grandfather Brahmā, together with the gods, said these words:

20. " 'It will be just as you wish, bull among rākṣasas. And now, since I am pleased, hear my additional auspicious words.

21. " 'Those heads that you earlier offered as oblations into the fire, blameless rākṣasa, will all be yours once more, just as they were.'

22. "When the rākṣasa Daśagrīva had been addressed in this fashion by Grandfather Brahmā, those heads that had been offered as oblations into the fire materialized.

23. "When Prajāpati, the grandfather of the worlds, had addressed Daśagrīva in this fashion, Rāma, he spoke these words to Vibhīṣaṇa:

24. " 'Vibhīṣaṇa, my child, knower of righteousness, I am pleased with you, for your mind is focused on righteousness.'

25. "Cupping his hands in reverence, righteous Vibhīṣaṇa, ever endowed with every virtue, as is the moon with its beams, said these words:

26. " 'Holy one, I have accomplished my purpose in that you, the guru of the worlds, have appeared in person before me. But if you are pleased, hear now, O you of excellent vows, what boon you should give to me.

27. “ ‘May every thought that I may have in each and every stage of life in this world be supremely righteous. And may I always uphold the righteous conduct appropriate to every stage.

28. “ ‘Most munificent Lord, I believe this to be the greatest of all boons, for nothing whatever in this world is beyond the reach of those who are devoted to righteousness.’

29. “Then, pleased, Prajāpati said to Vibhīṣaṇa: ‘Since you are so supremely righteous, my child, all of this shall come to pass.

30. “ ‘Since, dragger of your foes, no thought of yours is ever unrighteous, even though you are born from a rākṣasa womb, I shall grant you immortality.’

31. “But, Rāma, tamer of your foes, just as Prajāpati was about to grant a boon to Kumbhakarṇa, all the gods, their hands cupped in reverence, said these words to him:

32. “ ‘You must by no means grant a boon to Kumbhakarṇa, for you know how that evil-minded wretch terrorizes the three worlds.

33. “ ‘In the Nandana garden he has devoured seven apsarases as well as ten servants of great Indra. And, Brahmā, he has also devoured seers and men.

34. “ ‘O Lord of immeasurable radiance, under the pretext of a boon, we must befuddle him. And so the welfare of the worlds will be assured, and he himself will be brought down.’

35. “Addressed in this fashion by the gods, Brahmā, born from a lotus, called to mind the goddess Sarasvatī, and she, called to mind, presented herself beside him.

36. “Cupping her hands in reverence as she stood beside him, Sarasvatī spoke these words: ‘I have come, Lord. What duty must I perform?’

37. “Then Prajāpati spoke these words to Sarasvatī, who had come to him: ‘O goddess of speech! You must become the speech that the gods desire to hear from the rākṣasa lord.’

38. “Saying, ‘So be it,’ she entered the rākṣasa’s mouth. Then Prajāpati said, ‘Great-armed Kumbhakarṇa, choose whatever boon you like.’

39. “Now, when Kumbhakarṇa heard those words of his, he spoke these words: ‘O God of gods! What I desire is to sleep for many years.’

40. “And Grandfather Brahmā said to him, ‘So be it.’ Then he and the goddess Sarasvatī, together with the gods, left him and proceeded to heaven.

41. "But as for evil-minded Kumbhakarṇa, he pondered in his misery: 'What kind of words have issued from my mouth this day and why?'

42. "When those brothers of intense blazing energy had all received boons in this fashion, they went to a forest of śleṣmātaka trees and dwelt happily there."

The end of the tenth sarga of the Uttarakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 11

1. "Now, when Sumālin learned that those night-roaming rākṣasas had been granted those boons, he abandoned his fear and, together with his followers, came up from Rasātala.

2. "The rākṣasa's ministers—Mārīca, Prahasta, Virūpākṣa, and Mahodara—also came up, filled with bitter indignation.

3. "And surrounded by all of those bulls among rākṣasas, Sumālin approached Daśagrīva, and, embracing him, said this:

4. " 'Through great good fortune, my son, you have attained your long-cherished desire in that you have received such a boon from the ruler of the triple world.

5. " 'Our great fear of Viṣṇu, because of which we abandoned Laṅkā and fled to Rasātala, is now banished, O great-armed hero.

6. " 'For, broken by him again and again, we abandoned our own home and, fleeing all together, entered Rasātala.

7. " 'Our own city of Laṅkā, once inhabited by the rākṣasas, has now been occupied by your brother, the wise lord of wealth.

8. " 'Indeed, blameless one, if it is possible to get it back, whether by conciliation, bribery, or force, then, great-armed one, it ought to be done.

9. " 'And you, my child, will, without doubt, become the lord of Laṅkā. Thus, immensely powerful warrior, you will become the ruler of us all.'

10. "But Daśagrīva replied to his maternal grandfather, who stood before him, 'You must not speak in this fashion. The lord of wealth is our revered elder.'

11. "Then the night-roaming rākṣasa Prahasta humbly addressed these purposeful words to Daśagrīva, who had spoken in this fashion:

12. “ ‘Great-armed Daśagrīva, you should not speak in this fashion. There can be no brotherly affection among heroes. Now listen to these words of mine:

13. “ ‘It is said that the two exquisitely beautiful sisters Aditi and Diti together became the wives of Prajāpati Kaśyapa.

14. “ ‘Aditi gave birth to the gods, the lords of the triple world, while Diti gave birth to the daityas. They were all sons of Kaśyapa.

15. “ ‘They say, heroic knower of righteousness, that long ago this earth, together with its forests, oceans, and mountains, belonged to the daityas. Thus, they became the more powerful.

16. “ ‘But then, when the powerful Lord Viṣṇu had slaughtered them in battle, this imperishable triple world was brought under the control of the gods.

17. “ ‘You, sir, would not be the only one to engage in such enmity, for it was engaged in long ago by the gods themselves. Therefore, you should do as I say.’

18. “When Daśagrīva had been addressed in this fashion by the evil-minded Prahasta, he reflected for a moment and then said, ‘Very well.’

19. “And so that very day mighty Daśagrīva, filled with delight, proceeded with the night-roaming rākṣasas to the forest.

20. “When the night-roaming rākṣasa Daśagrīva had reached Mount Trikūṭa, he dispatched Prahasta, who was skilled in speech, as a messenger, saying:

21. “ ‘Prahasta! You must go at once and, in a conciliatory manner, using my own words, address this speech to the lord of wealth, that bull among the rākṣasas, sons of chaos.

22. “ ‘ “Your majesty, this city of Laṅkā belongs to the great rākṣasas. It is not right, gentle and blameless brother, that you have occupied it.

23. “ ‘ “If you, sir, a person of unequaled valor, were to surrender it peacefully, you would be doing me a favor while adhering to righteousness.” ’

24. “Addressed in this fashion, Prahasta, who was skilled in speech, went and reported the entire speech of Daśagrīva to the lord of wealth.

25. “Now, when the divinity Vaiśravaṇa, who was skilled in speech, had heard these words from Prahasta, he replied to him with these words:

26. “ ‘Go and say to Daśagrīva: “The city and kingdom that are mine are yours as well, great armed-hero. Please enjoy them without impediment of any kind.

27. “ ‘“Rest assured, I will shortly do everything that the rākṣasa lord has asked, but please wait a bit while I inform our father.”’

28. “When the overlord of wealth had spoken in this fashion, he approached his father. After respectfully saluting his elder, he told him what Rāvaṇa wanted:

29. “ ‘Dear father, Daśagrīva has sent me an emissary with the message: “Please give back the city of Laṅkā, which was formerly inhabited by the hosts of rākṣasas.” So now, sage of excellent vows, tell me what I should do in this matter.’

30. “Addressed in this fashion, that bull among sages, the brahman-seer Viśravas, spoke these words to the giver of wealth: ‘Listen, my son, to these words of mine:

31. “ ‘Great-armed Daśagrīva said this in my presence as well. But I rebuked that extremely evil-minded one, and I warned him repeatedly.

32. “ ‘I angrily told him again and again, “You will surely bring ruin upon yourself!” But now listen, my son, to these words of mine, which are in keeping with righteousness and will work to your advantage.

33. “ ‘Deluded by the granting of his boon, this very evil-minded rākṣasa, who is of a vicious nature because of my curse, does not know whom he should and should not treat respectfully.

34. “ ‘Therefore, great-armed hero, you should go to Mount Kailāsa and found a city where you may dwell. You must leave Laṅkā together with your followers.

35. “ ‘There the best of rivers, the lovely Mandākinī River, flows—its waters covered with golden lotuses as radiant as the sun.

36. “ ‘For, giver of wealth, you cannot possibly engage in hostilities with this rākṣasa. You know how he attained that greatest of boons.’

37. “Addressed in this fashion, he accepted those words out of respect for his father and so departed together with his wives, townspeople, ministers, vehicles, and wealth.

38. “Meanwhile, Prahasta went back to Daśagrīva and reported everything, saying, ‘The city of Laṅkā, thirty leagues in breadth, is now deserted. Enter it with us and there carry out the duties of your station.’

39. "Then, when the rākṣasa Rāvaṇa had been addressed in this fashion by Prahasta, he entered the city of Laṅkā, along with his brothers, his troops, and his followers.

40. "Then the ten-faced rākṣasa, consecrated by the night-roaming rākṣasas, settled the city. The city thus came to be densely populated with night-roaming rākṣasas, who resembled black storm clouds.

41. "Then out of respect for his father's words, the lord of wealth founded on that mountain as bright as the moon a city that was as adorned with well-ornamented mansions as is Amarāvatī, the city of Indra, smasher of citadels."

The end of the eleventh sarga of the Uttarakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 12

1. "Once Daśagrīva had been consecrated as the lord of the rākṣasas, he and his two brothers considered giving away in marriage their sister, the rākṣasa woman Śūrpaṇakhā.

2. "He gave in marriage his sister, the rākṣasa woman called Śūrpaṇakhā, to the dānava lord named Vidyujjihva, the son of Kālaka.

3. "Now, Rāma, after giving away his sister in marriage, the king was wandering about hunting when he encountered Diti's son, who was called Maya.

4. "Seeing him accompanied only by his daughter, the night-roaming rākṣasa Daśagrīva asked, 'Who are you, sir, who stay alone in this forest unpeopled save by wild beasts?'

5. "And then, Rāma, Maya said to that night-roaming rākṣasa, who was inquiring: 'Please listen. I will tell you everything about myself, just as it happened.

6. " 'As you may have heard, my boy, there is an apsaras named Hemā. She was given to me in marriage, just as was Paulomī to Indra of the hundred sacrifices.

7. " 'For five hundred years, my boy, I was infatuated with her. But now this is the fourteenth year since she has been gone in the service of the gods.

8. " 'For Hemā's sake, I then constructed through my creative power an entire city of gold, inlaid with diamonds and lapis.

9. “ ‘But, finding no pleasure there without her, in my great sorrow, I took my daughter out of that city and came to this forest.

10. “ ‘This is my daughter, your majesty, nourished in Hemā’s womb. I came here with her to find her a husband.

11. “ ‘For men concerned about their honor, being a father of an unmarried girl is a great trouble. A young girl will always remain a source of suspicion for two families.

12. “ ‘And I also had two sons with my wife. The first, my boy, was Māyāvin followed by Dundubhi.

13. “ ‘Since you are inquiring, I have told you all of this just as it took place. But now, my boy, may I know who you are?’

14. “Addressed in this fashion, the lord of the rākṣasas courteously said this: ‘I am Daśagrīva by name, the son of Paulastya.’

15. “Now, no sooner had Maya learned that Daśagrīva was the son of a brahman-seer, than, delighted, he decided to give him his daughter in marriage right then and there.

16. “Smiling, the daitya lord said these words to the lord of the rākṣasas: ‘Your majesty, here is my daughter, the maiden named Mandodarī, who was borne by the apsaras Hemā. Please accept her as your wife.’

17. “And, Rāma, Daśagrīva said, ‘So be it!’ Then, kindling a sacred fire on that very spot, he took her hand in marriage.

18. “For, Rāma, Maya was unaware of the curse that Daśagrīva had received from his father, who was so rich in austerities. Therefore, recognizing that his lineage derived from his grandfather, Maya gave her to him in marriage.

19. “He also gave him an extremely marvelous and infallible javelin, which he had obtained through the most severe austerities—the very same one with which Rāvaṇa later struck down Lakṣmaṇa.

20. “When he had taken a wife in this fashion, the mighty lord of Laṅkā returned to the city and had his two brothers each marry a wife.

21. “Rāvaṇa had Kumbhakarṇa take as his wife Vairocana’s granddaughter, who was named Vajrajvālā.

22. “Vibhīṣaṇa, a knower of righteousness, took as his wife the daughter of Śailūṣa, the great king of the gandharvas. Her name was Saramā.

23. “She was born on the shore of Lake Mānasa, and once, during the rainy season, dear boy, Lake Mānasa flooded.

24. "Then, in her love for her daughter, her mother uttered this wailing cry: 'O lake! Do not flood!' For that reason she was named Sara-mā, 'Flood Not.'

25. "Having thus taken wives, those rākṣasas enjoyed themselves there, each with his own wife, just as do the gandharvas in the Nandana garden.

26. "Then Mandodarī gave birth to a son, Meghanāda, the one you refer to by the name Indrajit.

27. "No sooner had he been born than, crying, that son of the rākṣasa unleashed a tremendous roar, which was like that of a thundercloud.

28. "Since all of Laṅkā was stupefied by that roar of his, his father himself gave him the name Meghanāda, 'Cloud Thunderer.'

29. "Then, Rāma, he grew up in Rāvaṇa's splendid inner apartments, hidden by beautiful women as is fire by firewood."

The end of the twelfth sarga of the Uttarakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 13

1. "Now, after some time, intense drowsiness brought on by Brahmā, Lord of the worlds, took hold of Kumbhakarṇa.

2. "Kumbhakarṇa then said these words to his brother, who was seated before him: 'Drowsiness overwhelms me, your majesty. Please have them build an abode where I may sleep.'

3. "Then, commanded by the king, artisans who were like Viśvakarman himself constructed an abode for Kumbhakarṇa that resembled Mount Kailāsa.

4. "And so they built one for Kumbhakarṇa that was a league in width and twice that in length. It was splendid, exquisite, and flawless.

5–6. "It was adorned everywhere with columns variegated with crystal and gold. Its luster was enhanced by lapis, and it was filled with masses of little bells. It was surrounded by gateways of ivory and filled with raised platforms of diamond and crystal. It was ever delightful in all seasons like a sacred cavern of Mount Meru.

7. "There the night-roaming rākṣasa Kumbhakarṇa fell asleep, and he lay there for many thousands of years without waking.

8. "Once Kumbhakarṇa had been overcome by sleep, ten-faced Daśagrīva continually harassed the gods, seers, yakṣas, and gandharvas.

9. "Going to the magnificent heavenly gardens, Nandana and the rest, the ten-faced Daśagriva tore them up in his tremendous rage.

10. "As a playful elephant might roil a river, a driving wind might scatter trees, or the loosed vajra might shatter mountains, he constantly wrought destruction.

11–12. "When Vaiśravaṇa, the lord of wealth, came to know that Daśagrīva was acting in such a fashion, that knower of righteousness, reflecting upon the conduct befitting his lineage, sent a messenger to Laṅkā for the benefit of Daśagrīva and to demonstrate his own fraternal affection.

13. "Proceeding to the city of Laṅkā, the messenger met Vibhīṣaṇa. The latter honored him in keeping with righteousness and inquired as to why he had come.

14. "After inquiring about the well-being of his king and his king's relatives on both sides of the family, Vibhīṣaṇa presented him to ten-faced Daśagrīva, who was seated in his assembly hall.

15. "When the messenger saw the king there radiant with his own blazing energy, he addressed him reverently with blessings of victory and then stood silent for a moment.

16. "Once the messenger had taken his seat on a couch that had been brought for him and which was covered with fine cushions, he said these words to Daśagrīva:

17. " 'Your majesty, I will report to you everything that your brother has said. It is, kind sir, in keeping with the conduct and lineage of both of you.

18. " ' "Enough! The course of conduct you have adopted has gone far enough. Enough! If at all possible you must establish yourself in righteousness.

19. " ' "For I have seen the Nandana garden destroyed, and I have heard that seers have been slain. But I have also heard, your majesty, of the measures the gods are taking against you.

20. " ' "You have spurned me, time and time again, lord of the rākṣasas, and, in your folly, you have committed crimes against your own kinsmen, whom you should have been protecting.

21. “‘“But I had gone to the slopes of the Himalayas in order to practice righteousness, undertaking a vow to Rudra, controlling my senses, and maintaining self-control.

22. “‘“There I saw that powerful god, together with the goddess Umā, and it was there that I cast my left eye upon the goddess.

23. “‘“I did so merely wondering, ‘Who can this lovely woman be?’ and for no other reason, since Pārvatī had taken on incomparable beauty and was dallying there.

24. “‘“Nonetheless, because of the radiance of the goddess, my left eye was burned so that its sight grew dim as if obscured by dust.

25. “‘“Then I proceeded to another broad slope of that mountain and fully performed a great vow for a full eight hundred years.

26. “‘“When those austerities were completed there, the god Lord Maheśvara was delighted, and with a delighted heart, he spoke these words:

27. “‘“‘Lord of wealth! You of excellent vows! Knower of righteousness! I am pleased with these austerities of yours, for I myself have performed this vow as you have.

28. “‘“‘No third person could perform such a vow, for this vow, which I devised long ago, is all but impossible to perform.

29. “‘“‘Therefore, lord of wealth, please accept my friendship. Since I have been won over by your austerities, you must become my friend, sinless lord.

30. “‘“‘And since, through the splendor of the goddess your left eye was burned, your name shall forever remain Ekākṣipiṅgala, “Dusky in One Eye.”’

31. “‘“When I had earned the friendship of Śaṅkara in this fashion and taken my leave of him, I returned. Only then did I hear of your evil intentions.

32. “‘“And so, defiler of your lineage, you must desist from indulgence in such extreme unrighteousness, for even now the gods, together with the hosts of seers, are considering a strategy for your destruction.”’

33. “When he had been addressed in this fashion, Daśagrīva was enraged, and his eyes grew red. Clenching his fists and his teeth, he spoke these words:

34. “ ‘I know, messenger, the real meaning of these words that you have spoken. Neither you nor my brother who sent you shall live!

35. “ ‘The guardian of wealth is not saying this for my benefit. Instead, fool, you are merely boasting about his friendship with Maheśvara.

36. “ ‘I always thought, “I must not kill him, for he is my elder and my superior.” But now, after hearing his words, this is exactly what I intend to do.

37. “ ‘This very hour, relying on the strength of my arms, I shall conquer the three worlds, and, on account of just one of them, I shall send all four world guardians to the abode of Yama.’

38. “When the lord of Laṅkā had spoken in this fashion, he killed the messenger with his sword and gave him to the evil-minded rākṣasas to eat.

39. “Then, once he had performed benedictory rites, Rāvaṇa mounted his chariot and, eager to conquer the three worlds, proceeded to where the lord of wealth was.”

The end of the thirteenth sarga of the Uttarakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

1–2. “Majestic Rāvaṇa then marched forth, as if to burn up the worlds in his anger. He was surrounded by six ministers, who were ever arrogant in their might. Those that accompanied him were Mahodara, Prahasta, Mārīca, Śuka, Sāraṇa, and the mighty Dhūmrākṣa, who was ever eager for battle.

3. “Passing towns, rivers, mountains, parks, and woodlands, in a short time he reached Mount Kailāsa.

4. “When the yakṣas had heard that the rākṣasa lord was encamped on the mountain, they said, ‘It is the king’s brother!’ and went to where the lord of wealth was.

5. “They went and told him all about his brother’s intention, and, granted permission by the giver of wealth, they marched off to battle.

6. “There was a great surge of agitation in the army of the king of the rākṣasas, sons of chaos, as in the ocean when it floods. It seemed to shake the very mountain.

7. “Then there arose a battle swarming with yakṣas and rākṣasas in which the rākṣasa’s ministers were sorely afflicted.

8. "When the night-roaming rākṣasa Daśagrīva saw that his fighters were in such a plight, he unleashed a roar in his excitement, and, in a rage, he rushed to the attack.

9. "Fearsome in their valor, each one of the rākṣasa lord's ministers then engaged in battle with a thousand of those thousands of foes.

10. "Although he was being struck with maces, iron clubs, swords, javelins, and iron cudgels, Daśagrīva plunged into the yakṣa army.

11. "Being struck by those weapons there, ten-faced Daśagrīva, nearly breathless, was closely pressed on every side by the yakṣa lords, as if by pelting storm clouds.

12. "Then that evil-minded rākṣasa, raising his mace, which was like the rod of Kāla, plunged into the army of the yakṣas, sending them to Yama's abode.

13. "Just as a fire driven by the wind might consume a vast, parched woodland filled with dry tinder, he consumed that very fearsome army.

14. "Just like clouds decimated by the winds, the yakṣas were all but destroyed in battle by his ministers, Mahodara, Śuka, and the rest.

15. "Some of them fell on the battleground, their limbs hacked off by weapons. Others were knocked to the ground, biting their lips with their sharp teeth.

16. "Clutching one another in terror, their weapons fallen on the battlefield, some of the yakṣas then collapsed like the banks of a river undercut by the current.

17. "What with the slain, who, after fighting on the surface of the earth, had ascended to heaven, and the hosts of seers, who were watching from there, there was no room left in the heavens.

18. "At this juncture, Rāma, an enormous yakṣa named Saṃyodhakaṇṭaka arrived with a large host of troops and mounts.

19. "Struck down by that yakṣa as if by Viṣṇu himself, Mārīca fell and crashed to the earth, as someone might fall from the heavens when his merit is exhausted.

20. "Regaining consciousness after a moment, the night-roaming rākṣasa composed himself and then engaged that yakṣa in battle. The latter, broken, fled.

21. "Then, at the perimeter, watched over by the gatekeepers, Daśagrīva breached the gateway, every part of which was ornamented with gold and which was inlaid with lapis and silver.

22. "But, Rāma, a gatekeeper known as Sūryabhānu blocked the night-roaming rākṣasa Daśagrīva as he was entering.

23. "Tearing up the gateway, the yakṣa struck him with it. Although the rākṣasa was struck by the gateway hurled by the yakṣa, he was not injured, Rāma, because of the boon of Brahmā, who was born from the waters.

24. "And then, with that very same gateway, he struck down that yakṣa. Pulverized, the yakṣa simply vanished.

25. "Witnessing his valor, all of the yakṣas fled. Oppressed by terror, they then entered the rivers and caves."

The end of the fourteenth sarga of the Uttarakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 15

1. "Then, seeing that the yakṣas had fled in their hundreds and thousands, the lord of wealth himself went forth to battle.

2. "There was an all-but-invincible yakṣa there by the name of Māṇicara. Surrounded by four thousand yakṣas, he gave battle.

3. "Those yakṣas charged the rākṣasas, striking them in battle with maces, cudgels, darts, javelins, iron cudgels, and war hammers.

4. "Nonetheless, Prahasta slew a thousand of them in battle, while Mahodara slew another thousand with his mace.

5. "And then, Rāma, the evil-minded Mārīca, enraged, struck down two thousand in the blink of an eye.

6. "In that great battle, Māṇibhadra confronted Dhūmrākṣa. Although he was angrily struck in the chest with a cudgel, he was not shaken.

7. "Then the rākṣasa Dhūmrākṣa was struck on the head by Māṇibhadra, who was whirling his mace. Stunned, he collapsed.

8. "When ten-faced Daśagrīva saw that Dhūmrākṣa had been struck and, drenched with blood, had fallen, he charged at Māṇibhadra in a towering rage.

9. "But as he charged toward him in his rage, like the fire blazing up at the end of a cosmic era, that bull among yakṣas pierced him with three javelins.

10. "But he, in turn, was then struck with a mace by the rākṣasa king in battle. Because of that blow, his diadem was knocked to one side, and, from that time onward, that yakṣa was known as Pārśvamauli, 'He of the Sideways Diadem.'

11. "When the great yakṣa Māṇibhadra had retreated, Rāma, a deafening cheer arose on that mountain.

12. "Then, accompanied by Śaṅkha and Padma, the lord of wealth, bearing a mace, appeared from afar with Śukra and Proṣṭhapada.

13. "Seeing his brother, who because of the curse was deprived of all sense of decorum, the wise Kubera, there in the midst of battle, addressed him in words that were befitting the lineage of their grandfather.

14. " 'Although I tried to stop you, evil-minded wretch, you did not understand. Only after you have received your just deserts and have gone to hell will you come to realize this.

15. " 'A foolish man who mistakenly drinks poison without knowing it will, once it has taken effect, nonetheless come to realize the consequences of his action.

16. " 'Indeed, the gods take delight only in one who is righteous. It is because of this that you have been reduced to such a state, and you do not even realize it.

17. " 'A person who disrespects his mothers, fathers, brothers, and preceptors will experience the fruit of that once he has come under the power of the king of the dead.

18. " 'The fool who fails to amass austerities while still in this impermanent body will later, once dead, come to regret it when he sees where he has gone.

19. " 'No evil-minded person spontaneously acquires good judgment. A person experiences the fruit of whatever action he performs.

20. " 'Intellect, beauty, strength, wealth, sons, and greatness—men obtain all of this through the previous actions they have performed.

21. " 'And thus you, whose mind is of such a nature, will surely go to hell. I shall not speak with you again, as this is the proper resolution with regard to one of evil ways.'

22. "When Kubera had spoken in this fashion, he assailed Rāvaṇa's ministers. All of them, headed by Mārīca, turned tail and fled en masse.

23. "Then, although the great yakṣa lord struck him on the head with his mace, Daśagrīva did not give any ground.

24. "After that, Rāma, the two, assailing each other in fierce combat, were neither shaken nor fatigued and remained unyielding.

25. "Then, in battle, the bestower of wealth loosed the divine weapon of Agni, but Daśagrīva parried that divine weapon with that of Varuṇa.

26. "Now, having recourse to the rākṣasas' power of illusion, the rākṣasa lord, whirling his huge mace, struck the bestower of wealth on the head.

27. "Struck in this fashion with that, the lord of wealth, shaken and drenched with blood, fell like an aśoka tree cut off at the roots.

28. "Then the presiding deities of his treasuries, Padma and the rest, brought the lord of wealth, that bestower of wealth, to the Nandana grove and there revived him.

29. "And now, Rāma, when the lord of the rākṣasas had defeated the bestower of wealth, he seized his flying palace Puṣpaka as a token of his victory.

30. "It was enclosed by golden columns, and its gateways were of lapis and gemstones. It was covered with fretworks of pearls and had trees that bore whatever was desired as their fruit.

31. "Having vanquished the god Vaiśravaṇa, the king mounted that flying palace, which was steered by its owner's will and which he had won through his valor, and descended from Mount Kailāsa."

The end of the fifteenth sarga of the Uttarakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 16

1. "Now, Rāma, once the lord of the rākṣasas had vanquished his brother, the bestower of wealth, he then proceeded to the Śaravaṇa, the birthplace of Skanda Mahāsena.

2. "Daśagrīva then gazed upon the golden Śaravaṇa, which, haloed with a mass of rays, resembled a second sun.

3. "But as he approached that mountain, he spied some other lovely grove, and there, Rāma, the Puṣpaka was brought to a halt in the sky.

4. "Perceiving that the Puṣpaka, which had been steered by its owner's will, had been stopped and rendered motionless, the rākṣasa, surrounded by his ministers, fell to brooding.

5. " 'What is the reason that the Puṣpaka does not move for me? Who on this mountain could have done this?'

6. "Then Mārīca, skilled in discernment, said to Daśagrīva, 'It cannot be, your majesty, that the Puṣpaka does not move without a reason.'

7. "Then, coming up beside him, Nandīśvara, the mighty servant of Bhava, boldly said this to the rākṣasa lord:

8. " 'You must turn back, Daśagrīva, for Śaṅkara is dallying on this mountain.

9. " 'Therefore the mountain has been forbidden to the great birds, great serpents, yakṣas, daityas, dānavas, rākṣasas, and, indeed, to all living beings.'

10. "Daśagrīva, his eyes red with rage, descended from the Puṣpaka and saying, 'Who is this Śaṅkara?' he approached the base of the mountain.

11. "He glared at the lord Nandīśvara, who, like a second Śaṅkara, stood close by, holding a blazing lance.

12. "Seeing that he had a monkey's face, the rākṣasa regarded him with contempt, and, as might a storm cloud charged with rain, in his folly, he unleashed a roar of laughter.

13. "Then, infuriated, the blessed Lord Nandin, like a second body of Śaṅkara, addressed the rākṣasa Daśagrīva, who was standing there:

14–15. " 'Since, evil-minded rākṣasa, in your folly, you were contemptuous when you saw me in my simian form and roared with laughter, monkeys—bearing my form and with blazing energy equal to my might—will be born for the destruction of your race.

16. " 'But although I am well able to deal with you here and now, night-roaming rākṣasa, I must not kill you. For you have already been slain by your own actions.'

17. "However, heedless of Nandin's words, the night-roaming rākṣasa approached the mountain and said these words:

18. " 'I shall tear up this mountain of yours by its roots, lord of cattle, on account of which the passage of Puṣpaka was interrupted while I was traveling.

19. " 'By what authority does Bhava dally there, as if he were a king? You do not realize, as you should, what a dangerous situation is at hand.'

20. "After having spoken in this fashion, your majesty, he thrust his arms under the mountain and then hefted it together with its deer, its beasts of prey, and its trees.

21. "Then, Rāma, Mahādeva, smiling when he saw what Daśagrīva had done, playfully pressed down the mountain with his big toe.

22. "Then the rākṣasa's arms, which were beneath the mountain, were crushed, on account of which his ministers were astonished.

23. "In his rage and because of the crushing of his arms in this fashion, the rākṣasa released a tremendous cry that filled the three worlds.

24. "Terrified by that sound, people thought that it was the end of the world. Even the gods were disturbed as they discharged their duties.

25. "But, your majesty, Mahādeva, resting on the summit of the mountain, was pleased. Freeing ten-faced Daśagrīva's arms, he spoke these words to him:

26. "'I am pleased with your might and boldness, night-roaming rākṣasa. The howl you released in your agony as you cried out was truly terrifying.

27. "'And since this triple world, reverberating with your cries, was terrified, you shall be known by the name "Rāvaṇa."

28. "'Therefore, the gods, humans, yakṣas, and everyone else in this world will call you Rāvaṇa, "He Who Makes the Worlds Reverberate with His Cries."

29. "'Go now, Paulastya, without fear, by whatever path you choose. I grant you leave, lord of the rākṣasas. You may go.'

30. "And so, having been given his name by Maheśvara Mahādeva, Rāvaṇa first reverentially saluted him and then mounted his flying palace.

31. "Then, Rāma, Rāvaṇa roamed the earth, oppressing mighty kshatriyas wherever he went."

The end of the sixteenth sarga of the Uttarakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 17

1. "Then, your majesty, while wandering the earth, great-armed Rāvaṇa reached the Himalayan forests and roamed about there.

2. "There he spied a young woman wearing black antelope skin and matted locks. She was engaged in asceticism according to the ordinances of the seers, and she looked like a goddess.

3. "When he saw that beautiful young woman observing severe penitential vows, his mind was overcome with lust and delusion. Laughing softly, he asked her:

4. “ ‘Lovely lady, why are you living like this? It is completely unsuitable to your youth. Such perverse behavior is not at all consonant with your beauty.

5. “ ‘Lovely lady, whose daughter are you? Or who, blameless lady, is your husband? Tell me at once, since I am asking you. For what purpose do you amass these austerities?’

6. “Addressed in this fashion by the ignoble rākṣasa, that young woman, rich in austerities, performed the rites of hospitality for him according to custom and then said:

7. “ ‘My father was the righteous brahman-seer named Kuśadhvaja. He was the majestic son of Bṛhaspati, and he was Bṛhaspati’s equal in intellect.

8. “ ‘I am his daughter, born from that great being who was ever engaged in vedic recitation. As an incarnation of vedic speech, I am known by the name Vedavatī.

9. “ ‘Then the gods, along with the gandharvas, as well as the yakṣas, rākṣasas, and great serpents, approached my father and asked for my hand in marriage.

10. “ ‘But my father did not give me to them, lord of the rākṣasas. Listen, great-armed hero, and I shall tell you the reason.

11–12. “ ‘They say that it was Viṣṇu, foremost of the gods and Lord of the three worlds, whom my father intended as his son-in-law, and that is why that righteous man did not want to give me to anyone else. Upon hearing that, the king of the daityas, Śambhu by name, arrogant in his strength, was furious. And so that wicked creature killed my father as he slept at night.

13. “ ‘Then my illustrious mother, desolate, embraced my father’s body and entered the fire with him.

14. “ ‘And so the wish is firmly lodged in my heart that I will make my father’s dream with respect to Nārāyaṇa come true.

15. “ ‘Having thus vowed that I will fulfill my father’s desire even though he has departed, I am engaged in extensive austerities.

16. “ ‘I have now told you everything, bull among rākṣasas. Know that I am resorting to righteousness in my desire to make Nārāyaṇa my husband.

17. “ ‘I know all about you, your majesty. So please go away, delight of the Paulastyas. For through my austerities, I know everything that transpires in the three worlds.’

18. “But Rāvaṇa, tormented by the arrows of Kandarpa, the god of love, descended from atop his flying palace and there addressed that young woman of very severe vows.

19. “ ‘You are very arrogant, fair-hipped lady, in that you entertain such a resolution. The amassing of righteous actions, fawn-eyed woman, is an adornment only of the elderly.

20. “ ‘Timorous woman, you are endowed with every virtue and are indeed the most beautiful woman in the triple world. You ought not in your youth be acting in such a manner that is fitting only for the elderly.

21. “ ‘Who, after all, is this individual to whom you refer as Viṣṇu? Surely, lovely lady, he whom you so desire is not equal to me in valor, asceticism, wealth, or strength, my lady.’

22. “ ‘Don’t do this! Don’t!’ cried the young woman to that night-roaming rākṣasa, as he seized her by the hair with his hand.

23. “Enraged, Vedavatī then cut off her hair with her hand. Eager to end her life, she kindled a fire and said:

24. “ ‘As I have been violated by you, ignoble wretch, my life is at an end. Therefore, rākṣasa, I shall enter the fire, the eater of oblations, right before your very eyes.

25. “ ‘Since I, innocent and without a protector, have been violated, I shall be born again for your destruction.

26. “ ‘Truly it is not possible for a woman to kill anyone, least of all you, evil rākṣasa. Moreover, were I to unleash a curse, it would exhaust the power of my asceticism.

27. “ ‘If I have performed good deeds, made charitable donations, and offered sacrificial oblations, then, by virtue of that, may I be born as the virtuous daughter of a righteous man and not from a human womb.’

28. “When she had spoken in this fashion, she entered the blazing fire, the eater of oblations. Then, on every side, there fell from the heavens a heavenly shower of blossoms.

29. “That foe, who had previously been doomed by her in her wrath, has now been slain by you, who have taken recourse to your mountainous and superhuman strength.

30. “And thus this illustrious woman has been born once again among men in a field torn up by a ploughshare, where she looked like a flame of fire on a sacrificial altar.

31. "And thus the woman called Vedavatī, who lived long ago in the Kṛta Yuga, has appeared in the Tretā Yuga to accomplish the destruction of that rākṣasa. Since she was born from a furrow [sītā], men always call her Sītā."

The end of the seventeenth sarga of the Uttarakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 18

1. "After Vedavatī had entered the fire, eater of oblations, Rāvaṇa mounted the flying palace Puṣpaka and roamed the earth.

2. "Then, arriving at the country of Uśīrabīja, the rākṣasa spied King Marutta, who was offering a sacrifice together with the gods.

3. "The brahman-seer Saṃvarta by name, the brother of Bṛhaspati himself and a knower of righteousness, officiated at the sacrifice, surrounded by all the hosts of brahmans.

4. "But when the gods saw that rākṣasa, invincible through the gift of his boon, they betook themselves to the wombs of various creatures, terrified that he would attack them.

5. "Indra became a peacock; Yama, the king of righteousness a crow; while the lord of wealth became a lizard; and Varuṇa, a haṃsa.

6. "Approaching the king, Rāvaṇa, lord of the rākṣasas, said, 'You must either offer me battle or acknowledge defeat.'

7. "Then King Marutta said to him, 'And who, sir, are you?' But the rākṣasa laughed derisively and said these words:

8. " 'I am amused by how unimpressed you are, your majesty, in that you do not seem to grasp that I am Rāvaṇa, the younger brother of Kubera, the bestower of wealth.

9. " 'For who in the three worlds does not know my strength, whereby I defeated my brother and seized this flying palace?'

10. "Then King Marutta said this to the rākṣasa: 'What a splendid fellow you are, sir, to have defeated your own elder brother in battle.

11. " 'That which is inconsistent with righteousness is not praiseworthy, nor is that which goes against proper conduct. After having carried out this depraved act, you now boast about defeating your brother.

12. “ ‘Did you perform some perfect act of righteousness in the past, such that you received a boon? The sort of thing you yourself boast of is something I have never heard of before.’

13. “Then the king, seizing his bow and arrows in a rage, set out for battle. But Saṃvarta blocked his path.

14. “The great seer spoke affectionately to Marutta: ‘If you want my advice, battle is not appropriate for you.

15. “ ‘If left incomplete, this sacrifice dedicated to Maheśvara would consume your dynasty. And how can one who is consecrated for sacrifice engage in battle? How can there be violence on the part of one so consecrated?

16. “ ‘Moreover, battle is always uncertain and this rākṣasa is invincible.’ And so, withdrawing on the advice of his guru, Marutta, lord of the earth, put aside his bow and arrows and, fully composed, turned his attention to the sacrifice.

17. “Then, regarding him as vanquished, Śuka proclaimed: ‘Rāvaṇa is victorious!’ and he roared with delight.

18. “Rāvaṇa then devoured the great seers who had assembled there for the sacrifice and, sated with their blood, once more began to roam the earth.

19. “Once Rāvaṇa had gone, the gods, denizens of heaven, along with Indra, resumed their natural forms and addressed those creatures whose forms they had taken.

20. “In his delight Indra then addressed the peacock with its indigo tail feathers: ‘I am pleased with your assistance, O sky-going bird who knows righteousness.

21. “ ‘The thousand eyes that I possess shall appear upon your tail, and, as a token of my gratitude, you shall experience delight whenever I send my rains.’

22. “And so, lord of kings, they say that formerly the tails of peacocks were solid indigo, but after receiving that boon from the lord of the gods, they all became variegated.

23. “Then, Rāma, King Dharma addressed that crow, which now was perched on the beam of the eastern sacrificial hall: ‘O bird, I am pleased with you. Now hear my words of gratitude.

24. “ ‘Since I am pleased, those various ailments with which I afflict other creatures shall have no power over you. Of this there can be no doubt.

25. “ ‘Through my boon, O sky-going bird, you shall have no fear of death. Indeed, so long as men do not kill you, you shall live forever.

26. “ ‘And when you are fed, those men who reside in my realm and are afflicted by hunger will be sated together with their kinsmen.’

27. “Next Varuṇa addressed the haṃsa, who frequents the waters of the Ganges: ‘O lord of winged creatures, hear my grateful words.

28. “ ‘Your color will be ravishing, bright, like the orb of the moon, excellent, and equal in luster to shining foam.

29. “ ‘In contact with the water, my particular domain, you shall always be beautiful, and you shall obtain unequaled delight as a token of my gratitude.’

30. “Formerly, Rāma, the color of haṃsas was not pure white. Their wings had dark tips, while their breasts were as bright as the tips of new grass.

31. “Then Vaiśravaṇa addressed that lizard, which now sat on a hill: ‘As I am pleased with you, I shall grant you a golden color.

32. “ ‘Your head shall be immutably golden forever. This golden hue will be yours through my gratitude.’

33. “When the sacrificial ceremony was completed, the gods, having granted these boons to those creatures, returned to their respective abodes together with the king.”

The end of the eighteenth sarga of the Uttarakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

1. “Having thus defeated Marutta, the ten-faced lord of the rākṣasas, spoiling for battle, proceeded to the capitals of other kings.

2–3. “Accosting those lords among kings, the equals of great Indra and Varuṇa, the lord of the rākṣasas said: ‘You must either give me battle or declare yourselves vanquished! This is my resolve. There will be no escape for those of you who act otherwise.’

4. “Then those many wise kings who were resolved upon righteousness, recognizing that their enemy’s might derived from a boon, declared, ‘We are vanquished!’

5. “Then, Rāma my son, all those kings—Duṣyanta, Suratha, Gādhi, Gaya, and King Purūravas—declared, ‘We are vanquished.’

6–7. "At length Rāvaṇa, the lord of the rākṣasas, came to Ayodhyā, which was as carefully guarded by Anaraṇya as is Amarāvatī by Śakra, and, accosting that king, he said, 'Give me battle or declare yourself vanquished. Such is my command.'

8. "In a towering rage, Anaraṇya said to the lord of the rākṣasas, 'I grant you single combat, O lord of the rākṣasas.'

9. "Then the vast army of the lord of men, which he had made ready after hearing of those earlier conquests, marched forth intent on slaughtering the rākṣasas.

10. "At once many thousands of elephants and ten thousand cavalry marched forth, along with infantry and chariots, covering the earth.

11. "When the king's army encountered that of Rāvaṇa, it was consumed, your majesty, like an oblation offered in the sacrificial fire.

12. "The lord of men watched as his vast army was being annihilated, like the waters of the five rivers when they merge with the mighty ocean.

13. "And, beside himself with rage, the lord of men, twanging his bow, which was like the bow of mighty Indra, assailed Rāvaṇa on his own.

14. "Then the delight of the House of Ikṣvāku rained down eight hundred arrows on the rākṣasa king's head.

15. "But, like showers of rain falling from the clouds on a mountain summit, his arrows, in falling, produced no injury whatsoever.

16. "But then, with the palm of his hand, the enraged king of the rākṣasas struck King Anaraṇya on his head so that he fell from his chariot.

17. "Fallen to the ground, the king, trembling, his limbs twitching, resembled a mighty sāla tree struck down in the forest by a thunderbolt.

18. "Mocking the Ikṣvāku king, the rākṣasa said: 'Now what benefit have you reaped in doing battle with me?

19. "'For there is no one in the triple world who can offer me single combat, lord of men. I guess you have not heard of my might as you were addicted to sensual pleasures.'

20. "As Rāvaṇa was speaking in this fashion, the king, his life breaths ebbing, said these words: 'Since fate is insuperable, what could I have done here?

21. "'For it is not you who have defeated me, rākṣasa, although you boast about it. It is by fate that I have been slain here. You, sir, have merely been its instrument in my case.

22. “ ‘But what I can do now—as my life breaths ebb away—is utter a prophecy, rākṣasa, since you have insulted the House of Ikṣvāku.

23. “ ‘If I have given charitably, if I have performed sacrifices, if I have properly engaged in penances, and if I have duly protected my people, then may this prophecy of mine prove true:

24. “ ‘In this House of the great Ikṣvākus, there shall be born a king of immense blazing energy who shall rob you of your life.’

25. “No sooner had this curse been uttered than the war drum of the gods, loud as a thundercloud, was beaten, and a shower of blossoms fell from the sky.

26. “Then, O lord of kings, the king ascended to his heavenly abode. And once the king had gone to heaven, Rāma, the rākṣasa departed.”

The end of the nineteenth sarga of the Uttarakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 20

*1. “Then, as the lord of the rākṣasas continued terrorizing the people of the earth, he encountered Nārada, foremost of sages, in a forest.

2. “Perched on the back of a cloud, the divine seer Nārada of immense blazing energy and immeasurable splendor addressed Rāvaṇa, who was mounted on the flying palace Puṣpaka.

3. “ ‘My good sir, lord of the rākṣasas, stay a moment. Son of Viśravas, endowed with noble birth, I am pleased with your glorious feats of valor.

4. “ ‘I have been greatly pleased with Viṣṇu’s slaughter of the daityas, Tārkṣya’s defeat of the great serpents, and your crushing blows in battle.

5. “ ‘Now I will tell you something that you should hear, if you will listen. And once you have heard it, bull among rākṣasas, you should then act upon it.

6. “ ‘Why do you, who are invulnerable to the gods, go on killing mere mortals? For being under the power of death, these mortals have already been slain.

7. “ ‘Just look at this world of mortals, great-armed lord of the rākṣasas, filled with innumerable cross purposes and totally unaware of its own fate.

8. “ ‘In one place joyous people are playing music and dancing, while others, tormented, are weeping, their faces marked by eyes flooded with tears.

9. “ ‘With their affection for their mothers, fathers, and sons and delighting in their wives and friends, the people, in their infatuation, are lost and fail to grasp their own misery.

10. “ ‘So why go on tormenting the world in this fashion since it has already been destroyed by delusion? For you have already completely subjugated the world of mortals, good sir. Of this there is no doubt.’

11. “Addressed in this fashion, the lord of Laṅkā, blazing, as it were, with splendor, respectfully saluted Nārada and, smiling, said to him regarding that:

12. “ ‘Great seer, you who take your pleasure among the gods and gandharvas and are so fond of battle, I am indeed preparing to go to the underworld known as Rasātala in search of victory.

13. “ ‘Then, once I have subjugated the three worlds and brought the great serpents and gods under my control, I shall churn the ocean, the receptacle of every essence, for the nectar of immortality.’

14. “But the blessed seer Nārada said to Daśagrīva: ‘So where then are you going now by this path?

15. “ ‘For, tormentor of your foes, this path, difficult and impassable, leads to the city of Yama, the king of the ancestors.’

16. “Bursting out with a laugh like an autumnal cloud, ten-faced Rāvaṇa replied, ‘I have already accomplished this!’ Then he spoke these words:

17. “ ‘Therefore, great brahman, resolved as I am to slay Vaivasvata, I shall proceed to the south, where that king, the son of Sūrya, dwells.

18. “ ‘Eager for battle, O blessed lord, I vowed in my fury: “I shall conquer the four guardians of the world!”

19. “ ‘Therefore I shall set out for the city of the king of the ancestors and I shall put that tormentor of living beings to death.’

20. “When Daśagrīva had spoken in this fashion, he respectfully saluted the sage and set out for the southern region, accompanied by his excited counselors.

21. “But that foremost of brahmans, who was of immense blazing energy and resembled a smokeless fire, purifier of all things, remained lost in thought for a while and reflected:

22. “ ‘It is Kāla who afflicts the three worlds with their fixed and moving contents, including Indra, when their lives and merit are at an end. How can he himself be slain?

23. " 'How can the lord of the rākṣasas of his own free will approach him from whom the three worlds always flee, afflicted with terror?

24. " 'How can he who is the creator and who apportions the fruits of good and evil deeds, he by whom the triple world was conquered, be vanquished?

25. " 'And what other means will he devise to accomplish this? Having become quite curious, I, too, shall proceed to Yama's abode.' "

The end of the twentieth sarga of the Uttarakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 21

1. "When Nārada, the foremost of brahmans, had reflected in this fashion, he went swiftly to Yama's abode in order to report what had transpired.

2. "There he saw the god Yama, who, attended by Agni, was dealing out appropriate fates to living beings.

3. "When Yama saw that the great seer Nārada had arrived, he offered him, in keeping with righteousness, a comfortable seat and the guest-offering. He then said:

4. " 'I trust that all is well, divine seer, and I trust that righteousness has not been violated. What, O you upon whom the gods and the gandharvas attend, is the purpose of your coming?'

5. "Then the blessed seer Nārada spoke these words: 'Listen! I will tell you. Then you must take the necessary steps.

6. " 'O king of the ancestors, the night-roaming rākṣasa known as Daśagrīva is coming here in order to subjugate—through his valor—you, who are impossible to vanquish.

7. " 'It is for this reason that I have come in haste, lord. What can he do this day to you whose weapon is the rod?'

8. "At that very moment, Nārada spied the divine flying palace of the rākṣasa approaching from afar. It resembled the rising, many-rayed sun.

9. "The immensely powerful rākṣasa drew near, dispelling the darkness of the whole region through the radiance of the Puṣpaka.

10. "On every side, the great-armed Daśagrīva saw living beings experiencing the consequences of their good and evil deeds.

11. "Then, through his valor, mighty Rāvaṇa forcibly freed those who were being tormented because of their own evil deeds.

12. "As the departed spirits were being liberated by the immensely powerful rākṣasa, their guards were enraged and attacked the lord of the rākṣasas.

13. "In their hundreds of thousands, those heroes sent a hail of darts, iron beams, lances, war hammers, javelins, and iron cudgels against the Puṣpaka.

14. "Swarming like bees, they swiftly battered the seats, terraces, raised platforms, and gateways of the Puṣpaka.

15. "But since the Puṣpaka flying palace was an abode of divinity, it remained indestructible through the blazing splendor of Brahmā, even as it was being battered in battle.

16. "Then Rāvaṇa's mighty counselors fought with all their will and all their strength as did the ten-faced king himself.

17. "Their bodies smeared with blood, wounded by every sort of weapon, the counselors of the rākṣasa lord fought a great battle.

18. "And those illustrious warriors—Yama's great host and the rākṣasa's counselors—struck at one another with their weapons in battle.

19. "But, turning away from the rākṣasa's counselors, those exceedingly mighty warriors assailed ten-faced Rāvaṇa himself with a hail of lances.

20. "Then, grievously wounded with weapons, his body smeared with blood, the foremost of the rākṣasas in his flying palace resembled an aśoka tree in bloom.

21. "However, as he was a master of divine weapon-spells, that mighty warrior released lances, maces, darts, javelins, iron cudgels, arrows, cudgels, boulders, and trees.

22. "But, having repulsed them all and rendered futile his divine weapon-spell, they, in their hundreds and thousands, belabored the fearsome rākṣasa, who was alone.

23. "They all surrounded him as a mass of clouds might a mountain, and, with their short javelins and lances, they knocked the wind out of him.

24. "Drenched with gouts of blood, his armor gone, he left the Puṣpaka in a rage and took his stand on the ground.

25. "Then, after a moment, the enraged overlord of the rākṣasas cleared his mind and, armed with his bow and arrows, took up his stand on the ground like Yama, the ender of all things.

26. "Nocking to his bow an arrow charged with the divine weapon-spell of Paśupati, he drew that bow, crying out to them, 'Stand! Stand!'

27. "Garlanded with flames and followed by flesh-eating beasts, that arrow, released in battle, sped along, reducing thickets and trees to ashes.

28. "Consumed by its blazing energy, the warriors of Vaivasvata fell in battle, like trees consumed by a forest fire.

29. "Then, together with his ministers, that rākṣasa of fearsome valor roared a mighty roar causing the earth to tremble, as it were."

The end of the twenty-first sarga of the Uttarakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 22

1. "Now, when Yama Vaivasvata heard Daśagrīva's mighty roar, he realized that his enemy had been victorious and that his own army had been destroyed.

2. "Realizing that his warriors had been slain, his eyes wild with rage, he quickly said to his charioteer, 'Bring up my chariot.'

3. "His charioteer then brought up his divine, loudly rumbling chariot. Then he of immense blazing energy mounted that great chariot and took his stand.

4. "Standing before him, wielding a noose and a war hammer, was Mṛtyu, who destroys the entire triple world with its fixed and moving contents.

5. "And beside him in the chariot stood Yama's divine weapon, the rod of Kāla, in human form, glowing, as it were, with its blazing energy.

6. "Then the three worlds and the gods, denizens of heaven, seeing that Kāla, the terror of the three worlds, was enraged, were afraid and trembled.

7–8. "And when the ministers of that foremost of rākṣasas saw that fearsome chariot—terrifying to all the worlds—with Mṛtyu mounted upon it, they were stricken with fear. Their minds reeling because of their inferior strength, they cried, 'We are unable to fight here!' And they all fled.

9. "But even when the rākṣasa saw such a chariot, a terror to the worlds, he was not disturbed, nor did he suffer any anxiety.

10. "Now, having confronted Rāvaṇa, Yama, in a towering rage, hurled javelins and war hammers, piercing the rākṣasa's vital points.

11. "But Rāvaṇa remained uninjured and unleashed a hail of arrows on Vaivasvata's chariot, as might a storm cloud a torrent of rain.

12. "Then, because of the hundreds of huge javelins that cascaded down upon his great chest, the rākṣasa, afflicted by those sharp weapons, was unable to retaliate.

13. "Although Yama, the dragger of his foes, gave battle in this fashion with all manner of weapons for seven nights, Rāvaṇa was neither broken nor vanquished.

14. "Then there broke out a renewed battle between Yama and the rākṣasa, both eager for victory and never turning back in battle.

15. "The gods, along with the gandharvas, the perfected beings, and the supreme seers, placing Prajāpati at their head, gazed upon that battlefield.

16. "While those two—the chief of the rākṣasas and the lord of the departed—were engaged in battle, it was like the dissolution of the universe.

17. "Then the lord of the rākṣasas, enraged, drew his bow in battle and released arrows, seeming to fill the sky with them.

18. "He wounded Mṛtyu with four arrows and the charioteer with seven. Then he swiftly struck Yama in his vital points with a thousand arrows.

19. "But suddenly there issued forth from the mouth of the enraged Yama an exhalation wreathed in flames, a veritable fire of wrath.

20. "Then the gods, dānavas, and rākṣasas witnessed a miraculous thing: that blazing fire born of Yama's wrath that was eager to burn up the army of his foe.

21. "Now Mṛtyu, in a towering rage, addressed Vaivasvata: 'Give me leave at once, lord, and I will slay your enemy in battle.

22–23. " 'Naraka, Śambara, Vṛtra, Śambhu, the mighty Kārtasvara, Namuci, Virocana, and the pair Madhu and Kaiṭabha—all these and many other mighty and unassailable heroes—were slain the moment I saw them, so why worry about this night-roaming rākṣasa?

24. " 'Give me leave straightaway, knower of righteousness, so that I may kill him. For no one upon whom I gaze can survive even for an instant.

25. " 'Nor is this any power of mine. Rather, it is the law fixed by nature. For no one touched by me can survive, that is certain.'

26. "When the valorous king of righteousness heard these words, he said to Mṛtyu, 'I will kill him myself.'

27. "Then, his eyes reddened, the enraged lord Vaivasvata hefted the unfailing rod of Kāla.

28. "On every side of it, standing crowded closely together, were the nooses of Kāla. And standing there, too, in human form, was his war hammer, the very touch of which was like fire.

29. "Merely upon being seen, that rod cuts off the lives of living beings. How much more so would it take the lives of embodied beings through a blow or through its crushing weight?

30. "Touched by the hand of that mighty divinity, that angry and very fearsome rod was wreathed in flames, as if to consume the night-roaming rākṣasa.

31. "Then all creatures fled the battlefield, while the gods, seeing Yama with the upraised rod of Kāla, became agitated.

32. "But just as Yama, eager to strike Rāvaṇa, raised his rod, Grandfather Brahmā himself appeared to him and said:

33. " 'O great-armed Vaivasvata, you of incomparable valor! You must not strike this night-roaming rākṣasa with your rod.

34. " 'For I gave him a boon, O bull among the thirty gods. You must not falsify the words that I have spoken.

35. " 'And it was I who long ago created this rod of Kāla to be unfailing in the destruction of all creatures and in whose wake Mṛtyu follows.

36. " 'Therefore, gentle sir, you must not let it fall upon the rākṣasa's head. For once it falls, no one can survive for even an instant.

37. " 'For once it falls, whether the rākṣasa Daśagrīva lives or dies, still in either case, there would be a falsehood.

38. " 'Therefore you must now hold back from that lord of the rākṣasas this rod, held high for destruction. Have some regard for the worlds and make my words truthful.'

39. "When righteous Yama had been addressed in this fashion, he replied: 'The rod has been withdrawn, for you are our sovereign lord.

40. " 'But now what can I do here on the battlefield since I am unable to kill this rākṣasa, so arrogant by virtue of his boon?

41. " 'Therefore I shall vanish from the sight of this rākṣasa.' Having spoken in this fashion, he disappeared on the spot, along with his chariot and horses.

42. "Having vanquished Yama, Daśagrīva, in great delight, loudly proclaimed his own name and then, in the Puṣpaka, departed from Yama's abode.

43. "Then, delighted, Vaivasvata, together with the gods headed by Brahmā, went to the highest heaven as did the great sage Nārada."

The end of the twenty-second sarga of the Uttarakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 23

1. "Next, boastful of his victory after vanquishing Yama—the bull among the thirty gods—Rāvaṇa Daśagrīva spied his companions.

2. "Praising him with shouts of victory, Mārīca and the others all entered the Puṣpaka, where they were reassured by Rāvaṇa.

3. "Then, in delight, he proceeded toward Rasātala and plunged into the repository of water, the ocean, which was inhabited by daityas and great serpents and was protected by Varuṇa.

4. "Moving on to the city of Bhogavatī, ruled by Vāsuki, he brought the great serpents under his power and, establishing them there, then proceeded to the city of Maṇimatī.

5. "The Nivātakavaca daityas, who had obtained a boon, dwelt there. Encountering them, the rākṣasa challenged them to battle.

6. "Those sons of Diti there were all very valorous, endowed with strength and equipped with all kinds of weapons. They were intoxicated with battle and fought fiercely.

7. "While they were fighting, a full year went by, and yet in that time neither side was either victorious or vanquished.

8. "Then the imperishable god, Grandfather Brahmā, the highest recourse of the triple world, came in haste, mounted on his splendid vehicle.

9. "Calling a halt to the fighting on the part of the Nivātakavacas, the eternal Grandfather Brahmā spoke these words unambiguously:

10. "'Surely it is impossible for the gods and asuras to defeat Rāvaṇa in battle. Nor is it possible for the gods and asuras, together with Indra, to vanquish you gentlemen.

11. "'An alliance between you and the rākṣasa would find favor with me. For all good things are shared equally among friends, of this there is no doubt.'

12. "And so then and there Rāvaṇa concluded an alliance—witnessed by Agni—with the Nivātakavacas. And he was greatly pleased.

13. "Duly honored by them, ten-faced Rāvaṇa dwelt there happily for a year, and he received as much homage as he did in his own city.

14. "And with a disciplined mind, he acquired the ninety-nine powers of illusion. Then he wandered throughout Rasātala in search of the city of Varuṇa, lord of the waters.

15. "Then, having in a short time conquered the city called Aśmanagara, which was protected by the Kālakeyas, he slew four hundred daityas.

16. "At length the lord of the rākṣasas spied the heavenly abode of Varuṇa. It resembled a white cloud and was established as firmly as Mount Kailāsa.

17. "And he saw standing there the cow Surabhi, who was constantly pouring forth milk and from whose flow of milk the ocean called the Ocean of Milk comes into being.

18. "It is out of that ocean that the cool-rayed moon, beneficial to all creatures, arises and resorting to which the supreme seers subsist by drinking its foam. It is there that the nectar of immortality was produced, as well as the wine of the gods, those drinkers of wine.

19. "And when Rāvaṇa had reverently circumambulated that supremely wonderful cow, whom people in the world refer to by the name Surabhi, he entered that extremely formidable city guarded by troops of many kinds.

20. “There he spied the eternally happy and most excellent abode of Varuṇa, which was filled with hundreds of rushing streams and resembled an autumnal cloud.

21. “Belabored by the leaders of the troops, he then struck them down in battle and said: ‘Where has your king gone? Immediately announce to him:

22. “ ‘ “Rāvaṇa has come seeking battle. Please offer combat to him.” Otherwise, with your hands cupped in reverence, you must declare, “I am vanquished,” and you shall then have nothing to fear.’

23. “At that moment, the enraged sons and grandsons of great Varuṇa marched forth as did Go and Puṣkara.

24. “Endowed with might and with every virtue and surrounded by their own troops, they yoked their chariots, which were steered by their owners’ will and the radiance of which was like that of the rising sun.

25. “Then there took place a terrifying and hair-raising battle between the rākṣasa Rāvaṇa and the sons of the lord of the waters.

26. “But the immensely powerful ministers of the rākṣasa Daśagrīva instantly cut down that entire army of Varuṇa.

27. “When Varuṇa’s sons saw their own forces cut down, they withdrew from combat, harried by a hail of arrows.

28. “They had been on the ground, but when they spied Rāvaṇa in the Puṣpaka, they quickly flew up into the sky on their swift-moving chariots.

29. “Now that they had reached the same elevation, there broke out between them a great and tumultuous aerial battle like that between the gods and the dānavas.

30. “Then, with arrows like fire, they forced Rāvaṇa to turn his back in battle, and, in great delight, they roared out various shouts of victory.

31. “Seeing the king assaulted, the heroic Mahodara was furious, and, abandoning all fear of death, he glanced about him, eager for battle.

32. “With his mace Mahodara struck down their horses—as swift as the wind and steered by their owners’ will—so that they crashed to the ground.

33. “When he had struck down the soldiers and horses of Varuṇa’s sons, he quickly released a loud roar upon seeing them stripped of their chariots.

34. "Struck down by Mahodara, their chariots and horses, together with their excellent charioteers, fell to the surface of the earth.

35. "But although they were bereft of their chariots, the heroic sons of great Varuṇa were not shaken, and, through their innate power, they remained in the sky.

36. "Stringing their bows and piercing Mahodara, they all together charged at Rāvaṇa in their rage.

37. "Then, enraged, Daśagrīva, standing there like the fire of Kāla, let fall upon their vital spots an immensely powerful hail of arrows.

38. "Standing firm and unassailable, he sent crashing down upon them various kinds of clubs, hundreds of crescent-headed arrows, spears, javelins, hundred-slayers, and iron cudgels as well.

39. "Then, wounded, the heroic foot soldiers fled.

40. "Releasing a mighty roar, the rākṣasa battered the sons of Varuṇa with all kinds of fearsome weapons, as might a thundercloud with torrents of rain.

41. "Then, turning away, they all fell to the ground and their attendants quickly took them from the battlefield to their homes.

42. "The rākṣasa then told them, 'Let Varuṇa be informed.' And Varuṇa's counselor, Prabhāsa by name, said to Rāvaṇa:

43. " 'The lord of the waters, Varuṇa of immense blazing energy, whom you are challenging to battle, has gone to Brahmā's world to hear a musical recital.

44. " 'Therefore, hero, since the king is away, why do you exhaust yourself to no purpose? You have already defeated the heroic princes who are here.'

45. "When he heard this, the lord of the rākṣasas loudly proclaimed his own name. Releasing a roar in his delight, he set forth from Varuṇa's realm.

46. "Returning by the path on which he had come, the rākṣasa, rising into the sky, turned his face toward Laṅkā and proceeded on his way."

The end of the twenty-third sarga of the Uttarakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

[Prakṣipta I follows sarga 23; see pp. 1285–1303]

Sarga 24

1. "As he was returning, evil-minded Rāvaṇa, in great delight, abducted along the way the daughters of kings, seers, gods, and gandharvas.

2. "After killing her kinsmen, the rākṣasa forced any beautiful woman he saw, married or unmarried, to enter his flying palace.

3. "And so, along the way, Rāvaṇa seized the daughters of the great serpents, yakṣas, men, rākṣasas, daityas, and dānavas.

4. "They had long tresses and exquisite limbs, and their faces were like the full moon. All of those young women, bent down by the weight of their breasts, were overwhelmed with grief.

5. "Trembling and afflicted with sorrow, they shed copious tears, which, born of fear and the fire of grief, were like flames of fire.

6. "Inflamed by the sighs of those sighing women, the Puṣpaka resembled a sacrificial fire pit with a fire contained within it.

7. "One of them, deeply afflicted with sorrow, brooded, 'Is he going to kill me?' Utterly overwhelmed with grief and sorrow, all of those women lamented together when they remembered their mothers, fathers, brothers, sons, and fathers-in-law:

8. " 'Oh, what will my son do without me, what of my mother, what of my brother, all of them drowning in sea of grief?

9. " 'Alas, what shall I do without my husband, who is a god to me? Be merciful, Mṛtyu, I beg you. Carry me away to the abode of Yama.

10. " 'What evil deed must I have done long ago in another birth, such that I have been assaulted by him and have fallen into a sea of grief?

11–12. " 'Indeed, now I cannot see any end to this sorrow of mine in this world. How pathetic are men! Indeed, nothing is more abject, since my feeble kinsmen were obliterated by mighty Rāvaṇa as are the stars by the risen sun.

13. " 'Oh! This immensely powerful rākṣasa delights in the ways of slaughter. Alas, he does not realize himself what an evil nature he has.

14. " 'By all means, the valor of this evil-minded creature is quite appropriate. But the act that is unbecoming to him is the molestation of other men's wives.

15. " 'Since this evil-minded Rāvaṇa is enamored of women who belong to others, he shall therefore meet his death on account of a woman.'

16. "Then, after he was cursed by those virtuous women, who were devoted to their husbands and who were firmly fixed on the path of virtue, he was drained of his blazing energy and robbed of his luster.

17. "As the women continued to lament in this fashion, Rāvaṇa, the lord of the rākṣasas, being honored by the night-roaming rākṣasas, entered the city of Laṅkā.

18. "Then the sister of the rākṣasa king, in great sorrow, threw herself at his feet and began to speak.

19. "Raising up his sister and consoling her, Rāvaṇa said, 'What is this, auspicious lady? Please tell me quickly.'

20. "Her eyes occluded with tears, the rākṣasa woman spoke these words: 'I am ruined! For you, in your might, have made me a widow, your majesty.

21. " 'Your majesty, you, in your might, slaughtered in battle those daityas of immense strength and valor known as the Kālakeyas.

22. " 'And in that battle my beloved husband, dearer to me than life itself, was slain by you, a brother no different than an enemy.

23. " 'Since, your majesty, I have been ruined by you yourself, who are my kinsman, I shall now have to endure the painful epithet "widow," which you have inflicted upon me.

24. " 'Should not your son-in-law, surely, have been protected by you even in battle? Yet, having slain him in battle yourself, your majesty, you feel no sense of shame.'

25. "Addressed in this fashion by his wailing sister, the rākṣasa comforted her and spoke these conciliatory words:

26. " 'Enough of this despondency, dear child! You shall have nothing to fear in any way. For I shall always gratify you with special honors and gifts.

27. " 'Intoxicated in battle and distracted, I was shooting arrows in my desire for victory, so I did not, lovely lady, distinguish in battle my friends from my enemies. And it is thus, sister, that I slew your husband in battle.

28. " 'Whatever beneficial thing might be accomplished at this time, I will do for you. You should stay with our brother Khara, who lives in lordly splendor.

29. “ ‘And your brother will be the lord of fourteen thousand immensely powerful rākṣasas, commanding and supporting them.

30. “ ‘There your brother, Lord Khara, the son of your mother’s sister, will always dwell, carrying out whatever words you yourself shall utter.

31. “ ‘So let that hero go quickly to protect the Daṇḍakas. Immensely powerful Dūṣaṇa shall be the chief of his army.

32. “ ‘For that forest tract was cursed long ago by the enraged Uśanas, who said, “This shall be the dwelling place of rākṣasas, without a doubt.” ’

33. “When Daśagrīva had spoken in this fashion, he assigned to him an army of fourteen thousand rākṣasas, who could take on any form at will.

34. “And so, surrounded by all of those fearsome-looking rākṣasas, the utterly fearless Khara proceeded swiftly to the Daṇḍakas.

35. “And there he ruled a kingdom in which all obstacles had been eliminated. And Śūrpaṇakhā, too, delighted, dwelt in the Daṇḍaka forest.”

The end of the twenty-fourth sarga of the Uttarakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 25

1. “When Daśagrīva had granted that fearsome forest to Khara and had consoled his sister, he was delighted and greatly satisfied.

2. “Then, together with his retinue, the great lord of the rākṣasas entered Laṅkā’s vast woodland known as Nikumbhilā.

3. “There he saw that a sacrifice was taking place, blazing, as it were, with splendor. It was replete with hundreds of sacrificial posts and was made more beautiful by the presence of a splendid shrine.

4. “And then he saw there, wearing a black antelope skin and bearing the waterpot, tuft, and staff of an ascetic, his own son Meghanāda, the tamer of his foes.

5. “Approaching, the lord of the rākṣasas embraced him with his arms and said, ‘What is this that is taking place, my child? Tell me that.’

6. “But on that occasion, it was that foremost of brahmans, their guru Uśanas of great austerities who, for the success of the sacrifice, addressed Rāvaṇa, the foremost of rākṣasas:

7. “ ‘I shall tell you everything, your majesty. Please listen. Your son has completed seven extremely elaborate sacrifices.

8. “ ‘They were the agniṣṭoma, the aśvamedha, and the sacrifice called bahusuvarṇaka, as well as the rājasūya sacrifice, the gomedha, and the vaiṣṇava.

9. “ ‘And when the māheśvara sacrifice, so difficult for men to perform, was completed, your son received here boons from Paśupati himself.

10. “ ‘These were a heavenly and virtually indestructible chariot that moved at its owner’s will and could travel through the sky and the power of illusion called the tāmasī, which creates darkness.

11. “ ‘It is said that by means of this power of illusion, O lord of the rākṣasas, it is impossible for even the gods or the asuras to discern a warrior’s movements in battle.

12. “ ‘And, dear boy, he also received two inexhaustible quivers, along with arrows and an invincible bow, as well as a mighty, divine weapon-spell that annihilates one’s enemies in battle.

13. “ ‘Now at the conclusion of the sacrifice, having received these boons, ten-faced Rāvaṇa, this son of yours, is expecting you, as am I.’

14. “Then Daśagrīva said: ‘This was not well done, since our enemies, headed by Indra, have been worshiped with material gifts.

15. “ ‘But come now, for it is impossible to undo what has already been done. So come, dear boy, let us go back to our own home.’

16–17. “Then, when Daśagrīva had returned with his son and Vibhīṣaṇa, he made all those women, who were overwhelmed with tears, descend from the Puṣpaka. They were the foremost women of the gods, dānavas, and rākṣasas. They were endowed with every auspicious mark. They were adorned with all kinds of ornaments, and they shone with their own blazing splendor.

18. “Now, when righteous Vibhīṣaṇa saw those women, who were overwhelmed with grief, and realized his brother’s intentions toward them, he spoke these words:

19. “ ‘In assaulting living beings with such behavior that is so destructive to your reputation, your interests, and your clan, you are behaving willfully.

20. “ ‘In fact, while you were carrying off these splendid women, after having assaulted their kinsmen, your majesty, Madhu has transgressed against you and carried off Kumbhīnasī.’

21. “Then Rāvaṇa spoke these words: ‘I don’t understand. What is this? And who is this person called Madhu that you mentioned?’

22. “And Vibhīṣaṇa, greatly angered, said these words to his brother: ‘Now listen to the fruit of this evil action, which has now come to pass.

23–25. “ ‘The elder brother of our maternal great-uncle Sumālin is the wise and elderly night-roaming rākṣasa known as Mālyavān. And he is our mother’s father’s elder and so our venerable grandfather. The daughter of his daughter is called Kumbhīnasī. And that daughter born of our maternal aunt Analā is, according to proper custom, the sister of us brothers.

26. “ ‘It is she whom the immensely powerful rākṣasa Madhu carried off, your majesty, while your son was performing his sacrifices and I was dwelling underwater.

27. “ ‘Striking down the foremost of the rākṣasas and assaulting your respected ministers, your majesty, he carried her off, although she was guarded in your inner apartments.

28. “ ‘Still, although we came to know of this, great king, we let it pass, and he was not killed, since a maiden must, of necessity, be given away to a husband by those who are authorized to do so. And, as you must realize, you have now suffered the consequences in this very world.’

29. “Then Daśagrīva, his eyes reddened in his rage, said: ‘Get my chariot ready at once and let my heroic warriors prepare themselves.

30. “ ‘And let my brother Kumbhakarṇa and those who are foremost among the night-roaming rākṣasas, armed with all kinds of weapons, mount their vehicles.

31. “ ‘This very day I shall first kill in battle this Madhu, who has no fear of Rāvaṇa, and then, surrounded by my companions and eager for battle, I shall proceed to Indra’s world.

32. “ ‘Once I have conquered the highest heaven and subjugated Indra, smasher of citadels, then, contented and adorned with the lordship of the triple world, I shall enjoy myself.’

33. “At once, four thousand fearsome akṣauhiṇīs of rākṣasas marched forth bearing all kinds of weapons and eager for battle.

34. “Taking command of the troops, Indrajit went ahead of the army. Valorous Rāvaṇa was in the middle, while Kumbhakarṇa brought up the rear.

35. “But as for righteous Vibhīṣaṇa, he practiced righteousness in Laṅkā, while all those illustrious warriors marched off to Madhu’s city.

36. “Filling the entire sky, all the rākṣasas went forth mounted on chariots, elephants, donkeys, camels, horses, and great fiery serpents.

37. "Seeing Rāvaṇa advancing, the daityas, who cherished enmity for the gods, followed behind him in their hundreds.

38. "Once ten-faced Rāvaṇa reached Madhu's city, he entered it. He saw his sister there but not Madhu.

39. "Terrified of the king of the rākṣasas, his sister Kumbhīnasī humbly cupped her hands in reverence and bowed her head down to his feet.

40. "Raising her up and saying, 'You have nothing to fear,' Rāvaṇa, foremost of the rākṣasas, said, 'What may I do for you?'

41. "She said: 'If you are kindly disposed toward me, immensely powerful king, then please do not kill my husband today, bestower of honor.

42. " 'Great-armed warrior, you yourself said, "You have nothing to fear." Now be true to your word. Foremost of kings, please have some consideration for me, I am begging you.'

43. "Delighted, Rāvaṇa said to his sister, who stood there: 'Where, indeed, is your husband? Please inform me at once.

44. " 'Together with him I shall surely go on to the world of the gods for victory. Because of my compassion and affection for you, I shall not kill Madhu.'

45. "Addressed in this fashion, the rākṣasa woman, as if transported with joy, roused her extremely wise husband, the night-roaming rākṣasa, who had been sleeping, and said:

46. " 'My brother, the night-roaming rākṣasa Daśagrīva, eager to conquer the world of the gods, has chosen you to assist him.

47. " 'You must go to assist him, rākṣasa, together with your kinsmen. For it is only proper to accomplish the purpose of one who is affectionate and devoted.'

48. "When he had heard these words of hers, Madhu uttered the words, 'So be it!' He then received the foremost of the rākṣasas with all due courtesy.

49. "He honored Rāvaṇa, the lord of the rākṣasas, in keeping with righteousness. Having received this honor, the mighty Daśagrīva spent the night there in Madhu's abode and then prepared to depart.

50. "When the lord of the rākṣasas, who resembled great Indra, had reached Mount Kailāsa, the abode of Vaiśravaṇa, he had his army make camp."

The end of the twenty-fifth sarga of the Uttarakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 26

1. "As the sun, maker of day, had set, mighty Daśagrīva chose to camp there with his army.

2. "And when the bright moon rose, equal in splendor to the mountain itself, he gazed at the beauty of the scene, now still further enhanced by the moonlight.

3. "And it was yet further enhanced by heavenly karṇikāra groves, dense thickets of kadamba, lotus ponds in blossom, and the waters of the Mandākinī River.

4. "And there in the abode of Kubera, the giver of wealth, could be heard, like the sound of bells, the sweet sounds of the troupes of apsarases singing.

5. "Shaken by the breeze, the trees, fragrant with the sweetness of their nectar, released showers of blossoms, perfuming, as it were, the mountain.

6. "The pleasant breeze, mingled with nectar and the pollen of the blossoms, took on their powerful scent and blew, kindling Rāvaṇa's desire.

7–8. "As the night wore on, through the singing, the abundance of blossoms, the coolness of the breeze, and the beauties of the mountain, immensely powerful Rāvaṇa fell under the sway of Kāma's arrows. Sighing again and again, he gazed at the hare-marked moon.

9. "Now at this juncture, Rambhā, the foremost of all the apsarases, adorned with heavenly blossoms, her face like the full moon, happened to pass that way.

10. "With moist unguents applied as well as fragrant powders made from the flowers of all six seasons, she was draped in a dark blue garment that resembled a rain-charged cloud.

11. "As she, whose face was like the hare-marked moon, whose lovely brows were like two bows, whose thighs were as shapely as elephant trunks, and whose hands were as soft as tender sprouts, passed through the army, Rāvaṇa spied her.

12. "Leaping up, the lord of the rākṣasas, tormented by the force of Kāma's arrows, seized her hand as she passed by and, smiling, said:

13. "'Where are you going, fair-hipped lady? What consummation of delight will you bestow? Whose moment of good fortune is this in that he is about to enjoy you?

14. “ ‘Who, this very night, will sate himself on the nectar of your mouth, as fragrant as the red or blue lotus and which is like the very essence of divine nectar?

15. “ ‘Against whose chest will these breasts, like golden jars, so full, so lovely, and so closely pressed, crush, timid lady?

16. “ ‘And who will, this night, ascend to that very heaven in the form of your broad hips, which, adorned with golden girdle-strings, resemble a circle of gold?

17. “ ‘What other person—whether Śakra, Viṣṇu, or the Aśvins—is more distinguished than I so that, on his account, you pass me by? It is not right.

18. “ ‘So rest here, broad-hipped woman, on this lovely stone surface, for there is no lord in the triple world who is my equal.

19. “ ‘It is I, ten-faced Rāvaṇa, who humbly entreats you with hands cupped in supplication, and I am the lord and master of the triple world. Please love me.’

20. “Addressed in this fashion, Rambhā, trembling and cupping her hands in supplication, said: ‘Be merciful. You ought not speak to me in this fashion, for you are like a father to me.

21. “ ‘Indeed, you are the one who should protect me, should I be assaulted by others. For by rights, I am your daughter-in-law. This is the truth I am telling you.’

22. “But as she stood there with her eyes lowered to her feet, Daśagrīva said to her, ‘Only if you were my son’s wife would you be my daughter-in-law.’

23. “Rambhā replied to Rāvaṇa: ‘It is just so. For by rights, bull among rākṣasas, I am the wife of your son.

24. “ ‘He is the son of your brother Kubera Vaiśravaṇa and dearer to him than life itself. He is famed throughout the three worlds as Nalakūbara.

25. “ ‘He is a brahman in respect to righteousness and a kshatriya in respect to valor. He is Agni in his wrath and like the earth itself, bearer of wealth, in forbearance.

26. “ ‘It is with the son of that world guardian that I have made an assignation. It is for his sake that I have put on all this adornment.

27. “ ‘For it is he and none other who loves me, your majesty. By the force of that truth you must release me, tamer of your foes.

28. “ ‘Right now that righteous man awaits, anxiously longing for me. So you ought not create an obstacle for your son here. Release me!

29. “ ‘You should follow the path trodden by the virtuous, bull among rākṣasas. You are to be respected by me, and by the same token, I should be cherished by you.’

30. “But even as Rambhā was uttering this speech, which was in accord with righteousness and proper conduct, the powerful rākṣasa, cutting her off, in his infatuation seized her forcibly, and, inflamed with lust and infatuation, he began to rape her.

31. “Then, once she was released, her garlands and ornaments broken, Rambhā was as disheveled as a river churned up by the sporting of a great bull elephant.

32. “Trembling in her shame, terrified, and cupping her hands in supplication, she ran to Nalakūbara and fell at his feet.

33. “And when great Nalakūbara saw her in such a state, he said, ‘What is this, auspicious lady, that you have fallen at my feet?’

34. “But she, sighing and trembling, with her hands cupped in supplication, then began to tell him everything, just as it had happened.

35. “ ‘My lord, Daśagrīva came here on his way to Indra’s heaven, Triviṣṭapa, and he passed the night here together with his army.

36. “ ‘As I was coming to meet you, tamer of your foes, he spied me. Seizing me, that rākṣasa asked, “To whom do you belong?”

37. “ ‘And although I told him the whole truth, he, his mind overwhelmed with lust and delusion, would not heed my words.

38. “ ‘My lord, I pleaded with him, saying, “Your majesty, I am your daughter-in-law.” But brushing all that aside, he forcibly raped me.

39. “ ‘Thus, you should please forgive my transgression, gentle bestower of pride. For the strength of a woman is not equal to that of a man.’

40. “Then, when the son of Vaiśravaṇa had heard about this, he was furious. After hearing about that egregious assault, he entered into meditation.

41. “Then, when, after a moment, he had confirmed Rāvaṇa’s actions, Vaiśravaṇa’s son, his eyes red with rage, took water in his hand.

42. “When he had taken that heavenly water and sipped it according to the ritual precepts, he then pronounced a terrible curse on the lord of the rākṣasas:

43. "'Since, auspicious woman, he forcibly assaulted you, who were unwilling, he shall never force himself upon another unwilling young woman again.

44. "'And if ever, afflicted by lust, he should assault an unwilling woman, then his head shall burst into seven pieces.'

45. "The moment that curse, equal in radiance to a blazing fire, was uttered, the war drums of the gods thundered and a shower of blossoms fell from the sky.

46. "When all the gods, headed by Brahmā, Lord of creatures, came to know of the overall state of the world and of the impending doom of the rākṣasa, they were delighted.

47. "But when Daśagrīva heard about that hair-raising curse, he lost his desire to make love to unwilling women."

The end of the twenty-sixth sarga of the Uttarakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 27

1. "Then, passing beyond Mount Kailāsa, Daśagrīva, the night-roaming rākṣasa of immense blazing energy, along with his rākṣasas, reached Indra's world.

2. "As the rākṣasa army approached on every side, its din, like the roar of the ocean being shattered, reached the world of the gods.

3–4. "Upon hearing that Rāvaṇa had come, Indra trembled on his throne. He addressed all the gods who were assembled there—the Ādityas, along with the Vasus, the Rudras, the Viśvas, the sādhyas, and the hosts of the Maruts—saying, 'Make ready for battle with evil-minded Rāvaṇa.'

5. "Addressed in this fashion by Śakra, the immensely powerful gods, who were equal to Śakra in battle and confident in combat, girded themselves for battle.

6. "But great Indra was dejected for he was fearful of Rāvaṇa. Approaching Viṣṇu, he spoke these words:

7. "'O Viṣṇu, you who are endowed with immense power and valor, what shall we do? For this mighty rākṣasa has come, seeking battle.

8. "'He is powerful because of the granting of that boon and for no other reason. But, O God, those words of Prajāpati, must be rendered true.

9. “ ‘Please do as you did before when, relying upon your counsel, I burned up Namuci, Vṛtra, Bali, Naraka, and Śambara.

10. “ ‘For, mighty God among gods, you are the Supreme Spirit. There is no one other than you, who is our protector and recourse in times of calamity.

11. “ ‘You are the eternal and majestic lotus-navelled Nārāyaṇa. And it is you alone who have established me in the everlasting kingship of the gods.

12. “ ‘Therefore, please tell me, truthfully, God of gods. Will you, with the aid of your sword and discus, fight the enemy in battle yourself?’

13. “Addressed in this fashion by Śakra, the god, Lord Nārāyaṇa, said: ‘You need have no fear. Moreover, listen to me.

14. “ ‘For the time being, this evil creature, invincible through the gift of his boon, is impossible to kill even if encountered in battle by the gods and the dānavas.

15. “ ‘By all means, this rākṣasa, arrogant in his might and assisted by his son, is going to perform mighty feats. I know this through my inherent knowledge.

16. “ ‘And as for what you asked me, Śakra—“Will you fight him in battle?”—I shall by no means fight Rāvaṇa, the lord of the rākṣasas.

17. “ ‘For Viṣṇu never turns back without having killed his enemy. And at this time what you desire with regard to that rākṣasa is not feasible, as he has acquired that boon.

18. “ ‘But, standing right before you, O lord of the gods, Indra of the hundred sacrifices, I promise you that I myself shall be the cause of this rākṣasa’s death.

19. “ ‘When I recognize that the time is at hand, I shall kill Rāvaṇa, together with his son, in battle and so gratify the gods.’

20. “At that moment, just at daybreak, a roar was heard on every side coming from Rāvaṇa’s army, which always fought fiercely.

21. “Then, with a tumultuous din, a fearsome battle involving all sorts of weapons broke out between the gods and the rākṣasas.

22. “At this juncture, the heroic rākṣasa ministers, fearsome to look upon, ran forward to battle at Rāvaṇa’s command.

23–24. “There were Mārīca, Prahasta, Mahāpārśva, Mahodara, Akampana, Nikumbha, Śuka, Sāraṇa, Saṃhrādi, Dhūmaketu, Mahādaṃṣṭra, Mahāmukha, Jambumālin, Mahāmālin, and the rākṣasa Virūpākṣa.

25. “Surrounded by all those immensely powerful warriors, that bull among rākṣasas Sumālin, Rāvaṇa’s grandfather, plunged into the enemy hosts.

26. “Together with those night-roaming rākṣasas, he scattered in his rage all the hosts of the gods with all manner of sharp weapons.

27. “At this juncture, the heroic Vasu named Sāvitra, eighth among the Vasus, plunged into that great battle.

28. “Now there arose a battle between the gods—who were furious at the rākṣasas’ boasting of never turning back in battle—and the rākṣasas.

29. “Then, as the gods stood before them in battle, the heroic rākṣasas slaughtered them by the hundreds and thousands with all sorts of fearsome weapons.

30. “But in that battle, through their own blazing energy, the gods, with their various weapons, sent those fearsome and immensely powerful rākṣasas to the abode of Yama.

31. “At this juncture, the heroic rākṣasa named Sumālin, enraged, entered the fray with all sorts of weapons.

32. “Enraged, he scattered the entire army of the gods with all sorts of sharp weapons, just as the wind might rain clouds.

33. “Pelted with lances, fearsome darts, and hails of huge arrows, all the gods, who had assembled, could not stand their ground.

34. “Then, even though the thirty gods were being scattered by Sumālin, the god Sāvitra, eighth among the Vasus, stood his ground.

35. “But even as that night-roaming rākṣasa attacked, that warrior of immense blazing energy, surrounded by his own troops, warded him off in battle through his valor.

36. “Then there was a duel, extremely terrifying to the world, between the two frenzied warriors—Sumālin and the Vasu—neither of whom ever turned back in battle.

37. “Then, with huge arrows, the very great Vasu instantly brought down Sumālin’s great serpent-chariot.

38. “And having thus destroyed Sumālin’s chariot in battle with hundreds of sharp arrows, the Vasu seized a mace with his hand in order to kill him.

39. “Quickly seizing that splendid, blazing mace, which resembled the rod of Kāla, Sāvitra brought it down upon Sumālin’s head.

40. "And then, as it fell on Sumālin's head, that mace, which resembled a blazing meteor, looked like a mighty thunderbolt hurled at a mountain by thousand-eyed Indra.

41. "Once he was struck down in battle and reduced to ashes by that mace, his body—neither flesh nor bone—could be seen.

42. "When the rākṣasas saw that Sumālin had been struck down in battle, they all fled en masse in all directions, wailing loudly."

The end of the twenty-seventh sarga of the Uttarakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 28

1–2. "Then, seeing that Sumālin had been slain and reduced to ashes by the Vasu and observing that his own army, harried by arrows, had fled, Rāvaṇa's mighty son Meghanāda, enraged, turned back all the rākṣasas toward battle and took his stand.

3. "Mounted in his chariot, which shone like fire and moved at its owner's will, the great chariot-warrior raced toward the army of the gods like a blazing fire toward a woodland.

4. "Bearing various weapons, he plunged into that army, and the gods fled in all directions at the mere sight of him.

5. "Although he wished to fight, not one of them took a stand there. Then, seeing that they were all terrified, Śakra, rallying them, cried:

6. " 'Have no fear! Do not flee! You must return to the fight. For my son, who has never been defeated, is going forth to battle.'

7. "Then Śakra's son, the god known as Jayanta, rushed into battle in a chariot of marvelous construction.

8. "All the thirty gods surrounded Śacī's son and, confronting Rāvaṇa's son in battle, they took their stand.

9. "On behalf of great Indra's son and the son of the rākṣasa lord, a tremendous battle took place, befitting the gods and the rākṣasas.

10. "But then the son of the rākṣasa rained down arrows adorned with gold upon Jayanta's charioteer Gomukha, Mātali's son.

11. "But, in the same way, Śacī's son, Jayanta, in a rage, pierced Rāvaṇi, as well as his charioteer, on the battlefield.

12. “But Rāvaṇi, that rākṣasa of immense blazing energy, his eyes wide in his rage, pelted the son of Śakra with a hail of arrows.

13. “Seizing great and powerful weapons, Rāvaṇi let fly hundred-slayers, iron cudgels, darts, maces, swords, battle-axes, and enormous mountain peaks.

14. “As Rāvaṇa’s son was striking down his enemies, the worlds were terrified and a great darkness arose.

15. “Then the army of the gods, which had been surrounding Śacī’s son, was afflicted in every way and ran helter-skelter.

16. “Neither the gods nor their enemies could recognize one another. Scattered on every side, they ran helter-skelter.

17. “At this juncture, the valorous hero Puloman, son of Diti, appeared. He caught up Śacī’s son and carried him away.

18. “Taking his grandson Jayanta, his maternal grandfather Puloman—who had fathered Śacī Paulomī—entered the vast ocean.

19. “When the gods saw the extremely frightening disappearance of Jayanta, they were terrified and dejected, and they fled in all directions.

20. “But Rāvaṇi was excited, and, surrounded by his own troops, he charged at the gods and released a mighty roar.

21. “When the lord of the gods saw the disappearance of his son and the valor of Rāvaṇi, he said to Mātali, ‘Have my chariot brought up.’

22. “Then, driven by Mātali, that divine and extremely fearsome chariot, swift as thought and ready for battle, drew near.

23. “Once Indra had mounted the chariot, thundering clouds laced with lightning went before it, rumbling and driven by the wind.

24. “All sorts of musical instruments were played, and hymns of praise were sung. And the troupes of apsarases danced all together as Vāsava went forth to battle.

25. “Surrounded by the Rudras, the Vasus, the Ādityas, and the sādhyas, together with the hosts of the Maruts, all of them bearing all sorts of weapons, the overlord of the thirty gods went forth.

26. “But even as Śakra went forth, the wind blew harshly and the sun grew dim, while huge, blazing meteors appeared.

27. “At this juncture, the heroic and glorious Daśagrīva mounted his divine chariot, which had been fashioned by Viśvakarman.

28. “It was encircled by enormous, horrifying serpents, the wind from whose exhalations seemed to scorch the very battlefield.

29. “Surrounded by heroic daityas and night-roaming rākṣasas, his divine chariot turned toward the battlefield and rushed straight at great Indra.

30. “Waving off his son, he took his stand himself, so that Rāvaṇi withdrew from the battle and stood aside.

31. “Then there commenced a battle between the gods and the rākṣasas. In that battle, there was a fearsome hail of weapons, as if from storm clouds.

32. “And as for evil-minded Kumbhakarṇa, he, armed with all sorts of weapons, fought anyone at all in that battle without even knowing who they were.

33. “In a total frenzy, he assailed the gods with anything he could—fangs, arms, feet, javelins, iron cudgels, and arrows.

34. “Then, in that battle with the illustrious Rudras, together with the Ādityas, that fierce warrior, the night-roaming rākṣasa, was slashed everywhere with weapons.

35. “In that battle, with all sorts of sharp weapons, the thirty gods, together with the hosts of the Maruts, put to flight the entire rākṣasa army.

36. “Struck down with weapons, some of them writhed on the ground, while others remained fixed to their mounts in the battle.

37–38. “Some of those night-roaming rākṣasas, unable to move, remained clinging with both arms to their chariots, elephants, donkeys, camels, serpents, horses, crocodiles, boars, and creatures with the faces of piśācas, while others, grievously wounded with weapons by the gods, died.

39. “With the slain and stupefied rākṣasas scattered across the ground, the wreckage of battle looked like a painting.

40. “In the forefront of the battle, there flowed a river streaming with blood in place of water. It was thronged with adjutant storks and vultures and had weapons in place of crocodiles.

41–42. “At this juncture, valorous Daśagrīva, in a rage at seeing his entire army struck down by the gods, plunged quickly into the huge ocean of their army and, striking down the thirty gods in battle, raced straight toward Śakra.

43–44. "Then Śakra twanged his mighty bow with a tremendous roar, so that the ten directions reverberated with the thunder of its twanging. Drawing that mighty bow, Indra let fall on Rāvaṇa's head arrows with the brilliance of fire or the sun.

45. "And in the same fashion, great-armed Daśagrīva, standing his ground, pelted Śakra with hails of arrows loosed from his bow.

46. "Then, as those two battled fiercely with hails of arrows on every side, nothing at all could be discerned, for everything was shrouded in darkness."

The end of the twenty-eighth sarga of the Uttarakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 29

1. "Then, although that darkness had come on, the rākṣasas, intoxicated with their own strength, and the gods fought on, slaughtering one another.

2. "But by that point, the army of the gods had left standing only a tenth part of the vast host of the rākṣasas. The remainder had been led to the abode of Yama.

3. "Since everything was cloaked in darkness, the gods and rākṣasas could not recognize one another and so went on fighting among themselves.

4. "And while everything was shrouded in a mass of darkness, only three—Indra, Rāvaṇa, and immensely powerful Rāvaṇi—did not succumb to delusion.

5. "Now, when Rāvaṇa saw that his entire army had been struck down in battle, he flew into a towering rage and released a tremendous roar.

6. "In his rage, that unassailable warrior addressed his charioteer, who was in the chariot: 'Take me through the midst of the enemy army, right through to the end.

7. " 'This very day, fighting from the sky with all sorts of immensely powerful weapons, I myself shall destroy all the thirty gods through my valor.

8. " 'I shall kill Indra, Varuṇa, Kubera, bestower of wealth, and Yama. After I have quickly slain the thirty gods, I myself shall reign over all.

9. “ ‘And you must not give way to despair but drive my chariot swiftly. Now I tell you a second time, take me right through to the end.

10. “ ‘This place where we are now is the region of the Nandana garden. Now you must take me to where Mount Udaya stands.’

11. “And when his charioteer had heard those words of his, he directed his horses, which were as swift as thought, right through the middle of their enemies.

12. “Now, when Śakra, lord of the gods, who was standing in his chariot, realized his intention, he spoke these words to the gods, who were engaged in battle:

13. “ ‘Listen, you gods, to my words regarding what I would like. The rākṣasa Daśagrīva is to be taken alive, straightaway.

14. “ ‘Just like an ocean with towering waves on the full-moon day, this exceedingly powerful warrior is going to crash through our ranks with his chariot, which has the force of a gale.

15. “ ‘For it is not possible to kill him just now, as he is utterly fearless through the gift of a boon. Therefore we must capture the rākṣasa. You must be vigilant in battle!

16. “ ‘I have enjoyed the lordship of the triple world only after imprisoning Bali. I would now like to imprison this evildoer in the same way.’

17. “Then Śakra, of immense blazing energy, leaving Rāvaṇa, took a stand in another area where he fought on, annihilating the rākṣasas in battle.

18. “But Daśagrīva, never retreating, plunged into the army from the north, while Indra of the hundred sacrifices plunged in by the southern flank.

19. “The lord of the rākṣasas then penetrated the entire army of the gods to a distance of a hundred leagues and pelted it with hails of arrows.

20. “Although Śakra saw that his own army had been penetrated, he remained calm, and, cutting off ten-faced Rāvaṇa, he stopped his advance.

21. “At this juncture, when the dānavas and the rākṣasas saw that Rāvaṇa had been checked by Śakra, they cried out, ‘Alas! We are lost!’

22. “Then Rāvaṇi, beside himself with rage, mounted his chariot and, in a towering rage, plunged into that extremely fearsome army.

23. “Resorting to the power of magical illusion that had been given to him long ago by Śiva, lord of cattle, he became invisible to all beings and pelted that army.

24. "Then, leaving aside the gods, he made straight for Śakra. But great Indra of immense blazing energy could not see that son of his enemy.

25. "After striking Mātali and his horses with splendid arrows, he, shooting rapidly, pelted great Indra with a hail of arrows.

26. "Then Śakra, abandoning his chariot and dismissing Mātali, mounted Airāvata and went in search of Rāvaṇi.

27. "But through the power of his magical illusion, the rākṣasa could not be seen in battle even as he pelted great Indra of immeasurable might with torrents of arrows.

28. "When Rāvaṇi reckoned that Indra was exhausted, he bound him through his power of magical illusion and led him toward his own army.

29. "When all the immortal gods saw great Indra forcibly carried off in that battle by the power of magical illusion, they cried, 'How can this be? For Rāvaṇi, who, through the power of magical illusion, is leading Indra—himself a master of magical spells—away, is nowhere to be seen.'

30. "And at this juncture, all the hosts of the gods, in a towering rage, assaulted Rāvaṇa with hails of weapons.

31. "For, having encountered the Vasus, Ādityas, and the hosts of the Maruts, Rāvaṇa, battered by weapons, could neither make a stand in battle nor fight on.

32. "But, when Rāvaṇi saw that his father was exhausted and that his luster was dimmed by weapons, he, still invisible, said this to him in the midst of battle:

33. " 'Come, father, let us go. For the work of battle is done. Sir, you have been victorious, as you must know. Therefore, you should be easy in your mind and free from anxiety.

34. " 'For I have captured Śakra, who is the lord of the army of the gods and of the entire triple world. And I have broken the pride of the gods.

35. " 'Having captured your enemy through your might, you should enjoy the triple world as you please. Why should you exert yourself in vain, since further battle would yield no benefit?'

36. "When ten-faced Rāvaṇa had heard those words of Rāvaṇi, his mind was put at ease, and he withdrew from the army of the gods and from the work of battle.

37. "Then the mighty lord of the night-roaming rākṣasas, having attained victory, was free from his anxiety concerning the battle. Delighted, he prepared to depart from there to his palace, and, turning to his son, he said these words:

38. "'O you whose valor is equal to that of the immortal gods, through your feats of valor befitting the greatest of warriors, you have increased the pride of my lineage in that you have defeated the lord of the thirty gods and the thirty gods as well.

39. "'So bring Vāsava quickly and, surrounded by the army, proceed from here to the city. And as you proceed I will quickly follow behind you together with my ministers.'

40. "Then, surrounded by his forces and together with his mounts, the rākṣasa Rāvaṇi, his mind delighted, took the lord of the thirty gods and, reaching his own palace, dismissed the rākṣasas."

The end of the twenty-ninth sarga of the Uttarakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 30

1. "Now, when that immensely powerful god, great Indra, had been defeated by Rāvaṇa's son, the gods placed Prajāpati before them and proceeded to Laṅkā.

2. "Approaching Rāvaṇa, who was surrounded by his sons and brothers, Prajāpati, hovering in the sky, addressed him in a conciliatory fashion.

3. "'Rāvaṇa, my child, I am pleased with your son's feats in battle. Oh, the magnificence of his valor! He is your equal or even your superior.

4. "'You, sir, have conquered the entire triple world through your own blazing energy, and your vow has borne fruit. And I am indeed pleased with your son.

5. "'And, Rāvaṇa, this exceedingly mighty son of yours, Rāvaṇi, shall now be famed throughout the world as Indrajit, "the Conqueror of Indra."

6. "'Indeed, your majesty, this rākṣasa, relying on whom you brought the thirty gods under your control, will be a mighty conqueror of his enemies.

7. "'Therefore, great-armed warrior, please release great Indra, the chastiser of Pāka. Moreover, what must the gods, denizens of heaven, offer you for his release?'

8. "Then Indrajit, of immense blazing energy and victorious in battle, said, 'For his release, I now choose immortality, O God.'

9. "But the lotus-born god Brahmā said to Rāvaṇi, 'There is no such thing as absolute immortality for any living beings on earth.'

10. "Then Indrajit addressed lotus-born Brahmā, who hovered before him: 'In that case you must hear about the supernatural power that I demand for the release of Indra of the hundred sacrifices.

11. " 'My abiding desire, O God, is that whenever I strive to conquer my enemies, I should enter battle only after having worshiped Agni, the purifier, with oblations.

12. " 'But, O God, let my death occur in battle only if I should fight before that rite is completed, with its mantras and oblations to Agni, the shining god of fire.

13. " 'Moreover, every other man solicits immortality through asceticism. But I shall secure immortality through valor.'

14. "The god Prajāpati said to him, 'Let it be so!' So Indrajit released Śakra, and the gods returned to the highest heaven.

15. "At this juncture, Rāma, Śakra, despondent and with his garments and garlands in disarray, gave way to brooding, his mind overwhelmed with gloomy thoughts.

16. "When the god Prajāpati saw him in such a state, he said: 'O Indra of the hundred sacrifices, why are you so sorrowful? You must remember your evil deed.

17. " 'O lord, foremost of the immortal gods, long ago I created many people. They were all of a single type. They all had the same speech, and they all looked the same in every respect.

18. " 'There was absolutely no difference among them, either in their appearance or in their characteristics. Therefore, with my mind focused, I began to ponder over these people.

19. " 'Then, in order to create some distinction among them, I selected from those people whatever was most excellent in each and every limb and fashioned a woman.

20. " 'With those qualities of beauty, I fashioned a woman devoid of all imperfection. And so I gave her the name Ahalyā, "Devoid of Imperfection."

21. " 'But once that woman had been fashioned, O lord of the gods, I became concerned as to whom she should belong, bull among gods.

22. “ ‘But because of your exalted station, you, lord Śakra, smasher of citadels, reckoned in your mind, “She must be my wife.”

23. “ ‘I placed her under the guardianship of great Gautama, and when she had been in his care for many years, he returned her.

24. “ ‘Then, once I had made certain of the self-control of that great sage and had recognized his perfection in asceticism, I then gave her to him to be his wife.

25. “ ‘That righteous great sage then made love with her. But since she had been given to Gautama, the gods lost all hope.

26. “ ‘You, however, were infuriated, and, consumed with lust, you went to that sage’s ashram. Then you spied that woman, who was like a shining flame of fire.

27. “ ‘Overwhelmed with lust and filled with rage, Śakra, you raped her. And you were seen in the ashram by that supreme seer.

28. “ ‘Then, O lord of the gods, you experienced a reversal of your condition. For the enraged seer of supreme blazing energy cursed you as follows:

29. “ ‘ “Since, Vāsava, showing no fear, you raped my wife, therefore, your majesty, you shall fall into the hands of your enemies in battle.

30. “ ‘ “And this tendency, evil-minded wretch, that you have established in the world, will now be common to all men as well. Of this there is no doubt.

31. “ ‘ “And as for that great and very grievous violation that will arise, half of it will be ascribed to him who perpetrates it, while half will be ascribed to you.

32. “ ‘ “Nor, smasher of citadels, will your position be permanent because of your association with this violation that you have established in the world.

33. “ ‘ “And whosoever may become lord of the gods, he shall be so only temporarily. Such is the curse that I have pronounced.” That is what Gautama said to you at that time.

34. “ ‘Then that sage of great austerities addressed his wife, reviling her: “Unchaste woman, become invisible within the confines of my ashram.

35. “ ‘ “Since, endowed with beauty and youth, you were unfaithful, you shall no longer be the only beautiful woman in the world.

36. “ ‘ “That beauty of yours, once so hard to obtain and on account of which this infatuation came about, shall henceforth belong to all people.”

37. “ ‘And so from that time onward, many people have been endowed with beauty. It is because of the sage’s unleashing of that curse that all this has come to pass.

38. “ ‘Now, great-armed Vāsava, you must remember the evil deed that you did on account of which, and for no other reason, you were captured by your enemy.

39. “ ‘Now you must immediately perform the vaiṣṇava sacrifice with your mind fully focused. Only then, purified by that sacrifice, shall you return to the highest heaven.

40. “ ‘Nor, lord of the gods, was your son slain in the great battle. He was taken by his grandfather and kept in the ocean, the great receptacle of waters.’

41. “When he had heard this, great Indra performed the vaiṣṇava sacrifice and returned once more to highest heaven and ruled the gods.

42. “Such, Rāma, was the might of Indrajit, which I have told you about. He conquered the lord of the gods. What then of other living beings?”

The end of the thirtieth sarga of the Uttarakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 31

1. Then Rāma of immense blazing energy, in his amazement, once more bowing deferentially, addressed these words to that foremost of seers, Agastya:

2. “Blessed one, foremost of the twice-born, were people so dispirited then that Rāvaṇa, lord of the rākṣasas, did not meet with effective opposition?

3. “Or, since so many kings were conquered, is it that those lords of the earth were devoid of might and deprived of splendid, divine weapon-spells?”

4. When the blessed seer Agastya had heard Rāma Rāghava’s words, he smiled and addressed him, as Grandfather Brahmā might the Lord.

5. “In this fashion, Rāma, O lord of the earth and bull among kings, Rāvaṇa wandered the earth, harrying its kings.

6. "At length he reached the city called Māhiṣmatī, which, in its close proximity to Agni of the golden seed, was as resplendent as the city of heaven.

7. "In his blazing splendor, its king, whose name was Arjuna, was the equal of Agni of the golden seed. For Agni constantly dwelt in his fire pit, which was strewn with kuśa grass.

8. "Now on that very day that mighty king Arjuna, overlord of the Haihayas, had gone to the Narmadā River to take his pleasure with his womenfolk.

9. "But Rāvaṇa, lord of the rākṣasas, asked Arjuna's ministers: 'Where is Arjuna, your king, today? Please tell me at once.

10. " 'I am Rāvaṇa and have come eager to do battle with that foremost of men. Now you must calmly inform him of my arrival.'

11. "Addressed in this fashion by Rāvaṇa, those extremely wise ministers told the lord of the rākṣasas that the lord of the earth was away.

12. "When the son of Viśravas had heard from the townsfolk that Arjuna was gone, he departed and came to the Vindhya mountains, which resembled the Himalayas.

13–16. "Rāvaṇa gazed upon the Vindhya range. It seemed to burst forth from the earth, to pierce the clouds and scrape the sky. It had a thousand peaks, and its caves were haunted by lions. With the icy waters plunging from its precipices, it seemed to be laughing shrilly. It was immensely high, and, with the gods, dānavas, and gandharvas sporting with their womenfolk, together with the kinnaras and troupes of apsarases, it was truly heaven. As it loomed there, with its streams pouring forth—through its fissures—water as bright as the sky, it seemed to be flashing forth flickering tongues.

17. "Gazing at the Vindhya range, which, with its caves and flickering flames, resembled the Himalayas, Rāvaṇa proceeded to the Narmadā River.

18–19. "It was a holy river flowing to the western ocean, its waters rushing over stones. Its pools were churned up by buffalo, gaur, lions, tigers, bears, and great elephants—all of them oppressed by heat and thirst. It was always thronged with cakravākas and kāraṇḍas, as well as haṃsas, waterfowl, and sarus cranes—all of them impassioned and warbling constantly.

20–23. "The ten-faced bull among rākṣasas descended quickly from the Puṣpaka. Then, just as one might enter the embrace of a lovely and beloved woman, he immersed himself in the Narmadā, the foremost of rivers, which had blossoming trees for a chaplet, a pair of cakravākas for breasts, broad banks for hips, a line of haṃsas for a lovely girdle, a body smeared with pollen, the foam of the water for a white mantle, a plunge into its waters for an embrace, and blooming lotuses for lovely eyes. Afterward, seated on its charming bank, which was adorned with all kinds of flowers, the lord of the rākṣasas, together with his ministers, took pleasure in the sight of the Narmadā.

24. "Then Rāvaṇa, lord of the rākṣasas, smiling playfully, addressed his ministers there—Mārīca, Śuka, and Sāraṇa:

25. " 'The scorching sun, now at the zenith, seems, with his thousand rays, to turn the world to gold. Yet, realizing that I am sitting here, the sun seems more like the moon.

26. " 'Cooled by the waters of the Narmadā, the fragrant breeze blows gently out of fear of me, dispelling my fatigue.

27. " 'And even this best of rivers, the Narmadā, the increaser of delight, concealing her fish, birds, and waves, stands like a timid and beautiful woman.

28–29. " 'You gentlemen have been wounded with weapons in battle by kings who were equal to Indra, and you are smeared with blood like the ointment of sandalwood. You should therefore immerse yourselves in the Narmadā, which gives happiness to men, just as the great rutting elephants, headed by Mahāpadma, plunge into the Ganges.

30. " 'For once you have bathed in this mighty river, you will rid yourselves of all evils.

31. " 'But as for me, I shall calmly make a floral offering to Śiva, Umā's lord, here on this bank whose luster is like that of the autumnal moon.'

32. "Addressed in this fashion by Rāvaṇa, Mārīca, Śuka, and Sāraṇa, along with Mahodara and Dhūmrākṣa, immersed themselves in the Narmadā.

33. "The Narmadā River was as agitated by those elephants among the rākṣasa lords as is the Ganges by those mighty elephants, Vāmana, Añjana, Padma, and the rest.

34. "Then, when the rākṣasas had bathed in the lovely waters of the Narmadā, they came out and gathered flowers for Rāvaṇa's offering.

35. "And there on Narmadā's lovely bank, whose luster was like that of a white cloud, the rākṣasa lords in a short time heaped up a veritable mountain of flowers.

36. "Once the flowers had been gathered, Rāvaṇa, lord of the rākṣasas, went down to the river to bathe, just as might a mighty elephant to the Ganges.

37. "And when Rāvaṇa had bathed there according to the ritual prescriptions and had quietly intoned an unsurpassed mantra, he emerged from the waters of the Narmadā.

38. "Seven rākṣasas followed Rāvaṇa as he proceeded, his hands cupped in reverence. And wherever Rāvaṇa, the overlord of the rākṣasas, went, they carried a liṅga made of jāmbūnada gold.

39. "After installing that liṅga on an altar of sand, Rāvaṇa worshiped it with fragrant articles and flowers with the fragrance of nectar.

40. "And then, when the night-roaming rākṣasa had worshiped Hara, the dispeller of the afflictions of the virtuous and the supreme granter of boons who was adorned with the rays of the moon, he sang and, stretching out his long arms, danced."

The end of the thirty-first sarga of the Uttarakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 32

1–2. "Now not far from where Rāvaṇa, the lord of the rākṣasas, was making his floral offering on the bank of the Narmadā, Arjuna, foremost of conquerors and the lord and master of Māhiṣmatī, was sporting with his women in the Narmadā's waters.

3. "In their midst, King Arjuna was then as resplendent as a bull elephant in the midst of a thousand elephant cows.

4. "Eager to discover the ultimate strength of his thousand arms, Arjuna then obstructed the Narmadā's current with them.

5. "When the clear water reached the dam made by Kārtavīrya's arms, it flowed rapidly upstream, crumbling the riverbanks.

6. "Carrying along fish, crocodiles, dolphins, flowers, and mats of kuśa grass, the current of the Narmadā's waters looked just as it would in the rainy season.

7. "As if directed by Kārtavīrya, the current of water swept away Rāvaṇa's entire floral offering.

8. "And Rāvaṇa, abandoning his half-completed rite, glared at his beloved Narmadā as if at a cherished wife who had become disobedient.

9–10. "But when Rāvaṇa saw the current of the water flowing from the west and swelling like a tidal wave, he moved eastward and then saw the river—whose appearance was like that of an obedient woman and whose waterfowl were unruffled—in its splendid natural state.

11. "And then, with a finger of his right hand accompanied by a brief word, ten-faced Rāvaṇa directed Śuka and Sāraṇa to seek the source of that surge.

12. "Commanded by Rāvaṇa, the two heroic brothers, Śuka and Sāraṇa, set out, flying through the sky and heading west.

13–16. "But when they had gone a mere half a league, the two night-roaming rākṣasas spied a man and many women playing in the water. With his hair disordered by the water, he resembled a huge sāla tree. The corners of his eyes were red with passion, and in splendor he was the likeness of Madana, the god of love. That crusher of his foes was obstructing the river with his thousand arms as a mountain might obstruct the land with its thousand foothills. He was completely surrounded by a thousand young and exquisite women, just as a bull elephant might be by a thousand impassioned elephant cows.

17. "Now, when the two rākṣasas Śuka and Sāraṇa had seen that most amazing man, they turned back and, approaching Rāvaṇa, addressed him:

18. "'Lord of the rākṣasas, someone who resembles a huge sāla tree has blocked up the Narmadā like a dam and is having his womenfolk play.

19. "'And the river, its waters obstructed by him with his thousand arms, is sending forth again and again floods that resemble tidal waves.'

20. "Having listened while Śuka and Sāraṇa were speaking in this fashion, Rāvaṇa said, 'It is Arjuna!' and leapt to his feet, eager for battle.

21. "The moment the lord of the rākṣasas set out toward Arjuna, the clouds released a thunderclap accompanied by showers of blood.

22. "Nonetheless, the lord of the rākṣasas, surrounded by Mahodara, Mahāpārśva, Dhūmrākṣa, Śuka, and Sāraṇa, proceeded to where Arjuna was.

23. "Then, in a short time, the mighty rākṣasa, as black as collyrium, reached that fearsome pool in the Narmadā.

24. "There the king of the rākṣasas spied Arjuna, the lord of men, surrounded by women as a bull elephant might be by impassioned elephant cows.

25. “His eyes red with rage, the lord of the rākṣasas, arrogant in his might, in a deep voice, addressed Arjuna’s ministers thus:

26. “ ‘Ministers! Inform the Haihaya king at once that he who goes by the name of Rāvaṇa has arrived for the purpose of battle.’

27. “And when Arjuna’s counselors had heard Rāvaṇa’s words, they sprang up with their weapons and addressed these words to him:

28. “ ‘Well done, Rāvaṇa! You really know the time for a battle, since, just as a tiger might attack a rutting bull elephant in the midst of his cows, you wish to fight with our king while he is impassioned and surrounded by women.

29. “ ‘Be patient for today, Daśagrīva, please stay here for the night. If you still wish to fight, dear fellow, you can meet Arjuna in battle tomorrow.

30. “ ‘If, on the other hand, you are in such haste in your thirst for battle, you must first strike us down and only then join battle with Arjuna.’

31. “The famished ministers of Rāvaṇa then slaughtered those ministers of the king and devoured them.

32. “Then on the bank of the Narmadā there arose a tumultuous noise from the followers of Arjuna and the counselors of Rāvaṇa.

33. “Arjuna’s troops rushed up from every side, assailing Rāvaṇa and his ministers with arrows, iron cudgels, and lances that were like thunderbolts, together with nooses.

34. “The onset of the warriors of the Haihaya overlord was extremely fierce, like the roar of the ocean filled with sharks, fish, and crocodiles.

35. “But Rāvaṇa’s ministers—Prahasta, Śuka, and Sāraṇa—whose blazing energy was that of fire, burned up Kārtavīrya’s army in their rage.

36. “Then the men who guarded his gateway informed Arjuna, as he was sporting, of that feat of Rāvaṇa and his counselors.

37. “After telling his womenfolk, ‘Have no fear!’ Arjuna then came up out of the water, as might Añjana from the waters of the Ganges.

38. “Then, his eyes clouded with rage, the immensely fearsome fire that was Arjuna blazed forth like the fire that ends a cosmic era.

39. “Wearing armlets of splendid gold, he swiftly seized his mace and drove off the rākṣasas, as does the sun, the darkness.

40. “Raising that great mace, which was whirled about by the force of his arms, Arjuna charged with the swiftness of Garuḍa.

41. “But, blocking his path, as did the Vindhya mountain that of the sun, and armed with a cudgel, stood Prahasta, as immovable as the Vindhya itself.

42. “Puffed up with pride, Prahasta hurled that fearsome cudgel bound with iron and then roared like a thundercloud in his rage.

43. “At the tip of that cudgel as it left Prahasta’s hand, there appeared a fire that resembled a chaplet of aśoka blossoms and that seemed to be blazing.

44. “But Arjuna Kārtavīrya, who was armed with his mace and whose strength was that of an elephant, skillfully evaded that cudgel as it sped toward him.

45. “Then the lord of the Haihayas charged at Prahasta, whirling that massive mace, which was held aloft by five hundred of his arms.

46. “Then, struck violently by him with that mace, Prahasta was stunned and fell like a mountain struck by the thunderbolt of Indra, wielder of the thunderbolt.

47. “When Mārīca, Śuka, and Sāraṇa, along with Mahodara and Dhūmrākṣa, saw that Prahasta had fallen, they fled the battlefield.

48. “Now that his counselors had run away and Prahasta had been felled, Rāvaṇa swiftly charged at Arjuna, the foremost of kings.

49. “Then there commenced a fearsome and hair-raising battle between the thousand-armed king and the twenty-armed rākṣasa.

50–52. “The rākṣasa and Arjuna belabored each other powerfully with their maces, like two roiling seas, like two moving mountains, like two suns filled with blazing energy, like two burning fires, like two bull elephants arrogant in their might, like two bulls fighting over an impassioned cow, like two roaring thunderclouds, like two lions haughty in their might, or like Rudra and Kāla filled with rage.

53. “But the two, man and rākṣasa, withstood those mace blows, just as mountains might withstand the fearsome blows of a thunderbolt.

54. “Just as an echo inevitably arises from claps of thunder, so did all the directions resonate with the blows of their maces.

55. “As Arjuna’s mace fell on the chest of his enemy, it lent a golden glow to the heavens, as might a flashing bolt of lightning.

56. “And by the same token, the mace, which Rāvaṇa brought down again and again on Arjuna’s chest, resembled a blazing meteor falling on a mighty mountain.

57. “Neither Arjuna nor the lord of the rākṣasa hosts experienced any fatigue. Indeed, the battle between them was just like the one long ago between Bali and Indra.

58. “The foremost of men and the foremost of rākṣasas belabored each other as might two great bulls with their horns or two bull elephants with their tusks.

59. “But then, in that great battle, Arjuna, enraged, let fly his mace with all his might right at the middle of Rāvaṇa’s chest.

60. “But because of the protection afforded by the grant of his boon, that mace, striking Rāvaṇa’s chest, broke in two and fell to the ground like a feeble army.

61. “However, because of that mace blow delivered by Arjuna, Rāvaṇa staggered back a bow’s length and collapsed, moaning softly.

62. “Then, perceiving that Daśagrīva was stunned, Arjuna swiftly seized him, just as Garuḍa might a great serpent.

63. “And having forcibly seized ten-faced Rāvaṇa with his thousand arms, the mighty king bound him as Nārāyaṇa did Bali.

64. “As Daśagrīva was being bound, the perfected beings, celestial bards, and the gods cried out, ‘Well done!’ and scattered flowers on Arjuna’s head.

65. “Seizing him as a tiger might a deer or as the king of lions might an elephant, the Haihaya king, in his delight, roared again and again like a thundercloud.

66. “But now, having regained consciousness and seeing that ten-faced Rāvaṇa was bound, Prahasta, in a rage, together with the rākṣasas, charged at the king.

67. “The onset of those night-roaming rākṣasas as they rushed to the attack was like the wondrous rise of the seas at the waning of summer.

68. “Crying, ‘Release him! Release him! Stop! Stop!’ again and again, they then loosed cudgels and lances at Arjuna.

69. “But Arjuna, the destroyer of his enemies, was unfazed. He quickly caught those weapons of the foes of the immortal gods before they reached him.

70. “Then, with those very same excellent and irresistible weapons, he wounded the rākṣasas and drove them off as the wind might clouds.

71. "And, having thus frightened off the rākṣasas, Arjuna Kārtavīrya, surrounded by his friends and taking Rāvaṇa along, entered the city.

72. "Then as the twice-born brahmans, together with the townsfolk, showered him with masses of blossoms and unhusked rice, Arjuna, who resembled Indra, invoked by many, entered that city, just as did thousand-eyed Indra when he had captured Bali."

The end of the thirty-second sarga of the Uttarakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 33

1. "Now the seer Pulastya happened to hear about the capture of Rāvaṇa—which was like capturing the wind—as it was related in heaven by the gods.

2. "Then that great seer, despite his extraordinary self-control, was moved by affection for his grandson, and he went to see the lord of Māhiṣmatī.

3. "Taking to the path of the winds, that twice-born brahman, whose pace was equal to that of the wind and who strode with the speed of thought, reached the city of Māhiṣmatī.

4. "He entered the city, which resembled Amarāvatī and which was filled with happy and prosperous people, as Brahmā might enter Indra's Amarāvatī.

5. "As he approached he was as hard to look upon as would be Āditya if he were approaching on foot. But then, recognizing him, they informed Arjuna.

6. "Upon hearing the words 'It is Pulastya,' the lord of the Haihayas, raising his cupped hands to his forehead, went forth to meet that foremost of twice-born brahmans.

7. "And his purohita, taking the guest-offering and madhuparka, went before the king, as Bṛhaspati would before Indra.

8. "Then, when he spied the seer approaching like the rising sun, Arjuna worshiped him who had come, as Indra might the Lord.

9. "And after he had seen to it that he had been given the madhuparka, water to wash his feet, and the guest-offering, the lord of kings addressed Pulastya in a voice breaking with joy.

10. “ ‘Today, Māhiṣmatī has been rendered the equal of Amarāvatī since, lord among the lords of twice-born brahmans, I am seeing you, who are so hard to see.

11. “ ‘Today I have achieved felicity, O lord. Today my lineage is exalted in that I may worship your feet, which are worshiped by the hosts of the gods.

12. “ ‘This kingdom, my sons, my wives, and I are yours. O brahman, what may we do? What must we do? Please command us, sir.’

13. “Now, after having inquired of the king concerning the proper state of righteousness, the sacred fires, and his dependents, Pulastya then addressed Arjuna, king of the Haihayas:

14. “ ‘Lord of kings—you whose eyes are like shining lotuses and whose face is like the full moon—your strength, by which you vanquished Daśagrīva, is unequaled.

15. “ ‘My invincible grandson, for fear of whom the ocean and wind stand motionless, has been bound by you today.

16. “ ‘Thus you have increased your fame, my son, and spread your name. Now, dear boy, entreated by my words, please release ten-faced Rāvaṇa.’

17. “Accepting Pulastya’s command without a word, Arjuna, the lord among the lords of kings, happily released the lord of the rākṣasas.

18. “When he had released that foe of the thirty gods, he honored him with heavenly ornaments, garlands, and garments. Then, after forging with him a pact of nonaggression witnessed by Agni, Arjuna prostrated himself before the son of Brahmā and returned to his home.

19. “After having met with Pulastya as well, the valorous lord of the rākṣasas, given hospitality with an embrace, was dismissed, much abashed.

20. “Once Pulastya, the foremost of sages and son of Grandfather Brahmā, had brought about the release of Daśagrīva, he proceeded to Brahmā’s world.

21. “And that was how Rāvaṇa was overpowered by Kārtavīrya and how he obtained his freedom once again through the words of Pulastya.

22. “Thus, O delight of the Rāghavas, there are those who are mightier even than the mighty. Therefore, he who desires his own well-being should not hold his enemy in contempt.

23. "After the king of the flesh-eating rākṣasas had formed an alliance with thousand-armed Arjuna, he once more roamed the entire earth in his arrogance, slaughtering men."

The end of the thirty-third sarga of the Uttarakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 34

1. "Once released by Arjuna, Rāvaṇa, the lord of the rākṣasas, no longer despondent, roamed the entire earth.

2. "And whomever he heard of as having great strength—whether rākṣasa or human—Rāvaṇa encountered him and, in his arrogance, challenged him to battle.

3. "Then, one day, he came to the city of Kiṣkindhā, protected by Vālin, and challenged golden-garlanded Vālin to battle.

4. "Then Lord Tāra, a minister of the monkey and the father of Tārā, addressed these words to Rāvaṇa, who had come, eager for battle:

5. " 'Vālin, who would be your equal in strength, O lord of the rākṣasas, is gone, and there is none other among the leaping monkeys capable of standing before you.

6. " 'Vālin will return momentarily, after he has performed his sandhyā ritual in all four oceans, Rāvaṇa. So just wait a moment.

7. " 'Look at these heaps of bones, as white as conch shells. They belonged to those who came seeking battle, your majesty, and who were then slain by the blazing energy of the monkey lord.

8. " 'And even if you were to drink the nectar of immortality, Rāvaṇa, nonetheless, were you to encounter Vālin, that would be the end of your life, rākṣasa.

9. " 'On the other hand, if you are in a hurry to die, you should go to the southern ocean. There you will see Vālin, who is like the sun come to earth.'

10. "But, reviling Tāra, Rāvaṇa, lord of the rākṣasas, mounted the Puṣpaka and proceeded to the southern ocean.

11–12. "There, he spied Vālin, who—resembling a golden mountain and with a face like the rising sun—was absorbed in the performance of his sandhyā rites. Rāvaṇa, who resembled collyrium, descended from the Puṣpaka and advanced swiftly with silent footsteps in order to seize him.

13. “But Rāvaṇa, whose intention was evil, was spotted by Vālin, who by chance had opened his eyes. Still, Vālin was not perturbed.

14. “Just as a lion might a hare or Garuḍa, a serpent, Vālin, spying evil-intentioned Rāvaṇa, did not take him seriously, thinking:

15. “ ‘This evil-minded Rāvaṇa wishes to capture me. But today, hanging him from my armpit, I shall travel to the mighty oceans.

16. “ ‘Everyone will see my enemy, Daśagrīva, hanging at my side, his thighs, hands, and garments dangling like a serpent hanging from Garuḍa.’

17. “Having formed this resolution, Vālin, pricking up his ears, went on intoning vedic mantras as he stood there like the king of the mountains.

18. “The two kings—the one of the tawny monkeys, the other of the rākṣasas—each eager to seize the other and arrogant in his might, strove mightily toward that end.

19. “Even though his back was turned, Vālin, judging from the sound of his footsteps that Rāvaṇa was within arm’s reach, seized him, as the egg-born Garuḍa might a serpent.

20. “Seizing the lord of the rākṣasas, who had been eager to seize him, the tawny monkey swiftly leapt up into the sky dangling him from his armpit.

21. “Although Rāvaṇa gouged him repeatedly with his nails, Vālin, crushing him tightly, carried him off, as the wind might a cloud.

22. “Then, as ten-faced Rāvaṇa was being carried off, the fearsome ministers of the rākṣasa, wishing to free him, ran after him, crying out.

23. “Followed by them, Vālin, moving through the middle of the sky, was as radiant as the many-rayed sun high in the sky being followed by banks of clouds.

24. “But those foremost among the rākṣasas were unable to keep up with Vālin, and, exhausted by the speed generated by his arms and haunches, they collapsed.

25. “For as Vālin was proceeding, even the lords of the mountains got out of his way.

26. “The immensely swift lord of the monkeys, whose flight was impossible even for flocks of birds, performed his worship at the time of sandhyā at each of the oceans, one after another.

27. "Moving through the sky, the tawny monkey Vālin, honored by the creatures that move through the sky, came to the western ocean, still clutching Rāvaṇa.

28. "After performing the sandhyā rite there and having bathed and intoned the mantras, the monkey proceeded to the northern ocean, still carrying ten-faced Rāvaṇa.

29. "When he had performed the sandhyā rite at the northern ocean, Vālin proceeded to the great eastern receptacle of waters.

30. "When he had performed the sandhyā ritual there, Vāsavi, lord of the tawny monkeys, headed back to Kiṣkindhā, still clutching Rāvaṇa.

31. "And thus, having performed the sandhyā ritual at all four oceans, the monkey, fatigued from carrying Rāvaṇa, landed in a parkland of Kiṣkindhā.

32. "The foremost of monkeys released Rāvaṇa from his armpit and, laughing at him, said, 'Where did you come from?'

33. "Greatly astonished, his eyes rolling from exhaustion, the lord of the rākṣasas said these words to the lord of the tawny monkeys:

34. "'I am Rāvaṇa, lord of the rākṣasas, O lord of monkeys—you who resemble great Indra. I came here eager for battle, and now you have overpowered me.

35. "'Oh, what might! Oh, what power! Oh, what composure you have! For you have captured me as if I were some dumb beast and whirled me around the four oceans.

36. "'O heroic monkey! What other hero, carrying me, could stride so swiftly in this fashion, without tiring?

37. "'Indeed, other than you, leaping monkey, only three things possess such speed: thought, the wind, and Suparṇa. Of this, there is no doubt.

38. "'Having witnessed your might, bull among tawny monkeys, I desire an enduring and affectionate alliance with you, one concluded in the presence of Agni, the purifier.

39. "'Our wives, our sons, our cities, our kingdoms, our possessions, our garments, and our food—we shall share all these together, lord of the tawny monkeys.'

40. "Then, after kindling a fire, the two of them—the tawny monkey and the rākṣasa—embraced each other and became as brothers.

41. "Then, hand and hand, delighted, the two of them—the tawny monkey and the rākṣasa—entered Kiṣkindhā, as two lions might a mountain cave.

42. "And so Rāvaṇa dwelt there for a month as if he were Sugrīva, until he was taken away by his ministers, who had come and were eager to ravage the triple world.

43. "This took place in this fashion long ago, lord, when Rāvaṇa was first overpowered by Vālin and then, in the presence of Agni, the purifier, was treated by him as his brother.

44. "Vālin's supreme might was unequaled, and yet, Rāma, you burned him as well, as might a fire, a moth."

The end of the thirty-fourth sarga of the Uttarakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 35

1. Then Rāma once more questioned the sage who dwelt in the southern region. Cupping his hands in reverence, he humbly uttered these appropriate words:

2. "The might of those two, Vālin and Rāvaṇa, was unequaled, but, in my opinion, they were not equal in heroic deeds to Hanumān.

3. "Heroism, skill, strength, steadfastness, wisdom, mastery of policy, valor, and power all reside in Hanumān.

4. "Back then, when he saw the ocean and the monkey army in despair, he reassured the monkeys once again and leapt one hundred leagues.

5. "After assaulting the citadel of Laṅkā and exploring Rāvaṇa's inner apartments, he spoke with Sītā and gained her confidence.

6. "And there Hanumān single-handedly slaughtered the generals of the army, the sons of the counselors, the servants, and Rāvaṇa's own son.

7. "And when he was once more free from his bonds, he conversed with ten-faced Rāvaṇa and then reduced Laṅkā to ashes, as a great fire might the earth.

8. "Those feats of Hanumān in battle are unheard of on the part of Kāla, Śakra, Viṣṇu, or Kubera, the guardian of wealth.

9. "For it was through the strength of his arms that I gained Laṅkā and victory and recovered Sītā, Lakṣmaṇa, my kingdom, my friends, and my kinsmen.

10. "If I had not had Hanumān, the companion of the monkey lord, who would have been able to find out any word of Jānakī?

11. "Why then is it that when hostility broke out, he did not, out of a desire to serve Sugrīva, burn up Vālin, as if he were a mere creeper?

12. "Since he merely watched as the lord of the monkeys, as dear to him as life itself, was suffering, I guess that Hanumān did not know his own strength.

13. "Great and blessed sage, you who are honored by the immortal gods, please tell me truthfully and in detail everything concerning Hanumān."

14. Then, when the seer had heard Rāghava's reasonable words, he addressed to him these words, there in the presence of Hanumān.

15. "What you say about Hanumān is true, foremost of the Raghus. There is none other who is his equal in might, speed, or intelligence.

16. "Long ago, some seers, whose curses never fail to take effect, cursed him such that, even though that crusher of his foes was mighty, he would not know his own strength.

17. "Because of its extreme childishness, I really ought not tell you, immensely powerful Rāma, what he did in his infancy.

18. "If, however, it is your intention to hear it, Rāma Rāghava, then concentrate your mind and listen as I tell you.

19. "There is a mountain named Mount Sumeru, which is golden as the result of a boon granted by Sūrya. And it is there that Hanumān's father, Kesarin, ruled his kingdom.

20. "He had a beloved wife well known as Añjanā, and it was on her that Vāyu fathered an excellent son.

21. "Then that forest-roaming monkey Añjanā gave birth to a son, whose complexion was like that of rice awn. And one day she went out wishing to fetch some fruit.

22. "As he was separated from his mother and greatly afflicted by hunger, the child cried loudly like a young king of the śarabhas.

23. "Then he saw Vivasvant, the rising sun, which resembled a cluster of japā blossoms, and, in his longing for fruit, he leapt up toward it.

24. "Facing the rising sun, the child, who was himself like the rising sun incarnate, leapt up into the middle of the sky, wishing to seize the rising sun.

25. "As the infant Hanumān was leaping up, the gods, dānavas, and perfected beings experienced tremendous astonishment.

26. "They said: 'Not even Vāyu, Garuḍa, or thought is as swift as this son of Vāyu, who is leaping across the highest heaven.

27. " 'If his speed and valor, even as a child, are such, what then will be his speed once he gains the strength of his prime?'

28. "Now, as his son was leaping upward, Vāyu, as cold as a mass of snow, leapt after him, protecting him from the danger of being scorched by the sun.

29. "Through his father's power and in his own childishness, he then flew along many thousands of leagues into the sky, drawing near to the sun.

30. "However, the sun, maker of day, refrained from burning him, thinking, 'He is only a child, who doesn't know that this is wrong. Moreover, a great task will depend on him.'

31. "Now on the very day on which he leapt up to seize the sun, Rāhu, too, desired to seize the sun, maker of day.

32. "But, O Rāma, when he was right over Sūrya's chariot, Rāhu, tormentor of the moon and sun, was mauled by Hanumān and he fled, terrified.

33. "Furious, Rāhu, Siṃhikā's son, went to Indra's palace, and, knitting his brows, he addressed the god, who was surrounded by the hosts of gods:

34. " 'Having given me the moon and the sun to allay my hunger, Vāsava, how is it that you have now given it to another, O slayer of Bala and Vṛtra?

35. " 'Today, as it was the time for an eclipse, I went to the sun to seize it, but suddenly, another Rāhu assaulted me and seized it.'

36. "Upon hearing the words of Rāhu, Vāsava, in great agitation, left his throne and leapt up still wearing his golden garland.

37–38. "Then Indra mounted the four-tusked lord of elephants, which resembled a peak of Mount Kailāsa. It was streaming rut fluid, bearing ornaments, lofty, and loud with the sound of its golden bells. And, placing Rāhu before him, he proceeded to the place where Sūrya and Hanumān were.

39. "But, leaving Vāsava behind, Rāhu went on ahead with tremendous speed. And Hanumān spied him as he raced toward him like a mountain peak.

40. "Seeing Rāhu like that, Hanumān then left the sun behind and once more leapt into the sky to seize Siṃhikā's son.

41. "And, Rāma, seeing that the leaping monkey had left the sun behind and was racing toward him, Rāhu, who consists only of a head, turned around and took flight.

42. "Hoping that Indra would protect him, the son of Siṃhikā, in his terror, cried out again and again, 'Indra! Indra!'

43. "Hearing the voice of Rāhu, who was crying out, and recognizing it even before seeing him, Indra said, 'Do not fear! I will slay him.'

44. "Now, when Māruti saw Airāvata, he thought, 'This one is a really big fruit!' and he rushed toward that king of elephants.

45. "Then, as he rushed onward in his desire to seize Airāvata, his appearance became momentarily fearsome and as radiant as that of Indra or Agni.

46. "As he was rushing onward in this fashion, Śacī's lord, only slightly angered, struck him with his vajra, which he loosed from the tips of his fingers.

47. "Struck by Indra's vajra, he fell on a mountain. And as he fell, his jaw [hanu] was broken on the left side.

48. "But when that child had fallen, stunned by the blow of the vajra, Pavana was enraged at Indra, who had injured his son.

49. "Closing off the organs of defecation and urination, the lord who moves within all creatures blocked up all beings, as Vāsava might the rains.

50. "Because of Vāyu's wrath, beings were completely deprived of breath, and, bursting at the seams, they became like blocks of wood.

51. "Deprived of the cries of 'svadhā' and 'vaṣaṭ,' devoid of all ritual performance, and, indeed, stripped of all righteous practices through the wrath of Vāyu, the triple world seemed to be in hell.

52. "Then, afflicted with misery, all creatures, including the gandharvas, the gods, the asuras, and humans, ran to Prajāpati, seeking relief.

53. "Cupping their hands in supplication, the gods, whose bellies were as bulbous as conch shells, said: 'Blessed Lord of creatures, you created the four types of beings.

54–55. " 'Foremost of beings, you gave us Pavana to be the lord of our lives. Why then, since he is the lord of life, has he blocked us up, causing us pain as if we were women in the inner apartments? Therefore, stricken by Vāyu, we have come to you, O Lord, for refuge.

56. "'Please, slayer of your enemies, take away this suffering of ours caused by the blockage of wind.'

57. "When Prajāpati, the Lord of creatures, had heard these words of the creatures, he said to them, 'This has happened for a reason.' And then once more he addressed those creatures:

58. "'Listen, O creatures, to the reason for which Vāyu grew angry and blocked you up. You must patiently hear all this for yourselves.

59. "'His son was struck down today by King Indra, lord of the immortal gods, who acted on the words of Rāhu, and so Anila, the wind god, grew angry at you.

60. "'Bodiless, Vāyu moves within all bodies, protecting them; for, without Vāyu, the body becomes nothing but dust.

61. "'Vāyu is the breath of life. Vāyu is happiness. This whole world is Vāyu. Abandoned by Vāyu, the world can find no happiness.

62. "'And today the world has been abandoned by Vāyu, the life of the world. Today all these creatures, deprived of their breath, stand here motionless like logs or walls.

63. "'So then let us go to where Māruta, the cause of your affliction, is staying. Let us not court destruction by failing to propitiate the son of Aditi.'

64. "Then Prajāpati, along with the creatures and together with the gods, gandharvas, great serpents, and guhyakas, went to where Māruta was staying, after he had taken his son, who had been struck down by the lord of the gods.

65. "There on the lap of ever-moving Vāyu lay his son, as radiant as the sun, Agni Vaiśvānara, or gold. When four-faced Brahmā, together with the gods, perfected beings, seers, great serpents, and the rākṣasas, saw him, he was filled with pity."

The end of the thirty-fifth sarga of the Uttarakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 36

1. "When Vāyu, who was distressed at the injury to his son, saw Grandfather Brahmā, he stood up before the Creator, holding his infant son.

2. "After rising, with his dangling earrings, garland, diadem, and ornaments of burnished gold, Vāyu prostrated himself three times at the Creator's feet.

3. "The primordial knower of the vedas caused Vāyu to rise, and he stroked his infant son with a hand that was adorned with hanging ornaments.

4. "And no sooner had he been touched as if in play by lotus-born Brahmā, than he once more revived, as might crops sprinkled with water.

5. "Perceiving with delight that Hanumān had revived, Vāyu, bearer of scents and the breath of life, began to circulate among all beings, where there had previously been obstruction.

6. "Released from the affliction of wind, creatures were as delighted as might be lotus ponds in bloom freed from freezing winds.

7. "Then Brahmā of the three pairs, foremost of the three, who has three abodes and is worshiped by the thirty gods, addressed the gods out of a desire to do a kindness to Māruta.

8. "'O great Indra! O Agni! O Varuṇa! O Kubera, lord of wealth! O Maheśvara! Please listen. Although you know all this, I shall tell it, as it is beneficial.

9. "'This infant will have to accomplish a mission of yours. So you must all grant Māruta boons in order to gratify him.'

10. "Then thousand-eyed Indra, moved by affection and with a benign expression, took off his garland of lotuses and said this:

11. "'In that his jaw [hanu] was broken by the vajra loosed from my hand, this tiger among monkeys shall be known by the name of Hanumān, "He of the Great Jaw."

12. "'And I will grant him the greatest and most excellent boon. Henceforward, he shall be invulnerable to my vajra.'

13. "Then the blessed Sūrya Mārtāṇḍa, dispeller of darkness, said: 'I shall give him a hundredth portion of my blazing energy.

14. "'And when he is able to study the śāstras, I shall grant him mastery of that śāstra by means of which he shall become eloquent.'

15. "Next Varuṇa gave him a boon: 'His death shall never come about through my noose or through water, even after a million years.'

16. "And Yama, being pleased, ordained for him invulnerability to his rod, perpetual freedom from disease, and the boon of never losing heart in battle.

17. "Then Kubera Ekākṣipiṅgala, who was a granter of boons, spoke thus: 'This mace of mine shall never kill him in battles.'

18. "And Śaṅkara granted him the greatest boon, saying, 'His death shall never come from me or from my weapons.'

19. "Next Brahmā said these words: 'He will be a great being, long-lived, and immune to all chastisements on the part of brahmans.'

20. "Then very wise Viśvakarman, foremost of artisans, gazing at that infant, who resembled the rising sun, uttered a boon for him:

21. " 'And he will be invulnerable at the time of battle to whatever weapons of the gods I have fashioned here.'

22. "Then, seeing Hanumān adorned with the boons of the gods, four-faced Brahmā, guru of the world, with a satisfied expression, said to Vāyu:

23. " 'O Māruta, your son here, Māruti, shall bring fear to his enemies and freedom from fear to his friends. He shall be invincible.

24. " 'And he shall perform hair-raising feats in battle for the destruction of Rāvaṇa and the delight of Rāma.'

25. "When all of those gods had spoken in this fashion and had taken leave of Māruta, they placed Grandfather Brahmā before them, and, along with the other immortals, they all departed just as they had come.

26. "But as for Vāyu, the bearer of scents, he took his son and brought him home. Then, after telling Añjanā about the boons that had been granted, he departed.

27. "Now, Rāma, when Hanumān had acquired these boons, he was filled with strength from their having been granted, and, with his native strength, he swelled up like the ocean.

28. "Indeed, filled with strength, that bull among monkeys fearlessly committed offenses in the ashrams of the great seers.

29. "He broke the sacrificial ladles, smashed the ritual vessels, and scattered the sacred fires and the piles of barkcloth garments belonging to those tranquil sages.

30. "Knowing that Brahmā had granted him immunity from all chastisements on the part of the brahmans, the seers continued to tolerate this.

31. "Even when Kesarin and Vāyu, together with Añjanā, tried to restrain him, the monkey continued to transgress all bounds.

32. "Then, foremost among the Raghus, those great seers, born in the lineage of the Bhṛgus and the Aṅgirasas, were annoyed, but not excessively wrathful or impatient. Still they cursed him:

33. " 'Befuddled by our curse, leaping monkey, you shall for a very long time be unaware of your strength, relying on which you have been annoying us.'

34. "As he was thus forced to forget his power and blazing energy through the force of the great seers' words, he took on a gentle nature, roaming the ashrams without violating them.

35. "At that time, the father of Vālin and Sugrīva, named Ṛkṣarajas, was the king of all the monkeys, and he was like the sun in his blazing energy.

36. "After that lord of the tawny monkeys, whose name was Ṛkṣarajas, had ruled over the monkeys for a long time, he succumbed to the rule of time.

37. "When he had passed away, the counselors, who were expert in counsel, set Vālin as king in his father's place and Sugrīva in that of Vālin.

38. "And between Hanumān and Sugrīva there was an unbreakable friendship, indivisible, and free from any breach, just as there is between wind and fire.

39. "But because of the force of the curse, Rāma, when the hostility arose between Vālin and Sugrīva, Hanumān did not realize his own strength.

40. "And, Rāma, even when Sugrīva was being driven out by Vālin, he did not remind him. Nor did Māruti know his own strength.

41. "Who in this world excels Hanumān in valor, energy, intelligence, prowess, morality, kindness, political sense, dignity, cleverness, great strength, and fortitude?

42. "Long ago this foremost of monkeys, immeasurable and eager to learn grammar, faced the sun and, following it, walked from the eastern to the western mountain and so mastered that great subject.

43. "Who will stand before Hanumān, who, like the ocean, is eager to inundate the world, like Agni, the purifier, eager to consume all the worlds, and like Yama, the ender of all things, at the times of universal destruction?

44. "He himself as well as these other great monkey lords, Sugrīva, Mainda, Dvivida, Nīla, Tāra, Tārā's son, Nala, and Rambha, were created by the gods on your behalf, Rāma.

45. "Thus I have now told you everything about which you asked me. I have told you about the deeds of Hanumān in his childhood.

46. "Having seen and conversed with you, Rāma, we must now depart." Having spoken in this fashion, all the seers departed as they had come.

The end of the thirty-sixth sarga of the Uttarakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

[Prakṣipta II follows sarga 36; see pp. 1305–18]

Sarga 37

1. After this Rāma first caressed and then embraced his fearless friend Pratardana, the lord of Kāśi, and said this:

2. "You, sir, have demonstrated the greatest affection and the highest friendship. And, your majesty, Bharata made great preparations in tandem with you.

3. "So, this very day, sir, you must go to the city you protect, that beautiful city in the country of Kāśī, Vārāṇasī, with its splendid palisades and lovely gateways."

4. When he had said this much, righteous Kākutstha arose from his splendid throne and held him closely to his chest.

5. After he had dismissed his friend, Rāghava, smiling, addressed this sweet-syllabled speech to the lords of the earth who had come willingly.

6. "Through your strength of character, you gentlemen have maintained your unshakable affection for me. Your righteousness is ever unwavering, and you are always true.

7. "And it was through the might and blazing energy of you great kings that the evil and evil-minded lord of the rākṣasas was slain.

8. "It was through the blazing energy of you gentlemen that Rāvaṇa, together with his hosts, his sons, and his kinsmen, was slain in battle. I was merely the proximate cause of that.

9. "It was great Bharata who assembled you gentleman upon hearing that Janaka's daughter had been abducted in the wilderness.

10. "A very long time passed while all you great kings were here making preparations. Now you must resolve to depart."

11. Filled with the greatest delight, the kings replied to him: "Thank heavens you have been victorious, Rāma, and your reign has been established!

12–13. "Thank heavens Sītā has been recovered! Thank heavens your enemy has been vanquished! This was our greatest desire, and this is our greatest glory, in that we see you, Rāma, victorious, after having slain your enemies. And how like you, Kākutstha, that you praise us.

14. "For only those worthy of praise know how to utter praise such as this. Let us now take our leave and depart. But you, sir, will always remain in our hearts. And, great king, may your affection for us endure forever."

The end of the thirty-seventh sarga of the Uttarakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 38

1. Shaking the earth, those great and heroic kings delightedly departed in all directions for their own cities.

2. And so all of them who had come for Rāghava's sake returned home in delight, accompanied by many thousands of akṣauhiṇīs.

3. But those protectors of the earth, filled with the pride of their might, said: "We never got to see Rāvaṇa standing before us in battle.

4. "Bharata assembled us belatedly and to no purpose. For otherwise, we kings would have doubtless slain the rākṣasas there.

5. "For, protected by the might of Rāma's arm and Lakṣmaṇa's too, we would have happily fought without a care on the far shore of the sea."

6. Discussing these and thousands of other matters, those kings, great chariot-warriors, entered their own kingdoms.

7–8. Once they had gone each to their own city, those kings, acting on their desire to please Rāma, presented as gifts for him various precious things, as well as horses, jewels, garments, rutting elephants, heavenly sandalwood, and heavenly ornaments.

9. Taking those precious things, Bharata, Lakṣmaṇa, and the great chariot-warrior Śatrughna returned to Ayodhyā.

10. And when those bulls among men returned to the charming city of Ayodhyā, they gave all those precious things to great Rāghava.

11. Rāghava, filled with delight, accepted all of that and then gave everything to the great Sugrīva.

12–13. And he also made gifts to Vibhīṣaṇa. As for those other heroic apes and monkeys, starting with Hanumān, as well as the immensely powerful rākṣasas, all of them immensely powerful with delighted hearts, placed Rāma's gifts on their heads and arms.

14. And they drank various fragrant honey-wines and feasted on fruits and well-dressed meats.

15. While they were dwelling there, a month and more went by, but, because of their devotion to Rāma, it all seemed to pass in a moment.

16. As for Rāma, he delighted in the company of the monkeys, who could take on any form at will, the immensely powerful kings, and the immensely mighty rākṣasas.

17. In this way the second month of the cold season passed pleasantly for all those delighted monkeys and rākṣasas.

The end of the thirty-eighth sarga of the Uttarakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 39

1. While the apes, monkeys, and rākṣasas were living there in this manner, Rāghava, of immense blazing energy, said this to Sugrīva:

2. "My dear friend, you must go now to Kiṣkindhā, which is unassailable even by the gods and asuras. For together with your ministers, you must guard your sovereignty, the threats to which have been eliminated.

3. "And, great-armed warrior, as you look upon Aṅgada, as well as Hanumān and the immensely powerful Nala, you must be filled with the greatest affection.

4–6. "Similarly, filled with affection, you must look upon your father-in-law, the hero Suṣeṇa, Tāra foremost among the mighty, unassailable Kumuda, immensely powerful Nīla, the hero Śatabali, Mainda, Dvivida, Gaja, Gavākṣa, Gavaya, immensely powerful Śarabha, the immensely powerful and unassailable king of the apes, Jāmbavān, and Gandhamādana as well.

7. "And as for those other very great monkeys who were ready to lay down their lives for my sake, you must also look upon them with affection, and you must do nothing to offend them."

8. When Rāma had addressed Sugrīva in this fashion and praised him again and again, he addressed Vibhīṣaṇa in a sweet voice:

9. "You must rule Laṅkā righteously, O king, for you are held in high esteem by the rākṣasas of that city and by your brother Vaiśravaṇa.

10. "And you must not in any way set your mind on unrighteousness; for wise kings rule securely.

11. "And, your majesty, may you always remember Sugrīva and me with the greatest affection. You may go now, free from any anxiety."

12. When the apes, monkeys, and rākṣasas had heard Rāma's speech, they cried, "Wonderful! Wonderful!" and praised Kākutstha again and again.

13. "O great-armed Rāma, your intelligence, amazing valor, and extreme sweetness are always just like those of self-existent Brahmā."

14. While the monkeys and the rākṣasas were speaking in this fashion, Hanumān, prostrating himself, spoke these words to Rāghava:

15. "May my highest love, your majesty, always be fixed on you. And, hero, may my devotion be constant. May this affection never attach itself to anyone else.

16. "And, O hero, may my life breaths undoubtedly remain in my body as long as I shall hear on earth the tale of Rāma."

17. Then, even as Hanumān was speaking in this fashion, that best of kings rose from his throne and, embracing him, spoke these words:

18. "All of this shall come to pass, best of monkeys, of this there is no doubt. As long as the worlds shall endure, so shall my tale.

19. "As long as this tale of mine shall circulate throughout the worlds, so long will the breaths of life remain in your body. Of this there is no doubt."

20. Then, removing from his neck his pearl necklace, which with its central gem of lapis lazuli shone like the moon, Rāghava lovingly fastened it on Hanumān.

21. With the pearl necklace fastened on his chest, that great monkey was as resplendent as the golden lord of mountains with the moon rising over its peak.

22. And when those immensely powerful monkeys had heard Rāghava's speech, they arose one after the other, and, after prostrating themselves with their heads at his feet, they departed.

23. After this, Rāma embraced great-armed Sugrīva, and then he pressed righteous Vibhīṣaṇa close to his chest.

24. All of them had their throats choked with tears and their eyes, too, were filled with tears. Distracted, as if fainting with grief, they then left Rāghava.

The end of the thirty-ninth sarga of the Uttarakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 40

1. Once the joyous, great-armed Rāma had dismissed the apes, monkeys, and rākṣasas, he rejoiced happily together with his brothers.

2. In the afternoon Rāghava, together with his brothers, heard sweet words that were spoken from the sky:

3. "Gentle Rāma, please look upon me with a gentle countenance. Know, O lord, that I am the Puṣpaka, who has come from the summit of Mount Kailāsa.

4. "After receiving your command, I went back to Kubera, the bestower of wealth. And he, O best of men, told me to wait upon you, saying:

5. " 'You were won by the great Rāghava, the lord of men, after he had slain in battle Rāvaṇa, the unassailable lord of the rākṣasas.

6. " 'And I, too, gentle one, experienced the greatest delight when the evil-minded Rāvaṇa was slain, along with his hosts, his sons, his ministers, and his kinsmen.

7. " 'You were won in Laṅkā by Rāma, who is the Supreme Spirit. And thus I command you, "Gentle one, you must carry him."

8. " 'It is my greatest desire that you should carry the delight of the Raghus on his journeys through the world. So go, free from any anxiety.'

9. "Having received that command of great Kubera, the bestower of wealth, I have returned once again to your side. Therefore please accept me."

10. And saying, "So be it!" Kākutstha worshiped the Puṣpaka with parched grain, unhusked rice, flowers, and extremely fragrant perfumes, saying:

11. "Now you may depart as you wish. But you must return whenever I call you to mind." Then, having said, "May it be so!" the Puṣpaka was dismissed once again by Rāma. Adorned with flowers, the Puṣpaka departed in the direction of its choice.

12. When the varicolored Puṣpaka had vanished in this fashion, Bharata, cupping his hands in reverence, spoke these words to the delight of the Raghus:

13. "Extraordinary things are seen when you are ruling the kingdom. Again and again nonhuman creatures are speaking.

14. "More than a month has passed since there was any illness among the people, and death has not befallen even the aged creatures, Rāghava.

15. "Women are giving birth to sons, and men have splendid bodies. Joy abounds among the people who dwell in the city.

16. "At the proper time, Vāsava sends down rain that is like the nectar of immortality. And the winds blow softly to the touch, giving pleasure.

17. "And, lord of men, the people in the city and the folk in the countryside say, 'May such a king be ours forever.' "

18. When Rāma had heard those extremely sweet words that Bharata had uttered, he was filled with delight, and, joyous, he rejoiced happily.

The end of the fortieth sarga of the Uttarakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 41

1. Once great-armed Rāma had dismissed the golden Puṣpaka, he entered the aśoka grove.

2. It was adorned on every side with sandalwood trees, aloe trees, mangos, tuṅgas, kāleyakas, and stands of devadārus.

3. It was filled with priyaṅgu creepers, kurabaka, as well as with kadamba, jambū, pāṭalī, and kovidāra trees.

4–5. It was always adorned with delightful blossoms and charming fruit trees, which were filled with beautiful buds and blossoms and swarming with intoxicated black bees. And it was also adorned with kokilas and hundreds of bumblebees and many-colored birds, which served as the variegated ornaments of the mango trees.

6. Some of the trees there shone like gold, some resembled flames of fire, while others were as dark as black collyrium.

7. And there were pools of various shapes, filled with crystalline water. Their steps were made of precious gems and their floors were inlaid with crystal.

8. They had dense clusters of blooming red and blue lotuses, and they were adorned with cakravākas. They were also adorned with enclosures of various shapes and with stone benches.

9. Here and there, in the forested areas, they were richly endowed with glades that resembled emeralds, and they were surrounded by flowering trees.

10. The appearance of Rāma's grove, which he had created, was just like that of Indra's Nandana garden and like that of Kubera's Caitraratha garden, which Brahmā had created.

11–12. The delight of the Raghus entered that luxuriant aśoka grove, which was endowed with many seats and dwellings, and was filled with bowers of creepers. And he sat down on a beautifully formed seat, adorned with bunches of flowers and furnished with a covering of carpets.

13. Taking Sītā in his arms, Kākutstha gave her excellent, sweet maireya to drink, just as Indra might give the nectar of immortality to Śacī.

14. Servants then quickly brought various meats and different fruits for Rāma's meal.

15. And beautiful, inebriated young women, skilled in dancing and singing, danced before the king.

16. In this fashion, filled with joy, Rāma, like a god, delighted Sītā, the lovely princess of Videha, day after day.

17. While great Rāghava, foremost of men, was enjoying himself in this fashion, the pleasant winter season passed.

18. After that knower of righteousness had righteously discharged his duties to the people of the city in the morning, he would spend the remaining half of the day in the inner apartments.

19. And as for Sītā, after discharging her morning obligations to the gods, she would stand, cupping her hands in reverence without distinction, before all of her mothers-in-law.

20. After that, adorned with exquisite and abundant jewelry, she would go to Rāma, just as Śacī might go to thousand-eyed Indra when he is seated in his heaven Triviṣṭapa.

21. Now one day, seeing that his wife was endowed with an auspicious glow, Rāghava experienced unparalleled delight, and he cried: "Wonderful! Wonderful!

22. "The acquisition of a child is at hand for me, Vaidehī. So what do you desire? Tell me, what desire of yours must be fulfilled?"

23–24. Smiling, Vaidehī then said these words to Rāma: "Heroic Rāghava, I should like to see the holy penance groves that are located on the bank of the Ganges so that I may spend some time at the feet of the seers of holy deeds, who live on fruits and roots.

25. "It is my greatest desire, Kākutstha, that I might spend even a single night among those holy sages, who subsist on roots and fruits."

26. And saying, "So be it!" Rāma, tireless in action, promised, "Rest assured, Vaidehī, tomorrow you shall go without a doubt."

27. When Rāma Kākutstha had spoken in this fashion to Janaka's daughter Maithilī, he went off to another inner chamber, surrounded by his friends.

The end of the forty-first sarga of the Uttarakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 42

1. Once the king was seated there, amusing conversationalists, skillful in many types of discourse, attended him on every side.

2–3. Vijaya, Madhumatta, Kāśyapa, Piñgala, Kuśa, Surāji, Kāliya, Bhadra, Dantavakra, Samāgadha—all in high spirits—jokingly told great Rāghava many different kinds of stories.

4. Then during one story, Rāghava said: "Bhadra, what are people talking about in the city and provinces?

5–6. "What are the people of the city and the countryside saying about me? And what about Sītā and Bharata, and what indeed of Lakṣmaṇa? And what about Śatrughna and my mother, Kaikeyī? For at the beginning of a reign, the royalty must certainly be talked about."

7. When Rāma had spoken in this fashion, Bhadra replied, his hands cupped in reverence: "The comments of the residents of the city are consistently favorable, your majesty.

8. "But, gentle sir, it is the victory in connection with the slaying of Daśagrīva that is mostly talked about in your city, bull among men."

9. Addressed in this fashion by Bhadra, Rāghava spoke these words: "You must tell me everything, truthfully, leaving out nothing.

10. "Once I hear what the residents of the city say is good and what is bad, I will continue the good and not perpetuate the bad.

11. "You must tell me confidently, without fear and without anxiety, just what the people of the city and folk in the countryside are saying."

12. Addressed in this fashion by Rāghava, Bhadra, his mind composed, cupping his hands in reverence, replied to great-armed Rāma in these well-chosen words:

13. "Listen, your majesty, to what the people are saying—at the crossroads, in the markets, on the highways, and in the parks and woodlands—about what is good and what is bad. They say:

14. " 'Rāma accomplished the all-but-impossible bridging of the ocean, which no one—not even the gods and dānavas together—had ever done before.

15. " 'Thus he slew unassailable Rāvaṇa, along with his troops and his mounts, and brought the monkeys and apes, along with the rākṣasas, under his sway.

16. " 'But then, after having slain Rāvaṇa in battle and having recovered Sītā, Rāghava put his anger behind him and brought her back once more into his own house.

17. " 'What sort of pleasure could be produced in his heart through the enjoyment of Sītā, since earlier Rāvaṇa, clutching her to his side, had forcibly carried her off to Laṅkā?

18. " 'And how can Rāma not despise her who was taken to Laṅkā and, what is more, placed in the aśoka grove under the control of the rākṣasas?

19. " 'Now we shall have to put up with this from our own wives as well. For people always follow what the king does.'

20. "And that, your majesty, is what—in many different ways—the city residents are saying in all the cities and provinces."

21. When Rāghava had heard this speech of his, he was deeply pained, and he addressed all his friends, saying, "What about this? You must tell me."

22. And they all saluted him, bowing with their heads to the ground, and replied to the despondent Rāghava, "This is how it is, there is no doubt."

23. When Kākutstha had heard the words that all of them had spoken, that slayer of his foes then dismissed them all.

The end of the forty-second sarga of the Uttarakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 43

1. And once Rāghava had dismissed the circle of his friends, he took a resolution in his mind and then spoke these words to the doorkeeper who sat nearby:

2. "Quickly bring Lakṣmaṇa Saumitri of auspicious marks, as well as great-armed Bharata and invincible Śatrughna."

3. When the doorkeeper, his hands cupped reverentially at his head, had heard Rāma's words, he went to Lakṣmaṇa's dwelling and entered unhindered.

4. And then, after glorifying Lakṣmaṇa, he spoke these words, with his hands cupped in reverence: "The king wishes to see you. You must go there without delay."

5. Upon hearing Rāghava's command, Saumitri mounted his chariot with the words, "So be it!" and hastened to Rāghava's residence.

6. When the doorkeeper had seen Lakṣmaṇa departing, he went into the presence of Bharata and, cupping his hands in reverence, spoke these words: "The king wishes to see you."

7. Now, when Bharata had heard from the doorkeeper the words that Rāma had uttered, he swiftly leapt up from his seat and departed from there on foot.

8. When the doorkeeper had seen Bharata departing, he went swiftly to Śatrughna's mansion, his hands cupped in reverence. He then said these words:

9. "Come! Come along, best of the Raghus! The king wishes to see you. For Lakṣmaṇa has already gone and so has illustrious Bharata."

10. When Śatrughna had heard the doorkeeper's words, he acknowledged Rāma's command by bowing his head to the ground, and then he went to where Rāghava was.

11. Upon hearing that the princes had arrived, Rāma, his senses disordered through constant brooding, his head sunk, and his mind distressed, said these words to the doorkeeper:

12. "You must quickly have the princes enter my presence. For my life depends on them. They are indeed my life breaths outside my body."

13. And when they were thus commanded by the lord of men, the princes, clad in white garments, bowing and cupping their hands in reverence, entered together.

14–16. They saw that wise Rāma's face was like the hare-marked moon dimmed by an eclipse and that it was as devoid of its radiance as is the sun at twilight. They saw that his eyes were filled with tears and they observed that his face was like a lotus robbed of its splendor. Then, after immediately and reverently honoring Rāma's feet with their heads, they all stood there together, while Rāma continued to shed tears.

17. Embracing them with his arms, great-armed Rāma had them rise, and, telling them, "Please take your seats," he then said these words:

18. "You gentlemen are everything to me. You gentlemen are my life. Lords of men, you have created the kingdom that I rule.

19. "You gentlemen are well grounded in the meaning of the śāstras, and you are highly advanced in intelligence. Lords of men, there is a concern of mine that, upon reflection, must be considered."

The end of the forty-third sarga of the Uttarakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 44

1. As they all sat there, their minds distressed, Kākutstha, his mouth gone dry, spoke these words:

2. "Bless you, you must all hear the sort of talk that is circulating among the people of the city regarding Sītā and me and do not think of objecting to it.

3. "There is severe criticism on the part of the people of the city as well as of the countryside. There is disgust directed toward me, and it pierces me to the vitals.

4. "I have, as is well known, been born into the House of the great Ikṣvākus. How then could I have brought Sītā, whose conduct has been sinful, back into the city?

5. "For you know, gentle brother, how Sītā was abducted by Rāvaṇa in the deserted Daṇḍaka wilderness and how he was slain by me.

6. "Right before your eyes, Saumitri, and those of the gods, Agni, bearer of oblations, as well as Vāyu, who moves through the sky, declared Maithilī to be innocent.

7. "And back then, in the presence of the gods and all the seers, the moon and the sun extolled Janaka's daughter as innocent.

8. "And thus, on the island of Laṅkā, in the presence of the gods and gandharvas, that woman of blameless conduct was handed over to me by great Indra.

9. "And in my heart of hearts I knew that illustrious Sītā was pure. So then, taking Vaidehī, I came to Ayodhyā.

10. "But now there is this grave allegation against me, and there is sorrow in my heart. There is severe criticism on the part of the people of the city as well as of the countryside.

11. "Any person whose infamy is bruited about among the people falls into the lowest hells so long as that gossip is repeated.

12. "For infamy is condemned by the gods, while fame is honored among them. And every undertaking of the great is made for the sake of fame.

13. "Moreover, alarmed by the fear of criticism, I would abandon my life itself, or even you, bulls among men, what to say of Janaka's daughter.

14. "That is why you gentlemen have been forced to see me fallen into an ocean of sorrow. Moreover, I cannot imagine any agony greater than this.

15. "Tomorrow at daybreak, Saumitri, you must mount a chariot driven by Sumantra, and, after helping Sītā to get in, you are to abandon her at the border of the realm.

16. "On the far side of the Ganges lies the ashram of the very great Vālmīki. It is heavenly in its appearance, and it is situated on the banks of the Tamasā River.

17. "And once you have abandoned her there, O delight of the Raghus, in a desolate wood, you must quickly return. Saumitri, you must carry out my instructions.

18. "Nor must I be contradicted in any way with regard to Sītā. For if I were to be opposed, it would give rise to my most extreme displeasure.

19. "I bind you to an oath, swearing by my arms and my life, you who might speak in the midst of my words in an effort somehow to conciliate me.

20. "If you gentlemen are obedient to my commands, then you must respect me. This very day Sītā must be taken away from here. You must carry out my instructions.

21. "Earlier she told me, 'I should like to see the great ashrams on the banks of the Ganges.' So now let her wish be fulfilled."

22. When righteous Kākutstha, his eyes filled with tears, had spoken in this fashion, surrounded by his brothers, he went inside.

The end of the forty-fourth sarga of the Uttarakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 45

1. Then, when the night had given way to dawn, Lakṣmaṇa, his mind distressed and his mouth gone dry, spoke these words to Sumantra:

2. "Charioteer, quickly yoke horses to a fine carriage and bring a beautiful, well-covered seat from the king's palace for Sītā.

3. "For I am to take Sītā from the king's palace to the ashram of the great seers of holy deeds. So bring the carriage quickly."

4–5. Saying, "So be it!" Sumantra brought an exquisitely beautiful carriage, well furnished with comfortable seating and yoked with splendid horses, and he said to Saumitri, the increaser of his friends' joy, "The carriage is here, please do what you must do, lord."

6. Addressed in this fashion by Sumantra, Lakṣmaṇa, that bull among men, entered the king's residence and, approaching Sītā, said:

7. "On the orders of our king, my lady, I am to go quickly to the bank of the Ganges and take you to the lovely ashram of the sages."

8. Addressed in this fashion by great Lakṣmaṇa, Vaidehī experienced unequaled joy, for she was delighted to go.

9–10. Gathering costly garments and various precious things, Vaidehī prepared to depart, saying, "I shall give these ornaments to the sages' wives." And saying, "So be it!" Saumitri had Maithilī mount the carriage, and he then set forth with swift horses, keeping Rāma's command in mind.

11. Then Sītā said to Lakṣmaṇa, the increaser of prosperity: "Today, delight of the Raghus, I see many inauspicious signs.

12. "Today my eye is throbbing and a trembling has arisen in my limbs. Also, Saumitri, my heart seems ill at ease.

13. "I feel the greatest anxiety and a great faintheartedness seizes me. And, wide-eyed prince, I see the earth as if it were desolate.

14–15. "May all be well with your brother, together with his brothers, and also with all my mothers-in-law without distinction, heroic prince.

And may all be well with all the living things in the city and countryside." Thus did Sītā pray to the gods, her hands folded in reverence.

16. But Lakṣmaṇa, aware of the real state of affairs, bowed his head to Maithilī and, feigning happiness, though his heart was deeply pained, said, "All is well."

17. Then, after reaching a place to stay in an ashram on the banks of the Gomatī, Saumitri once again rose in the morning and addressed the charioteer:

18. "Yoke the carriage quickly! For today, I would place the waters of the Bhāgīrathī on my head, just as did three-eyed Śiva on the mountain."

19. After he had quickly exercised the horses, which were as swift as thought, and yoked them to the carriage, the charioteer, cupping his hands in reverence, said to Vaidehī, "Please mount."

20. And on his instructions, Sītā mounted that splendid carriage together with Saumitri and the wise charioteer Sumantra.

21. After traveling for half a day, Lakṣmaṇa spied the waters of the Bhāgīrathī and, deeply despondent, wept loudly.

22. And Sītā, deeply concerned, seeing that Lakṣmaṇa was suffering, spoke these words: "Knower of righteousness, what is it? Why are you crying?

23. "Now that we have reached the banks of the Jāhnavī, which I have longed for all this time, why, at the moment of my joy, are you making me sad?

24. "You always abide at Rāma's feet, bull among men. Is it that you are sorrowful at being separated from him for two nights?

25. "Rāma is as dear as life itself to me as well, Lakṣmaṇa, but I am not grieving in this way. Please do not be so childish.

26. "Take me across the Ganges and let me see the ascetics. Then I shall distribute the wealth, garments, and ornaments.

27. "Then, once we have made our respectful salutations to the great seers according to their merit, we will spend one night there and then return to the city."

28. When Lakṣmaṇa had heard those words of hers, he wiped his lovely eyes and, intent on crossing the Ganges, had a lovely boat brought up.

The end of the forty-fifth sarga of the Uttarakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 46

1. After first helping Maithilī board the very large and fully rigged boat of the Niṣādas, the younger brother of Rāghava boarded himself.

2. Lakṣmaṇa told Sumantra, who had the carriage with him, "Please remain here," and then, tormented with grief, he told the boatman, "Cast off."

3. When they had reached the farther bank of the Bhāgīrathī, Lakṣmaṇa, cupping his hands in reverence, spoke these words to Maithilī, his voice choked with tears:

4. "Vaidehī, it is as if there were a massive dart through my heart in that my wise and noble brother has in this matter made me an object of censure for the world.

5. "Death would be better for me today, or what would be still better than death would be if I were not to be enjoined to such a task that is condemned by all the world.

6. "Forgive me and please do not be angry with me, woman of excellent vows." Having said this, Lakṣmaṇa cupped his hands in reverence and fell to the ground.

7. Now, when Maithilī saw Lakṣmaṇa weeping with his hands cupped in reverence and wishing for his own death, she was greatly alarmed and said these words to him:

8. "What is this? I do not understand. Tell me truthfully, Lakṣmaṇa. I see that you are distraught. Is all well with the lord of the earth?

9. "You must have been compelled to take an oath by the lord of men. Tell me, here and now, about this anguish of yours. I command you."

10. Prodded by Vaidehī, Lakṣmaṇa, his mind distressed, his face downcast, and his throat choked with tears, spoke these words:

11–12. "Daughter of Janaka, in the middle of his assembly the king heard vile rumors about you that are current in the city and the countryside. I cannot repeat those things before you, my lady, those things that the king has lodged in his heart. All anger has been set aside.

13. "Although you were shown to be innocent in my presence, you have been abandoned by the lord of men, who is fearful of the criticism of the people. You should not understand it in any other way, my lady.

14. "And so, taking cognizance of the king's command as well as your reported pregnancy-longing in this regard, I will have to abandon you on the outskirts of the ashram.

15. "Here, on the bank of the Jāhnavī, is the ascetic grove of the brahman-seers. It is holy and beautiful, so you should not be despondent, lovely lady.

16. "The extremely illustrious brahman and bull among sages, Vālmīki, was the greatest friend of my father, Daśaratha.

17. "Resorting to the shade of the feet of that great sage, you must dwell here happily, daughter of Janaka, devoted to fasting, your mind composed.

18. "Living the life of a completely devoted wife and holding Rāma always in your heart—conducting yourself in this way—you will attain the greatest happiness, my lady."

The end of the forty-sixth sarga of the Uttarakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 47

1. When Janaka's daughter Vaidehī had heard those terrible words of Lakṣmaṇa, she was devastated and she collapsed.

2. Unconscious for a short while, Janaka's daughter, her eyes filled with tears, addressed Lakṣmaṇa with sorrowful words:

3. "Surely, Lakṣmaṇa, this body of mine, which is now seen to be a veritable incarnation of suffering, must have been created by the creator for suffering alone.

4. "What sin did I commit previously, or whom did I separate from his wife, that I—a virtuous wife of blameless conduct—have been abandoned by the lord of the earth?

5. "Earlier I dwelt in an ashram following Rāma's footsteps, and, Saumitri, living with that hardship, I endured it.

6. "How, dear boy, am I to live in an ashram cut off from everyone? And to whom, given over as I am to sorrow, am I to tell my sorrows?

7. "And what will I say to the sages when they ask what wrong I have done to the king and for what reason great Rāghava has abandoned me?

8. "And by no means, Saumitri, can I abandon my life this very day in the waters of the Jāhnavī, for then my husband's royal lineage would be cut off.

9. "You must do as you are ordered, Saumitri. Leave me, whose lot is misery. You must abide by the instructions of the king. But hear my words.

10. "First, with your hands extended and cupped in reverence, and your head affectionately bowed to the feet of my mothers-in-law without distinction, you must inquire after the well-being of the king, saying:

11. " 'You must always act toward the people just as you do toward your brothers. For this would be the greatest righteousness and this would be your unsurpassed glory.

12. " 'I do not grieve for my own body, bull among men. But, your majesty, you must act righteously toward the people in such a way that you avoid their criticism, O delight of the Raghus.' "

13. As Sītā was speaking in this fashion, Lakṣmaṇa, his mind distressed, bowed his head to the ground and was unable to speak.

14. Then, after making a respectful circumambulation, he once more boarded the boat, and, weeping loudly, he urged on the boatman.

15. Crushed under a great burden of grief, he reached the northern bank and quickly mounted the carriage, almost unconscious in his misery.

16. Lakṣmaṇa then set forth, turning around again and again to gaze at Sītā, who, like a woman without a protector, was clutching herself on the farther bank.

17. She gazed again and again at the distant carriage and at Lakṣmaṇa, and as she watched, terrified, grief overwhelmed her.

18. Bowed down under the burden of her suffering, the virtuous and glorious woman, not seeing anyone to protect her, now wretched and given over to her suffering, wept loudly in the woods, which resounded with the cries of peacocks.

The end of the forty-seventh sarga of the Uttarakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 48

1. Seeing Sītā crying, the sages' sons, who were nearby, ran to where the blessed Vālmīki of profound intellect was staying.

2. After reverently honoring the sage's feet, the sons of the sages all informed that great seer about the sound of her weeping.

3. "Blessed one, a woman such as we have never seen before, who looks like Śrī herself, perhaps the wife of some great man, is weeping with strangled cries in her bewilderment.

4. "You should see her straightaway, blessed one. She looks like some goddess fallen from the heavens. For we do not think she is a mortal, and we should welcome her fittingly."

5. When that knower of righteousness had heard those words of theirs, he, who had obtained special insight through asceticism, reached certainty in his mind and hastened to where Maithilī was.

6. When he had almost reached that spot on foot, the great sage, carrying a splendid guest-offering, stood on the bank of the Jāhnavī and saw Rāghava's beloved wife, Sītā, who was like a woman without a protector.

7. Vālmīki, bull among sages, addressed Sītā, who was crushed under the weight of her grief, with gentle words, gladdening her with his ebullient spirit.

8. "You are Daśaratha's daughter-in-law, Rāma's virtuous chief queen, and the daughter of King Janaka. Welcome to you, O you who are devoted to your husband.

9. "Through my pious meditation, I recognized you, even as you were coming, and, in my heart, I determined the entire reason.

10. "I know through the vision I have obtained through austerities that you are without sin, Sītā. As you are of a pure nature, Vaidehī, you shall now dwell with me.

11. "Not far from my ashram there are some ascetic women engaged in austerities. They will always care for you, my child, as they would their own child.

12. "Please accept this guest-offering, trusting and free from anxiety. You should be no more despondent than if you were returning home."

13. When Sītā had heard the sage's extremely wonderful speech, she bowed her head to his feet and, cupping her hands in reverence, said, "So be it."

14. As the sage was departing, Sītā followed behind him, her hands cupped in reverence. She followed him to where the ascetic women, composed and constantly engaged in righteousness, dwelt.

15. And they, seeing the sage approaching followed by Vaidehī, then came forward, filled with joy, and said these words:

16. "Welcome to you, foremost of sages. It has been a long time since you have come, lord. We all greet you reverentially. Now please tell us what we are to do."

17. When Vālmīki had heard those words of theirs, he said this: "This is Sītā who has come, the wife of wise Rāma.

18. "She is the daughter-in-law of Daśaratha and the virtuous daughter of Janaka. Although she is without sin, she has been abandoned by her husband. I must care for her always.

19. "You venerable ladies should regard her with the greatest affection, and she is to be especially honored by you because of the respect owing to my words."

20. And then, after comforting Vaidehī again and again, the great and illustrious ascetic, surrounded by his disciples, returned to his own ashram.

The end of the forty-eighth sarga of the Uttarakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 49

1. But as for Lakṣmaṇa, his mind distressed, he felt terrible anguish as he watched Sītā Maithilī being taken into the ashram.

2. And that prince of immense blazing energy said to his counselor and charioteer, Sumantra: "Just imagine wise Rāma's suffering on account of Sītā's pain.

3. "What greater suffering than this could there possibly be for Rāghava after he has sent away Janaka's daughter, a wife of blameless conduct?

4. "I think it is clear, charioteer, that Rāghava's separation from Vaidehī has been caused by fate, and that fate is impossible to avert.

5. "For even Rāghava, who, when angered, could slay the gods, along with the gandharvas and the asuras together with the rākṣasas, must submit to fate.

6. "Earlier, because of my father's words, he dwelt in the very fearsome and deserted Daṇḍaka wilderness for nine years and five.

7. "Still, much more painful than that is his banishment of Sītā after hearing the criticism of the townsmen. It seems cruel to me.

8. "Moreover, charioteer, what practice of righteousness has been accomplished in subjecting Maithilī to this act—so destructive to one's reputation—at the instigation of the townsmen with their baseless allegations?"

9. When Sumantra had heard these various words that Lakṣmaṇa had uttered, he cupped his hands in reverence and uttered this speech:

10. "You should not suffer such anguish with regard to Maithilī, Saumitri. For, Lakṣmaṇa, all this was foretold long ago by the brahmans in the presence of your father.

11. "It is certain that Rāma will be unhappy for the most part and will experience little happiness. And after a long time, that great and righteous man will abandon you and Maithilī as well as Śatrughna and Bharata.

12. "And, Saumitri, I really should not tell either you or Bharata those words uttered by Durvāsas, which the king himself did not tell you.

13. "The seer uttered these words, bull among men, in my presence and that of the great king as well as in the presence of Vasiṣṭha.

14. "When that bull among men had heard the words of the seer, he said to me, 'Charioteer, you must never divulge this to anyone.'

15. "Mindful of that, it was my intention, gentle prince, that I would never prove false to the words of the guardian of the people.

16. "However, by no means should I leave this unsaid in your presence, gentle prince. And if you really want to hear it, then listen, delight of the Raghus.

17. "Although at that time the lord of men told me this as a secret, even so, I will tell it to you, for fate is impossible to avert."

18. When Saumitri had heard those important words of his, filled as they were with profound meaning, he then said these words to the charioteer: "Tell me the truth."

The end of the forty-ninth sarga of the Uttarakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 50

1. Encouraged by great Lakṣmaṇa in this fashion, the charioteer began to relate the words that the seer had uttered:

2. "A long time ago, Atri's son, the great sage named Durvāsas, passed the rainy season in the holy ashram of Vasiṣṭha.

3. "And your greatly illustrious father of immense blazing energy came in person to that ashram, eager to see his great purohita.

4. "Upon seeing the great sage, who blazed with energy like the sun, seated to the left of Vasiṣṭha, he humbly saluted those two sages, who were foremost among ascetics.

5. "Honored by them with words of welcome, a seat, water for washing his feet, and fruits and roots, he stayed with the sages.

6. "Around midday, the great seers held various delightful conversations as they sat there.

7. "Then, during one such conversation, the king, with his hands extended and cupped in reverence, addressed Atri's great son, so rich in austerities:

8. " 'Blessed one, how long will my lineage endure? How long will my Rāma live? How long will my other sons live?

9. " 'And how long will whatever sons Rāma may have live? In keeping with my desire, blessed one, please tell me. What does the future hold for my lineage?'

10. "When Durvāsas, of truly immense blazing energy, had heard the words that were spoken by King Daśaratha, he began to speak:

11. " 'Rāma will be the lord of Ayodhyā for a long time and his younger brothers will be happy and prosperous.

12. " 'And it is said that after a long time, that righteous man will abandon you and illustrious Maithilī for a certain reason.

13. " 'When he has ruled the kingdom for eleven thousand years, Rāma will go to the Brahmaloka.

14. " 'After Kākutstha, conqueror of enemy citadels, has performed opulent aśvamedhas, he will establish many royal lineages.'

15. "When that sage of immense blazing energy and tremendous radiance had related everything about the lineage of the king, both past and future, he fell silent.

16. "Then, when the sage had fallen silent, King Daśaratha respectfully saluted those two great sages and returned once more to his splendid city.

17. "These were the words spoken by the sage long ago that I heard there and that I have kept in my heart. All this will not prove otherwise.

18. "Such being the case, you must not be tormented, Rāghava, on account of either Sītā or Rāghava. You must be strong, best of men."

19. When Lakṣmaṇa had heard those truly extraordinary words that had been spoken by the charioteer, he experienced unequaled delight and cried, "Excellent! Excellent!"

20. And as the two of them, the charioteer and Lakṣmaṇa, were conversing in this fashion on the road, the sun set and they camped beside the Gomatī.

The end of the fiftieth sarga of the Uttarakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 51

1. Having spent the night there beside the Gomatī, Lakṣmaṇa, the delight of the Raghus, arose in the morning and continued on his way.

2. At midday, the great chariot-warrior entered Ayodhyā, which was filled with precious things and thronged with happy and prosperous people.

3. But the exceedingly wise Saumitri became extremely dejected, thinking, "Once I get there and approach Rāma's feet, what shall I say?"

4. And as he was brooding in this fashion, Rāma's extremely splendid palace, as radiant as the moon, appeared before him.

5. Getting down at the gate of the king's palace, the foremost of men, his face downcast, his mind distressed, entered unhindered.

6. Through eyes filled with tears, he saw before him his elder brother Rāghava, who sat dejected on his splendid throne.

7. His mind distressed, Lakṣmaṇa grasped Rāma's feet, and then composing himself, he cupped his hands in reverence and spoke in a dejected voice:

8. "Honoring my noble brother's command, I have abandoned Janaka's daughter, as was specified, at the beautiful ashram of Vālmīki on the banks of the Ganges. Now I have returned again, hero, to serve at your feet.

9. "You must not grieve, tiger among men, for such is the course of fate. For men like you, strong and wise, never grieve.

10. "All accumulations end in loss, all elevations in falls, all unions end in separation, and all life ends in death.

11. "Through your mind alone, you are able to conquer yourself by yourself and even all the worlds, Kākutstha. What then to say about suffering such as this?

19. When Lakṣmaṇa had heard those truly extraordinary words that had been spoken by the charioteer, he experienced unequaled delight and cried, "Excellent! Excellent!"

20. And as the two of them, the charioteer and Lakṣmaṇa, were conversing in this fashion on the road, the sun set and they camped beside the Gomatī.

The end of the fiftieth sarga of the Uttarakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

12. “Bulls among men such as you, your majesty, are not confused over such matters as that for which Maithilī was abandoned out of fear of malicious rumors.

13. “So, tiger among men, with your mind composed through fortitude, you must abandon this feeble mental state. You must not torment yourself.”

14. And addressed in this fashion by great Lakṣmaṇa, Kākutstha spoke with the greatest pleasure to Saumitri, who was so loving to his friends:

15. “It is just as you say, Lakṣmaṇa, best of men. I am content, hero, with regard to my command as to what had to be done.

16. “You have brought me happiness, gentle brother, and banished my torment. I have been comforted by your very sweet words, Lakṣmaṇa.”

The end of the fifty-first sarga of the Uttarakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 51-1 = Appendix I, No. 8, lines 1–48*

1. When Rāma had heard those extremely wonderful words of Lakṣmaṇa, he was greatly pleased, and he spoke these words:[1–2]

2. “It is hard to find such a kinsman as you, especially in these days, wide-eyed and highly intelligent Lakṣmaṇa.[3–4]

3. “Now listen to what is in my heart, gentle brother of auspicious marks. Then, once you have heard it, you must act upon my words.[5–6]

4. “Four days have passed, gentle brother, during which I have not issued any instructions as to what needs to be done. This pierces me to the vitals, Saumitri.[7–8]

5. “Summon the officials, household priests, ministers, and the men and women who would petition me about something they would have me do, bull among men.[9–10]

6. “For a king who does not carry out the people’s business day after day will, after death, be hurled into a terrible hell. Of this there is no doubt.[11–12]

7. “I have heard that long ago there was a king named Nṛga, who was a great chariot-warrior. He was a protector of the earth on the earth, reverential toward brahmans, a speaker of truth, and virtuous.[13–14]

8. “Now, on one occasion at Puṣkara that foremost of kings gave to the brahmans ten million cows, adorned with gold, together with their calves.[15–16]

9. “At that time, there was a poor brahman, a keeper of the sacred fires, who lived by gleaning. His cow, a good milker, wandered off, together with her calf, through mingling with other cows.[17–18]

10. “Afflicted with hunger, he searched for his lost cow here and there, but he could not find her in any kingdom, even after many, many years.[19–20]

11. “Then, having come to Kanakhala, he saw in the house of a brahman his own cow, which was in good health and whose calf had grown up.[21–22]

12. “Then the twice-born brahman addressed her by her own name, saying, ‘Come, Śabalā!’ And the cow heard his voice.[23–24]

13. “Recognizing the voice of that twice-born brahman who was afflicted by hunger, the cow followed behind him as he, who was like fire, was departing.[25–26]

14. “And as that twice-born brahman went along, he said to the seer, ‘This is my cow. She was given to me by that lion among kings, Nṛga, during a donation.’[27–28]

15. “Then a great dispute arose between those two learned brahmans. Still arguing with each other, they approached the donor.[29–30]

16. “Remaining at the gateway of the king’s palace for many days and nights, and yet not receiving an audience with Nṛga, they became furious.[31–32]

17. “And those two great and outstanding twice-born brahmans, furious and greatly distressed, uttered these terrible words:[33–34]

18. “ ‘Since you do not grant an audience to those who are petitioners for the resolution of a matter, you shall become a lizard, invisible to all beings.[35–36]

19. “ ‘For a long time—many thousands of years and many hundreds of years—having become a lizard, you will live in a burrow.[37–38]

20. “ ‘Viṣṇu shall be born in this world in a human form, as the increaser of the glory of the Yadus. He shall be known as Vāsudeva.[39–40]

21. “ ‘Your majesty, he shall liberate you from this curse uttered by the twice-born brahmans. And by that time, your redemption will be effected.’[41–42]

22. “When those two brahmans had unleashed that curse in this fashion, they were freed from their cares, and they gave that old and feeble cow to some other brahman.[43–44]

23. “And thus did the king suffer that very terrible curse. For, among those petitioning for something they want done, conflict results in harm to kings.[45–46]

24. “So therefore, you must quickly have those who are seeking redress approach me for an audience. For does not a king obtain the fruit of an affair that is well transacted?”[47–48]

[colophon]

Sarga 51-2 = Appendix I, No. 8, lines 49–82*

1. Upon hearing Rāma’s words, Lakṣmaṇa, who grasped their essential meaning, cupped his hands in reverence and said to Rāghava of brightly blazing energy:[49–50]

2. “For a very minor offense, Kākutstha, those two brahmans pronounced upon the royal seer Nṛga a very grave curse, which was like a second rod of Yama.[51–52]

3. “When he heard that he had committed an offense, what did that bull among men, King Nṛga, say to those two twice-born brahmans, who were so filled with rage?”[53–54]

4. Addressed in this fashion by Lakṣmaṇa, Rāghava said: “Listen, gentle brother, to how that king, who was afflicted by the curse, acted long ago.[55–56]

5–6. “Now, when Nṛga realized that the two brahmans had gone on their way, he summoned all his ministers and the townspeople, along with his purohita. Then the king, completely overcome with misery, addressed all of his subjects, saying: ‘Listen to me attentively![57–60]

7. “ ‘Now two blameless brahmans, Nārada and Parvata, having alerted me to the great danger facing me, went off to the highest heaven, having become as the wind.[61–62]

8. “ ‘You must consecrate the prince named Vasu here and now.[63] And let a comfortable burrow, approved by the artisans, be fashioned.[64]

9. “ ‘Rather, let the artisans fashion one burrow that is proof against the rainy season, a second that is proof against the cold season, and yet one more that is comfortable during the summer.[65–66]

10. “ ‘And let many different kinds of fruit trees, bearing many different kinds of flavors, as well as flowering creepers, be planted thickly around them.[67–68]

11. “ ‘And let there always be wonderfully fragrant flowers for a distance of one and a half leagues around my burrows.’[69–70]

12. “Once he had made this arrangement, he then installed Vasu, saying: ‘Constant in righteousness, you must protect the people according to the code of the kshatriyas, my son.[71–72]

13. “ ‘Best of men, you have witnessed how this curse was made to fall upon me by two angry twice-born brahmans for even such a minor offense.[73–74]

14. “ ‘But you must not suffer on my account, bull among men. For destiny, which has brought me to this misfortune, is all powerful, son.[75–76]

15. “ ‘Everyone receives what he must receive, whether pleasure or pain, according to his deeds[77] in a previous birth, my child. Therefore do not be despondent.’[78]

16. “When he had spoken in this fashion there to his son, that bull among men, the very illustrious King Nṛga, went off to live in his well-crafted burrow.[79–80]

17. “And thus having entered a burrow, which was well adorned within, Nṛga adhered to the command of the twice-born brahmans for many tens of thousands of years.”[81–82]

[colophon]

Sarga 51-3 = Appendix I, No. 8, lines 83–123*

1. “I have thus told you a detailed account of Nṛga’s curse. But if you desire to hear more, then listen to yet another tale.”[83–84]

2. Addressed in this fashion by Rāma, Saumitri once more said, “I never get my fill of such marvelous tales, your majesty.”[85–86]

3. Addressed in this fashion by Lakṣmaṇa, Rāma, the delight of the Ikṣvākus, began to tell a tale that was exemplary of righteousness.[87–88]

4. “There was a king named Nimi. Heroic and established in righteousness, he was the twelfth son of the extremely great Ikṣvāku.[89–90]

5. “At that time, near the ashram of Gautama, that king, who was endowed with might, founded a city similar to the city of the gods.[91–92]

6. “He himself aptly named the city ‘Vaijayanta.’ And that was where the illustrious royal seer Nimi made his dwelling.[93–94]

7. "After he had founded that very great city, this thought struck him: 'I will perform a long sacrificial session.' This delighted his father's heart. [95–96]

8–9. "Then that royal seer Nimi, foremost of the Ikṣvākus, after taking leave of his father, Ikṣvāku, the son of Manu, chose Atri, Aṅgiras, and that treasure-store of austerities, Bhṛgu, as well as that bull among twice-born brahmans, Vasiṣṭha, who was the first to be born of Brahmā.[97–100]

10. "But Vasiṣṭha said to Nimi, the delight of royal seers, 'I was previously chosen by Indra. Please wait until after that.'[101–102]

11. "Then the brahman Gautama took his place. As for Vasiṣṭha of immense blazing energy, he performed Indra's sacrifice.[103–104]

12. "And King Nimi, the lord of men, assembled those brahmans and sacrificed in the vicinity of his own city, not far from the Himalayas. [105–106]

13. "The king entered a state of consecration for five thousand years. [107]

14. "However, at the conclusion of Indra's sacrifice, the blessed seer, blameless Vasiṣṭha, approached the king in order to perform the duties of the hotṛ priest.[108–109]

15. "But when Vasiṣṭha, the foremost of brahmans, saw that that sacrifice had been completed by Gautama, he was seized with a towering rage.[110–111]

16. "Expecting to see the king, he sat waiting for a while. But as for the king, he had gone happily to sleep on that day.[112–113]

17. "Then, because he could not see the royal seer, anger flared up in great Vasiṣṭha, and he began to speak:[114–115]

18. " 'Since, O king, having treated me with contempt, you chose someone else, your body shall be devoid of consciousness.'[116–117]

19. "Then, upon waking, the royal seer heard about the curse that had been uttered, and, beside himself with rage, the king said this to the one born of Brahmā:[118–119]

20. " 'While I was sleeping unawares, you, perverted by anger, unleashed upon me the fire of your curse, which was like a second rod of Yama. [120–121]

21. " 'Therefore, brahman-seer, your body, too, with its radiant splendor shall, no doubt, be rendered devoid of consciousness.' "[122–123]

[colophon]

Sarga 51-4 = Appendix I, No. 8, lines 124–171*

1. When Lakṣmaṇa, the slayer of enemy heroes, had heard Rāma's words, he cupped his hands in reverence and said to Rāghava of brightly blazing energy:[124–125]

2. "Once they had left their bodies, Kākutstha, how did those two—the twice-born brahman and the king—who were honored by the gods, come to be embodied once again?"[126–127]

3. Addressed in this fashion by Lakṣmaṇa, Rāma, the delight of the Ikṣvākus, who was possessed of immense blazing energy, replied to that bull among men:[128–129]

4. "When those two righteous men—the king and the brahman-seer—had abandoned their bodies because of their mutual curses, both of them, so rich in austerities, became as the wind.[130–131]

5. "Lacking a body, the great sage Vasiṣṭha, of immense blazing energy, went to his father, Brahmā, for the sake of another body.[132–133]

6. "Then, after reverently honoring the feet of the wise God of gods, he, who had become as air, spoke these words to Grandfather Brahmā:[134–135]

7. " 'Blessed Lord, I have been rendered bodiless by Nimi's curse. Please show your grace with regard to the creation of another body.'[136–137]

8. "Then the self-existent Brahmā of immeasurable splendor said to him: 'You, who are greatly illustrious, must first enter the semen released by Mitra and Varuṇa.[138–139]

9. " 'And so you will not be born from a womb, foremost of the twice-born, but, endowed with great righteousness, you shall, once more, come under my control.'[140–141]

10. "Addressed in this fashion by the God, he made a reverential salutation and, after respectfully circumambulating Grandfather Brahmā, he went quickly to Varuṇa's abode.[142–143]

11. "Now at that very time, Mitra was sharing Varuṇa's rule. He had come there and, together with that lord of the milk ocean, was being honored by the lords of the gods.[144–145]

12. "And at the same time, Urvaśī, the foremost of the apsarases, surrounded by her companions, happened to come to that place.[146–147]

13. "When Varuṇa saw Urvaśī, who was endowed with such beauty, playing in his own abode, he was overcome with tremendous lust for her.[148–149]

14. "Varuṇa then asked that foremost of apsarases—whose eyes were like lotus petals and whose face was like the full moon—to make love with him.[150–151]

15. "But, cupping her hands in reverence, she replied to Varuṇa, 'O lord of the gods, I have already been asked by Mitra personally.'[152–153]

16. "Then Varuṇa, tormented by the arrows of Kandarpa, said these words: 'I will release my semen into this pot fashioned by the God.[154–155]

17. " 'Since you do not wish to make love with me, fair lady of lovely hips, I shall satisfy my desire for you and obtain release in this way.'[156–157]

18. "Then, when Urvaśī had heard that eloquent speech of the world guardian Varuṇa, she was extremely pleased, and she said these words:[158–159]

19. " 'Let this be as you wish. My heart belongs to you. My love for you is greater; nevertheless, my body belongs to Mitra, O lord.'[160–161]

20. "When he was addressed in this fashion by Urvaśī, he discharged into that pot his great and wondrous semen, which was as radiant as a blazing fire.[162–163]

21. "But as for Urvaśī, she went to where the god Mitra was. Mitra, however, in a towering rage, said these words to Urvaśī:[164–165]

22. " 'Having been first solicited by me, why did you not reject him? Why did you choose another with your heart, slut?[166–167]

23. " 'Because of this wicked act, you, sullied by my wrath, shall descend to the world of mortals and dwell there for some time.[168–169]

24. " 'Budha's son, the royal seer Purūravas, is the king of Kāśi. You must go to him this very day, foolish woman. For he shall be your lord.' "[170–171]

[colophon]

Sarga 51-5 = Appendix I, No. 8, lines 172–212*

1. When Lakṣmaṇa had heard that divine story, which was so wonderful to contemplate, he was supremely delighted, and he said these words to Rāghava:[172–173]

2. "Once they had left their bodies, Kākutsha, how did those two—the twice-born brahman and the king—who were honored by the gods, come to be embodied once again?"[174–175]

3. When truly valorous Rāma had heard that speech of his, he told him the tale of great Vasiṣṭha.[176–177]

4. "Then, best of men, from that pot of the great God, which was filled with semen, those two brahmans, foremost among seers and filled with blazing energy, were born.[178–179]

5. "The first to be born from it was the blessed seer Agastya. Saying to Mitra, 'I am not your son,' he left him.[180–181]

6. "For Mitra's semen had first been deposited in Urvaśī, and it came to be in the pot where the semen of Varuṇa already was.[182–183]

7. "Then, after some time, that divinity of the Ikṣvākus, Vasiṣṭha, endowed with blazing energy, was born of Mitra and Varuṇa.[184–185]

8. "And the moment Vasiṣṭha was born, Ikṣvāku, of immense blazing energy, chose that blameless sage as his purohita for the prosperity of our lineage, gentle brother.[186–187]

9. "Thus have I told you of the emergence of great Vasiṣṭha with his new body, gentle brother. Now hear about the birth of Nimi, just as it happened.[188–189]

10. "When the wise seers saw that the king was disembodied, they then all performed a sacrifice on his behalf for the duration of his consecration.[190–191]

11. "And those foremost among the twice-born brahmans, along with the townspeople and servants, preserved the body of the lord of men, worshiping it with fragrances and garlands.[192–193]

12. "So then, upon the completion of the sacrifice, Bhṛgu, who was there, said this: 'I shall make your consciousness return, as I am pleased with you, your majesty.'[194–195]

13. "Then all the gods, being greatly pleased, said this to Nimi's consciousness: 'Choose a boon, royal seer. Where shall your consciousness be manifested?'[196–197]

14. "Addressed in this fashion by all the gods, Nimi's consciousness then said, 'I would dwell in the eyes of all beings, O foremost among the gods.'[198–199]

15. "The wise gods then said to Nimi's consciousness: 'Very well. Having become as the wind, you shall move about in the eyes of all beings.[200–201]

16. " 'On your account, lord of the earth, eyes will blink again and again for the sake of rest, as you, who have become as air, move about in them.'[202–203]

17. "Having spoken in this fashion, all the wise gods departed as they had come.[204]

18. "But as for those great seers, so rich in austerities, they placed on Nimi's body a fire stick. And those great seers then spun it back and forth vigorously to the accompaniment of mantras and oblations in order to produce a son for Nimi.[205–207]

19. "As that fire stick was being spun back and forth there, a great ascetic came forth. Because of the spinning back and forth [mathana], they called him 'Mithi.' And because of such a birth [janana], he became Janaka.[208–209]

20. "And since he was born of someone who was bodiless [videha], he was known as Vaideha.[210]

21. "And thus was born Janaka, of immense blazing energy, the first king of Videha. He was called Mithi and, because of him, his lineage is known as Maithila."[211–212]

[colophon]

Sarga 51-6 = Appendix I, No. 8, lines 213–258*

1. Now as Rāma was speaking in this fashion, Lakṣmaṇa, the slayer of enemy heroes, addressed the great man, who seemed to shine with his blazing energy:[213–214]

2. "Tiger among kings, it was a great thing, astonishing and wonderful, that happened long ago to disembodied Vasiṣṭha, along with Nimi.[215–216]

3. "But even though he was consecrated for sacrifice, King Nimi, who was a kshatriya hero, did not show any forbearance toward the great Vasiṣṭha."[217–218]

4. As Lakṣmaṇa was speaking in this fashion, Rāma, the foremost of those who give delight, spoke once more to his heroic brother of brightly blazing energy:[219–220]

5. "Anger such as was borne patiently by Yayāti, who relied on the quality of goodness, is hard to endure, Saumitri. Now listen to this carefully.[221–222]

6. "King Yayāti, who caused his people to prosper, was the son of Nahuṣa. He had two wives, gentle brother, who were unmatched in beauty on earth.[223–224]

7. "The one that was held in higher esteem by that royal seer, the son of Nahuṣa, was a daitya woman who was called Śarmiṣṭhā, the daughter of Vṛṣaparvan.[225–226]

8. "And, bull among men, fair-waisted Devayānī, the daughter of Uśanas, was also Yayāti's wife, but she was not beloved by the king.[227–228]

9. "Then they had two sons, who were handsome and steadfast. Śarmiṣṭhā gave birth to Pūru and Devayānī to Yadu.[229–230]

10. "But Pūru was the more beloved of the king because of his virtues and for his mother's sake. Then, filled with unhappiness, Yadu said to his mother:[231–232]

11. " 'Although you are born in the lineage of godlike Bhārgava, who is tireless in action, you must endure this heartfelt sorrow and this unbearable disrespect.[233–234]

12. " 'So, my lady, let us together enter the fire, the eater of oblations, and let the king take his pleasure for many nights with that daughter of the daityas.[235–236]

13. " 'But if this is to be endured by you, please grant me permission. You may tolerate this, but I will not. Without a doubt, I shall die.'[237–238]

14. "Then, when Devayānī had heard this speech of her son, who was weeping and sorely afflicted, she was in a towering rage, and she called to mind her father.[239–240]

15. "Realizing his daughter's intention, the Bhārgava came swiftly to where Devayānī was.[241–242]

16. "Seeing that his daughter was not her usual self and that she was despondent and distracted, her father said these words: 'What is this?'[243–244]

17. "In a towering rage, Devayānī said these words to her father, the Bhārgava of brightly blazing energy, who was questioning her again and again:[245–246]

18. " 'I can no longer live, foremost of sages. Therefore, I shall enter the fire or the water, or I shall consume virulent poison.[247–248]

19. " 'You do not understand how miserable and disrespected I am. For when one mistreats a tree, those things that depend on the tree are destroyed as well.[249–250]

20. “ ‘Having insulted a Bhārgava through his contempt, the royal seer now shows his contempt for me, nor does he treat me with respect.’ [251–252]

21. “When Uśanas had heard those words of hers, he was overcome with anger and he began to say this concerning the son of Nahuṣa:[253–254]

22. “ ‘Since, lacking self-control, the son of Nahuṣa has treated me with contempt, he shall attain decrepitude and become withered with extreme senescence.’[255–256]

23. “When he had spoken in this fashion and had comforted his daughter, the illustrious brahman-seer Bhārgava returned to his own abode.” [257–258]

[colophon]

Sarga 51-7 = Appendix I, No. 8, lines 259–302*

1. “When the son of Nahuṣa had heard that Uśanas was enraged, he was afflicted by that curse. Then, having attained extreme old age, he said this to his son:[259–260]

*2. “ ‘You are a knower of righteousness, Yadu. Therefore, for my sake, my illustrious son, you must accept this extreme old age, while I enjoy the pleasures of sex.[261–262]

3. “ ‘For I have not thus far had my fill of sensual pleasures, bull among men. Once I have enjoyed them to my heart’s content, then only will I take back this old age.’[263–264]

4. “But when Yadu had heard those words, he replied to the bull among men: ‘Let your beloved son Pūru take on this old age.[265–266]

5. “ ‘I have been excluded, O king, with regard to objects of value and even from your presence. So let those others with whom you have been enjoying the objects of pleasure take on your old age, your majesty.’ [267–268]

6. “When the king had heard those words of his, he said to Pūru, ‘For my sake, great-armed prince, you must take on this old age.’[269–270]

7. “Addressed in this fashion by the son of Nahuṣa, Pūru, his hands cupped in reverence said, ‘I am fortunate. I am favored. I abide by your command.’[271–272]

8. “Acknowledging Pūru’s words with the greatest delight, the son of Nahuṣa attained unequaled joy, and he transferred his old age.[273–274]

9. “Then the king, once more young, performed thousands of sacrifices and ruled the earth for many thousands of years.[275–276]

10. “Now, after a long time, the king said to Pūru: ‘Give back that old age, my son. Return that deposit to me.[277–278]

11. “ ‘My son, I transferred that old age to you as a trust. Therefore, I shall take it back. Do not be concerned.[279–280]

12. “ ‘Great-armed prince, I am pleased with your acceptance of my command, and so, filled with affection, I shall consecrate you as the lord of men.’[281–282]

13. “After King Yayāti, son of Nahuṣa, had spoken to his son Pūru in this fashion, he spoke these words in anger to Devayānī’s son:[283–284]

14. “ ‘In you, I have given birth to an incorrigible rākṣasa in the form of a son. Since you disobeyed my command, you shall have no power over the people.[285–286]

15. “ ‘Since you disregarded me, your father, who is your guru, you shall father fearsome rākṣasas who are yātudhānas.[287–288]

16. “ ‘And, evil-minded prince, your lineage, arising from the Lunar Dynasty, will not endure. For your descendants will be as ill-disciplined as you are.’[289–290]

17. “Once he had addressed Yadu in this fashion, the royal seer honored Pūru—who would enhance the kingdom—with royal consecration and then entered an ashram.[291–292]

18. “Then, after a long time, he met his appointed end. And in this way, King Yayāti, the son of Nahuṣa, went to the highest heaven.[293–294]

19. “Meanwhile, the very illustrious king Pūru ruled that kingdom with great righteousness in the foremost of cities, Pratiṣṭhāna, in the kingdom of Kāśi.[295–296]

20. “But Yadu sired yātudhānas by the thousand as well as an enduring lineage of kings in the inaccessible city of Krauñcavana.[297–298]

21. “And thus, according to the code of the kshatriyas, Yayāti tolerated the curse unleashed by Uśanas, as Nimi did not.[299–300]

22. “I have now told you everything, gentle brother. Let us grant audiences to all those who have legitimate business so that there is no dereliction such as there was in the case of Nṛga.”[301–302]

[colophon]

[Prakṣipta III follows sarga 51-7*; see pp. 1318–29]

Sarga 52

1–2. Then Sumantra entered and said these words to Rāghava: "Your majesty, some ascetics who dwell on the banks of the Yamunā—great seers who have placed the Bhārgava Cyavana at their head—are being held at the gateway. Filled with affection, great king, they are in haste and request an audience with you, tiger among men."

3. When Rāma, who understood righteousness, had heard those words of his, he said, "Have those great twice-born brahmans, whose leader is the Bhārgava, enter."

4. Honoring the king's command, the doorkeeper, cupping his hands at his head in reverence, then had those many esteemed ascetics enter.

5. Then more than one hundred great ascetics, glowing with their own blazing energy, entered the king's palace.

6. Bearing holy water from all the sacred sites and fruits and roots in full vessels, those twice-born brahmans offered them in abundance to Rāma.

7–8. And Rāma, moved by affection, accepted all of that—all the waters from sacred sites and the various fruits. And that great-armed hero said to all those great seers, "Please sit on these excellent seats, in due order."

9. When the great seers had heard Rāma's speech, they all sat down on beautiful, gilded seats fit for ascetics.

10. Then Rāghava, the conqueror of enemy citadels, self-controlled and cupping his hands in reverence, regarded the seers seated there and spoke these words:

11. "What is the purpose of your visit? What shall I do, O you whose wealth consists of asceticism? I am at the command of the great seers and will happily fulfill all your wishes.

12. "This entire kingdom and the life residing in my breast—everything of mine exists only for the sake of the twice-born. This is the truth I am telling you."

13. When they heard those words of his, there was a great cry of approbation on the part of those seers of fierce austerities who dwelt on the banks of the Yamunā.

14. Filled with the greatest delight, those great sages said: "This is characteristic of you alone, best of men, and of no one else on earth.

15. "Many extremely powerful kings whom we approached, your majesty, without even hearing about the importance of the undertaking, were not inclined to give their assent.

16. "But you, on the other hand, because of your respect for brahmans, have given your assent without even looking into the matter. You must do this; for, without a doubt, you are the one to do it. You must save the seers from a terrible danger."

The end of the fifty-second sarga of the Uttarakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 53

1. Lauded by the seers who were speaking in this fashion, Kākutstha said these words: "Tell me what needs to be done for you. I will banish your fear."

2. As Kākutstha was speaking in this fashion, Bhārgava said these words: "Listen, lord of men, to the cause of our fear and that of our country.

3. "Long ago, Rāma, in the Kṛta Yuga, there was a great asura named Madhu. That extremely powerful descendant of Diti was the eldest son of Lolā.

4. "Devoted to brahmans, a source of refuge and perfect in intellect, his friendship with the lofty gods was unequaled.

5. "This Madhu was endowed with might and intent upon righteousness. Because of his high regard for him, Rudra gave him a marvelous boon.

6. "Then that great divinity, very pleased, extracting an extremely powerful and extremely radiant lance from his own lance, presented it. Then he said these words:

7. " 'You have performed this splendid and unequaled righteousness in order to propitiate me. Filled with the greatest affection, I give you this supreme weapon.

8. " 'So long as you do not oppose the gods or the brahmans, the lance will remain yours, great asura. Otherwise, it will vanish.

9. " 'This lance will reduce to ashes whoever might be so incautious as to challenge you in battle, and it will then return to your hand.'

10. "When the great asura had obtained this boon from Rudra in this fashion, he then prostrated himself before Mahādeva and said these words:

11. “ ‘Blessed one, may this unsurpassed lance always remain with my lineage. For you, O God, are the Lord of the gods.’

12. “Śiva Mahādeva, the God and Lord of all beings, replied to Madhu, who was speaking: ‘It shall not be so.

13. “ ‘But your excellent words, prompted by my grace, must not prove fruitless. The lance shall pass on to your son alone.

14. “ ‘As long as this lance shall remain in your son’s hand, he, lance in hand, will be invulnerable to all beings.’

15. “And then, when Madhu had received that extremely marvelous boon from the God in this fashion, that foremost of the asuras had a resplendent palace built.

16. “His beloved and illustrious wife was the radiant Kumbhīnasī, she who was the child of Viśvāvasu by Analā.

17. “She had an immensely powerful and fearsome son named Lavaṇa. From childhood onward he was evil and did only wicked things.

18. “Seeing that his son was ill disciplined, Madhu was filled with sorrow. He gave way to grief, but he said nothing to him.

19. “He left this world and entered the ocean, the abode of Varuṇa, after bestowing the lance upon Lavaṇa and informing him of the boon.

20. “Through the power of that lance and because of his own evil nature, he torments the three worlds and especially the ascetics.

21. “Such is the power of Lavaṇa, and such is the nature of that lance. Having heard this, Kākutstha, you must be the one who decides. For you are our ultimate recourse.

22. “Up until now we seers, afflicted with fear, have begged many kings for safety, but, hero, we could find no one to protect us.

23. “Since we heard that Rāvaṇa was slain, along with his troops and mounts, we can find no other king on earth to protect us, Rāma. And so, afflicted by the fear of Lavaṇa, we seek protection.”

The end of the fifty-third sarga of the Uttarakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 54

1. Once that had been related, Rāma, his hands cupped in reverence, replied to the seers, “What does Lavaṇa eat? How does he conduct himself? And where does he live?”

2. When the seers had heard the words of Rāghava, they all informed him of how Lavaṇa had thrived.

3. "His diet consists of all creatures, but especially ascetics. His conduct is that of perpetual ferocity, and he always lives in Madhuvana.

4. "He always makes his daily meal after killing tens of thousands of lions, tigers, deer, and elephants, as well as men.

5. "Then that immensely powerful creature, like Yama himself, the ender of all things, with his jaws gaping wide at the time of universal destruction, devours still other creatures."

6. When Rāghava had heard those words, he said to the great sages, "I will have that rākṣasa slain. Let your fear be gone."

7. When he had thus made this promise to those sages of fierce blazing energy, the delight of the Raghus addressed his brothers, who were all assembled:

8. "Who is going to kill Lavaṇa, heroes? Please determine which one—great-armed Bharata or, on the other hand, Śatrughna—should deal with him."

9. Addressed in this fashion by Rāghava, Bharata said these words: "I will kill him. Please let me deal with him."

10. When Lakṣmaṇa's younger brother had heard Bharata's words, which were so expressive of heroism and valor, he stood up, leaving his golden seat.

11. Prostrating himself before the lord of men, Śatrughna said these words: "The great-armed middlemost delight of the Raghus has already done his duty.

12. "My revered elder brother earlier guarded the deserted city of Ayodhyā while suffering torment in his heart until the return of his revered elder brother.

13. "The great prince experienced many hardships, your majesty, as he lay on his painful beds in Nandigrāma.

14. "He lived on fruits and roots and wore matted locks and barkcloth garments. Having experienced such pain, the delight of the Rāghavas should not once again experience such suffering while I am here to be dispatched, your majesty."

15. As Śatrughna was speaking in this fashion, Rāghava once again spoke: "So be it, Kākutstha. You must carry out my command.

16. "I shall consecrate you as king in Madhu's lovely city. Let Bharata stay here, great-armed hero, if you are concerned about him.

17. "You are heroic, well trained, and capable of resettling that city, which was so beloved of Madhu, as well as its splendid countryside.

18. "For whoever uproots a lineage and then, upon the destruction of the king, fails to install another king, descends to hell.

19. "Once you have slain Madhu's son, the evil-intentioned Lavaṇa, you must rule that kingdom in accordance with righteousness, if you heed my words.

20. "And you must not raise any objection, hero, in connection with my words. A younger brother must obey the commands of his elder brother. Of this there is no doubt.

21. "You must accept the consecration I have undertaken, Kākutstha, one that is accompanied by rites and mantras performed by the brahmans headed by Vasiṣṭha."

The end of the fifty-fourth sarga of the Uttarakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 55

1. But when he was addressed in this fashion by Rāma, mighty Śatrughna was extremely embarrassed, and he spoke hesitantly:

971*. "I feel that there is something wrong in this affair, Kākutstha, lord of men. How can the juniormost be consecrated when there are elder brothers living?

2[a–d]. "It is true, bull among men, that an order must inevitably be carried out. And your command, illustrious prince, is especially inviolable.

973*1–2. "Since our middle brother had already made his vow, I should not have spoken after that. I spoke improperly in saying that I would slay the fearsome Lavaṇa in battle.

973*3–4. "And, bull among men, this wrongful speech of mine will have dire consequences, for one should not speak further once an elder has spoken.

973*5–6. "It was filled with unrighteousness and would exclude one from heaven. I shall not speak after you a second time, Kākutstha.

2[ef]. "Your majesty, bull among men, I will carry out your wishes.

977*. "Kākutstha, delight of the Raghus, please exonerate me from any wrongdoing with regard to what I have done."

3. And when that hero, great Śatrughna, had spoken in this fashion, Rāma, delighted, addressed Lakṣmaṇa and Bharata:

4. "Carefully fetch the requisites for the consecration. I will consecrate this invincible tiger among men this very day.

5. "You two Kākutsthas, acting on my orders, must bring together the purohita, the vedic brahmans, the sacrificial priests, and all my counselors."

6. Following the king's command, those great chariot-warriors did so. Then, having placed at their head the purohita with all the requisites for the consecration, they entered the king's palace, which was like the mansion of Indra, smasher of citadels.

7. And then the majestic consecration of great Śatrughna commenced, bringing joy to Rāghava and to the city.

8. Then, placing the consecrated Śatrughna on his lap, Rāghava spoke these sweet words, inciting his blazing martial energy:

9. "Here is a divine arrow for you. It is infallible and a conqueror of enemy citadels. With it, gentle delight of the Raghus, you shall kill Lavaṇa.

10. "This arrow was created, Kākutstha, when the self-existent and invincible God, whom even the gods and asuras could not perceive, lay upon the vast ocean.

11. "For, O hero, although he was imperceptible to all beings, he was overcome with rage, and he created this greatest of arrows in order to kill the evil-minded Madhu and Kaiṭabha, who constituted an obstacle.

12. "And so, desiring to create the three worlds, he killed those two in battle with this foremost of arrows. Then he created the worlds.

13. "I did not release this arrow earlier when I wanted to kill Rāvaṇa, Śatrughna, fearing that there might be a great panic among creatures.

14. "Moreover, the great lance that he has, that supreme weapon, was given by the great three-eyed Śiva to Madhu for the destruction of his enemies.

15. "Leaving it in his palace, where it is continually worshiped, he searches all directions and so gets his food.

16. "And whenever anyone seeking battle challenges him, that rākṣasa seizes that lance and reduces him to ashes.

17. "So you, tiger among men, must stand outside the gateway before he enters the city while he is still without his weapon.

18. "Then, great-armed bull among men, you must challenge him to battle before he has entered his palace. Only then will you kill that rākṣasa.

19. "But if you act in any other way, he will be impossible to kill. If, however, you act in this fashion, hero, he will be destroyed.

20. "I have now told you everything, including the means of evading that lance. For the decree of majestic black-throated Śiva is impossible to violate."

The end of the fifty-fifth sarga of the Uttarakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 56

1. When the delight of the Raghus had spoken in this fashion to Śatrughna Kākutstha and had praised him again and again, he once more uttered excellent words:

2–3. "Let these four thousand cavalry, two thousand chariots, and a hundred war-elephants accompany you, Śatrughna, as well as actors and dancers and town shopkeepers carrying their various wares, bull among men.

4. "And take ten thousand gold and silver pieces and, Śatrughna, bull among men, go with wagons sufficient for that treasure.

5. "For, heroic best of men, with words and gifts you must win over your unsurpassed army, which must be well maintained, happy, and well fed.

6. "For, Rāghava, where your troop of retainers, who must be kept happy, will be stationed, they will be without provisions, wives, and kinsmen.

7. "Therefore, having dispatched your vast host, filled with contented troops, you, your bow in hand, must then proceed alone to Madhu's woods.

8. "You must proceed unsuspected in such a way that Lavaṇa, Madhu's son, does not realize that you are coming, eager for battle.

9. "There is no other way for him to be killed, bull among men. For whoever comes within the range of Lavaṇa's sight will inevitably be slain by him.

10. "When the hot season is over and the rains are at hand, you must kill Lavaṇa, gentle brother. For that is the proper time to deal with that evil-minded creature.

11. "Placing the great seers at their head, let your soldiers march forth, such that they may cross the waters of the Jāhnavī during the remainder of the hot season.

12. "Then, swift-striding warrior, once you have encamped your entire army on the bank of the river, you must go on ahead determinedly with your bow."

13. Addressed in this fashion by Rāma, Śatrughna assembled the immensely powerful captains of his army and spoke these words:

14. "The various places at which you are to make camp are well known to you. You are to camp at them peacefully, in such a way that no one suffers any hardship."

15. When he had thus given them their orders and sent forth his great army, he made his respectful salutations to Kausalyā, Sumitrā, and Kaikeyī.

16–17. After reverentially circumambulating Rāma and bowing his head at his feet, Śatrughna, scorcher of his foes, granted leave by Rāma, bowed with hands cupped in reverence to Lakṣmaṇa and Bharata. Then immensely powerful and self-controlled Śatrughna, after reverentially circumambulating the purohita Vasiṣṭha, set forth.

The end of the fifty-sixth sarga of the Uttarakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 57

1. After having sent forth his entire army, Śatrughna stayed behind for a month. Then, hastening, he quickly set forth on the road all by himself.

2. Camping for two nights on the way, the heroic delight of the Rāghavas reached Vālmīki's holy ashram, which was an excellent place to stay.

3. After reverentially saluting the great Vālmīki, foremost of sages, he cupped his hands in reverence and said these words:

4. "Blessed one, I have come at the behest of my elder brother and would like to stay here overnight. I will depart tomorrow morning toward the west, the direction guarded by Varuṇa."

5. When that bull among sages had heard Śatrughna's words, he smiled and replied to that great man: "Welcome, illustrious prince!

6. "Truly, gentle prince, this ashram belongs to the House of the Rāghavas. So you should have no hesitation in accepting from me a seat, water to wash your feet, and the guest-offering."

7. Then, after accepting this honor, Kākutstha ate some food—fruits and roots—and was quite satisfied.

8. When he had eaten, the great-armed prince said this to the great seer: "To whom did all these sacrificial implements that are near the ashram once belong?"

9. When Vālmīki had heard that speech of his, he spoke these words: "Listen, Śatrughna, to whom this sacrificial ground once belonged.

10. "A mighty and highly righteous king named Mitrasaha, the son of great Sudāsa, is an ancestor of yours.

11. "Although he was but a child, Mitrasaha Saudāsa went out hunting, and that hero spied a pair of rākṣasas who were constantly roaming about.

12. "Fearsome and taking on the form of tigers, they were devouring many thousands of animals, and yet they were unsatisfied and could not get enough.

13. "And when he saw those two rākṣasas and saw that the forest had been stripped of game, he was filled with a towering rage, and he killed one of them with a great arrow.

14. "But once that bull among men Saudāsa had struck down that one, he was freed from his distress and anger, and he gazed at the slain rākṣasa.

15. "When the companion of that rākṣasa saw him staring, he was filled with a terrible anguish and said this to Saudāsa:

16. "'Since you have killed my companion, who had done nothing wrong, I will pay you back, you evil wretch!'

17. "Once he had addressed him in this fashion, the rākṣasa vanished on the spot. Now, in the course of time, Mitrasaha became king.

18. "Now as king he performed a sacrifice, just near this ashram. And Vasiṣṭha oversaw that great sacrifice, the aśvamedha.

19. "The sacrifice there was very grand and went on for many tens of thousands of years. Lavish and accompanied with the greatest splendor, it was equal to a sacrifice of the gods themselves.

20. "Now at the completion of the sacrifice, the rākṣasa, recalling his former enmity, took the form of Vasiṣṭha and addressed the king in this fashion:

21. " 'Today, when the final rites are over, you must quickly give me some food, including meat. You must not hesitate in this regard.'

22. "When the lord of the earth had heard those words uttered by the rākṣasa, who could take on any form at will, he said to one who was skilled in the preparation of food:

23. " 'You must quickly prepare savory food with meat, fit for the sacrificial offering, so that my guru will be fully satisfied.'

24. "Because of that order of the lord of kings, the cook's mind was in a flurry of agitation, and so the rākṣasa then took on the guise of the cook then and there.

25. "He then offered human flesh to the king, saying, 'I have brought you this savory food with meat, fit for the sacrificial offering.'

26. "And the king, together with his wife Madayantī, offered Vasiṣṭha that food, which the rākṣasa had brought, O tiger among men.

27. "Then the brahman, realizing that human flesh had been brought as his food, was seized with a towering rage, and he began to speak:

28. " 'Since, your majesty, you wanted to give me this food, such food will be yours without a doubt.'

29. "Then the king and his wife prostrated themselves again and again. And he then once more told Vasiṣṭha what the rākṣasa in the form of a brahman had said.

30. "When Vasiṣṭha had heard from the king about the abominable thing that the rākṣasa had done, he spoke once again to the king, that bull among men:

31. " 'It is impossible to falsify these words that I spoke when I was overcome with anger. But I shall grant you a boon.

32. " 'The duration of this curse shall be twelve years. Then, through my grace, best of kings, you will not remember what will have transpired.'

33. "And so the king, that crusher of his foes, experienced that curse and then regained his kingdom and once more protected his subjects.

34. "And this area near the ashram about which you were inquiring, Rāghava, is the lovely sacrificial ground that belonged to Mitrasaha Kalmāṣapāda."

35. When Śatrughna had heard the extremely dreadful tale of that best of kings Kalmāṣapāda, he reverentially saluted the great seer Vālmīki and then entered a leaf hut.

The end of the fifty-seventh sarga of the Uttarakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 58

1. Now the very night on which Śatrughna entered the leaf hut, Sītā gave birth to two sons.

2. At midnight the young sons of the sages reported the good news of Sītā's auspicious childbirth to Vālmīki: "O sage of great blazing energy, please prepare a protective amulet for them that will ward off malignant spirits."

3. When the sage had heard those words of theirs, he was delighted, and he fashioned for each infant a protective amulet that would destroy malignant spirits and ward off rākṣasas.

4. Taking up the cut tips of kuśa grass as well as the remaining stalks, called lava, the twice-born Vālmīki handed over for each infant a protective amulet that would ward off malignant spirits, saying:

5. "The one who was born first of the two is to be cleansed with the cut tips of kuśa grass that have been sanctified with mantras, and he shall thus be known by the name Kuśa.

6. "And this very quiet one, born second of the two, is to be cleansed by the elderly women with the remaining stalks, called lava, and so he shall be Lava by name.

7. "Thus the two of them, the twins Kuśa and Lava, will be renowned by the two names that I have given them."

8. Taking the amulets from the sage's hands with deep concentration, those women, free from impurity, then affixed them to the two infants.

9–10. In the middle of the night, Śatrughna heard that wonderful news—the auspicious birth of twins to Sītā—as well as praise of Rāma, the announcement of the children's names and dynastic name, and the application of the amulets that was being done. Then, returning to his leaf hut that night, he cried, "Thank heavens! Thank heavens!"

11. Thus that monsoon night in the month of Śrāvaṇa passed quickly for great Śatrughna, who was delighted.

12. And in the morning, mighty Śatrughna, after completing his sequence of morning activities, folding his hands in reverence, took his leave of the sage and once more set out, heading west.

13. He proceeded to the bank of the Yamunā, camping for seven nights on the way. There he took up residence in the ashram of those seers of pious reputation.

14. And there that greatly illustrious king stayed with the sages, whose leader was the Bhārgava Cyavana, engaging in many kinds of discourse.

The end of the fifty-eighth sarga of the Uttarakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 59

1–2. Then, as the night came on, Śatrughna questioned the brahman Cyavana, the delight of the Bhṛgus, about Lavaṇa's strengths and weaknesses and about the power of his lance, saying, "Brahman, who were those who were previously struck down by him with that greatest of lances when they approached him for single combat?"

3. When Cyavana of immense blazing energy had heard that speech of great Śatrughna, he replied to that delight of the Raghus:

4. "The feats that he performed are countless, bull among men. But just hear from me what befell one scion of the Ikṣvāku lineage.

5. "Long ago, in Ayodhyā, there was a mighty king, the son of Yuvanāśva. That mighty man was famed throughout the three worlds as Māndhātṛ.

6. "Having brought the entire earth under his rule, that king and lord of the earth then prepared to conquer the world of the gods.

7. "Now when, in his desire to conquer the world of the gods, Māndhātṛ had completed his preparations, Indra and the great gods were acutely afraid.

8. "Honored by the hosts of the gods with half of Śakra's throne and half of his kingdom, the king gave his word and then ascended.

9. "Realizing his malicious intention, Indra, the chastiser of Pāka, spoke these conciliatory words to the son of Yuvanāśva:

10. " 'Bull among men, you are not yet the king of the world of men. Nevertheless, without having subjugated the entire earth, you desire the kingship of the gods here.

11. “ ‘If, hero, the entire earth were completely under your sway, then you, along with your servants, troops, and mounts, might exercise the rulership of the gods.’

12. “But even as Indra was speaking in this fashion, Māndhātṛ said these words to him: ‘Where on the surface of the earth is my rule contested, Śakra?’

13. “Thousand-eyed Indra said to him, ‘In Madhuvana Madhu’s son, the rākṣasa named Lavaṇa, does not obey your command, blameless king.’

14. “When the king had heard those unwelcome and terrible words spoken by thousand-eyed Indra, he hung his head in shame and was unable to reply.

15. “And so, taking leave of thousand-eyed Indra and still hanging his head somewhat in shame, the majestic lord of men returned once more to this world.

16. “Cherishing indignation in his heart, the blameless king, together with his servants, troops, and mounts, came in order to subjugate Madhu’s son.

17. “Eager to fight Lavaṇa, that bull among men dispatched a messenger to him.

18. “When he had gone there, the messenger said many unpleasant words to Madhu’s son, but the rākṣasa just devoured him as he was speaking in that fashion.

19. “When the messenger had not returned after some time, the king, seized with anger, assailed the rākṣasa with a hail of arrows from every side.

20. “Then, laughing, Lavaṇa took that lance in his hand and released that supreme weapon for the destruction of the king, along with his entire retinue.

21. “That blazing lance reduced the king to ashes, along with his servants, troops, and mounts, and then returned to Lavaṇa’s hand.

22. “And thus was that very great king slain, along with his troops and mounts. For the power of that lance, hero, is immeasurable and unsurpassed.

23. “However, tomorrow morning, without a doubt, you shall quickly kill Lavaṇa before he can take up his weapon. Indeed, your victory is certain.”

The end of the fifty-ninth sarga of the Uttarakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 60

1. As they were carrying on this conversation and hoping for an auspicious victory, the night passed swiftly for great Śatrughna.

2. Now at that very moment, in the clear dawn, that heroic rākṣasa went out of the city, intent on gathering food.

3. At that juncture, heroic Śatrughna crossed the Yamunā River and took up his position, bow in hand, at the gate of Madhupura.

4. Then, just at midday, that rākṣasa of cruel deeds returned bearing the weight of many thousands of creatures.

5. When the rākṣasa spied Śatrughna standing at the gate and holding his weapon, he said to him: "What are you going to do with that?

6. "In my wrath, I have devoured thousands of armed men such as you, lowest of men. Are you eager to die?

7. "This food of mine is still not enough, lowest of men. How is it, fool, that, having come, you have entered my mouth of your own accord?"

8. As he was speaking in this fashion and laughing again and again, Śatrughna, endowed with valor, shed tears of rage.

9. When great Śatrughna was overwhelmed with rage, blazing sparks flew from his every limb.

10. And in his towering rage Śatrughna said to that night-roaming rākṣasa: "I am eager for battle—a single combat with you—evil-minded wretch.

11. "I am the son of Daśaratha and the brother of wise Rāma. I am Śatrughna, 'Slayer of Enemies' by name, who has come here eager to kill you.

12. "So you must offer me single combat, as I am eager for battle. For you are the enemy of all living things, and you shall not escape me with your life."

13. But even as that foremost of men was speaking in this fashion, the rākṣasa, chuckling, replied to him: "You fool, it is my good fortune that you have come.

14. "You fool, you lowest of men, it was Rāma who, for the sake of a woman, killed the rākṣasa named Rāvaṇa, the brother of my mother's cousin.

15. "But because I held you in such contempt, I let the complete destruction of Rāvaṇa's lineage pass and spared all of you especially.

16. "Thus I did not kill all you lowest of men since I regarded you—your ancestors, your descendants, and you yourselves—as too insignificant.

17. "Since, you fool, you desire to fight, I will give you battle of whatever kind you wish. I will just make ready a weapon to deal with you."

18. Then Śatrughna said to him: "How will you escape from me with your life? For an accomplished warrior must not permit even a feeble enemy who has encountered him to escape.

19. "For someone of irresolute mind who gives an enemy an opportunity to escape will surely be slain through his dim-wittedness, just like a coward."

The end of the sixtieth sarga of the Uttarakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 61

1. When Lavaṇa had heard those words of great Śatrughna, he manifested the most violent rage, and he cried, "Stay right where you are! Stay right where you are!"

2. Pounding his fist in his hand and loudly grinding his teeth, Lavaṇa repeatedly challenged that tiger among the Raghus.

3. As Lavaṇa of fearsome valor was speaking these words in this fashion, Śatrughna, the slayer of the enemies of the gods, said these words to him:

4. "Śatrughna had not been born when you vanquished those others. Therefore, this very day, struck down by my arrow, you must go to the abode of Yama.

5. "And, evil-minded wretch, may the seers and learned brahmans see you struck down by me in battle this very day, just as the thirty gods saw Rāvaṇa struck down.

6. "Once you have fallen this very day, incinerated by my arrow, night-roaming rākṣasa, the city and the countryside will be safe.

7. "This very day, my arrow, its head like the vajra itself, will, loosed by my arm, pierce your heart, as does a ray of the sun, a lotus."

8. Addressed in this fashion, Lavaṇa, beside himself with rage, hurled a huge tree at Śatrughna's chest. But that hero shattered it into a hundred pieces.

9. Seeing his feat foiled, the mighty rākṣasa once again seized many trees and loosed them upon Śatrughna.

10. But as for Śatrughna, who was filled with blazing energy, he cut down those many trees as they hurtled toward him, one after the other, with three or four straight arrows.

11. Mighty Śatrughna then unleashed a hail of arrows on the rākṣasa's chest. But the rākṣasa did not falter.

12. Then, laughing, Lavaṇa easily tore up a tree and struck the hero on the head. The latter, his limbs gone slack, lost consciousness.

13. When that hero had fallen, a great cry of "Alas! Alas!" arose from the seers and the hosts of gods and from the gandharvas and apsarases as well.

14. Paying no further heed to Śatrughna, who had fallen, stricken, to the ground, the rākṣasa did not enter his residence, although he now had an opportunity to do so.

15. Nor, having seen him fallen to the ground, did he get his lance. Instead, thinking him dead, he picked up his food.

16. But Śatrughna regained consciousness after a short while and once more, holding his weapon, stood at the rākṣasa's gate, being honored by the seers.

17–19. He then took up that divine, unfailing foremost of arrows. It was fearsome and it glowed with blazing energy with which it filled the ten directions. Its tip was the vajra, and its impact was that of the vajra. Its weight was that of Mount Meru and Mount Mandara. It was smooth at every joint, and it was undefeated in battles. Its shaft was smeared with blood and sandalwood paste. It was a beautifully fletched arrow that was terrifying to the dānava lords and the lords of the mountains and to the asuras.

20. Seeing that arrow, which was blazing like the fire at the end of time when the end of a cosmic era is at hand, all beings were terrified.

21. In great distress, the entire world, including the gods, asuras, gandharvas, sages, and the troupes of apsarases, approached Grandfather Brahmā.

22. And they said to Great-Grandfather Brahmā, the bestower of boons and Lord of the gods among gods: "Is it the end of the world, O God? Or has the end of the cosmic era come?

23. "We have never seen or heard anything like this, Great-Grandfather. O Lord, the gods are dazed with terror at the thought of the destruction of the worlds."

24. When Brahmā, grandfather of the worlds, had heard those words of theirs, he explained the cause of their fear, thus soothing the fear of the gods.

25. "Foremost among the gods, it is just the arrow that has been taken up by Śatrughna for the destruction of Lavaṇa in battle. You have all been stupefied by its blazing energy.

26. "For this arrow, because of which this fear has come, my children, is the eternal one, consisting of blazing energy that belonged of old to the God who created the world.

27. "This mighty arrow was created by that great Lord on account of Kaiṭabha and Madhu in order to destroy those two daityas.

28. "Thus, you should know that this arrow consists of the blazing energy of Viṣṇu. And it is indeed the primordial body of great Viṣṇu.

29. "So go forth from here and watch as that foremost of rākṣasas Lavaṇa is slain by Rāma's great and heroic younger brother."

30. When they had heard those pleasant words of that God of gods, they came to the place where Śatrughna and Lavaṇa were fighting.

31. All beings gazed upon that arrow as it was held in Śatrughna's hand. With its divine radiance it resembled the fire that blazes up at the end of a cosmic era.

32. First glancing at the sky, which was crowded with the gods, the delight of the Raghus repeatedly roared like a lion and turned his gaze once more to Lavaṇa.

33. Then, challenged by great Śatrughna, Lavaṇa, filled with rage, approached for battle.

34. Drawing his bowstring back to his ear, that foremost of bowmen released that great arrow toward Lavaṇa's chest. Swiftly tearing through his vast chest, it entered Rasātala.

35. Worshiped by the wise gods, the divine arrow penetrated to Rasātala and returned swiftly to that delight of the Ikṣvāku lineage.

36. Pierced by Śatrughna's arrow, the night-roaming rākṣasa Lavaṇa collapsed suddenly to the ground, like a mountain struck by a thunderbolt.

37. And as for that great divine lance, once the rākṣasa Lavaṇa had been slain, it returned to the control of Rudra as all beings stood watching.

38. Having struck down that terror of the three worlds with the blow of a single arrow, the great hero of the Raghus, with his bow and arrow raised, resembled the thousand-rayed sun when it has driven away the darkness.

The end of the sixty-first sarga of the Uttarakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 62

1. Once Lavaṇa had been slain, the gods, together with Indra, placing Agni at their head, spoke very pleasant words to Śatrughna, scorcher of his foes:

2. "Thank heavens you have been victorious, child! Thank heavens the rākṣasa Lavaṇa has been slain, tiger among men! Choose a boon, Rāghava.

3. "The granters of boons, who were anxious for your victory, are all assembled here, great-armed warrior. And a vision of us is never in vain."

4. When the self-controlled hero, great-armed Śatrughna, had heard the words of the gods, he cupped his hands at his forehead in reverence and replied:

5. "May I quickly obtain for my residence this lovely and charming city of Madhupurī, which was crafted by the gods. Let this boon, which I cherish, be mine."

6. Delighted at heart, the gods said to Rāghava, "So be it! Without a doubt it shall become the lovely city of Śūrasenā, 'The City with a Heroic Army.'"

7. Having spoken in this fashion, the great gods then ascended to heaven. And Śatrughna of immense blazing energy sent for his army.

8. Upon hearing Śatrughna's command, the army came at once, and Śatrughna, through his command, commenced the settlement.

9. And in the twelfth year, that lovely city, with its divine radiance, was fully established, as was the realm of the Śūrasenas, which was free from any threat.

10. Vāsava sent the rains at the proper season, and so the fields were filled with grain. And the city, under the protection of Śatrughna's arms, was free from disease and filled with heroic men.

11. Resembling a half-moon, it was adorned by the bank of the Yamunā. It was adorned with splendid mansions and adorned with squares and markets.

12. And with a varied abundance of goods that hero adorned the great palace that had earlier been left bare by Lavaṇa.

13. Gazing upon that prosperous city, Śatrughna, Bharata's younger brother, his mission accomplished, was extremely pleased and experienced the greatest delight.

14. Then, after he had founded the city of Madhurā, this thought occurred to him: "I would gaze upon Rāma's feet in this auspicious twelfth year."

The end of the sixty-second sarga of the Uttarakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 63

1. Thus, in the twelfth year, Śatrughna desired to go—with a small retinue of retainers and troops—to Ayodhyā, which was under the protection of Rāma.

2. Sending back his counselors, the leaders of the army, and his purohita, he went forth in an excellent chariot, which was radiant and yoked to horses.

*3ab–App. I, No. 9, line 1. Proceeding through seven or eight predetermined encampments, the immensely powerful delight of the Raghus reached the ashram of Vālmīki, where he made camp.

*lines 2–3. Then that bull among men, having bowed reverentially to the feet of Vālmīki, accepted from the hands of the sage water for washing his feet, the guest-offering, and all that was fitting for a guest.

*lines 4–5. And there the sage told great Śatrughna thousands of extremely sweet and varied stories.

*lines 6–7. The sage then said these words concerning the slaying of Lavaṇa: "This was an extremely difficult task, which your ancestors could not accomplish.

*lines 8–9. "Gentle Śatrughna, many great kings were destroyed, along with their troops and mounts, in fighting with the evil-minded Lavaṇa.

*lines 10–11. "But you, bull among men, easily slew that evil creature. Through your blazing energy, your majesty, the terror of the world has been put to rest.

*lines 12–13. "The frightful slaying of Rāvaṇa was accomplished with great effort. You, however, accomplished this extremely great feat effortlessly.

*lines 14–15. "When Lavaṇa was slain, the gods experienced tremendous delight, and delight was also generated for the world and all its beings.

*lines 16–17. "And I myself witnessed that battle just as it happened, bull among men, as I was seated in the assembly of great Vāsava.

*lines 18–19. "Thus, Śatrughna, you have increased my great joy as well, and so I shall kiss you on the head, for that is the highest expression of affection."

*lines 20–21. When the great sage had spoken in this fashion, he kissed Śatrughna on the head and extended his hospitality to him and to those who were his followers.

*lines 22–23. After that foremost of men had eaten, he heard, sweetly rendered in song, the supreme tale of Rāma, in due order, just as it had occurred at that time.

*lines 24–25. Upon hearing those words, so consonant with the truth and in accordance with what had happened long ago, that tiger among men, his eyes filled with tears, lost consciousness.

*lines 26–27. After remaining unconscious for a short while, he sighed again and again, and, while the poem was still being sung, he heard that tale of the past as if it were happening right then.

*lines 28–29. And as for those who were the king's followers, when they heard the magnificence of the singing, they were despondent and hung their heads and said, "This is wonderful!"

*lines 30–31. The soldiers there said to one another: "What is this? Where are we? Is this an illusion or a vision in a dream?

*lines 32–33. "This history that we witnessed long ago, we are now once again hearing in an ashram! Is this magnificent musical composition taking place in a dream?"

*lines 34–35. Having experienced the greatest wonder, they said this to Śatrughna: "Best of men, please straightaway inquire of Vālmīki, that bull among sages."

*lines 36–37. But Śatrughna said to all of those soldiers, who were filled with curiosity: "It would be improper for us to ask such a thing.

*lines 38–39. "There are many miracles here in the ashram of the sage. It would not be proper for me to ask about them simply out of curiosity."

*lines 40–41. And when the delight of the Raghus had spoken these words to the soldiers, he respectfully saluted the great seer and then went to his own quarters.

[colophon]

*lines 42–43. But sleep would not come to that tiger among men as he lay there, preoccupied, pondering that unsurpassed song about Rāma.

*lines 44–45. Thus the night passed swiftly for great Śatrughna, once he had heard those immensely sweet words accompanied by stringed and percussion instruments.

*lines 46–47. When the night had passed and he had completed his morning activities, Śatrughna cupped his hands in reverence and spoke these words to that bull among sages:

*lines 48–49. "Blessed one, I wish to see Rāghava, the delight of the Raghus. I wish to be given leave by you and these sages of severe vows."

*lines 50–51. As the Rāghava Śatrughna, destroyer of his foes, was speaking in this fashion, Vālmīki embraced him and gave him leave.

*line 52–3cd. And he, after respectfully saluting that foremost of sages, mounted his very splendid chariot and, in his longing to see Rāghava, proceeded swiftly to Ayodhyā.

4. Upon entering that delightful city, the great-armed and majestic delight of the Ikṣvākus entered the assembly hall where Rāma of tremendous radiance sat.

5. Having reverentially saluted the great and truly valorous Rāma, who seemed to glow with blazing energy, he cupped his hands in reverence and said to him:

6. "I have done everything that was commanded, great king. Evil Lavaṇa has been slain and that city has been populated.

7. "And the twelfth year has now gone by without you, delight of the Raghus. I can no longer bear to live apart from you, O king.

8. "Please be gracious to me, Kākutstha of immeasurable valor. For I cannot live apart from you any more than can a calf deprived of its mother."

9. As Śatrughna was speaking in this fashion, Rāma embraced him and said this: "Do not be despondent, hero. This is not the conduct of a kshatriya.

10. "Kings do not despair while living abroad, Rāghava, and, Rāghava, one's subjects must indeed be protected according to the code of the kshatriyas.

11. "But you may come from time to time, hero, to visit me and Ayodhyā. However, you will have to go back to your city, best of men.

12. "You, too, are, without doubt, as dear to me as life itself. Nonetheless, the protection of the kingdom must be attended to.

13. "Therefore, Kākutstha, you may stay with me for five nights. After that, you will have to go back to Madhurā together with your retainers, troops, and mounts."

14. When Śatrughna had heard these heartfelt words of Rāma, which were in keeping with righteousness, Śatrughna said in a voice filled with sorrow, "So be it."

15. And so, having dwelt there for five nights according to Rāghava's command, the great bowman Kākutstha prepared to depart.

16. Taking his leave of great and truly valorous Rāma, as well as of Bharata and Lakṣmaṇa, he mounted his great chariot.

17. Accompanied for a great distance by both great Lakṣmaṇa and Bharata, Śatrughna then proceeded swiftly to his own city.

The end of the sixty-third sarga of the Uttarakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 64

1. Once he had sent Śatrughna away, Rāghava, delighted, enjoyed himself, along with his other two brothers, ruling the kingdom in accordance with righteousness.

2. But after several days, an aged brahman of that country approached the royal gate, holding the dead body of a child.

3. Wailing various lamentations filled with loving words and crying, "My son! My son!" over and over, he said these words:

4. "What evil deed must I have done in the past in some previous birth that I must see you, my only son, in the grip of death?

5. "For you, my little son, are a mere child but five years old and have not yet reached manhood. Yet, to my grief, you have come to an untimely death.

6. "In a few days your mother and I will doubtless too be in the grip of death out of grief for you, my little son.

7. "I do not recall any lie that I have uttered nor any harm that I have done. For what evil deed of mine then has my son, a mere child, been led this day to the abode of Vaivasvata without having completed my obsequial rites?

8. "I have never before seen or even heard of such a dreadful thing as an untimely death in Rāma's realm.

9. "Without a doubt, it must be that there is some great misdeed on Rāma's part. Your majesty, you must restore this child to life as he has come under the sway of death.

10. "May you attain long life together with your brothers, your majesty, as we have always dwelt happily in this kingdom of yours, immensely powerful prince.

11. "But now the realm of the great Ikṣvākus has no protector since it has acquired for its protector Rāma, a king who brings about the death of its children.

12. "Subjects who are not governed according to law perish through the transgressions of their king. And when the king is one whose conduct is unrighteous, people die before their time.

13. "And when the people in the towns and in the countryside act improperly, and yet there is no one to prevent them, then there is fear of death.

14. "It is perfectly clear beyond any doubt that either in the city or the countryside there must have been some transgression on the part of the king, and thus there has been the death of a child."

15. Thus reviling the king over and over again with many different words, the brahman, consumed with sorrow, embraced his son.

The end of the sixty-fourth sarga of the Uttarakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 65

1. And thus did Rāma hear that twice-born brahman's entire piteous lamentation, so filled with sorrow and grief.

2. Wholly consumed with sorrow, he summoned his counselors, as well as Vasiṣṭha, Vāmadeva, and his brothers, together with the vedic brahmans.

3. The eight twice-born brahmans were ushered in together with Vasiṣṭha, and they addressed the king, who was as resplendent as a god, saying, "May you prosper!"

4–5. All of those bulls among the twice-born brahmans—Mārkaṇḍeya, Maudgalya, Vāmadeva, Kāśyapa, Kātyāyana, Jābāli, Gautama, and Nārada—were seated on cushions, as were the counselors and the vedic brahmans, in proper fashion, according to their merit.

6. Once all of those men of fiercely blazing energy had been seated, Rāghava told them everything about why the twice-born brahman was wailing.

7. Now, when Nārada had heard those words of the dejected king, he responded to him with these auspicious words there in the presence of the seers:

8. "Listen, your majesty, to how this untimely death of a child has come about. Once you have heard it, heroic delight of the Raghus, you must do what needs to be done.

9. "In the beginning, Rāma, in the Kṛta Yuga, only brahmans were ascetics. At that time, your majesty, a non-brahman could by no means be an ascetic.

10. "In that resplendent age, unshrouded by darkness, in which brahmans were preeminent, all were immortal and farsighted.

11. "Next came the age called the Tretā Yuga, the age of men of powerful bodies. In that age kshatriyas became able to practice the asceticism of that previous age.

12. "And compared to those great men in that age known as the Tretā Yuga, those in the preceding age were superior to them in both strength and asceticism.

13. "The brahmans were superior and the kshatriyas were inferior in every respect. But over the course of the two yugas, they came to be equal in power.

14. "Then, unable to perceive any great difference between the brahmans and kshatriyas, all the authorities instituted regulations that governed all four social classes to address this.

15. "Nonetheless, unrighteousness set one foot on the earth, so that, through association with that unrighteousness, the twice-born ones became diminished.

16. "Then there appeared for the first time a limit to the span of life, so that people performed only auspicious acts and were devoted to truth and righteousness.

17. "But in the Tretā Yuga those who were brahmans and kshatriyas practiced asceticism, while other people were engaged in serving them.

18. "And that, which was allotted to the vaiśyas and śūdras, came to be their highest righteous duty. But it was the śūdras especially who revered all the other three classes.

19. "Then unrighteousness set down its second foot. And thus, that yuga came to be known as the Dvāpara.

20. "And, bull among men, both unrighteousness and agriculture increased in that yuga reckoned as the Dvāpara, which came to be their basis.

21. "And in the yuga known as the Dvāpara, the practice of asceticism was extended to the vaiśyas. But the śūdra did not gain access to that practice—that is, to the performance of severe austerities—O bull among men.

22. "But eventually a person of the lowest class, O best of kings, will be able to perform very great asceticism. Indeed, the practice of asceticism in the future, that is, in the Kali Yuga, will be extended to those of the śūdra class.

23. "The practice of asceticism by a śūdra, even in the Dvāpara, Rāma, is a severe violation of righteousness. Surely then, your majesty, some wicked śūdra, having become a great ascetic, is practicing austerities in some corner of your realm. And it is because of this that there has been the death of a child.

24. "For any evil-minded man who commits an unrighteous or forbidden act in the city or country of a king, O tiger among kings, goes swiftly to hell, as does that king. Of this there is no doubt.

25. "So you, tiger among men, must search your realm, and wherever you see any evil being done, you must take forceful action.

26. "In this way your righteousness will increase and so will the life span of men, foremost of kings, and this child will live once more."

The end of the sixty-fifth sarga of the Uttarakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 66

1. When Rāma had heard those words of Nārada, which consisted, so it seemed, of the nectar of immortality, he experienced unequaled delight, and he said this to Lakṣmaṇa:

2. "Go, gentle Lakṣmaṇa, and console that foremost of twice-born brahmans. Then have him place the boy's body in a vat of oil.

3. "See to it, gentle brother, that the child's body is placed there together with fine fragrances and highly aromatic oils so that it does not decompose.

4. "And you must act in such a way that there will be no destruction or disintegration of the body of this innocent boy while it is being preserved."

5. When greatly illustrious Kākutstha had instructed Lakṣmaṇa of auspicious marks in this fashion, he called to mind the Puṣpaka with the thought, "Come!"

6. When the Puṣpaka, adorned with gold, perceived Rāghava's intentions, it came at once into his very presence.

7. Bowing humbly, he said, "It is I, great-armed lord of men, your obedient servant, who has come."

8. Upon hearing those welcome words of the Puṣpaka, the lord of men respectfully saluted those great seers, and he then boarded the flying palace.

9–10. Taking up his bow, his quiver, and his brightly gleaming sword, he entrusted the city to those two heroes, Saumitri and Bharata, and proceeded to the west, searching the wastelands on every side. Then the majestic hero turned to the northern quarter, which is bounded by the Himalayas.

11. Not finding even the most minor transgression there, the lord of men inspected the entire eastern region as well.

12. Then the delight of the royal seers traversed the southern quarter, where he spied a very large lake on the northern slopes of Mount Śaivala.

13. Close to the lake, majestic Rāghava spied an ascetic hanging upside down while performing very severe austerities.

14. Approaching him who was performing supreme austerities, Rāghava spoke these words: "You are fortunate, O you of excellent vows.

15. "To which of the four classes do you belong, you who are advanced in asceticism and of firm resolve? I, Rāma Dāśarathi, am asking you out of curiosity.

16. "Whether it be the attainment of heaven or the acquisition of a boon, I wish to hear, ascetic, about the goal in connection with which you have been practicing austerities.

17. "Pray, are you a brahman or are you an invincible kshatriya? Or if you are a vaiśya or a śūdra, you must tell me that truthfully."

The end of the sixty-sixth sarga of the Uttarakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 67

1. Upon hearing that speech of Rāma, who was tireless in action, he spoke these words, while still hanging upside down:

2. "I was born into the śūdra class, and I am engaged in severe austerities. For, greatly glorious Rāma, I desire the status of a god in this very body.

3. "I would not speak falsely, your majesty, out of my desire to win the world of the gods. Know me, Kākutstha, to be a śūdra known by the name Śambūka."

4. But even as the śūdra was speaking, Rāghava drew his spotless and brightly gleaming sword from its sheath and cut off his head.

[Appendix I, No. 11]

*lines 1–2. Once that śūdra had been slain, the gods, together with Indra and with Agni at their head, praised Kākutstha over and over again, crying, "Well done! Well done!"

*lines 3–4. And a great shower of flowers made up of extremely fragrant and heavenly blossoms fell on all sides, scattered by the wind.

*lines 5–6. Exceedingly pleased, the gods said to truly valorous Rāma: "Wise and gentle Rāma, you have splendidly carried out this deed on behalf of the gods.

*lines 7–8. "Please accept a boon, gentle Rāma, whichever one you wish, tamer of your foes, since because of you, delight of the Raghus, this śūdra will not enjoy heaven."

*lines 9–10. After listening with great concentration to the speech of the gods, Rāghava cupped his hands in reverence and spoke these words to thousand-eyed Indra, smasher of citadels:

*lines 11–12. "If the gods are pleased with me, let the son of the twice-born brahman live. Let them ordain for me this boon, which is my most cherished desire.

*lines 13–14. "It was through my transgression that this child, the brahman's only son, whose time had not come, was led by Kāla to the abode of Vaivasvata.

*lines 15–16. "Now, bless you, you must make him live. I promised that twice-born brahman this: 'I will restore your son to life.' You ought not prove me false."

*lines 17–18. Now, when the foremost among the wise gods had heard these words of Rāghava, they were delighted with an abundance of delight, and they replied to that great hero:

*lines 19–20. "Rest assured, Kākutstha, this very day, surrounded by his kinsmen, that little child has once more come to life.

*line 21–5ab. "At the very moment that the śūdra was struck down, Kākutstha, the child was restored to life.

[End Appendix I, No. 11]

*lines 1–2. "Bless you, may you obtain prosperity! We have accomplished our purpose, bull among men. We shall visit the ashram of Agastya, illustrious prince.

*lines 3–4. "The religious observances of that immensely illustrious brahman-seer are now completed. For the twelfth year has passed while he was practicing devotions underwater.

*lines 5–6. "We shall go there, Kākutstha, to pay our respects to the sage. Bless you! You, too, should go to see that foremost of seers."

*lines 7–8. Having promised the gods with the words, "So be it!" the delight of the Raghus mounted the flying palace Puṣpaka, which was adorned with gold.

*lines 9–10. Then the gods set out in their vast flying palaces, while Rāma swiftly followed them to the penance grove of the pot-born sage Agastya.

*lines 11–12. When righteous Agastya, that treasure-house of austerities, saw that the gods had arrived, he honored them all without distinction.

*lines 13–14. When they had accepted that reverence from him and had reverenced that great sage in return, the thirty gods, delighted, returned to the highest heaven, along with their attendants.

line 15–1128. Once they had gone, Kākutstha, having descended from the Puṣpaka, then respectfully greeted Agastya, foremost of seers.

[Verse 6 elided—See notes]

7. After he had respectfully saluted that great sage, who seemed to glow with blazing energy, the lord of men received the greatest hospitality and took his seat.

8. The pot-born sage of great austerities and immense blazing energy said to him: "Welcome, Rāghava, foremost of men. It is fortunate that you have come.

9. "I hold you in high esteem for your many excellent virtues. A guest must be honored and, your majesty, you dwell in my heart.

10. "For the gods had informed me that you had come to kill that śūdra and that, through your righteousness, you have restored the brahman's son to life.

11. "Please spend the night here with me, Rāghava. At daybreak, you will go in the Puṣpaka to your own city.

12. "And please, dear Rāghava Kākutstha, favor me and accept this ornament, which was fashioned by Viśvakarman. It is celestial with its celestial beauty, and it shines with its own blazing radiance.

13. "For it is said that the giving away of something that has been given brings great benefits. Therefore, I would duly give it. Please accept it, bull among men."

14. And Rāma accepted the great sage's splendid celestial ornament, which resembled the blazing sun.

15. Once Rāma had accepted that unsurpassed ornament, he began to ask the sage how the celestial jewel had come to be his:

16. "How and from where, brahman, did the blessed one acquire this extremely marvelous and splendid thing, so filled with beauty? And who brought it?

17. "It is out of curiosity, brahman, that I ask you, who are so greatly illustrious. For you, sir, are the greatest treasure-house of many wonders."

18. As Kākutstha was speaking in this fashion, the sage said these words: "Listen, Rāma, to what took place long ago in a bygone Tretā Yuga."

The end of the sixty-seventh sarga of the Uttarakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 68

1. "Long ago, in that Tretā Yuga, there was a vast forest tract, a hundred leagues in every direction. It was devoid of birds and beasts.

2. "As I was performing severe austerities in an uninhabited region of the forest, dear boy, I wandered about that forest in order to explore it.

3. "I cannot describe the beauty of that forest with its succulent fruits and roots and with its many different kinds of trees.

4. "In the middle of that forest, there was a lake that was a league across. It was filled with red and blue lotuses and covered with waterweeds.

5. "It was truly like a wonder. It was magnificent, and its waters were pleasant to the taste. It was limpid, calm, and lovely, and it was filled with flocks of birds.

6. "And near that lake, there was a great and marvelous ashram. It was ancient and extremely sacred. But it was devoid of ascetics.

7. "I spent a summer night there, bull among men, and, rising early in the morning, went down to the lake.

8. "Then, at a certain spot, I spied a corpse. It was quite plump and showed no signs of decay. Still exuding a splendid vital glow, it was lying in that body of water.

9. "I stood there, on the shore of the lake, for some time, Lord Rāghava, pondering this matter and thinking, 'What can this be?'

10. "But then, after some time, I spied a magnificent celestial flying palace. Yoked to haṃsas and as swift as thought, it was a wonder to behold.

11. "And there in that flying palace, heroic delight of the Raghus, a thousand apsarases with celestial ornaments attentively waited upon a heavenly being. Some of them sang delightful songs, while others played musical instruments.

12. "Then, even as I watched, Rāma, delight of the Raghus, that heavenly being descended from the flying palace and began to eat the corpse.

13. "Then, when he had eaten duly and abundantly of that flesh to his heart's content, the heavenly being went down into the lake and began to wash.

14. "After having washed in the proper fashion, bull among men, the celestial being began to mount that excellent and splendid flying palace.

15. "Then, looking up at that godlike being as he mounted, I spoke words to him in this fashion, bull among men:

16. " 'Who are you, sir? And why, gentle sir, are you eating this abominable food? Please tell me.

17. " 'What an extraordinary thing—on the one hand, such a splendid being, virtually a god, and on the other, this abominable food! Gentle friend, I wish to hear about this truthfully.' "

The end of the sixty-eighth sarga of the Uttarakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 69

1. "When that heavenly being had heard the pleasant speech that I had spoken, he cupped his hands in reverence and replied thus, delight of the Raghus:

2. " 'Since you are asking me, twice-born brahman, listen to these inescapable events and how they led to both my felicity and my misery.

3. " 'Long ago my father, the illustrious and mighty Sudeva, was the king of Vidarbha and was renowned throughout the three worlds.

4. " 'Two sons were born to him, brahman, by his two wives. I am known as Śveta and the younger was Suratha.

5. " 'Then, when my father had ascended to heaven, the people consecrated me as king. And there, with great attentiveness, I ruled the kingdom righteously.

6. " 'And thus, brahman of excellent vows, thousands of years passed while I ruled the kingdom righteously, protecting my subjects.

7. " 'Having come to know the length of my life by virtue of a certain sign, foremost of twice-born brahmans, I retired to the forest, keeping my mortality in mind.

8. " 'And I entered this inaccessible forest devoid of beasts and birds in order to practice austerities in the lovely environs of the lake.

9. “‘After consecrating my brother, Suratha, in the kingdom as the lord of men, I came to this lake and practiced austerities for a long time.

10. “‘And after practicing the most severe austerities for three thousand years, great sage, I attained the unsurpassed Brahmaloka.

11. “‘But then, foremost of twice-born brahmans, while I was dwelling in heaven, hunger and thirst afflicted me. Because of that, supremely noble sage, my senses were reeling.

12. “‘I went to Grandfather Brahmā, who is foremost in the three worlds, and said: “Blessed one, the Brahmaloka should be free from hunger and thirst.

13. “‘“Of what action is this the outcome that I am nonetheless subjected to hunger and thirst? What shall be my food, O God. Tell me that, Grandfather.”

14. “‘But Grandfather Brahmā said to me: “Your food, son of Sudeva, will be your own sweet flesh. You must eat that perpetually.

15. “‘“While you were performing severe austerities, you nourished merely your own body. What is not sown, extremely wise Śveta, can never grow.

16. “‘“You did not give even the smallest donation in that forest frequented by creatures. It is because of that, my child, that, even though you have reached heaven, you are afflicted by hunger and thirst.

17. “‘“Now you must eat your own splendid body that has been well nourished with food and which will taste like the nectar of immortality. It will satisfy your hunger.

18. “‘“But, Śveta, when the very great seer, the unassailable Agastya, shall set foot in this forest, you shall be freed from this hideous fate.

19. “‘“For, gentle Śveta, he is able to save even the hosts of the gods, what to say of you, great-armed king, who are subject to hunger and thirst.”

20. “‘Having heard the pronouncement of the blessed God of gods, I take my own body as my abominable food, foremost among twice-born brahmans.

21. “‘I have been eating it, O brahman, for many multitudes of years, but still it never diminishes. And this, brahman-seer, is the ultimate satisfaction of my hunger.

22. “ ‘You must release me, who have fallen into this wretched state because of this hideous fate. For no one other than you, a twice-born sage born from a pot, could have come here.

23. “ ‘Please accept this ornament, gentle foremost of twice-born brahmans, for saving me. Please, brahman-seer, be gracious.’

24. “Upon hearing that heavenly being’s words, so laden with misery, I accepted that magnificent ornament for the sake of saving him.

25. “No sooner had I accepted that splendid ornament than the former human body of the royal seer vanished.

26. “Once that body had vanished, the king, that royal seer, with the greatest delight, once more departed for the highest heaven gratified and overjoyed.

27. “It was for this reason, Kākutstha, that that person, who was equal to Śakra, gave me this celestial ornament, marvelous to behold.”

The end of the sixty-ninth sarga of the Uttarakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 70

1. When Rāghava had heard that most astonishing speech of Agastya, he began to question him once again out of respect for him as a guru as well as out of his amazement.

2. “Blessed one, how did that fearsome forest where Śveta, the king of Vidarbha, practiced austerities come to be devoid of animals and birds?

3. “And how is it that in order to practice austerities he entered that forest that had become deserted, devoid of creatures, and without any people? I wish to hear this just as it happened.”

4. When that sage of supremely blazing energy had heard Rāma’s words, so filled with curiosity, he began to speak these words:

5. “Long ago, Rāma, in the Kṛta Yuga, Lord Manu wielded the rod of punishment. His son was the great Ikṣvāku, the increaser of his lineage.

6. “Manu established his invincible son in his former kingdom and said to him, ‘May you be the founder of royal lineages on earth.’

7. “And, Rāghava, the son promised his father, saying, ‘So be it.’ Then Manu, supremely delighted, spoke again:

8. " 'I am pleased, supremely illustrious son, there is no doubt that you shall be the founder. You must protect your subjects with the rod of punishment, but let that rod not be used without good cause.

9. " 'The rod of punishment, when employed properly and brought down upon men who have committed crimes, leads a king to heaven.

10. " 'Therefore, my great-armed son, you must be diligent with respect to the rod of punishment. For if you do this, the greatest righteousness will be yours.'

11. "When Manu had thus instructed his son copiously and attentively, he went in great happiness to the highest heaven, that is, the unsurpassed Brahmaloka.

12. "And once he had departed for the highest heaven, Ikṣvāku, of immeasurable splendor, was given over to brooding, thinking, 'How can I father sons?'

13. "Then, by means of various sacrificial rites, Manu's righteous son fathered a hundred sons, who were equal to the sons of the gods.

14. "Now, dear boy, delight of the Raghus, the youngest of them all was stupid and ignorant and did not obey his elder brothers.

15. "Foreseeing that the rod of punishment [daṇḍa] would inevitably fall upon the body of that dullard, his father gave him the name 'Daṇḍa.'

16. "Perceiving his son's terrible defect, Rāghava, tamer of your foes, he gave him a kingdom between the Vindhya and the Śaivala mountains.

17. "And so, Rāma, Daṇḍa became king there, and he founded an incomparable and unsurpassed city on the lovely slopes of the mountains.

18. "He gave that city the name Madhumanta, lord, and he chose Uśanas of excellent vows as his purohita.

19. "And thus the king, together with his purohita, ruled that kingdom, which was filled with happy people, as if it were the kingdom of the gods in heaven."

The end of the seventieth sarga of the Uttarakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 71

1. When the great pot-born seer had related this to Rāma, he continued with the next part of the story.

2. “And there, Kākutstha, for many tens of thousands of years the dull-witted Daṇḍa ruled that kingdom, which was free from all troubles.

3. “Now once, during the delightful month of Caitra, the king visited the charming ashram of Bhārgava.

4. “And there Daṇḍa spied Bhārgava’s daughter wandering in the woodlands. She was unsurpassed and had no equal on earth in beauty.

5. “Upon seeing her, that extremely dull-witted king was smitten by the arrows of Anañga and, in great agitation, he approached the girl and said these words:

6. “ ‘Where are you from, lovely, fair-hipped girl? And whose daughter are you? Smitten as I am by Anañga, I ask you, my fair-waisted one.’

7. “But even as the lustful king was speaking in this fashion, intoxicated in his infatuation, the Bhārgava girl replied to him with these courteous words:

8. “ ‘You must know me to be the eldest daughter of the godlike Bhārgava, tireless in action. My name, lord of kings, is Arajā, and I dwell here in the ashram.

9. “ ‘My father is your guru, lord of kings, and you are a disciple of that great sage. If he were to be angered, that sage of great austerities would inflict a very great calamity upon you.

10. “ ‘If, however, you are to do this with me according to the path of the virtuous, which is fixed according to righteousness, then, foremost of kings, you must petition my immensely glorious father.

11. “ ‘Otherwise, there would be dreadful consequences for you, since, with his anger, my father could burn up even the three worlds.’

12. “Now as Arajā was speaking in this fashion, Daṇḍa, smitten by the arrows of Kāma and intoxicated with desire, cupped his hands to his forehead and said to her:

13. “ ‘Be gracious, fair-hipped girl, you must not let this moment pass. For, my fair-faced one, my very life is being torn apart on your account.

14. “ ‘As long as I have you, let me suffer death or dreadful sin. So love me, timid one, your lover, who loves you to distraction.’

15. “Having spoken in this fashion, the powerful king seized the girl forcibly with both arms and began to rape her at will as she struggled.

16. “Once he had done this evil, very dreadful, and extremely horrifying thing, Daṇḍa went immediately to the unsurpassed city of Madhumanta.

17. "But as for Arajā, weeping and terrified, she waited for her father not far from the ashram."

The end of the seventy-first sarga of the Uttarakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 72

1. "Now after a short time the divine seer of immeasurable splendor, afflicted with hunger and surrounded by his disciples, returned to his ashram having heard about what had happened.

2. "He spied Arajā. Desolate and covered with blood, she had lost her radiance like the moonlight swallowed up in the morning by the red dawn.

3. "And his anger flared up—all the more so as he was afflicted by hunger—as if to consume the three worlds, and he said this to his disciples:

4. " 'Now witness the destruction—as dreadful to look upon as a raging flame of fire—of this perverse and ignorant Daṇḍa.

5. " 'This evil fool, who dared to touch the blazing flame of fire, eater of oblations, now faces destruction, along with his followers.

6. " 'Since this fool has committed such a sin, so dreadful to contemplate, he must therefore reap the fruit of his evil act.

7. " 'In seven nights this stupid king, who performs such evil acts, will meet his death, along with his retainers, troops, and mounts.

8. " 'With an immense dust storm, Indra, the chastiser of Pāka, will parch that fool's kingdom for a hundred leagues all around.

9. " 'Every living thing that is here, both fixed and moving, will be completely destroyed by that immense dust storm.

10. " 'After seven nights, every living thing throughout the length and breadth of Daṇḍa's realm will become invisible as if made of dust.'

11. "When, inflamed with anger, he had spoken in this fashion, he told the people who dwelt in the ashram, 'You must now stay beyond the borders of this country.'

12. "When the people who dwelt in the ashram had heard those words of Uśanas, they departed from Daṇḍa's realm and made their residence outside of it.

13. "After he had spoken to the sages in this fashion, he said this to Arajā: 'You must stay here in the ashram, you stupid girl, engaged in profound meditation.

14. " 'This lake, however, will remain brilliantly clear for the distance of a league around. Enjoying it without anxiety, Arajā, you must wait here for the proper time.

15. " 'And whatever creatures may come to dwell for the night in your vicinity will be forever spared from the dust storm.'

16. "After Bhārgava had spoken in this fashion, he took up his residence elsewhere. And after seven days, just as that expounder of Brahman had predicted, everything was reduced to ashes.

17. "This is that very realm of Daṇḍa lying between the peaks of the Vindhya and Śaivala mountains. It was cursed by the brahman-seer long ago when that violation of righteousness had been committed.

18. "And ever since that time, Kākutstha, it has been called the Daṇḍaka forest, while the area where the ascetics stayed likewise became 'Janasthāna.'

19. "I have now told you all of that about which you asked me, Rāghava. Now, hero, the time for performing the sandhyā rites is passing.

20. "All around us, all these great seers, their water pots filled, have performed their ablutions and are worshiping the sun.

21. "And those seers, the foremost of brahmans, all together are hymning the sun as it is about to set, Rāma. Now go and perform your ablutions."

The end of the seventy-second sarga of the Uttarakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 73

1. Heeding the words of the seer, Rāma approached that holy lake, frequented by apsarases, to perform the sandhyā rites.

2. After having completed his ablutions and having performed the evening sandhyā rites, Rāma entered the ashram of the great pot-born sage.

3. And Agastya arranged many kinds of fruits and roots as well as herbs and wholesome vegetables for his meal.

4. When the foremost of men had eaten that food, which was like the nectar of immortality, he spent the night there, pleased and satisfied.

5. After rising early in the morning and performing his daily rituals, the foremost of the Raghus, tamer of his foes, approached the seer for permission to depart.

6. Respectfully saluting the great pot-born seer, Rāma said: "I would depart, and so I beg of you, please grant me leave.

7. "I am blessed and I am graced by the sight of such a great personage as you, and I shall return here to see you in order to purify myself."

8. As Kākutstha was thus speaking these words—so marvelous to apprehend—the sage, so rich in austerities, who viewed all through the eye of righteousness, was supremely delighted, and he said:

9. "Your words, Rāma, are extremely wonderful, each of their syllables mellifluous. It is you alone, delight of the Raghus, who purify all the worlds.

10. "And all who see you, Rāma, even for a mere moment, are purified and attain heaven where they are worshiped by the divinities.

11. "But those living beings on earth who look upon you with an inimical eye are struck down by the rod of Yama and go straight to hell.

12. "So go safely and confidently on your journey, free from all dangers. Rule the kingdom in accordance with righteousness. For you, sir, are the recourse of all the world."

13. Addressed in this fashion by the sage, the wise king extended his arms with his hands cupped in reverence and respectfully saluted that seer of holy conduct.

14. Then, after respectfully saluting that foremost of sages and all those sages, so rich in austerities, he calmly mounted the Puṣpaka, which was adorned with gold.

15. And as he, who was like great Indra, was departing, the hosts of sages on every side honored him with blessings, just as the immortal gods might thousand-eyed Indra.

16. Comfortably mounted in the Puṣpaka, which was adorned with gold, Rāma resembled the hare-marked moon abutting the clouds at the onset of the rainy season.

17. Then, at midday, Kākutstha, who was honored all along the way, reached Ayodhyā and descended from the flying palace.

18. After dismissing the resplendent Puṣpaka, which moved at its master's will, Rāma spoke these words to the gatekeeper who was posted in the inner courtyard:

19. "Go to swift-striding Lakṣmaṇa and Bharata, report my arrival, and summon them without delay."

The end of the seventy-third sarga of the Uttarakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 74

1. When the gatekeeper had heard that speech of Rāma, who was tireless in action, he summoned the two princes and then informed Rāma.

2. Upon seeing that his beloved Bharata and Lakṣmaṇa had arrived, Rāma embraced them and spoke these words:

3. "I have faithfully accomplished this unsurpassed task for the twice-born brahman. And therefore, Rāghavas, I now wish to firmly establish the bulwark of righteousness.

4. "I wish to perform the unsurpassed rājasūya together with both of you, who are my second selves, for in this lies everlasting righteousness.

5. " For it was by sacrificing with the rājasūya rite, accompanied by excellent oblations and excellent subsidiary rites, that Mitra, destroyer of his foes, attained the position of Varuṇa.

6. "And it was by sacrificing with the rājasūya rite in accordance with righteousness that Soma, who knew righteousness, attained fame among all the worlds and an eternal domain.

7. "You must carefully consider with me what would be best at this time, and you must state prudently what would be beneficial in the time to come."

8. When Bharata, skillful in speech, had heard these words of Rāghava, he cupped his hands in reverence and said these words:

9. "In you, noble brother, resides the highest righteousness. On you rests the entire earth, the bearer of wealth. And in you, great-armed prince of measureless valor, abides glory.

10. "Just as the immortal gods look upon Prajāpati, all the great kings, those protectors of the earth, look upon you as the lord of the world as do we as well.

11. "And the people regard you as their father, immensely powerful king. Rāghava, you are the refuge of all living beings on earth as well.

12. "Therefore, your majesty, how can you undertake such a sacrifice, which would witness the destruction of the royal lineages on earth?

13. "For in the performance of that, your majesty, the annihilation—like the universal destruction—of all men on earth who have attained manly valor will come to pass.

14. "Tiger among men, you who are of unequaled valor through your virtues should not destroy the earth for it is already under your sway."

15. When truly valorous Rāma had heard that speech of Bharata, which seemed to consist of the nectar of immortality, he experienced unequaled delight.

16. And he said these splendid words to the increaser of Kaikeyī's joy: "I am indeed pleased and gratified by your words this day.

17. "These words in conformity with righteousness, which you have boldly uttered, tiger among men, will be the salvation of the earth.

18. "Because of your excellent speech, knower of righteousness, I will surely desist from that intention of mine, which was to perform that foremost of rites, the rājasūya.

19. "Protection of the people is a duty of kings on a par with sacrifice. Therefore, I shall heed your words, which were so well spoken and finely articulated."

The end of the seventy-fourth sarga of the Uttarakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 75

1. Once Rāma and great Bharata had spoken in this fashion, Lakṣmaṇa, too, spoke splendid words to the delight of the Raghus:

2. "The great sacrifice, the aśvamedha, purifies one of all sins. May this foremost of sacrifices, which is both incomparable and sanctifying, please you.

3. "For we have heard this ancient tale concerning the very great Śakra Vāsava. Once, when he was overwhelmed by the sin of killing a brahman, he was purified by the aśvamedha.

4. "They say that long ago, great-armed brother, when the gods and the asuras had come together, there was a great descendant of Diti named Vṛtra, who was highly regarded throughout the worlds.

5. "He was a hundred leagues in breadth and three times that in height, and, in his affection, he looked fondly upon all the three worlds.

6. "Knowing righteousness and proper conduct and perfected through his intellect, he ruled the entire earth single-mindedly and in accordance with righteousness.

7. "At that time, while he was ruling, the earth produced every desirable thing. And the roots and fruits that were produced were succulent.

8. "That great being's land was extremely rich, and it brought forth crops without cultivation. And such was the prosperous kingdom, wonderful to behold, that he enjoyed.

9. "Then an idea occurred to him: 'I must practice unexcelled austerities. For austerity is the greatest good. For austerity is the greatest happiness.'

10. "Having set his eldest son as supreme ruler over his subjects, he performed severe austerities, thus causing anxiety to all the divinities.

11. "Now, while Vṛtra was engaged in austerities, Vāsava was extremely distressed. He approached Viṣṇu and said these words:

12. "'Through practicing austerities, O great-armed Lord, Vṛtra has conquered the worlds. For he is mighty and righteous and I am unable to oppose him.

13. "'If he should continue to perform austerities, O Lord of the gods, then, as long as the worlds may endure, they will remain under his control.

14. "'And yet, immensely powerful Lord, you ignore that supremely exalted one. For surely Vṛtra could not survive for even a moment if you were angry with him.

15. "'For ever since he attained this amicable relationship with you, Viṣṇu, he has enjoyed the lordship of the worlds.

16. "'Immensely illustrious Lord, you must extend your grace to the world. For it is only through your action that the whole world may be at peace and free from dissolution.

17. "'All the gods, denizens of heaven, look to you, Viṣṇu. You must render assistance to them through the great feat of killing Vṛtra.

18. " 'Indeed, you have always rendered assistance to these great divinities. This feat is impossible for others. You, sir, are the refuge of those who have no other refuge.' "

The end of the seventy-fifth sarga of the Uttarakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 76

1. When Rāma, the destroyer of his foes, had heard those words of Lakṣmaṇa, he said to him, "Please tell me in full about the slaying of Vṛtra."

2. Addressed in this fashion by Rāghava, Lakṣmaṇa, increaser of Sumitrā's joy, resumed his narration of that celestial tale.

3. "Once Viṣṇu had heard those words of thousand-eyed Indra and of all the gods, denizens of heaven, he said this to all of them, who were led by Indra:

4. " 'I have long been bound by ties of affection to the very great Vṛtra. Because of that, I will surely not kill that great asura as a favor to you.

5. " 'However, I must certainly fulfill your ultimate desire. Therefore I shall tell you the means whereby you shall slay Vṛtra.

6. " 'I shall divide myself into three parts. In this way, there is no doubt that thousand-eyed Indra will kill Vṛtra.

7. " 'Let one portion enter Indra Vāsava, the second the vajra, and the third the earth. After that, Śakra will slay Vṛtra.'

8. "Now as the Lord of the gods was speaking in this fashion, the gods spoke these words: 'Without a doubt, O slayer of the daityas, it will happen thus, just as you say.

9. " 'May blessings be upon you. We shall depart, eagerly anticipating the slaying of the asura Vṛtra. O supremely noble Lord, endow Vāsava with your own blazing energy.'

10. "Then all the great gods, led by thousand-eyed Indra, proceeded to the forest where the great asura Vṛtra was.

11. "They saw the foremost of the asuras engaged in austerities. Suffused with blazing energy, he seemed as if to consume the three worlds and to scorch the very heavens.

12–13. "At the mere sight of that foremost of asuras, the gods were terrified. And just as they were thinking, 'How will we kill him? How will we not suffer defeat?' thousand-eyed Indra, smasher of citadels, seized his vajra with both hands and hurled it at Vṛtra's head.

14. "As it fell on Vṛtra's head, that fearsome weapon blazed, as it were, with great flames like the fire at the end of time. Seared by that weapon, the whole world was terrified.

15. "But, brooding about his unimaginable killing of Vṛtra, the illustrious lord of the wise gods fled to the ends of the earth.

16. "Nonetheless, even as Indra fled, the sin of brahmahatyā pursued him and fell upon his limbs. Then misery took hold of Indra.

17. "Their enemy had been slain, but since they had lost Indra, the gods, with Agni as their leader, worshiped Viṣṇu, the foremost in the three worlds, again and again saying:

18. " 'You are the highest refuge, O God. You are Lord and the firstborn of the world. It is for the sake of the protection of all beings that you took the form of Viṣṇu.

19. " 'You have slain Vṛtra, but the sin of brahmahatyā is afflicting Vāsava. Please, tiger among the gods, declare the means for his liberation.'

20. "When Viṣṇu had heard these words of the gods, he said: 'Let Śakra sacrifice to me alone. Then I shall purify that the wielder of the vajra.

21. " 'Once Indra, the chastiser of Pāka, has sacrificed to me with the sacred aśvamedha, he shall be free from fear and he will once more attain the lordship of the gods.'

22. "When he had instructed the gods in this fashion with this speech, which was like the nectar of immortality, Viṣṇu, the Lord of the gods, being lauded, returned to heaven."

The end of the seventy-sixth sarga of the Uttarakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 77

1. When Lakṣmaṇa had thus described the entire slaying of Vṛtra, omitting nothing, that foremost of men began to tell the rest of the story, saying:

2. "Then, once the immensely powerful Vṛtra, the terror of the gods, had been slain, Śakra, the slayer of Vṛtra, overwhelmed with the sin of brahmahatyā, was unable to regain consciousness.

3. "Having resorted to the ends of the earth, he lay there, unconscious and insensate, writhing like a serpent.

4. "Now after thousand-eyed Indra had vanished, the world was in a terrible state. The earth looked devastated, parched, its forests desiccated.

5. "Ponds, lakes, and rivers were empty of water, and there was distress on the part of creatures caused by the drought.

6. "But as this world was wasting away, the gods, their minds agitated, performed the sacrifice previously prescribed by Viṣṇu.

7. "Then all the hosts of the gods, together with their preceptors and the seers, proceeded together to the place where Indra lay, dazed with fear.

8. "When they saw thousand-eyed Indra, dazed by the sin of brahmahatyā, they placed that lord of the gods at their head and performed the aśvamedha.

9. "Then, O lord of men, a very grand aśvamedha proceeded for the sake of the purification of great Mahendra from the sin of brahmahatyā.

10. "But then, at the conclusion of the sacrifice, Brahmahatyā herself approached those great ones and said these words: 'Where, then, will you establish a residence for me?'

11. "Gratified and filled with delight, the gods then said to her, 'You must divide yourself by yourself into four parts, O unassailable lady.'

12. "When Brahmahatyā, with whom it was impossible to abide, had heard the speech of the great gods, there, in their presence, she requested a residence somewhere else:

13. " 'With one portion, I will dwell in rivers when they are filled with water, and with the second, in trees. This is the truth I am telling you.

14. " 'And as for my third portion, with that I will dwell for three nights in women endowed with youth and filled with pride, as a crusher of their pride.

15. " 'And, O you bulls among the gods, with my fourth portion, I will possess those who intentionally kill innocent brahmans.'

16. "Then the gods replied to her, 'Everything shall be just as you say, O you with whom it is impossible to abide. May you prosper according to your desire.'

17. "Then, filled with joy, the gods paid homage to thousand-eyed Indra. And thus did Vāsava become free from anxiety and purified of sin.

18. "Once thousand-eyed Indra had regained his position, the world became tranquil. And then Śakra worshiped that sacrifice of marvelous appearance.

19. "For such is the power of the aśvamedha, O delight of the Raghus. Therefore, immensely fortunate king, you should offer sacrifice with the aśvamedha."

The end of the seventy-seventh sarga of the Uttarakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 78

1. When Rāghava of immense blazing energy had heard the speech that Lakṣmaṇa had spoken, he, who was himself skilled in speech, smiled and responded with these words:

2. "It is entirely and exactly as you say, Lakṣmaṇa, with respect to the killing of Vṛtra and the benefits of the aśvamedha.

3. "For I have heard, gentle brother, that, long ago, the extremely righteous and majestic Ila, the son of Kardama Prajāpati, was the lord of the country of Bāhli.

4. "That greatly illustrious king brought the entire earth under his control. And, tiger among men, he ruled his kingdom as if it were his son.

5–6. "Afflicted with fear of him, gentle delight of the Raghus, the supremely noble gods, the sons of Diti, the great asuras, the great serpents, the rākṣasas, the gandharvas, and the extremely great yakṣas paid him homage. Indeed, the three worlds themselves feared that great king when he was angry.

7. "For such was the king of the Bāhlīkas. He was unwavering in righteousness and in might. He was highly illustrious and supremely exalted in intellect.

8. "Once, in the charming month of Caitra, that great-armed king, together with his retainers, troops, and mounts, conducted a hunt in a beautiful forest.

9. "In that forest the king slaughtered animals in their hundreds and thousands, but even after killing them, the great king was not satisfied.

10. "Slaughtering ten thousand animals of various kinds, the great king wandered into the region where Mahāsena was born.

11. “But there the unassailable Lord of the god among gods, Hara, accompanied by all his attendants, was making love to the daughter of the king of the mountains.

12. “There, near a mountain waterfall, Umā’s lord, whose banner bears the lord of cattle, had turned himself into a woman in his desire to delight the Goddess.

13. “And whichever creatures in that region of the forest bore a masculine gender, along with everything else that was there, came to have a feminine gender.

14. “At that very juncture, King Ila, the son of Kardama, wandered into that region, slaughtering thousands of animals.

15. “And there, delight of the Raghus, he saw that everything, including the serpents, beasts, and birds, had been turned into females and that he himself, as well as his attendants, had become women.

16. “When he saw himself in such a condition, he became immensely distressed. But when he realized that this was the work of Umā’s lord, he was terrified.

17. “Then the king, together with his servants, troops, and mounts, took refuge with the great God, black-throated Śiva of the matted locks.

18. “That beneficent and illustrious Lord, together with the Goddess, laughed, and, as he was a granter of boons, he said these words to the son of Prajāpati:

19. “ ‘Get up! Get up, immensely powerful royal seer Kārdameya! Gentle prince of excellent vows, choose any boon other than manhood.’

20. “Thus was the grief-stricken king denied by the great God; but since he had become a woman, he would accept no other boon from that foremost of gods.

21. “Then, stricken with still greater grief, the king wholeheartedly prostrated himself before the great Goddess, daughter of the king of the mountains, and said:

*22. “ ‘Goddess of boons! Granter of boons! You are the most beautiful woman in all the worlds. O gentle Goddess, the vision of whom is never in vain, I appeal to you. Homage to you.’

23. “Understanding what was in the heart of the royal seer, the Goddess, with the approval of Rudra, replied with these auspicious words in the presence of Hara:

24. " 'The God will be the granter of half of the boon, and similarly I will be of the other half. Therefore you may choose half of womanhood and half of manhood for as long as you wish.'

25. "When the king had heard the Goddess's unsurpassed and most marvelous boon, he was delighted at heart and then said these words:

26. " 'If, O Goddess, you who are unequaled in the world for beauty, are pleased with me, then may I once again be a man for a month, after first having become a woman for a month.'

27. "When the Goddess of the lovely face realized what he desired, she replied with these auspicious words: 'It shall be so.

28. " 'Your majesty, when you are a man, you will not remember your having been a woman, and when, in the following month, you become a woman, you will not remember your ever having been a man.'

29. "And in this way, the king Ila Kārdami, having been a man for a month, would then, for a month, become a woman named Ilā, the most beautiful woman in the triple world."

The end of the seventy-eighth sarga of the Uttarakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 79

1. When Lakṣmaṇa and Bharata had heard the story of Ila as it had been narrated by Rāma, they were extremely amazed.

2. Cupping their hands in reverence toward Rāma, they then asked once more for a detailed account of the particular situation of that great king.

3. "How did that king endure his misfortune while he was a woman? On the other hand, what sort of life did he lead when he was a man?"

4. When Kākutstha had heard their words, so filled with curiosity, he related how it had fared with that king.

5. "Having become the most beautiful woman in the world, she passed that very first month surrounded by those women who had previously been his attendants.

6. "Soon she, the most beautiful woman in the world, her eyes like lotus petals, wandered on foot deep into that forest, which was filled with trees, shrubs, and creepers.

7. "Then, having left all the mounts behind, Ilā enjoyed herself throughout a broad mountain meadow.

8. "Now in that forested region, not far from the mountain, there was an extraordinarily beautiful lake frequented by flocks of various birds.

9–10. "In the middle of it, Ilā then spied Soma's son, Budha, who was blazing with the effulgence of his body, like the full moon newly risen. Engaged in severe and difficult austerities there in the water, he was glorious, unfettered, and in the full flush of youth.

11. "Together with her companions, who had previously been men but had now become women, O delight of the Raghus, she, in her astonishment, ruffled the entire lake.

12. "But as for Budha, no sooner had he caught sight of her than he was afflicted by the arrows of Kāma. Unable to control himself, he began to tremble in the water.

13. "Gazing at Ilā, whose beauty exceeded any in the triple world, he fell to thinking: 'Who can she, who surpasses even a goddess, be?

14. " 'Never have I seen anyone endowed with such beauty even among the goddesses, the apsarases, or the women of the great serpents and the asuras.

15. " 'If she is not the wife of another, she would be a fitting one for me.' With this thought in mind, he came out of the water to the shore.

16. "Once he had caught his breath, that righteous sage then called out to four of the young women, and they, in turn, greeted him respectfully.

17. "The righteous sage asked them, 'To whom does this woman, the most beautiful in the world, belong? And why has she come here? Tell me the truth at once.'

18. "And when those women had heard his speech, so pleasant and sweet, with its sweet syllables, they all replied with sweet voices:

19. " 'This fair-hipped woman continues to be our leader. Lacking a husband, she wanders with us through the depths of the forest.'

20. "When he had heard the women's speech with its obscure wording, the twice-born Budha recited the sacred āvartinī spell.

21. "When he had thus come to know the entire matter concerning that king, just as it had come about, that bull among sages said to all of those women:

22. “ ‘Here the fortunate kiṃpuruṣas dwell on the slopes of the mountain. You too shall dwell on this mountain, and so you must arrange your living quarters.

23. “ ‘All of you women will forever live on roots, leaves, and fruits, and you shall surely obtain kiṃpuruṣas as your husbands.’

24. “No sooner had that large group of women heard that speech of the son of Soma than they were turned into kiṃpuruṣa women. They then inhabited that mountain in many different places.”

The end of the seventy-ninth sarga of the Uttarakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 80

1. And then, when Lakṣmaṇa and Bharata had heard about how those women had become kiṃpuruṣas, they both said, “How wonderful!” to Rāma, the lord of the people.

2. Righteous and illustrious Rāma then resumed the tale of Prajāpati’s son Ila, saying:

3. “When Budha, the foremost of seers, had seen that all of those kinnara women had dispersed, he smiled gently and addressed that beautiful woman:

4. “ ‘O fair-faced woman, I am the dearly beloved son of Soma. Please love me with devotion, fair-hipped one, and with tender regard.’

5. “When Ilā, who was cut off from her own retinue in that deserted place, had heard those words of his, she replied to that great planetary divinity of lovely radiance:

6. “ ‘I do as I please, gentle sir, and I am at your disposal. Command me, son of Soma, and do as you desire.’

7. “When the son of the moon god had heard that wonderful response of hers, he was overcome with excitement, and, filled with desire, he made love with her.

8. “And for Budha, who, filled with desire, was passionately making love to fair-faced Ilā, the month of Mādhava passed as if it were a mere instant.

9. “Then, after a full month, Ila, Prajāpati’s majestic son, whose face was like the full moon, awoke in their bed.

10. “And there King Ila spied Soma’s son, engaged in austerities in the lake, standing without any support, his arms raised, and he said:

11. “ ‘Blessed one, I came to this inaccessible mountain, along with my retinue, but I do not see that army. Where in the world have those followers of mine gone?’

12. “When he had heard that speech of the royal seer, who had lost his memory, Budha responded with beguiling words, soothing him with his resonant voice:

13. “ ‘Your retainers were annihilated by a massive hailstorm, while you, afflicted with fear of the wind and rain, slept in the ashram.

14. “ ‘Take heart, bless you. For you may dwell here as you please, hero, free from fear and anxiety, living on fruits and roots.’

15. “Comforted by that speech but saddened at the death of his retainers, the immensely illustrious king replied with these splendid words:

16. “ ‘I shall renounce my kingdom, for, deprived of my retainers, I cannot continue even for a moment. You must please grant me permission, brahman.

17. “ ‘My eldest son, who is known as Śaśabindu, is immensely illustrious, O brahman. Devoted to righteousness, he will take over my kingdom.

18. “ ‘For I cannot bear to go there and speak those dreadful words to the happy wives of my retainers, O sage of immense blazing energy.’

19. “As the lord among kings was speaking in this fashion, Budha comfortingly uttered these extraordinary and wonderful words: ‘Please choose to remain here.

20. “ ‘You must not grieve, immensely powerful Kārdameya. When you have dwelt here for a year, I will bring about something of benefit to you.’

21. “When Ila had heard those words of Budha, who was tireless in action, he made up his mind to stay just as that exponent of the doctrine of Brahman had urged.

22. “Thus he, having become a lovely woman for one month, made love constantly, while as a man in alternate months, he set his mind on righteousness.

23. “Then, in the ninth month, she, fair-hipped Ilā, gave birth by the son of Soma to a son, Purūravas, the child of her own body.

24. "As soon as her immensely powerful son, who looked just like Budha, was born, the fair-hipped Ilā placed him in his father's hands.

25. "And as for the self-controlled Budha, after comforting the lord of men who had now become male, he entertained him with tales exemplary of righteousness."

The end of the eightieth sarga of the Uttarakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 81

1. When Rāma had spoken in this fashion about the miraculous birth of Purūravas, Lakṣmaṇa and the extremely illustrious Bharata spoke once again:

2. "When she, the beloved of Soma's son, had dwelt with him for a year, what did she do then? Please tell us just as it happened, foremost of men."

3. When Rāma had heard the sweetness of the words of those two who were inquiring of him, he continued the story of Prajāpati's son.

4–5. "Then, after heroic Ila had once again become a man, supremely wise and immensely illustrious Budha summoned the extremely noble Saṃvarta, Bhṛgu's son Cyavana, the sage Ariṣṭanemin, the delightful Pramodana, and the sage Durvāsas.

6. "When he had brought them all together, the eloquent sage, well composed through his self-control, addressed his guests, all of whom perceived the highest truth.

7. " 'This is the great-armed King Ila, son of Kardama. You all know what happened to him. Now you must do what would be best for him.'

8. "While they were conversing, Kardama of immense blazing energy arrived at the ashram together with some eminent twice-born brahmans.

9. "Pulastya, Kratu, Vaṣaṭkāra, and Oṃkāra of great blazing energy came to the ashram.

10. "All of them were delighted at heart at meeting one another, and desiring only the best for the lord of Bāhli, they then individually offered him advice.

11. "Now, for the sake of his son, Kardama spoke words that were extremely beneficial: 'Twice-born brahmans, hear my words as to what would be best for the king.

12. " 'I can see no remedy other than bull-bannered Śiva. And, indeed, no sacrifice other than the aśvamedha is as dear to that great God.

13. " 'Therefore, let us all sacrifice to the unassailable God on the king's behalf.' Addressed in this fashion by Kardama, all those bulls among twice-born brahmans agreed to that sacrifice in order to propitiate Rudra.

14. "The royal seer named Marutta, the conqueror of enemy citadels and a disciple of Saṃvarta, performed the sacrifice.

15. "The great sacrifice took place near Budha's ashram, and the greatly illustrious Rudra was supremely gratified.

16. "Then, upon the completion of the sacrifice, Umā's lord was pleased and, with the greatest delight, said the following with regard to Ilā to all those twice-born brahmans:

17. " 'I am pleased with the aśvamedha and with your devotion, O foremost of twice-born brahmans. What excellent favor may I do for this lord of Bāhli?'

18. "As the Lord of the gods was speaking in this fashion, those twice-born brahmans, well composed, further propitiated him so that Ilā might become a man.

19. "Then, delighted at heart, Rudra restored his manhood. And having granted that to Ilā, the immensely illustrious God vanished.

20. "Once the aśvamedha had been completed and Hara had vanished, all those farsighted, twice-born brahmans departed just as they had come.

21. "And as for King Ila, having left Bāhli, he founded the glorious and unsurpassed city of Pratiṣṭhāna in the middle country.

22. "But as for Śaśabindu, that conqueror of enemy citadels, he became king in Bāhli, while Prajāpati's mighty son Ila was king in Pratiṣṭhāna.

23. "In time, Ila attained the unsurpassed Brahmaloka, and King Purūravas Aila inherited Pratiṣṭhāna.

24. "For such is the power of the aśvamedha, O bulls among men, that Ila, having been a woman, regained his manhood and other things that were difficult to obtain as well."

The end of the eighty-first sarga of the Uttarakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 82

1. When immeasurably radiant Kākutstha had related this to his two brothers, he once more addressed to Lakṣmaṇa these words in keeping with righteousness:

2–3. "Lakṣmaṇa, once I have summoned Vasiṣṭha, Vāmadeva, Jābāli, Kaśyapa, and all the other preeminent twice-born brahmans who are experts in the aśvamedha, and once I have taken counsel with them, I shall, with great concentration, release a horse endowed with all the auspicious signs."

4. When he had heard those words spoken by Rāghava, Lakṣmaṇa, acting quickly, summoned all those twice-born brahmans and presented them to Rāghava.

5. When they had seen the highly unassailable Rāghava, who resembled a god and who was respectfully bowing at their feet, they honored him with blessings.

6. Cupping his hands in reverence, Rāghava then addressed those foremost among the twice-born brahmans in words concerning the aśvamedha that were in keeping with righteousness.

7. When Rāma had heard the wonderful words concerning the aśvamedha on the part of the foremost among the twice-born brahmans, he was extremely pleased.

8. Having secured their approval, Rāma said to Lakṣmaṇa: "Great-armed prince, send for the great Sugrīva, saying to him:

9. " 'Bless you, please come quickly, together with the great tawny monkeys and many of their dependents, in order to participate in this greatest of sacrifices.'

10. "And let great-armed Vibhīṣaṇa, traveling swiftly, attend the aśvamedha accompanied by many rākṣasas, who can travel anywhere at will.

11. "And, tiger among men, let those kings who are eager to please me come quickly with their retinues to the unsurpassed sacrificial ground.

12. "Moreover, Lakṣmaṇa, you must invite to the aśvamedha all those twice-born brahmans, wholly devoted to righteousness, who dwell in distant lands.

13. "And, great-armed prince, let the seers, those treasure stores of asceticism, be summoned as well as the great seers—together with their wives—who dwell in distant lands.

14. "Great-armed prince, please give instructions for a vast sacrificial enclosure on the banks of the Gomatī, in the Naimiṣa forest, for it is unsurpassed in holiness.

15. "And, immensely powerful prince, let a hundred thousand cartloads of the finest rice and ten thousand cartloads of sesame seeds and mudga beans go on ahead.

16. "Let the immensely wise Bharata go on ahead accompanying many tens of millions in gold coins and more than a billion in silver.

17–19. "Indeed, let the immensely wise Bharata go on ahead, placing before him rows of shops along the way, all the actors and dancers, the townsfolk young and old, twice-born brahmans in deep concentration, skilled workmen, highly expert craftsmen, all my mothers, the princes' womenfolk, and a golden image of my wife, one fit for consecration at the sacrificial rite."

The end of the eighty-second sarga of the Uttarakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 83

1. When Bharata's elder brother had swiftly sent ahead all the sacrificial requisites, omitting nothing, he released a piebald stallion marked with the auspicious signs.

2. And then, once he had placed Lakṣmaṇa, together with the ṛtvij priests, in charge of the horse, Kākutstha proceeded with his army to the Naimiṣa forest.

3. And when great-armed Rāma saw the superlative and marvelous sacrificial enclosure, he experienced unequaled delight, and he cried, "How magnificent!"

4. While Rāma was dwelling in the Naimiṣa forest, all the lords of men came from every kingdom and Rāma honored them.

5. The immensely illustrious foremost of men ordered costly royal pavilions for those great kings together with their retinues.

6. And Bharata, together with Śatrughna, then quickly gave food, drink, and garments to those great kings and their retinues.

7. And all the great monkeys, along with Sugrīva, humbly waited upon the brahmans.

8. Vibhīṣaṇa, too, surrounded by many garlanded rākṣasas, waited upon the seers of fierce austerities as their servant.

9. And thus, in strict accordance with the injunctions, that sacrifice, the aśvamedha, commenced. Meanwhile, the horse proceeded to wander under the protection of Lakṣmaṇa.

10. While the great king's aśvamedha was going on, there was no cry other than, "Give confidently and freely until all who ask are satisfied." And it was seen that the monkeys and the rākṣasas gave accordingly.

11. And there at the king's preeminent sacrifice, which was thronged with happy and well-nourished people, there was no one who was unwashed, unhappy, or underfed.

12. Even the great seers there who had lived a long time could not recall such a sacrifice that had been adorned with such an abundance of gifts.

13. Although silver, gold, jewels, and garments were continually being given away, there appeared to be no end of them.

14. "Such a sacrifice has never been seen before, even on the part of Śakra, Soma, Yama, or Varuṇa," so said those treasure-houses of austerity.

15. The monkeys were stationed everywhere, as were the rākṣasas, and, their hands full, they gave clothing and wealth generously to those who desired them.

16. Such was the sacrifice, replete with every virtue, of that lion among kings. It continued for more than a year and was in no way deficient.

The end of the eighty-third sarga of the Uttarakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 84

1. While that preeminent and marvelous sacrifice was proceeding, as has been described, the bull among sages, Vālmīki, quickly arrived, along with his disciples.

2. When he had viewed that heavenly sacrifice, so marvelous to behold, he had some charming leaf huts constructed a little apart from the encampments of the seers.

3–4. Delighted, he then said to his two disciples: "Go and, with great concentration and with the greatest joy, sing the poem, the Rāmāyaṇa, in its entirety in the holy encampments of the seers, in the dwellings of the brahmans, on the royal highways and byways, and at the dwellings of the kings.

5. "But you must especially sing it right before the officiating priests near the entrance to Rāma's dwelling, where the sacrifice is going on.

6. "You must keep on singing, pausing only from time to time to eat the various sweet fruits that grow on the hilltops here.

7. "For indeed, in eating these fruits and these especially delicious roots, dear boys, you will experience no fatigue and can stay clear of the city.

8. "And if Rāma, the lord of the earth, should summon you to perform in the presence of the assembled seers, then let the singing commence.

9. "With the greatest delight, you must sing twenty sargas each day according to the several tempos, just as I taught you earlier.

10. "And you must not harbor even the slightest greediness in expectation of wealth. For of what use is wealth to ashram dwellers, who partake of only fruits and roots?

11. "But if Kākutstha should ask you, 'Whose sons are you?' you must speak thus to that lord of men, saying, 'We are disciples of Vālmīki.'

12. "While playing on these very melodious strings and their frets, as I showed you earlier, you should sing most sweetly and confidently.

13. "You must sing it from the beginning, showing no disrespect for the king. For the king is by rights the father of all beings.

14. "Therefore, tomorrow morning, you two, delighted at heart and with great concentration, should sweetly sing this song to the accompaniment of both stringed and percussion instruments."

15. Then, when the supremely noble and highly illustrious seer Vālmīki Prācetasa had repeatedly instructed them in this fashion, he fell silent.

16. The two princes, having been properly prepared though the guidance of the Bhārgava, just as were the Aśvins, took to heart those splendid words spoken by the seer, and, filled with anticipation, they passed the night comfortably.

The end of the eighty-fourth sarga of the Uttarakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 85

1. When the night had given way to dawn, the two princes bathed, made their oblations into the fire, eater of oblations, and then sang in place after place, just as they had been instructed to do earlier by the seer.

2–3. Kākutstha heard about that narrative of his past adventures in various lands and about the unprecedented mode of recitation, which was ornamented by singing, replete with the various tempos, and accompanied by stringed and percussion instruments. And when he heard about it being performed by two boys, Rāghava was overcome with curiosity.

4–5. Then, during an interval of the rite, that tiger among men, the king, assembled the great seers, kings, scholars, townsmen, experts in ancient lore, grammarians, and the aged, twice-born brahmans, and when he had assembled them all, he had the two singers brought in.

6–7. The delighted hosts of seers there and the immensely powerful kings, drinking in, as it were, the king and those two singers with their eyes, then all said to one another simultaneously: "Both of them look like Rāma, just like reflections of the same image.

8. "Were they not wearing matted locks and barkcloth garments, we would not be able to discern any difference between Rāghava and the two who are singing."

9. And as those assembled were conversing in this fashion, the two young sages began a song that enhanced the delight of those who heard it.

10. Then that sweet and ethereal musical performance took place there, and because of the perfection of the singing, none of those who heard it could get enough of it.

11. First, it commenced from the beginning, that is, from the sarga in which there was the meeting with Nārada. Continuing from there, they sang twenty sargas.

12. Then, in the late afternoon, after having heard those twenty sargas, Rāghava, who was so fond of his brothers, said to Bharata:

13. "Kākutstha, you must at once give these two great singers eighteen thousand gold coins. The exertions of these two youths must not be in vain."

14. But the two great bards were perplexed and would not accept the gold that was being offered, saying: "Of what use is this to us?

15. "We are two forest dwellers who are quite satisfied with woodland fruits and roots. What would we do in the forest with this brightly shining gold?"

16. As the two of them were speaking in this fashion, Rāma and all those who were listening were greatly amazed and were filled with curiosity.

17. Eager to hear about the origin of that poem, Rāma, of immense blazing energy, asked the two young sages:

18. "What is the extent of this poem? And what did the great man base it on? Indeed, which bull among sages is the creator of this great poem?"

19. The two young sages then spoke these words to Rāghava, who was questioning them: "The author, the blessed Vālmīki, by whom this, your life history, has been revealed in its entirety, is present at the sacrifice.

20. "Starting from the beginning, lord of kings, there are five hundred sargas, and it is based upon your entire life, your majesty, including the good and the bad.

21. "If you decide to hear it, your majesty, then, great chariot-warrior, please listen to it, together with your younger brothers, when you are at leisure during an interval of the rite."

22. Rāma replied, "By all means!" And so, delighted, the two of them, having taken leave of Rāghava, went back to their dwelling, where the bull among sages waited.

23. But as for Rāma, having heard the sweetness of that singing, he returned to the sacrificial enclosure, along with the sages and the great kings.

The end of the eighty-fifth sarga of the Uttarakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 86

1. Together with the sages, kings, and monkeys, Rāma listened to the supremely wonderful singing for many days.

2–3. During the singing, Rāma, having recognized the two bards as Sītā's sons, said these words in the midst of the assembly: "Go hence into the presence of the blessed one and say in my words:

4. " 'If Sītā be of untainted conduct or if she has expiated her sin, then let her, with the permission of the great sage, demonstrate her purity here.

5. “ ‘Then, after having determined the will of the sage and the intentions of Sītā, who may be eager to give some proof of her innocence, report to me at once.

6. “ ‘Tomorrow morning, for the sake of clearing my name as well, let Janaka’s daughter, Maithilī, take a solemn oath here in the midst of the assembly.’ ”

7. When the messengers had heard these supreme and wonderful words of Rāghava, they proceeded together to the sacrificial enclosure where the bull among sages was staying.

8. Prostrating themselves before the great and radiant sage of immeasurable splendor, they repeated Rāma’s gentle and sweet words.

9. When he had heard their speech and had understood Rāma’s intention, that sage of enormous blazing energy then spoke these words:

10. “So be it! Bless you all. Since a husband is a wife’s divinity, Sītā will act in such a way that Rāghava is satisfied.”

11. Addressed in this fashion by the sage, all those immensely powerful messengers of Rāma returned to Rāghava, and they all repeated the sage’s words.

12. And so, when the delighted Kākutstha had heard the words of the great sage, he addressed the seers and kings assembled there, saying:

13. “These holy ones together with their disciples, these lords of men, along with their retinues, and anyone else who so desires—let them witness Sītā’s oath.”

14. When they had heard those words of great Rāghava, there arose on the part of all those foremost seers a great cry of “Excellent!”

15. And the great kings, too, praised Rāghava, saying, “Only you, best of men, and no one else on earth would do such a thing.”

16. When Rāghava had thus made his decision, he said, “It shall take place tomorrow.” Then that destroyer of his foes dismissed them all.

The end of the eighty-sixth sarga of the Uttarakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 87

1. When the night had given way to dawn, King Rāghava of immense blazing energy went to the sacrificial enclosure and summoned all the seers.

2–5. Vasiṣṭha, Vāmadeva, Jābāli, Kāśyapa, Viśvāmitra of prolonged austerities, Durvāsas of great austerities, Agastya, Śakti, Bhārgava, Vāmana, long-lived Mārkaṇḍeya, Maudgalya of great austerities, the Bhārgava Cyavana, Śatānanda the knower of righteousness, Bharadvāja of blazing energy, and Agni's son Suprabha—these and many other sages of fierce vows, as well as all those kings, tigers among men, assembled.

6. And all of those great ones—the very mighty rākṣasas and the immensely powerful monkeys—assembled out of eager anticipation.

7. And kshatriyas, vaiśyas, and śūdras by the thousands all assembled to witness Sītā's oath.

8. Once Vālmīki, the foremost of sages, had heard that they had all assembled in this fashion and were as motionless as if they had been turned to stone, he quickly entered together with Sītā.

9. Thinking only of Rāma, Sītā, choked with tears, followed behind the seer, her face downcast and her hands cupped in reverence.

10. When those assembled saw Sītā coming behind Vālmīki like Śrī following Brahmā, there arose a great cry of "Excellent!"

11. And thus a great cheer burst forth from all of those who had been overwhelmed with a vast grief born of sorrow.

12. Some cried, "Excellent, Sītā!" others, "Excellent, Rāma!" and still others there cried, "Excellent! Excellent!" to both of them.

13. Then, together with Sītā, Vālmīki, that bull among sages, strode into the midst of the mass of people and spoke in this fashion to Rāghava:

14. "Here, Dāśarathi, is Sītā, of strict vows, who practices righteousness. Even though she had done no wrong, she was abandoned by you near my ashram.

15. "Sītā will give proof of her innocence to you of solemn vows, Rāma, you who are fearful of the malicious rumors among the people. You must permit her to do so.

16. "And here are Jānakī's two sons, born as twins. These two unassailable boys are your sons as well. This that I am telling you is the truth.

17. "I am the tenth son of Pracetas, O delight of the Rāghavas. I do not recall ever uttering an untrue statement. Thus, these two are your sons.

18. "I have performed austerities for many thousands of years. Just as Maithilī is innocent, so may I enjoy their fruits.

19. "When, Rāghava, at the rapids in the wilderness, I had scrutinized Sītā with regard to her five senses and her mind as the sixth, I realized, 'She is blameless,' and so I took her in.

20. "She, who holds her husband as her divinity and who is of blameless conduct and innocent, will give proof of her innocence to you, who are fearful of the malicious rumors among the people."

The end of the eighty-seventh sarga of the Uttarakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 88

1. When Rāghava was addressed in this fashion by Vālmīki and had caught sight of Sītā, who resembled a goddess, he cupped his hands in reverence; and there, in the midst of the assembled people, he replied:

2. "Let it be exactly as you say, illustrious knower of righteousness. But your blameless words, brahman, are proof enough for me.

3. "Moreover, Vaidehī had already given proof of her innocence long ago in the presence of the gods. But although I knew Sītā to be innocent, brahman, I nonetheless abandoned her out of fear of the people. Therefore, please, sir, forgive me.

4. "And I acknowledge that these two bards, born as twins, are my sons. So let me show my affection toward Maithilī once she has proven that she is blameless in the midst of the people assembled here."

5–6. When the foremost among the gods realized what Rāma intended, they all assembled, placing Grandfather Brahmā at their head. There were the Ādityas, the Vasus, the Rudras, the Viśvedevas, the hosts of the Maruts, the Aśvins, the seers, the gandharvas, the troupes of the apsarases, and the sādhyas. Indeed, all the gods and all the foremost seers were there.

7. At that moment, Vāyu, god of wind, foremost of gods, auspicious, pleasant, delightful, and bearing a heavenly fragrance, refreshed the entire mass of people.

8. All the people assembled there from every country witnessed that inconceivable and almost miraculous thing that had taken place, just as if it were long ago in the Kṛta Yuga.

9. When Sītā, who was clad in ochre garments, saw all those who were assembled, she cupped her hands in reverence, cast down her eyes, and lowered her face. Then she spoke these words:

10. "As I have never even thought of any man other than Rāghava, so may Mādhavī, the goddess of the earth, open wide for me."

11. And as Vaidehī was thus taking this oath, a miraculous thing occurred. From the surface of the earth there arose an unsurpassed, heavenly throne.

12. It was borne on the heads of great serpents of immeasurable might. It was adorned with every jewel, and it was celestial with its celestial beauty.

13. Then Dharaṇī, the goddess of the earth, who was on that throne, took Maithilī in her arms and, greeting her with words of welcome, seated her upon it.

14. At the sight of Sītā entering Rasātala while seated on that throne, a continuous celestial shower of blossoms rained down upon her.

15. Suddenly there arose a great cry of "Excellent!" among the gods: "Excellent! Excellent! O Sītā, you who demonstrate such virtuous conduct!"

16. Such were the many different cries that the gods uttered as they, hovering in the sky, witnessed, with delighted hearts, Sītā's entrance into the earth.

17. All those who were present in the sacrificial enclosure—the sages as well as those tigers among men, the kings—could not get over their amazement.

18–19. Among all beings, fixed and moving, in the sky and on the earth—including the enormous dānavas and the lords of the great serpents in Pātāla—some, delighted, cried out, while some were lost in thought. Some just gazed at Rāma, while others, stupefied, gazed at Sītā.

20. They all assembled to witness Sītā's entrance into the earth. And for that moment the entire world was completely transfixed.

The end of the eighty-eighth sarga of the Uttarakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 88 (Appendix I, No. 13, lines 1–51)*

1. When Vaidehī had entered the underworld known as Rasātala, all the people and the sages there cried out, "Excellent! Excellent!" in Rāma's presence.[1–2]

2. Leaning on his wooden staff, his eyes clouded with tears, hanging his head, his mind distressed, Rāma was profoundly heartbroken.[3–4]

3. After weeping for a long time, Rāma, shedding copious tears, was overcome by rage and grief, and he said these words:[5–6]

4. "Grief such as I have never before felt seems to want to grip my heart right here. Sītā just now vanished right before my eyes, just as did Lakṣmī from Indra.[7–8]

5. "Earlier she was carried away and concealed on the Laṅkan shore of the great ocean. And yet, I brought her back even from there, how much more easily might I do so from the depths of the earth.[9–10]

6. "O Vasudhā, goddess of earth! My lady, you must give Sītā back to me or else I shall display my wrath so that you will know who I truly am.[11–12]

7. "Granted, you are my mother-in-law, for Maithilī came forth from you, and she was adopted long ago by Janaka, who, plough in hand, was ploughing.[13–14]

8. "Therefore, you must either give Sītā back or open wide for me. For I must be with her, whether it be in the underworld known as Pātāla or in the highest heaven.[15–16]

9–10ab. "Therefore, you must bring Sītā back for I have been driven mad on account of Maithilī. This very day, if you do not give me back Sītā, who has entered the earth, just as she was, I shall destroy you entirely, along with your mountains and forests.[17–19]

10cd. "I will either destroy the earth or let everything in this world be once more nothing but water!"[20]

11. As Kākutstha, the delight of the Raghus, filled with rage and grief, was speaking in this fashion, Brahmā, together with the hosts of gods, said to him:[21–22]

12. "Rāma! Rāma! You of excellent vows! You must not torment yourself. Remember your immemorial nature and our counsel, dragger of your foes.[23–24]

13. "At this time, you must recall that you are an unassailable incarnation of Viṣṇu.[25]

14. "You must heed what I say in the midst of this assembly. This very poem that you have heard is the foremost of poems.[26–27]

15. "No doubt, it will explain everything in great detail, Rāma.[28]

16. "Vālmīki has rendered everything, hero, starting from the time of your birth, including your experiences of joy and sorrow, and even what is yet to come.[29–30]

17. "This, the first poem, is entirely devoted to you, Rāma Rāghava; for no one other than you deserves to enjoy such poetic fame.[31–32]

18. "Moreover, I heard it in its entirety a long time ago together with the gods. It is divine and of marvelous form. It is utterly truthful, and it obscures nothing.[33–34]

19. "Now, Kākutstha, tiger among men, your mind focused in keeping with righteousness, you must listen to the poem, the Rāmāyaṇa, including the remaining events that are yet to come.[35–36]

20. "So, most illustrious prince of immense blazing energy, together with the seers here, listen to the great remainder of this poem known as the Uttara.[37–38]

21. "By no means, Kākutstha, is this culminating section to be heard by anyone other than the great seers and you, hero, who are the supreme seer."[39–40]

22. When the god Brahmā, Lord of the three worlds, had said this much, he went off to the highest heaven together with Vāsava and the gods.[41–42]

23. But then those immensely powerful great seers, the inhabitants of Brahmā's world who had been there, with Brahmā's permission, returned, since their hearts were set upon it, to hear the Uttara, which concerned the future of Rāghava.[43–45]

24. Then, having heard the auspicious words of the God of gods, Rāma, of supreme blazing energy, said this to Vālmīki:[46–47]

25. "Blessed one, the sages, inhabitants of Brahmā's world, have set their hearts on hearing the Uttara, which concerns my future. Please let it commence tomorrow."[48–49]

26. Once he had resolved thus and had accepted those two bards, Rāma quickly dismissed the assembly and retired to the sacrificial hall.[50–51]

[colophon]

Sarga 89

*Appendix I, No. 13, lines 52–53. When the night had brightened into dawn, Rāma assembled the great sages. Then he said to his two sons, "Now sing, setting all cares aside."

*Appendix I, No. 13, lines 54–55. Then, once the venerable great seers were seated, the two bards sang that poem, the Uttara, which related future events.

*Appendix I, No. 13, line 56–7.89.1. But because then, at the conclusion of the sacrifice, Vaidehī had entered the earth by virtue of her perfect fidelity, Rāma was deeply disconsolate. No longer able to see Vaidehī, he regarded this world as empty. He was completely overwhelmed by grief and could get no peace of mind.

2. After dismissing all the kings, as well as the apes, monkeys, and rākṣasas, he had the hosts of eminent brahmans dismissed, laden with wealth.

3. Then, after dismissing them all, lotus-eyed Rāma entered Ayodhyā, cherishing Sītā in his heart.

4. The delight of the Raghus took no wife after Sītā, so that in sacrifice after sacrifice, a golden Jānakī served in the role of his wife.

5. For ten thousand years he performed the aśvamedha as well as ten times as many vājapeyas, in which there was a distribution of much gold.

6. And majestic Rāma offered the agniṣṭoma and the atirātra, as well as the gosava rites, at which great wealth was distributed, and other rites as well, accompanied by ample sacrificial fees.

7. And in this way a very long time passed while great Rāghava ruled the kingdom, exerting himself in righteousness.

8. The apes, monkeys, and rākṣasas remained under Rāma's rule, and the kings were devoted to Rāghava, day in and day out.

9. Parjanya brought the rains at the proper time, there was abundant food, and the directions were pellucid. The city and the countryside were filled with happy and well-nourished people.

10. While Rāma was ruling the kingdom, no one suffered an untimely death, nor at that time did illness afflict any living creature, nor was there any breach of righteousness.

11. Then, after a long time, Rāma's illustrious mother, surrounded by her sons and grandsons, succumbed to the law of time.

12. Sumitrā followed her as did illustrious Kaikeyī, who, after performing many different acts of righteousness, was established in the highest heaven.

13. All of them were established in heaven, and, once reunited with King Daśaratha, those fortunate women resumed their wifely duties.

14. Time after time Rāma gave generous donations to brahman ascetics on behalf of his mothers, without distinction.

15. Righteous Rāma made offerings of many precious things to his ancestors and performed supremely excellent sacrifices, thus gratifying his ancestors and the gods.

The end of the eighty-ninth sarga of the Uttarakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 90

1–3. Now after some time, King Yudhājit Kekaya dispatched his guru, the immeasurably splendid brahman-seer Gārgya, the son of Aṅgiras, to great Rāghava. And out of affection the king gave Rāma an unsurpassed gift of ten thousand horses, woolen blankets, jewels, and splendid garments of varied hue, as well as many ornaments.

4–5. When Rāghava Kākutstha heard that the great seer Gārgya was approaching and that he had come as the beloved emissary of his uncle Aśvapati, he went forth to a distance of two miles, along with his retinue, and there he honored Gārgya and accepted that wealth.

6. After he had inquired affectionately about the complete well-being of his maternal uncle, Rāma began to question that extremely illustrious seer, once the latter had been seated:

7. "What words has my maternal uncle uttered on account of which the blessed one, foremost among the eloquent, like a second Bṛhaspati, has come here?"

8. When the brahman-seer heard what Rāma had said, he began to tell Rāghava in detail the extraordinary mission that was to be undertaken.

9. "Your maternal uncle, Yudhājit, has uttered these affectionate words, great-armed bull among men. Now hear them, if you please.

10. " 'There is a country that lies along both banks of the Sindhu. It is the supremely beautiful kingdom of the gandharvas and it is richly endowed with fruits and roots.

11. " 'The thirty million heroic and immensely powerful sons of Śailūṣa, heavily armed gandharvas, protect that country in battle.

12. " 'After conquering them, great-armed Kākutstha, along with the splendid kingdom of the gandharvas, you must, with great concentration, establish two cities.

13. " 'No one else can accomplish this. That country is extremely beautiful. You will love it, great-armed hero. I would not lie to you.' "

14. When Rāghava had heard this, he was delighted both with the great seer and with his maternal uncle. He spoke thus, "So be it!" and fixed his gaze upon Bharata.

15. Delighted, Rāghava, his hands extended and cupped in reverence, said to the twice-born brahman: "These two princes will conquer that country, brahman-seer.

16–17. "These two, Takṣa and Puṣkala, are the valorous sons of Bharata. Well guarded by our maternal uncle and focused on righteousness, they will place Bharata at their head, and then, together with their troops and retinue, they will annihilate the sons of the gandharva. Then they will divide the two cities between them.

18. "Once he has founded those two splendid cities and established his two sons in them, the extremely righteous Bharata will once again return to me."

19. When he had addressed the brahman-seer in this fashion, Rāma gave his orders to Bharata, together with his troops and retinue, and then consecrated the two princes.

20. And so, under an auspicious constellation, Bharata placed the son of Aṅgiras before him and set forth together with his army and the two princes.

21. As if commanded by Śakra, that army set forth from the city. It was unassailable even by the gods and asuras, and it was accompanied for a long way by Rāghava himself.

22. Flesh-eating creatures and enormous rākṣasas, thirsting for blood, shadowed Bharata.

23–24. And many hosts of malignant and extremely fearsome spirits, in their thousands, lusting to devour the flesh of the gandharvas' sons, went before the army, as did many thousands of lions, tigers, and jackals, while carrion birds circled in the sky.

25. After camping on the way for a month and a half, the army, intact and filled with happy and well-nourished troops, reached Kekaya.

The end of the ninetieth sarga of the Uttarakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 91

1. When Yudhājit, lord of the Kekayas, had heard that Bharata had come as the commander of an army, together with Gārgya, he experienced the greatest delight.

2. Together with a huge host of men, the lord of the Kekayas marched forth. Hastening, he advanced against the godlike gandharvas.

3. Together, swift-striding Bharata and Yudhājit, along with their troops and their retinues, reached the city of the gandharvas.

4. Upon hearing that Bharata had come, the immensely powerful gandharvas assembled from all directions, roaring and eager to fight.

5. Then began a tumultuous, hair-raising, and immensely terrifying battle that went on for seven nights without either side gaining the victory.

6. Then in a rage Bharata, Rāma's younger brother, employed Kāla's supremely terrifying divine weapon-spell, known as the saṃvarta, against the gandharvas.

7. Caught by Kāla's noose and torn to pieces by the saṃvarta, all thirty million of them were instantly annihilated on the spot by great Bharata.

8. The gods, denizens of heaven, could not recall such a ghastly slaughter of such great warriors within the space of an instant.

9. Once those heroes had been slain, Kaikayī's son, Bharata, founded two prosperous and splendid cities, establishing Takṣa in Takṣaśīlā and Puṣkara in Puṣkarāvatī.

10. Within five years, the lovely country of the gandharvas, now the kingdom of Gāndhāra, was filled with provinces and their inhabitants.

11. Both cities were filled with masses of wealth and jewels and were adorned with parklands. Their competition over the extent of their respective virtues made them rivals of each other.

12–14. Both appeared extremely resplendent, and all transactions there were honest. They were filled with large numbers of parks and vehicles, and their central markets were well laid out. Both of those splendid cities were charming and adorned with great wealth, as well as with extremely beautiful mansions and identical seven-storied palaces. Both were adorned with many beautiful shrines to the divinities. Having established them over a period of five years, Rāghava's younger brother Bharata, that great-armed son of Kaikayī, returned to Ayodhyā.

15–16. When majestic Bharata had respectfully saluted great Rāghava, who was like righteousness incarnate, just as Vāsava might Brahmā, he reported to him the great slaughter of the gandharvas, and the settlement of that region, just as they had transpired. When Rāghava had heard all this, he was delighted with him.

The end of the ninety-first sarga of the Uttarakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 92

1. When Rāghava had heard that, he, together with his brothers, experienced delight, and he said these extraordinary words to them:

2. "Saumitri, these two young sons of yours, Aṅgada and Candraketu, are well versed in righteousness. They are powerful bowmen and fit for kingship.

3. "I will consecrate these two as kings. Please find a country for them right away—one that is pleasant and spacious—where those two bowmen can enjoy themselves.

4. "But please, gentle brother, seek out a country in which there will be no oppression of kings and no destruction of ashrams, so that we may give no offense."

5. When Rāma had spoken in this fashion, Bharata replied: "There is the delightful and salubrious country of Kārāpatha.

6. "Let a city for great Aṅgada be established there as well as a lovely and salubrious one called Candrakānta for Candraketu."

7. Rāghava agreed to those words that Bharata had spoken, and then, having subjugated that country, he established a city for Aṅgada.

8. And so for Aṅgada, Rāma, tireless in action, established and carefully guarded the delightful and charming city of Aṅgadīyā.

9. And, in the land of Malla, he established for the immensely powerful Candraketu the renowned and heavenly city of Candrakāntā, which was like the city of heaven.

10. Then those heroes—Rāma, Bharata, and Lakṣmaṇa—unassailable in battle, attained the greatest delight and performed the consecration of the two princes.

11. After they had consecrated the two princes, they sent them off accompanied by their armies and retinues—Aṅgada to the western country and Candraketu to the north.

12. Lakṣmaṇa Saumitri accompanied Aṅgada, while Bharata served as the commander of Candraketu's rear guard.

13. Lakṣmaṇa remained in Aṅgadīyā for a year, and when his unassailable son was firmly established, he returned once again to Ayodhyā.

14. As for Bharata, having similarly spent yet one more year, he returned once again to Ayodhyā, where he approached Rāma's feet.

15. Extremely righteous Saumitri and Bharata, devoted to Rāma's feet, in their love for him, did not realize how much time had passed.

16. And so, in this fashion, ten thousand years passed by, while they constantly exerted themselves in righteousness and in their duties to the populace.

17. Having passed the time with contented hearts, they were enveloped in prosperity and fixed on the supreme path of righteousness. The three of them, resplendent with blazing energy, truly resembled the three sacred fires kindled and fed with oblations in a great sacrifice.

The end of the ninety-second sarga of the Uttarakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 93

1. Now after some time, during which Rāma was steadfast in the path of righteousness, Kāla, in the form of an ascetic, arrived at the king's gateway.

2. He spoke these words to the steadfast and illustrious Lakṣmaṇa: "Inform Rāma that I have come on a mission of grave importance.

3. "For I am the messenger of an exceedingly mighty and immeasurably powerful great seer. Because of my mission, I have come here, immensely powerful prince, wishing to see Rāma."

4. When Saumitri had heard those words of his, he immediately informed Rāma that an ascetic had something he wished to communicate. He said:

5. "May you, immensely splendid king, conquer both worlds through righteousness. An ascetic, whose radiance is that of the sun, has come as a messenger to see you."

6. When Rāma had heard the words uttered by Lakṣmaṇa, he said, "Please, dear boy, bid that sage of immense energy, who is bearing someone's message, enter."

7. And Saumitri, saying, "So be it," ushered in the sage, who seemed to be shining with his radiant energy and was blazing, as it were, with rays of light.

8. Approaching the foremost of the Raghus, who was shining with his own blazing energy, the seer addressed Rāghava in sweet words, saying, "May you prosper."

9. Rāma of immense blazing energy honored him, gave him the guest-offering, and then began to inquire about his undisturbed well-being.

10. When he had been asked by Rāma about his well-being, that immensely illustrious and most eloquent sage sat down upon a heavenly seat of gold.

11. Then Rāma said to him, "Welcome, great sage. Now please report the words of him of whom you have come as a messenger."

12. Encouraged by that lion among kings, the sage uttered these words: "This must be related privately; nor should my words be compromised by prying eyes.

13. "Rāghava, you must put to death anyone who overhears or might witness this. This must be so if you have any respect for the words of the foremost of sages."

14. Vowing, "So be it," Rāma said to Lakṣmaṇa: "Position yourself at the door, great-armed prince, and send the chamberlain away.

15. "For, Saumitri, I must put to death anyone who might overhear or witness the conversation between me and the seer, which must be uttered in secret."

16. Then, having thus entrusted Lakṣmaṇa with the guardianship of the door, Rāghava Kākutstha said these words to the sage: "Please tell me what you have to say.

17. "Please tell me without hesitation the message you have in mind and on account of which you were sent. For it is also in my heart."

The end of the ninety-third sarga of the Uttarakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 94

1. "Hear now, great-armed and immensely powerful Rāma, the purpose for which I have come. I have been sent by the God Grandfather Brahmā.

2. "In a previous existence, heroic conqueror of enemy citadels, I was your son, Kāla, the destroyer of all things, who was produced by your power of creative illusion.

3. "The blessed Grandfather, Lord Brahmā, guardian of the worlds, says: 'Great-armed Rāma, your agreement was to protect the heavenly worlds.

4. " 'And long ago, when, through your power of creative illusion, you yourself had drawn in the worlds, you first created me as you lay on the waters in the vast ocean.

5–6. " 'Then, through your power of creative illusion, having created the serpent Ananta, of immense coils, who lies upon the waters, you engendered those two immensely powerful beings Madhu and Kaiṭabha, covered with the heaps of whose bones this mountain-girded earth became known as Medinī.

7. " 'Then, when you had produced me, too, in a lotus—as radiant as the celestial sun—that was growing from your navel, you assigned to me the entire task of the generation of creatures.

8. " 'Since I was entrusted with this burden, I worshipfully approached you, the Lord of the universe, saying, "Please, sir, you who are the source of my blazing energy, provide for the protection of these creatures."

9. " 'Moreover, you are unassailable, and therefore, because of your eternal nature, you took on the form of Viṣṇu in order to protect all beings.

10. " 'You are the mighty son of Aditi and the increaser of your brothers' delight. For you render assistance to the worlds whenever the need arises.

11. " 'When all creatures were being terrorized, it was you, foremost of living beings who, desiring to kill Rāvaṇa, set your mind on dwelling among men.

12. " 'At that time you yourself set the limit of your sojourn at ten thousand years and ten hundred.

13. " 'You became a son through your own intention, and your life span here among men is now completed. And thus, foremost among the best of men, Kāla has approached you.

14. " 'But if, great king, you still wish to serve your subjects, then, by all means, please remain, hero.' Thus spoke Grandfather Brahmā.

15. " 'On the other hand, if you desire to regain the world of the gods, Rāghava, then let the gods, having a protector in Viṣṇu, be free from anxiety.' "

16. When Rāghava had heard the words that Grandfather Brahmā had spoken, just as they were reported by Kāla, he replied, smiling, to the destroyer of all.

17. "I have heard the extremely marvelous words of the God of gods. Your arrival has produced tremendous delight.

18. "Bless you. I shall return from whence I have come. You have come here in accordance with my heart's desire. I have no hesitation in this regard.

19. "I must attend to all the needs of the gods, who are my obedient subjects, and now, at the end of everything, I will do as Grandfather Brahmā says."

The end of the ninety-fourth sarga of the Uttarakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 95

1. As the two were conversing in this fashion, the blessed seer Durvāsas arrived at the king's gate, anxious to see Rāma.

2. And, approaching Saumitri, that foremost of seers said, "Show me in to Rāma at once, lest my purpose be thwarted."

3. When Lakṣmaṇa, slayer of enemy heroes, had heard the sage's speech, he respectfully saluted that great seer and spoke these words:

4. "Tell me, blessed one, what needs to be done? And what is your purpose? What can I do for you? For, O brahman, Rāghava is busy. Otherwise, please wait a little while."

5. When that tiger among seers had heard this, choking with rage, he spoke these words to Lakṣmaṇa, burning him up, as it were, with his gaze:

6–7. "Saumitri, you must announce me to Rāma this instant. Otherwise I shall curse this kingdom, you, the city, Rāghava, Bharata, and whatever progeny you all may have! For I am unable any longer to contain the rage that is in my heart."

8. When Lakṣmaṇa had heard those terrifying words of the great seer, he reflected in his mind on their import.

9. He announced the seer to Rāghava, after having resolved: "Let me alone die. Let there not be the destruction of everything."

10. No sooner had King Rāma heard Lakṣmaṇa's words than he dismissed Kāla and, quickly rushing out, met Atri's son.

11. Respectfully saluting the great seer, who seemed to glow with his blazing energy, Kākutstha cupped his hands in reverence and said, "What may I do for you?"

12. When the powerful Durvāsas, foremost among sages, had heard the words uttered by Rāma Rāghava, he replied to him, saying: "Listen, O you who are devoted to righteousness.

13. "This very day, Rāghava, I have completed a fast of one thousand years. I desire some freshly prepared food from you, sinless king."

14. When Rāma heard those words, he was filled with great delight, and he brought that foremost of sages some freshly prepared food.

15. When that most excellent of sages had eaten that food, which was like the nectar of immortality, he said, "Well done, Rāma!" and returned to his ashram.

16. When he had departed, Rāghava of immense blazing energy was at first delighted at heart, but then, when he recalled Kāla's words, he was stricken with grief.

17. When he remembered that thing which was too dreadful to contemplate, he was greatly afflicted by grief. His face downcast and his mind distressed, he was unable to speak.

18. But then Rāghava, reflecting in his mind on Kāla's words, said, "All this must pass away." Then that greatly illustrious prince fell silent.

The end of the ninety-fifth sarga of the Uttarakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 96

1. Now, when Lakṣmaṇa saw Rāghava, despondent, with his face downcast—like the moon in eclipse—he, remaining cheerful, spoke to him in sweet words, saying:

2. "You must not suffer anguish for my sake, great-armed warrior. For such is the course of destiny that has been determined by our previous actions.

3. "You must keep your promise and slay me without misgiving, gentle brother. For, Kākutstha, men who do not keep their promises go to hell.

4. "If you love me, great king, if you hold me in your favor, then kill me without hesitation and thus uphold righteousness."

5–6. Addressed in this fashion by Lakṣmaṇa, Rāma, the lord of men, his senses reeling, assembled his counselors as well as his purohita, and in their midst told them about the arrival of Durvāsas and the promise he had made to the ascetic, just as it had all taken place.

7. When his counselors, along with his preceptors, had heard that, they kept still, but Vasiṣṭha of immense blazing energy spoke these words:

8. "All this was foreseen, great-armed and illustrious Rāma: your terrifying death and your separation from Lakṣmaṇa.

9. "Abandon him! Destiny is all-powerful. You must not falsify your promises. For when a promise proves false, righteousness itself is undermined.

10. "And if righteousness were undermined, the entire triple world, together with its fixed and moving contents, as well as the hosts of gods and seers, would be destroyed without a doubt.

11. "Therefore, tiger among men, for the sake of the protection of the triple world, you must—this very day—provide for the welfare of the universe through the execution of Lakṣmaṇa."

12. When Rāma had heard those words, which were fully in keeping with both righteousness and statecraft, he addressed Lakṣmaṇa there in the council of those who had gathered:

13. "There must be no transgression of righteousness. Therefore, I will banish you, Saumitri. For whether it be banishment or execution that is ordained, both are the same to the virtuous."

14. No sooner had these words been uttered by Rāma than Lakṣmaṇa, his eyes clouded with tears, departed swiftly. But he did not return to his home.

15. Proceeding to the bank of the Sarayū River, he ritually sipped its water and then, cupping his hands in reverence, he closed off his senses and held his breath.

16. Then all the gods, together with Śakra, the troupes of apsarases, and the hosts of seers, showered him with flowers as he sat there absorbed in yoga, not breathing.

17. And in such a way that no man witnessed it, Śakra took immensely powerful Lakṣmaṇa, still in his earthly body, and entered heaven.

18. Then all of the foremost among the gods, together with the seers, thrilled and delighted, worshiped him, who had returned to his state as the fourth part of Viṣṇu.

The end of the ninety-sixth sarga of the Uttarakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 97

1. After he had banished Lakṣmaṇa, Rāma was consumed with grief and sorrow, and he said this to his purohita, his counselors, and the people of the city:

2. "This very day, here in Ayodhyā, I shall consecrate as king the valorous lord Bharata, who is devoted to righteousness. Then I shall depart for the forest.

3. "Bring in the requisite materials so that there may be no loss of time. For I will depart this very day by the path that Lakṣmaṇa has taken."

4. When they heard what Rāghava had said, all his subjects instantly bowed their heads to the ground and became as if lifeless.

5. When Bharata heard Rāma's words, he, too, was stunned. But he rejected the kingship and said this to Rāghava:

*6. "I swear to you by truth itself, your majesty, delight of the Raghus, and by the heavenly world as well, that without you, I do not desire kingship.

7. "Your majesty, lord of men, you must consecrate these two bards—valorous Kuśa in the kingdom of Kosala and Lava in the northern kingdom.

8. "And let swift-striding messengers go to Śatrughna and, without delay, let them report to him our departure for heaven."

9. When Vasiṣṭha heard what Bharata had said and saw that the people of the town were downcast and afflicted with grief, he spoke these words:

10. "Rāma, my dear boy, look at your subjects prostrate on the ground. Once you have determined what they desire to be done, you must not do anything to displease them."

11. Acting on the advice of Vasiṣṭha, Kākutstha, having bidden his subjects to rise, addressed them all in these words: "What must I do?"

12. Then all of his subjects said these words to Rāma: "Wherever you may go, Rāma, we shall follow after you.

13. "This is our highest delight. This we regard as our highest duty. Our constant and most deeply cherished desire is set upon following you.

14. "If you have any affection for the people of the city, if you have the deepest love for them, then, Kākutstha, let us, along with our sons and wives, accompany you on the path of the virtuous.

15. "If we are not to be abandoned by you, Lord, then you must lead us all, whether it be to a penance grove, the inaccessible wilderness, a river, or the ocean."

16. Recognizing their resolve and reflecting upon both destiny and the firm devotion of the townsmen, he replied, "Very well."

17–19. Once Rāghava had reached this decision in this fashion, that very day, he consecrated both of those great bards, Kuśa and Lava—valorous Kuśa in the kingdom of Kosala and Lava in the northern kingdom. And he gave each of them abundant wealth, as well as a thousand chariots, thirty thousand elephants, and ten thousand horses. And thus they had abundant jewels and great wealth and were surrounded by happy and prosperous people.

20. Once he had consecrated those two valiant princes and dispatched them to their respective cities in this fashion, he sent messengers to great Śatrughna.

The end of the ninety-seventh sarga of the Uttarakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 98

1. Urged on by Rāma's words, the swift-striding messengers proceeded swiftly to Madhurā without making camp on the way.

2. Then, after three days and nights, when they had reached Madhurā, they immediately reported everything to Śatrughna just as it had taken place.

3–6. In this fashion the messengers immediately reported to great Śatrughna everything—the banishment of Lakṣmaṇa, Rāghava's promise, the consecration of his two sons, his being followed by the townspeople, the founding by wise Rāma of Kuśa's charming city named Kuśāvatī on the slopes of the Vindhya mountains, the founding of Śrāvatī, Lava's charming and renowned city, the exodus of the people from Ayodhyā, and Bharata's following Rāghava. Then saying, "You must hurry, your majesty," they fell silent.

7–9. When that delight of the Raghus had heard about the terrible, impending destruction of his family, he assembled his subjects and his purohita, Kāñcana, and related to them everything, just as it had taken place, as well as his own imminent ascension together with his brothers. Then the valiant lord of men consecrated his own two sons. Subāhu received Madhurā and Śatrughātin got Vaidiśa.

10. Dividing the army of Madhurā between his two sons, he established them both as kings endowed with wealth and grain.

11. Then, having sent off Śatrughātin to be king in Vaidiśa, Rāghava went swiftly to Ayodhyā with but a single chariot.

12. There he saw the great king in the company of the immortal sages. He was blazing, as it were, like fire and was clad in a thin linen garment.

13. Cupping his hands in reverence and controlling his senses, that knower of righteousness respectfully saluted Rāma, and, reflecting upon righteousness, spoke these words:

14. "Now that I have properly consecrated my two sons, the Rāghavas, and endowed them with wealth, know, your majesty, that I am determined to follow you.

15. "And please do not say anything to the contrary with regard to this, for your command is not to be disobeyed. Please do not abandon me, hero, for I am especially devoted."

16. Recognizing how adamant Śatrughna's resolve was, Rāma, the delight of the Raghus, spoke these words to him: "Very well."

17. No sooner had he finished pronouncing these words than the monkeys, who could take on any form at will, and the hosts of apes and rākṣasas arrived in great numbers.

18. Once they learned of Rāma's departure, all those sons of the gods, sons of seers, and sons of gandharvas assembled.

19. When they had all assembled there, they respectfully saluted Rāma and said: "Illustrious king, we have come in order to follow you.

20. "If, Rāma, bull among men, you were to depart without us, then you would have struck us down as if you were wielding the staff of Yama."

21. When he had thus heard those words of the apes, monkeys, and rākṣasas, he then spoke sweetly to Vibhīṣaṇa in gentle tones:

22. "Vibhīṣaṇa, as long as your people shall endure, you shall live on as the immensely powerful lord of the rākṣasas in Laṅkā.

23. "You must protect your subjects in accordance with righteousness. Please do not argue with me."

24. When Kākutstha had addressed him in this fashion, he then said to Hanumān: "Resign yourself to remaining alive, for you must not violate your vow.

25. "As long as the tales about me remain current in the world, lord of the tawny monkeys, you must uphold your vow by remaining alive."

26. When he had spoken in this fashion, Kākutstha Rāghava then said to all the other apes and monkeys, "You may depart with me."

The end of the ninety-eighth sarga of the Uttarakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 99

1. Now, when the night had given way to dawn, the immensely illustrious Rāma, broad-chested, his eyes like lotus petals, said to his purohita:

2. "Let the agnihotra vessel, its fire blazing with ghee, go on before, as well as the umbrella consecrated for the vājapeya, beautifying the great highway."

3. Then, according to the ritual injunctions, Vasiṣṭha of blazing energy performed the entire sacred rite of departure for the next world, omitting nothing.

4. Then, clad in a garment of linen and invoking the Supreme Brahman, Rāma took up kuśa grass with both hands and, fastening it, he prepared to set forth.

5. Uttering no unnecessary words whatsoever at any point, making no unnecessary movements, spurning all comforts on the road, and blazing like the fierce-rayed sun, he set forth from his house.

6–7. On Rāma's left side was Padmā, that is, Śrī, in deep concentration. On his right was large-eyed Hrī, and before him was Vyavasāya. There were also the various kinds of arrows and his well-strung bow. All of these, taking on human form, respectfully followed Kākutstha.

8–9. The vedas in the form of brahmans, the Sāvitrīmantra, protector of all, the syllable oṃ, the sacred utterance vaṣaṭ, and all the great seers, those gods on earth: all of them, deeply devoted to Rāma Kākutstha, followed him, who had reached the gateway to heaven.

10. As he was proceeding, the women of the inner apartments, together with the elderly, the children, the serving women, the eunuchs, and the male attendants, followed him.

11. And Bharata, accompanied by the women of his inner apartments, followed as well, along with Śatrughna.

12. Then, having vowed their dedication to Rāma Rāghava and thus being utterly devoted to him, the great brahmans, in deep concentration and accompanied by the agnihotra fire, followed that immensely wise Kākutstha, together with their sons and their wives.

13. His counselors and their attendants, too, together with their sons, kinsmen, and retinues, all joyously followed Rāma.

14. After them, all the ministers, surrounded by delighted and prosperous people, deeply moved by Rāma's virtues, followed him as he proceeded.

15. That splendid host of monkeys—all of them devoted to Rāma, all of them bathed, joyful, happy, and in fine fettle—was chattering in a frenzy of delight.

16. No one there was despondent, ashamed, or miserable. Instead, all were delighted and joyous. It was a great wonder.

17. The people of the countryside had come merely to witness the king's departure. However, once they had come and witnessed it, they became just as devoted as the others.

18. And so, in great concentration and with the deepest devotion, the apes, monkeys, and rākṣasas, as well as the people who dwelt in the city, followed behind.

Sarga 100

1. When he had gone a league and a half, the delight of the Raghus spied the river Sarayū, of holy waters, that lay just before him as he looked to the west.

2–3. At that very moment, Brahmā, grandfather of the worlds, surrounded by all the gods and great seers and accompanied by hundreds of millions of celestial flying chariots, came to where Kākutstha, who was setting out for heaven, stood.

4. A shower of flowers, scattered by the wind, fell in great abundance.

5. Then, as the sky was filled with the sound of hundreds of trumpets and crowded with gandharvas and apsarases, Rāma approached the waters of the Sarayū on foot.

6. Then Grandfather Brahmā spoke these words from the sky: "Come, Viṣṇu, bless you. Fortunately you have come, Rāghava.

7. "Please, O Lord of immense blazing energy, return with your godlike brothers to your own essential Vaiṣṇava form, which is the eternal Brahman.

8. "For you are the refuge of the worlds, large-eyed Lord, yet no one other than Māyā, your immemorial consort, truly knows you.

9. "You are the Great Being—inconceivable, indestructible, and the sum of all things. O Lord of immense blazing energy, please return of your own accord to whichever form you wish."

10. When the immensely wise Rāma had heard those words of Grandfather Brahmā and had confirmed his resolution, he bodily entered, together with his younger brothers, the blazing energy proper to Viṣṇu.

11–12. Then, once he had returned to his form as Viṣṇu, the divinities—including the sādhyas, the hosts of the Maruts together with Indra, led by Agni, and accompanied by the celestial hosts of the seers, the gandharvas, the apsarases, the great birds, the great serpents, and the daityas, dānavas, and rākṣasas—all worshiped that God.

13. All of them were delighted and joyful. All of them had their dearest wish fulfilled. They all cried out, "Wonderful! Wonderful!" For the highest heaven was free from any impurity.

14. Then Viṣṇu of immense blazing energy said to Grandfather Brahmā: "Please, O Lord of firm vows, grant heavenly worlds to all of these hosts of people.

15. "For all these resolute devotees, who have abandoned their bodies for my sake, have followed me out of love and are therefore worthy of my devotion."

16. When Lord Brahmā, patriarch of the world, had heard those words of Viṣṇu, he said: "All these who have accompanied you shall go to the worlds known as the Sāntānikas.

17. "Even an animal that abandons its life breaths while thinking upon Rāma with devotion shall surely also dwell in Santāna, which is endowed with every virtue and is just next to the Brahmaloka.

18. "The monkeys shall return to their own places of birth and so shall the apes.

19. "Those of splendid birth shall return to those from whom they issued forth, starting with the gods and including the seers, the great serpents, and the yakṣas."

20. When the Lord of the gods had spoken in this fashion, everyone proceeded to the Gopratāra tīrtha, and there, their eyes overwhelmed with joyful tears, they entered the Sarayū.

21. Each and every living soul who entered the water became filled with joy. Then each one, casting off his or her human body, mounted a flying chariot.

22. Even those born in the wombs of animals, once they reached the waters of the Sarayū, became celestial and shone with a celestial beauty like gods.

23. All beings, whether fixed or moving, upon reaching the waters of the Sarayū and moistening themselves with it, attained the world of the gods.

24. Whatever had been the divine origin of each of the monkeys, apes, and rākṣasas, they each entered that, after having deposited their bodies in the water.

25. Once the patriarch of the world had dispatched all of them to their respective heavens, that immensely wise being, in great delight, returned to heaven together with the thirty gods, who were similarly delighted.

26. Here ends the foremost of tales, known as the Rāmāyaṇa, together with its epilogue. It was composed by Vālmīki and is worshiped by Brahmā.

The end of the one hundredth sarga of the Uttarakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

The end of the Uttarakāṇḍa.

NOTES

Sarga 1

1. "Now . . . Rāma had attained sovereignty . . . to felicitate Rāghava" prāptarājasya rāmasya . . . rāghavaṃ pratinanditum: The syntax of the verse is somewhat ambiguous and presents a certain awkwardness if, as most commentators and translators understand it, we are to take the accusative rāghavam in pāda b as referring back to the genitive rāmasya in pāda a. Ck, Cm, Ct, Cr, and Cs, who read in this way, suggest supplying the word samīpam, "proximity or presence," to construe with rāmasya. Ct, perhaps still concerned with the juxtaposition of rāmasya and rāghavam, glosses, "The sages came to the vicinity of [Rāma], who had attained sovereignty, that is to say, had attained royal consecration. For what purpose? In order to felicitate Rāghava. The meaning is to praise his greatness [vaibhavam] [of kingship]. (prāptarājasya prāptarājyābhiṣekasya samīpaṃ munaya ājagmuḥ. kim artham. rāghavaṃ pratinanditum. tadvaibhavam abhiṣṭotum ity arthaḥ—so Ct.)" They take the word samīpam, "vicinity," to be the adhikaraṇa, or locus, of the finite verb ājagmuḥ, "they came," in pāda c. In this reading, the sense of the verse is that the seers come into the presence of Rāma, who had acquired sovereignty. Cv and Cg, however, understand the phrase prāptarājasya rāmasya as an anādare ṣaṣṭhī, or genitive absolute of disrespect. According to this reading, the seers are unconcerned in the first instance with Rāma and his ascendance to the throne but have come to felicitate Lakṣmaṇa, to whom they understand the epithet rāghavam to refer, because of the importance of his slaying of Indrajit (Yuddhakāṇḍa 78). See Cs's comments to verse 20 below. Cg, however, also acknowledges that some commentators prefer the other interpretation. (prāptarājasya rāmasyānādare ṣaṣṭhī. prāptarājyaṃ rāmam anādṛtya rāghavaṃ lakṣmaṇaṃ pratinandituṃ sarva ṛṣaya ājagmuḥ. prādhānyenendrajidvadhaṃ praśaṃsiṣyanti rāmasya samīpa iti śeṣa ity eke—so Cg.) None of the translators consulted explicitly follows Cg's interpretation. Most substitute the pronoun "him" for Rāghava, referring explicitly to Rāma. Like us, Gorresio (1870, p. 1) and Benoît (1999, p. 1221) simply render the term rāghavam literally, thus retaining the ambiguity of the original.

In keeping with his continuing practice, Cg identifies the syllable pra- in the word pratinanditum as the twenty-first syllable of the Gāyatrīmantra. See Introduction, "Gāyatrīmantra," pp. 187–98, and notes to 423*, following notes to 7.22.6; 7.40.1; 7.67.10; and 1539*, following notes to 7.100.26. See, too, note to 7.99.8–9.

"all the seers" ṛṣayaḥ sarve: Ś,B4,D2,5–8,10–12,G1,M1,3, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read munayaḥ, "sages," for ṛṣayaḥ, "seers." V1,2,B2–4,G1,2,M2,6–10 read tatra, "there," for sarve, "all." The critical reading sarve is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition.

2. "There were those who dwelt in the east" pūrvasyāṃ diśi ye śritāḥ: Literally, "those who had recourse to or dwelt in the eastern direction." Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 373) understands the phrase to refer to sages dwelling in the east other than those named in the verse. Benoît (1999, p. 1708) notes that the groups of sages in this and the following three verses belong to the four cardinal directions and arrive in the traditional order in which these directions are mentioned. For variant lists of sages who dwell in the east, see MBh 12.201.25–26 and 13.151.31.

"Kauśika" kauśikaḥ: Literally, "descendant of Kuśika." In the Mahābhārata, a brahman sage by this name is condemned to hell for having assisted robbers in capturing and killing some of their victims (8.49.41–47). Kauśika is a commonly used patronymic of the sage Viśvāmitra. However, since that sage is mentioned by name in verse 5 below, he cannot be its referent here. Cg, in his comment to verse 5 below, notes that the two sages are different (kauśikaḥ kuśikavaṃśyo viśvāmitrād anyaḥ). Note that the name Kauśika is not included among the sages associated with the eastern or any other direction in the Mahābhārata lists.

"Yavakrīta" yavakrītaḥ: Literally, "bought with barely." Yavakrīta is a son of Bharadvāja, and is known to the Mahābhārata (3.130.14; 3.135.9–139.24; 12.201.25; 12.285.15; 13.270.6; 13.151.31). At Mahābhārata 3.135.9–139.24, Lomaśa narrates the story of Raibhya, a friend of the sage Bharadvāja and of the young ascetic Yavakrīta, in which Bharadvāja's son Yavakrīta undertakes severe penance to attain the boon of instant knowledge of the vedas. Yavakrīta makes advances toward Raibhya's daughter-in-law and is subsequently killed by the offended brahman. After learning of his son's death, Bharadvāja curses Raibhya before following Yavakrīta onto the funeral pyre. As a result of the curse, Raibhya's son Parāvasu inadvertently kills his own father in a hunting accident. All three are brought back to life by the gods through the austerities of Raibhya's other son, Aravāvasu.

"Raibhya, Cyavana" raibhyaś cyavana eva ca: The sage Raibhya is primarily known from the Mahābhārata episode told above (3.135.9–139.24). See, too, MBh 2.4.14; 12.201.25; 12.323.7; 13.27.6; 13.151.31). Cyavana is a well-known sage of the Bhārgava lineage who appears in several stories in the Mahābhārata as well as later in the Uttarakāṇḍa (7.52.2; 7.53.2; 7.59.1,3; 7.81.5; 7.87.4). See R. Goldman 1977, pp. 50–59, 67–72, and passim. D5,7,10,11,T3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read gārgyo gālavaḥ, "Gārgya and Gālava," for raibhyaś cyavanaḥ.

"Kaṇva, the son of Medhātithi" kaṇvaḥ medhātitheḥ putraḥ: Kaṇva is a vedic ṛṣi, probably best known as the foster father of Śakuntalā in the Śakuntalopākhyāna of the Mahābhārata (1.62.1–69.51) and in Kālidāsa's Abhijñānaśākuntalam. At MBh 12.201.26, Kaṇva is called the son of Medhātithi, as he is here, and at 13.151.31, both Medhātithi and Kaṇva are listed together but with no mention of their relationship.

3. "together with Agastya" sahāgastyāḥ: Agastya is an important figure not only here, where he will narrate the histories of the rākṣasas and Hanumāṇ, but later in the kāṇḍa, where he narrates the stories of Śveta and Daṇḍa to Rāma. See sargas 67–73. See also 6.97.3–13; 6.103.13–14; 6.111.22; and notes. Benoît (1999, p. 1708) notes that as the narrator of the subsequent histories of the rākṣasas and Hanumān, Agastya is given greater prominence in the opening portion of the kāṇḍa than several more illustrious sages. He attributes this, interestingly, to the fact that Agastya, as a denizen of the south, would be in a better position to know about the history of the rulers of the southern city of Laṅkā. This is, however, debatable. Agastya, of course, is well known in the literature as the sage who brought brahmanical civilization to the south. See notes to 3.10.83 and Mahābhārata 3.101. At Araṇyakāṇḍa sargas 10–13, Rāma meets Agastya in his ashram and is directed by the sage to Pañcavaṭī. See also 7.35.1 and notes.

"those who dwelt in the south" ye śritā dakṣiṇāṃ diśam: For other lists of sages who dwell in the south, see MBh 12.201.27–28 and 13.151.32–33.

"holy Svastyātreya" svastyātreyaś ca bhagavān: The commentators are divided as to whether svastyātreya is simply the name of the sage, or whether the term svasti, "well-being," is an elliptical reference to Ātreya's virtue of granting welfare, etc. Cg, Ct, and Cr all understand the latter (svastikara ātreyaḥ—so Cg, Ct). Cs, however, chooses the former option, commenting, "Svastyātreya is someone of that name (svastyātreyas tannāmakaḥ)." With the exception of Raghunathan, all translations consulted agree, as do we, that the entire compound is a proper noun. Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 373) appears to misunderstand the gloss of Cg and sees the compound as referring to two sages, "Swasthikara, Ātreya." The Mahābhārata mentions two seers, Svastyātreya from the south (12.201.27b) and Ātreya from the north (12.201.31a), while Mahābhārata 13.151.32 lists only Svastyātreya. Translators are also divided as to whether to assign the epithet "holy (bhagavān)" to the name Svastyātreya, which precedes it, or to Namucu, which follows it. We have chosen the former option, largely on metrical grounds, as the name and epithet both belong to the same pāda.

"Namucu, and Pramucu" namucuḥ pramucus tathā: Two figures named Unmuca and Pramuca are mentioned in the Mahābhārata as seers from the south (12.201.27). In a corresponding list of seers from the south, the two appear as Ulmucu and Pramucu (13.151.32b). Ñ2,V1,2,B2–4,D1,3–7,10,11,T1,2,G3,M1,5, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read namuciḥ for namucuḥ. D1,3–7,10,11,T1,2,G3,M1,5, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read pramuciḥ for pramucuḥ.

Following 3ab, D5,7,10,11,T3, and GPP (7.1.3cd), NSP (7.1.3cd), Gita Press (7.1.3cd), KK (7.1.3cd), and VSP (in brackets following 7.1.3ab) insert a passage of one line [7*]: "and Agastya and Atri,[1] and the holy Sumukha and Vimukha[2] (agastyo 'triś ca bhagavān sumukho vimukhas tathā /)."

[1] "Atri" atriḥ: It will be noted that this poorly attested line contains the name of the ṛṣi Atri, who is again mentioned among the seven seers named in verse 5 below. Benoît (1999, p. 1708), who is translating the vulgate text, is puzzled by the repetition of the name in the lists of both southern and northern sages. See insert 10*, following note to verse 5 below. He is uncertain as to whether there are two seers of the same name, or if the repetition is the result of textual incoherence.

[2] "Sumukha and Vimukha" sumukho vimukhas tathā: The Mahābhārata knows both a sage named Sumukha and one called Vimukha. Sumukha is a seer who accompanies Nārada from heaven to visit the Pāṇḍavas (MBh 2.5.3). The name Vimukha alone is found in a list of sages at MBh 2.7.16. The names are found elsewhere in the Rāmāyaṇa in reference to two monkeys in Rāma's army. In this context, Sumukha and Vimukha are depicted as the sons of Mṛtyu (6.19.8). For Sumukha, see, too, 6.21.23 and 6.36.3.

4. As with many proper names in the epic, the names listed here are subject to numerous variations.

"those who dwelt in the west" ye śritāḥ paścimāṃ diśam: For variant lists of sages who dwell in the west, see MBh 12.201.29–30 and 13.151.31.

"Pṛṣadgu" pṛṣadguḥ: A figure named Ruṣadgu is mentioned as a seer at MBh 2.8.12c and specifically as a seer from the west at 12.201.29. He is called Uṣadgu in the corresponding list of seers from the west at 13.151.34c. D10 and GPP and NSP read instead nṛṣaṅguḥ, while D7 and Gita Press, KK, and VSP read nṛṣadguḥ,

"Kavaṣa" kavaṣaḥ: D5–7,10,11,M6,8, and GPP and NSP read instead kavaṣī. Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 373) records Kavasthi, a variant not found in the critical apparatus or any printed editions consulted. The name Kavaṣa appears in the list of sages associated with the west at MBh 12.201.29. He is mentioned in the list of sages at MBh 2.7 (see, esp., 2.7.16). He (v.l. kavaśa) is said to be the author of two hymns in the tenth book of the Ṛgveda (10.30, 10.34). The name is first found in the Ṛgveda at 7.18.12, where Kavaṣa is apparently a name of one of the ten kings and is a follower of Druhyu. He is also said to be driven away from the sacrifice because he was the son of the sage Ilūṣa and a slave girl (AitBr 2.19).

"Dhaumya" dhaumyaḥ: This is the name of a sage who serves as a priest and guru to the Pāṇḍavas in the Mahābhārata (see, for example, MBh 1.174.1–12). Dhaumya is among the sages associated with the west at MBh 12.201.29 and among the sages associated with the north at MBh 13.151.35–36.

"Raudreya" raudreyaḥ: The term appears to be used as the name of a sage only in this passage. It is not found in any of the dictionaries or lexicons consulted. Prācīnacaritrakośa (s.v. raudra) mentions one Raudra, the expected taddhita derivation from rudra, as one of the four sons of Śukrācārya, but gives no source. D5–7,10,11,G2,M10, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead kauṣeyaḥ, "Kauṣeya."

5. "And there were also the seven great seers" te 'pi sapta maharṣayaḥ: The list here is rather different from the standard list of the saptarṣis, who are associated with the constellation Ursa Major. See Benoît's note on this (1999, p. 1708). The verse does not explicitly identify the region in which the sages dwell; however, the north is clearly intended. For similar lists, see MBh 12.201.31–32 and 13.151.35–36. In both of those lists the direction is clearly identified as the north (MBh 12.201.32—udīcīṃ diśam; 13.151.36 —uttarāṃ diśam). The list provided at MBh 12.201.21–32 is virtually identical with the one found here. Compare, too, 10* (below) where a large number of manuscripts, primarily southern, feel this lack and mention the northern direction.

"Vasiṣṭha" vasiṣṭhaḥ: Cg and Ct note an apparent contradiction here: since Vasiṣṭha as the purohita of the Ikṣvāku lineage would maintain his permanent residence in Ayodhyā, how is it that he is enumerated among the seven sages who [according to the vulgate text] dwell in the north? (See 10* below.) Their explanation is that, like the sage Agastya, Vasiṣṭha maintains an earthly bodily form in order to amass ascetic power, as well as a heavenly form. Cg adds that since the reference here is to the seven seers, the Vasiṣṭha who dwells in the city is not enumerated here. (nanu vasiṣṭho 'yodhyāyāṃ purohitatayā nityaṃ vartamānaḥ katham idānīm udīcyā diśaḥ samāgata ity ucyate. satyam. yathāgastyo jyotirmaṇḍalastho 'pi. bhuvi tapaḥsamārjanāya śarīrāntare sthita āgatas tathā vasiṣṭho 'pi jyotirmaṇḍalasthaḥ saptarṣibhiḥ samāgata iti bodhyam. tadāgamanadaśāyāṃ nagarastho vasiṣṭho nāyāto 'ta eva na parigaṇitaḥ.) Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1907) notes this in a footnote to its translation.

Following verse 5, V1,D5–7,10,11,T1–3,G,M, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of one line [10*]: "These seven always dwell in the northern region (udīcyāṃ diśi saptaite nityam eva nivāsinaḥ /)."

6. "they paused so that their arrival could be announced" viṣṭhitāḥ pratihārārthaṃ: Literally, "stood for the sake of announcement [of their arrival]." A common meaning of the term pratihāra (v.l. pratīhāra) is "doorkeeper or porter." The commentators have generally understood the term in this sense, and it will be used in this sense in the following verse. As Ct understands it, the phrase is elliptical and should be understood to mean that the sages are waiting at the gate for the doorkeeper to announce in his own words to Rāma that they have arrived (pratihāro dvāḥsthaḥ tadarthe [NSP tadarthaṃ] tanmukhena rāmāya svāgamananivedanārthaṃ viṣṭhitā dvāri sthitā ity arthaḥ). Cr understands similarly. Cg merely quotes Amarakośa 3.3.170 (dvāri dvāḥsthe pratīhāra ity amaraḥ). We, however, understand the term in the sense that Apte (s.v. pratīhāra) gives as his meaning number seven, "intimating arrival (āgamananivedana)." Apte cites this verse in support of that definition. A similar use of the term pratīhāra can be found in Bhāsa's SvapnVā, 6, line 9. Compare the use of the term pratihāraṇa at 2.30.23 (= GPP 2.33.30), in the sense of "admittance to or audience with [the king]."

Following verse 6, D5,7,10,11,T3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of one line [11*]: "learned in the vedas and their ancillary sciences (vedāṅga) and expert in the various śāstras (vedavedāṅgaviduṣo nānāśāstraviśāradāḥ /)."

Following 11*, D5,7,10,11,T3 (following 12*), and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert, while D6,T1,2,G,M1–3,5–10 insert following verse 6, a passage of two lines [13*]: "The foremost of sages, righteous Agastya, said to the doorkeeper, 'Announce to [Rāma] Dāśarathi that we seers have arrived'[1] (dvāsthaṃ provāca dharmātmā agastyo munisattamaḥ / nivedyatāṃ dāśarather ṛṣīn asmān upāgatān //)."

[1] "that we seers have arrived" ṛṣīn asmān upāgatān: D5–7,10,11,G1,2,M5,10, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read the grammatically normative nominative ṛṣayo vayam āgatāḥ. Cr explains the syntax: "Agastya said to the doorkeeper: 'Let it be announced in the presence of Dāśarathi, "We seers have arrived" ' (vayam ṛṣaya āgatā iti dāśaratheḥ samīpe nivedyatām iti dvāḥsthaṃ praty agastyaḥ provāca)."

7. "So then" tatas . . . atha: Ñ1,V1,D3,6,10,11,T3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read drutam, "swiftly," for atha, "then."

"hastening . . . quickly" tūrṇam . . . āśu: The expression is redundant. The southern commentators, whose text places pādas 7cd in a verse separate from 7ab, do not note this redundancy. On the other hand, as noted above, these same commentators read drutam for the critical edition's atha, creating a similar redundancy between tūrṇam and drutam. Ct, concerned about this redundancy understands tūrṇam to refer to mental haste or agitation, and drutam to physical speed. (tūrṇam iti mānasī tvarā. drutam iti kāyiky uktā.) Ct also notes that the term āśu, "quickly," expresses the fact that the doorkeeper is in such haste that he does not consider whether or not it is a convenient moment for the king (āśv ity anena rājāvasaraparīkṣābhāvo vivakṣitaḥ). Only Cs, who reads all three synonymous adverbs in one verse, attempts to rationalize the repetition. He argues that there are three discrete reasons for the doorkeeper to be in such haste: 1) These venerable sages must not be made to wait, and therefore there is concern as to what will happen if they wait too long; 2) What will Rāma do when that [the delay] is announced? 3) These great men have come to see our lord. This explains the use of the three adverbs tūrṇam, drutam, and āśu. Optionally, Cs notes that one can read, as in the text of Ct, the terms drutam and tūrṇam with the previous verse. Finally, Cs proposes that the apparent redundancy between tūrṇam and drutam can be addressed by understanding the sages as instructing the doorkeeper as follows: "We have come in haste, please announce us quickly." (ete munayo 'trāvasthānānarhā bahukālavilambe kiṃ bhavati vety ekaṃ bhayam. tannibodhane rāmaḥ kiṃ karotīty aparam. ete mahātmāno 'smatsvāmidarśanārtham āgatā iti saṃbhramaś ceti tvarāhetūnāṃ trayāṇāṃ sattvāt tūrṇadrutam āśv iti bahuvāraṃ paryāyoktiḥ. tūrṇaṃ drutam ity asya pūrvaśloke vānvayaḥ. vayaṃ tūrṇam āgatā iti drutaṃ nivedyatām iti.)

Following verse 7, D5,7,10,11,T3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of one line [14*]: "He [the doorkeeper] was knowledgeable about policy and in reading gestures and was of virtuous character, skillful, and resolute" (nayeñgitajñaḥ sadvṛtto dakṣo dhairyasamanvitaḥ /).

8. "Rushing in to see" dṛśya sahasā: Literally, "having seen rashly or hastily."

"together with the seers" ṛṣibhiḥ saha: D10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead ṛṣisattamam, "that foremost of seers," an epithet, which will then apply to Agastya.

9. "the king . . . he then said" tadovāca nṛpaḥ: D5–7,10,11,T2, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead pratyuvāca tataḥ, "then he replied."

"whose radiance was like that of the newly risen sun" bālasūryasamaprabhān: Note how the poet indicates relative status by making the solar radiance of the seers contrast with the lunar splendor of Rāma in the preceding verse.

10. "bade them be seated" āsanāny ādideśa ha: Literally, "he ordered or assigned seats." Most of the translators consulted understand that Rāma orders seats to be brought for the sages. We, however, are inclined to read the phrase as does Gorresio (1870, p. 2), "li invitò a sedere."

Following verse 10ab, D5–7,10,11,T3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of one line [16*]: "After honoring[1] [them] with water to wash their feet, the guest-offering,[2] and so forth, he respectfully presented each of them with a cow[3] (pādyārghyādibhir ānarcya gāṃ nivedya ca sādaram)."

[1] "After honoring" ānarcya: Literally, "having honored." D5,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead the finite liṭ (perfect) form, ānarca, "he praised."

[2] "with . . . the guest-offering, and so forth" -arghyādhibhiḥ: The arghya is the traditional welcome-offering made to a respected or venerable visitor. The full offering of eight items consists of water, milk, kuśa grass, curds, butter, rice, barley, and white mustard seed (āpaḥ kṣīraṃ kuśāgraṃ ca dadhi sarpiḥ sataṇḍulam / yavaḥ siddhārthakaś caivāṣṭāṅgo 'rghaḥ prakīrtitaḥ //; quoted by Apte [s.v. arghaḥ]).

[3] "each of them with a cow" gām: Literally, "a cow." We agree with Ct and Cr in understanding that Rāma offers one cow to each of the sages (pratyekam iti śeṣaḥ—so Ct). Cr additionally understands that by the term gām, "cow," is meant "a bull" (vṛṣabham). Cows are a highly valued gift. For examples of the gifting of a cow to a guest, along with other appropriate gifts, such as a good seat, water for washing the feet, and arghya, see MBh 12.313.5 and BhāgP 10.38.38–39. Compare 7.51-1* and 7.51-2*, where the story of King Nṛga is related.

11. "on comfortable seats, which were splendidly covered" svāstīrṇeṣu sukheṣu ca /. . . āsaneṣu: Literally, "having good covers and comfortable." D5,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead mahatsu ca vareṣu ca, "large and excellent." Ct understands vareṣu to mean "costly (bahumūlyeṣu)," while Cr glosses simply, "excellent, outstanding (uttameṣu)."

Following 11ab, D5–7,10,11,T3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of one line [17*]: "which were strewn with kuśa grass[1] and covered with deer skin (kuśāntardhānadatteṣu mṛgacarmayuteṣu ca /)."

[1] "which were strewn with kuśa grass" kuśāntardhānadatteṣu: Literally, "which had been given a covering of kuśa."

12. "Rāma . . . him" rāmeṇa . . . rāmam: Literally, "by Rāma . . . [to] Rāma."

13. Following verse 13, D6,7 (after 15ab),10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of one line [21*]: "Thank heavens, your majesty, you have slain Rāvaṇa, 'he who makes the worlds reverberate with his cries'[1] (diṣṭyā tvayā hato rājan rāvaṇo lokarāvaṇaḥ /)."

[1] "Rāvaṇa, 'he who makes the worlds reverberate with his cries' " rāvaṇo lokarāvaṇaḥ: This is a common alliterative epithet of Rāvaṇa. See notes to 7.16.27.

14. "the lord of the rākṣasas" rākṣaseśvaraḥ: Ñ2,V1,2,B3,4,D7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead putrapautravān, "together with [lit., 'possessing'] sons and grandsons."

"present you with a serious challenge" bhāraḥ sa te: Literally, "[was] a burden for you." As Ct notes, the sense is that killing Rāvaṇa was a minor task for Rāma (tadvadhas taveṣatkara ity arthaḥ).

15. "together with his sons and grandsons" putrapautravān: Literally, "possessing sons and grandsons." KK (7.1.16d) and VSP (7.1.19d) read instead rākṣaseśvaraḥ, "lord of the rākṣasas."

"together with your wife" saha bhāryayā: D6,7,10,11,G2,M2,6–8,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead saha sītayā, "together with Sītā."

Following verse 15, Ś,Ñ,V1,2,B,D (D5 after 15ab),T3,M3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of two lines [24*]: ". . . and, righteous hero, with your brother Lakṣmaṇa, who always acts on your behalf. And, O king, we see you together with Hanumān[1] (lakṣmaṇena ca dharmātman bhrātrā tvaddhitakāriṇā / hanūmatā ca sahitaṃ paśyāmo 'dya vayaṃ nṛpa //)."

[1] "together with Hanumān" hanumatā ca sahitam: D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead mātṛbhir bhrātṛsahitam, "together with your mothers and brothers."

16. "Thank heavens you have slain those night-roaming rākṣasas Prahasta, Vikaṭa, Virūpākṣa, Mahodara, and the unassailable Akampana." diṣṭyā prahasto vikaṭo virūpākṣo mahodaraḥ / akampanaś ca durdharṣo nihatās te niśācarāḥ: Literally, "Thank heavens, those niśācaras—Prahasta, Vikaṭa, Virūpākṣa, Mahodara, and the unassailable Akampana—were slain by you." None of the rākṣasas mentioned in this verse were actually killed by Rāma. Prahasta was slain by the monkey Nīla at 6.46.30–48. (On Prahasta, see 7.5.35–36; 7.15.4; and notes.) Vikaṭa is not known to the critical edition prior to this kāṇḍa. However, a rākṣasa of this name is found in two starred passages in the Yuddhakāṇḍa 1686*, following notes to 6.77.9–11, where Vibhīṣaṇa lists this name among those of the rākṣasas slain by the monkey forces, and at 3380*, following note to 6.111.6ab, where Rāma tells Sītā that Vikaṭa was slain by Aṅgada. There are apparently three rākṣasas named Virūpākṣa. The first is known to the Sundarakāṇḍa, where he is identified as one of the five field marshals of Rāvaṇa slain by Hanumān (5.44.2–3,27,30). The second, found in the Yuddhakāṇḍa, was an important member of the rākṣasa forces, who engaged with (6.33.10) and was finally slain by Lakṣmaṇa (6.33.35). The third, also found in the Yuddhakāṇḍa, was one of the chariot-warriors who, along with Mahodara, accompanied Rāvaṇa when he rode into battle against Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa (7.83.28). He was slain by Sugrīva at 6.84.13–33. There are two rākṣasas named Mahodara. One is a brother of Rāvaṇa (6.56.4,6.57.16–17) who is killed by the monkey Nīla at 6.58.27–29. The other is one of the most prominent of Rāvaṇa's ministers, who plays a significant role in the Yuddhakāṇḍa. He was slain by Sugrīva at 6.85.27–28. Akampana was slain by Hanumān at 6.44.11–29. For further details on these rākṣasas, including their births, see 7.5.32 and note (Virūpākṣa) and 7.5.35–36 and note (Prahasta, Vikaṭa, and Akampana).

17. "you struck down in battle Kumbhakarṇa" te samare . . . kumbhakarṇo nipātitaḥ: Literally, "Kumbhakarṇa was felled by you in battle." Kumbhakarṇa was Rāvaṇa's gargantuan younger brother who played a prominent role in the Yuddhakāṇḍa and was slain by Rāma at 6.55.89–125.

"whom no one in this world exceeded in sheer size" yasya pramāṇād vipulaṃ pramāṇaṃ neha vidyate: Literally, "greater than the measure of whom no measure here exists."

The commentators agree that pramāṇa, "size or measure," refers to the size of Kumbhakarṇa's body (pramāṇāc śarīrapramāṇāt—so Cg). Compare 7.9.26 and note, where the same phrase occurs.

Following verse 17, D1,3,4,6,7,10,11,T1–3,G,M1–4,5–10, as well as GPP (7.1.23, followed by the first of three bracketed, unnumbered verses), NSP (7.1.23 = 25*, lines 1,2), KK (7.1.21–22), and VSP (7.1.23–24), insert a passage of four lines [25*]: "And thank heavens, Rāma, you have slain those immensely powerful night-roaming rākṣasas Triśiras,[1] Atikāya,[2] Devāntaka,[3] and Narāntaka.[4][1–2] And thank heavens, Rāma, you slew in battle those two fearsome-looking[5] rākṣasas Kumbha[6] and Nikumbha,[7] the sons of Kumbhakarṇa.[8][3–4]"

[1] "Triśiras" triśirāḥ: Triśiras, also known as Trimūrdhan, was a son of Rāvaṇa. After hearing of Kumbhakarṇa's death, Triśiras vowed to avenge his maternal uncle's death (6.57.1–7); entered battle, along with his brothers Atikāya, Devāntaka, and Narāntaka (6.57.9–38); and was killed by Hanumān at 6.58.29–42. There was another rākṣasa of this name mentioned at 3.26–27, who was killed by Rāma (3.26.6–18).

[2] "Atikāya" atikāyaḥ: Atikāya was killed by Lakṣmaṇa at 6.59.46–106. Preceding Atikāya's death, his identity was the subject of conversation between Rāma and Vibhīṣaṇa at 6.59.10–35.

[3] "Devāntaka" devāntakaḥ: The rākṣasa Devāntaka was killed by Hanumān at 6.57.22–24.

[4] "Narāntaka" narāntakaḥ: Narāntaka was killed by Aṅgada at 6.57.79–89.

[5] "fearsome-looking" bhīmarūpiṇau: Literally, "of terrifying form." T1,2,G3,M3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the more or less synonymous bhīmadarśanau, "of fearsome countenance."

[6] "Kumbha" kumbhaḥ: Kumbha was the son of Kumbhakarṇa and the elder brother of Nikumbha. He was sent into battle, along with his younger brother, by Rāvaṇa (6.62.37); and was killed by Sugrīva (6.63.45–53).

[7] "Nikumbha" nikumbhaḥ: Nikumbha was one of the sons of Kumbhakarṇa and was killed by Hanumān at 6.64.11–23.

[8] D6,7,10,11,G2,M10, and GPP (7.1.23, followed by first of three bracketed, unnumbered verses) and NSP (7.1.23 = 25*, lines 1,2) omit lines 3–4. See notes to 32*, following verse 20 below.

Following 25*, M3, and KK and VSP continue with a passage of four lines [32*, lines 1,2,4,6]—despite the fact that the critical apparatus states that M3 and KK include all six of these lines. See 32*, following verse 20 below.

19. "was no great thing" na kiṃcit: Literally, "nothing at all." This reiterates the notion expressed in verse 14 above.

"But thank heavens you engaged in single combat with Indrajit Rāvaṇi and slew him." dvandvayuddham anuprāpto diṣṭyā te rāvaṇir hataḥ: Literally, "Fortunately Rāvaṇi, who had engaged in single combat, was slain by you." Only Ct and Cs appear to express any concern over the ascription of the slaying of Indrajit to Rāma, when, in fact, the mighty rākṣasa was killed by Lakṣmaṇa (Yuddhakāṇḍa 78) during the period of Rāma's incapacity (Yuddhakāṇḍa 69–78). Ct does not address the apparent contradiction explicitly. Instead, he attributes Indrajit's death in single combat to the destruction of his chariot, which had been one of the means of his attaining invisibility in battle. Ct does not, however, explicitly credit Rāma with the destruction of the chariot, which was, in fact, effected by Lakṣmaṇa and the monkeys (Yuddhakāṇḍa sarga 77). (diṣṭyā tirodhānasādhanayānabhañgena dvandvayuddham anuprāptaḥ. ata eva hato rāvaṇir iti.)

Cs addresses the problem more seriously. With his characteristic facility for extracting alternative meanings from the Sanskrit lexicon, he takes the indeclinable, diṣṭyā, "thank heavens [lit., 'by good fortune or luck']" in its nominal instrumental sense of "by [your] command." He thus takes the passage to mean "Rāvaṇi Indrajit was slain by your command," and indicates that we should supply the phrase "by Lakṣmaṇa." Alternatively, Cs proposes that we should read the participle hataḥ, "slain," as a causative in the sense of "caused to be slain." (te diṣṭyādiṣṭyājñayā dvandvayuddham anuprāpto rāvaṇir indrajid dhataḥ. lakṣmaṇeneti śeṣaḥ. te tvayā hato ghātita iti vā.) See notes to verses 1 above and 20 below. Benoît (1999, p. 1709) notes the inconsistency, ascribing it to a tendency to assimilate the two heroic brothers Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa and to attribute the glorious deeds to the elder of the two avatāras. It is interesting to note how here, as in the Yuddhakāṇḍa (sarga 35) and later in this kāṇḍa (7.29.20–35), Indrajit appears to be a much more formidable warrior than his supposedly all-powerful father.

20. "you were freed from that foe of the gods" tasya . . . muktaḥ suraripoḥ: Literally, "freed of that enemy of the gods." Ct understands the participle muktaḥ, "freed," to be an elliptical reference to Rāma's having been freed from the dire straits that he had encountered, such as bondage by [Indrajit's] arrows (śarabandhādikṛtaparamakṛcchrād iti śeṣaḥ). Cg understands similarly. Cs offers a number of alternative readings of the verse. His first interpretation is that the pronoun (tasya) and the noun (suraripoḥ) refer to Indrajit. The epithet "enemy of the gods" can be taken either generally to refer to the rākṣasa Indrajit, who is an enemy of the gods (suraripoḥ), or, more specifically, to refer to the enemy of the god Indra. In this latter sense, it serves as a synonym for the epithet Indrajit, "Conqueror of Indra." Cs then takes the participle muktaḥ, "freed," to refer to Lakṣmaṇa, whom he sees as having escaped from Indrajit. In Cs's second interpretation, the pronoun tasya refers to Lakṣmaṇa, and it is through his proximity that Indrajit's life breaths have been released (muktaḥ). In his third interpretation, it is Rāvaṇa who is the enemy of the gods, while the participle prāptaḥ, "achieved," in pāda d, which Cs glosses as atyantāptaḥ, "fully trusted," refers to Indrajit, who was liberated (muktaḥ) from his life breaths. Finally, Cs speculates that the adjective muktaḥ, "freed," refers to the act of slaying [Indrajit], which was not easily accomplished by anyone [in that the task was renounced and delegated to Lakṣmaṇa]. He then reads vīra prāptaḥ, "O hero, [you have] achieved," as the compound vīraprāptaḥ, which he then interprets as meaning: "He [Indrajit] who has reached the vīras, that is to say, those from whom the life breaths have departed, that is to say, the lifeless. This is to say that he has entered the assembly of his dead kinsmen, and this is the victory that you have accomplished for us and others. The real meaning is that through the conquest of enemies that was spearheaded by you, our own victory has come about." (tasya suraripoḥ sāmānyataḥ sumānasadviṣo rāvaṇeḥ. asādhāraṇanyāyena sura indras tadripor indrajitaḥ sakāśān mukto lakṣmaṇa iti tvayā vijayaḥ prāpta iti diṣṭyā mañgalam ity arthaḥ . . . tasya lakṣmaṇasya sakāśāt suraripor muktas tyājitaḥ prāṇa iti śeṣaḥ . . . suraripo rāvaṇasya prāpto 'tyantāpta indrajin muktaḥ prāṇair iti śeṣaḥ. muktaḥ sarvair apy asusādhavadha iti tyaktaḥ. vīraprāpto vigata īraḥ prāṇo yebhyas te vīrā niṣprāṇās tān prāptaḥ. mṛtasvajanasaṃghaniviṣṭa iti tvayā vijayaḥ. asmadādīnām iti śeṣa iti vā. tvanmukhena paraparibhāvanena na evāyaṃ vijaya iti bhāvaḥ.) Finally, Cs notes that some scholars, having reflected on the sequence of the verses, understand that the term rāghava, as found in verse one above, refers to Lakṣmaṇa, who is being praised throughout the opening stanzas by Agastya. (idaṃ padyapadyām abhipadyādyapadyastharāghavam ity etal lakṣmaṇam ity api vicakṣaṇāḥ kecid vyācakṣate.) This is, no doubt, based on the fact that it is Lakṣmaṇa, not Rāma, who kills Indrajit (6.72–78). See notes to verse 1 above.

"who rushed onward like Kāla himself" kālasyevābhidhāvataḥ: Literally, "[of him] who was rushing upon or attacking like Kāla." Ct understands the simile to refer to Indrajit's power of invisibility. Thus he suggests that Indrajit rushed forward or attacked unseen (alakṣyam abhidhāvataḥ).

Following verse 20, a number of northern and southern manuscripts, in whole or in part, insert a passage of eight lines [32*]. Six of these lines [1,2,4,6,7,8] belong to the textual tradition of Cg. See notes to 25*, following notes to verse 17 above and notes to verse 21 below. As these individual lines, taken out of context from 32*, cannot always be construed syntactically, we have rendered only the lines as they appear in the textual tradition of Cg and, to a large extent, M3. These lines read as follows:

kumbhaś caiva nimkumbhaś ca rākṣasau bhīmadarśanau /
diṣṭyā tau nihatau rāma kumbhakarṇasutau mṛdhe // [= KK 7.1.22; VSP 7.1.24]*
(See notes to 25, following notes to verse 17 above, for a translation of this verse.)
yuddhonmattaś ca mattaś ca kālāntakayamopamau / yajñakopaś ca balavān dhūmrākṣo nāma rākṣasaḥ // [= KK 7.1.23; VSP 7.1.25] kurvantaḥ kadanaṃ ghoram ete śastrāstrapāragāḥ / antakapratimair bāṇair diṣṭyā vinihitās tvayā // [= KK 7.1.24; VSP 7.1.26]
(For the translation of lines 7–8, see 32*, following note 21 below.)

"[Thank heavens you slew] Yuddhonmatta[1] and Matta,[2] who were like Yama, who brings time itself to an end, as well as the mighty Yajñakopa[3] and the rākṣasa named Dhūmrākṣa.[4][= GPP the last two bracketed, unnumbered verses between verses 7.1.23 and 7.1.25; KK 7.1.23, lines 1,2 with variants; VSP 7.1.25] And, thank heavens, even as these warriors, who were masters of weapons and divine weapon-spells, wrought their horrific slaughter, you struck them down with arrows, which were like Yama, the ender of all things [= KK 7.1.24, lines 4,6 with variants; VSP 7.1.26]."

[1] "Yuddhonmatta" yuddhonmattaḥ: This figure is not known to the critical edition; however, the name, along with the abbreviated Unmatta, is considered an alternative name for Mahodara by some commentators. At Yuddhakāṇḍa sarga 85, Mahodara fought with Sugriva and was slain by him at 7.85.27. For further details on this rākṣasa, see 7.5.32 and notes.

[2] "Matta" mattaḥ: This figure is not known to the critical edition; however, the name is considered an alternative name for Mahāpārśva by some commentators. At Yuddhakāṇḍa sarga 86, Mahāpārśva battled with Aṅgada and was killed by him at 6.86.20–22. For further details on this rākṣasa, see 7.5.32 and notes.

[3] "Yajñakopa" yajñakopaḥ: One of the rākṣasas of Rāvaṇa's forces (6.9.1–5) with whom Rāma engaged (6.33.11, 26). He struck Rāma with his arrows and, like Suptaghna, was killed in the war by Rāma (6.33.27) as the narrative is reconstructed in the critical edition. He, too, was among those listed by Vibhīṣaṇa as slain by the monkey forces at 1686*, following notes to 6.77.9–11. He is also mentioned at 7.5.32.

[4] "Dhūmrākṣa" dhūmrākṣaḥ: Dhūmrākṣa was called to battle by Rāvaṇa (6.41.18–19) and was killed by Hanumān (6.42.25–35 and notes). See, too, 7.5.35–36 and note.

Following verse 20, D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of one line [33*]: "Having heard about the slaying of Indrajit, we all felicitate you (abhinandāma te sarve saṃśrutyendrajito vadham /)."

21. D6,7,10,11,G2,M10, and GPP, NSP, KK, and VSP and transpose 21ab and 21cd.

"We . . . gentle Rāma" naḥ saumya: Literally, "of us . . . O gentle [one]." D6,7,10,11,T1,2,G, M2–5,7,9,10 read instead cāsmākam, "and of us."

"upon hearing" saṃśrutvā: Literally, "having heard." Note the irregular tvānta form. G1,2 and GPP and Gita Press read instead the normative taṃ śrutvā, "having heard [that] he," while D6,7,10,11, and KK and VSP read tac chrutvā, "having heard that."

Following verse 20, a number of northern and southern manuscripts insert a passage of eight lines [32*], see note above. However, following verse 21, M3 and KK and VSP insert lines 7–8 of 32*: "Thank heavens, heroic[1] increaser of the house of the Raghus, you slew these and many other foremost leaders of the rākṣasas."[2]

[1] "heroic" vīra: T1,2, and GPP, VSP, and KK read instead the nominative plural vīrāḥ, which would then modify the rākṣasas.

[2] "foremost leaders of the rākṣasas" rakṣasāṃ nayakottamāḥ: D6,7,T1,2,G3,M3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead rākṣasāḥ kāmarūpiṇaḥ, "the rākṣasas, who could take on any form at will." See, too, 25*, following note 17, and 32*, following note 20, lines 1,2,4, and 6 above.

22. "precious" saumyām: Literally, "gentle, benign."

"you are to be congratulated on your victory" diṣṭyā vardhasi . . . jayena: Literally, "fortunately, you increase through victory." All translators consulted understand the root √vṛdh in its normal senses of "to grow, prosper" and take the adverb diṣṭyā, as we have done elsewhere in the passage, in its idiomatic sense of "through good fortune or thank heavens." Here, however, we agree with Apte (s.v. √vṛdh), who understands the collocation of the verb, the adverb, and an instrumental noun, here, jayena, "victory," to be an idiomatic phrase in the sense of "to have cause for congratulation, usually with diṣṭyā." Apte cites an example from Śāk 7.25.8–9. Cf. 7.23.2 and notes.

23. "of the . . . seers" ṛṣīṇām: Ś,Ñ,V1,B2,D1–4,6–12,T3,M6,8, and Lahore, GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead munīnām, "of the sages."

24. "Why is it . . . you . . . only to praise Indrajit Rāvaṇi" kim . . . praśaṃsatha rāvaṇim: Literally, "why do you praise Rāvaṇi." Cr and Cs both gloss kim artham, "for what reason or purpose," for kim, "what or why."

"sirs . . . Kumbhakarṇa and" bhavantaḥ kumbhakarṇaṃ ca: D1,10,11,M3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead bhagavantaḥ kumbhakarṇam, "O holy ones . . . Kumbhakarṇa." Cv and Ck acknowledge the critical reading as a variant and understand that it must be read as a saṃbodhana, "vocative." Ct and Cs are in agreement that the v.l. bhagavantaḥ is also to be read as saṃbodhana. Cs glosses pūjyāḥ, "praiseworthy," for bhagavantaḥ, "holy ones." For the death of Kumbhakarṇa, see 6.55.65–125.

"those two immensely powerful warriors" mahāvīryau: Literally, "the two of great strength."

25. "Why is it . . . you . . . only to praise Indrajit Rāvaṇi" kim . . . praśaṃsatha rāvaṇim: See note to verse 24 above.

"those immensely powerful warriors" mahāvīryān: Literally, "[the ones] of great strength."

Following verse 25ab, Ñ1,D7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of two lines [35*], transposing lines 1 and 2, followed by a passage of one line [36*]: "Why is it that you pass over those immensely powerful warriors—the unassailable Matta and Unmatta,[1] Devāntaka and Narāntaka,[2] as well as Atikāya,[3] Triśiras,[4] and the night-roaming rākṣasa Dhūmrākṣa[5]—only to praise Indrajit Rāvaṇi?[6] (atikramya mahāvīryān kiṃ praśaṃsatha rāvaṇim / mattonmattau ca durdharṣau devāntakanarāntakau [35] // atikāyaṃ triśirasaṃ dhūmrākṣaṃ ca niśācaram [36] //)"

[1] "Matta and Unmatta" mattonmattau: See 32*, following note to 20 above, especially, notes 1 and 2.

[2] "Devāntaka and Narāntaka" devāntakanarāntakau: See 25*, following note to 17 above, especially notes 1 and 2.

[3] "Atikāya" atikāyam: See 25*, following note to 17 above, especially note 2.

[4] "Triśiras" triśirasam: See 25*, following note to 17 above, especially note 1.

[5] "Dhūmrākṣa" dhūmrākṣam: See 32*, following note to 20 above, especially note 4.

[6] "Indrajit Rāvaṇi" rāvaṇim: Literally, "Rāvaṇi." See note to verse 19 above.

26. "power . . . strength" prabhāvaḥ . . . balam: Ct, the only commentator to remark on the near synonyms, understands the former to refer to the power attained by Indrajit through his austerities and the latter to his physical strength. (prabhāvas tapaḥprabhāvaḥ. balaṃ śārīram.)

27. "if it is not a secret, and if you can tell me" yadi guhyaṃ na ced vaktum: Literally, "If it is not a secret to speak." The syntax of the gerundive guhyam, "to be kept hidden," and the infinitive vaktum, "to speak," is a bit awkward. Various commentators and translators either read the infinitive with śakyam, "to be able," in pāda a (vaktuṃ śakyam) in the sense of "[if] it can be spoken," as we have done, and/or with the verb phrase na khalv ājñāpayāmi vaḥ in pāda b in the sense of "I do not command you to speak."

"how did he conquer Śakra" kathaṃ śakro jitas tena: Literally, "How was Śakra defeated by him?" D6,7,10,11,G2,M9, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead śakro 'pi vijitas tena, which then construes with katham, "how," of pāda f, lending the phrase the sense "[How] was even Śakra defeated by him?"

Following verse 27, D6,7,10,11,T1,2,G,M1,2,4–10 (M6,8 insert after 27ef), and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert, while V3,D1,3,4,T3 continue following 39*, a passage of one line [40*]: "How is it that Rāvaṇa's son was so much more powerful than his father?[1] (kathaṃ ca balavān putro na pitā tasya rāvaṇaḥ /)"

[1] "How is it that Rāvaṇa's son was so much more powerful than his father?" kathaṃ ca balavān putro na pitā tasya rāvaṇaḥ: Literally, "And how was the son powerful, not his father Rāvaṇa?"

Following 40*, D7,10,11,T3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of four lines (consisting of four pādas) [41*]: "How is it that he was superior to his father in the great battle? And how did that rākṣasa come to be the conqueror of Śakra? And how did he obtain his boons? Please tell me all of this now, foremost of sages,[1] since I am asking so earnestly.[2] (kathaṃ pituś cāpy adhiko mahāhave śakrasya jetā hi kathaṃ sa rākṣasaḥ / varāś ca labdhāḥ kathayasva me 'dya pāpracchataś cāsya munīndra sarvam //)"

[1] "foremost of sages" munīndra: Literally, "lord or best [lit., 'Indra among'] of sages." The vocative singular refers to Agastya, who will respond to Rāma's questions in the following sargas. See Benoît's note (1999, p. 1709).

[2] "since I am asking so earnestly" me . . . pāpṛcchataś cāsya: Literally, "[to me] that one who is intently asking." KK and VSP read instead tatpṛcchataḥ, "[to me] who am asking that."

The meter is vaṃśasthavila (vaṃśastha).

Sarga 2

1. "the pot-born sage . . . Agastya" kumbhayoniḥ: Literally, "[the one] having a pot for a womb." The mythological literature refers to several sages who are born directly from semen deposited in a jar or pot. Aside from Agastya, who is intended here, this or similar epithets could also refer to Droṇa, Vasiṣṭha, and the like. For references to Agastya as "pot-born," see 1127*9–10 (inserted into translation following 7.67.5); 7.67.8; 7.69.22; and 7.73.2. For Droṇa's birth, see MBh 1.121.3–5. For Vasiṣṭha's birth, see ṚV 7.33.11–13. All translations consulted, with the exception of Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1911), which simply renders, "Agastya," treat the epithet as if it were a proper noun. 7.51-4* and 7.51-5* (= App. I, No. 8, lines 124–212) tell of the birth of both Agastya and Vasiṣṭha from the same pot in which the semen of Mitra and Varuṇa had been deposited. The story is widespread and referred to in numerous texts. For example, see BhāgP 6.18.5–6 and 9.13.6; MatsyaP 60.20–3; PadmaP 1.22.23–40; ViṣṇuDhaP 1.117.21–28; ViṣṇuP 4.5.11–12; etc. See, too, S. Goldman 2015b.

"he spoke these words" vākyam etad uvāca ha: KK and VSP read rāmam instead of vākyam, lending the pāda the sense "he said this to Rāma."

2. "your majesty" rājan: Ś,Ñ1,V1,3,B4,D2,5,7–12,T3,M3,6, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the vocative rāma, "Rāma."

"how he came to possess" yathā vṛttaṃ tasya: Literally, "how or in what way of him there was." D10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read tathā, "in this way," for yathā, "in which way," while KK and VSP read instead kathā[vṛttam], yielding a compound with the sense of "the history of the story." Cs, citing Viśvakośa, understands the participle vṛttam, "what took place or transpired," in the sense of karma, "action," referring to Indrajit's great feats (yathā vṛttaṃ tadīyaṃ karma tathā vakṣyāmīti śeṣaḥ . . . karmaṇi vṛttam iti viśvaḥ).

"how he slaughtered his enemies in battle, and how he came to be invulnerable to his foes" jaghāna ca ripūn yuddhe yathāvadhyaś ca śatrubhiḥ: D1,3,4,6,7,10,11,T1,2,G2,3,M1,

2,4,7,9,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead jaghāna śatrūn yenāsau na ca vadhyaḥ sa śatrubhiḥ, "by means of which he slaughtered his foes and was not vulnerable to his enemies." Ck, Cg, Ct, and Cr remind us that asau, "he," refers to Indrajit Rāvaṇi.

3. "I . . . you" ahaṃ te: B4,D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tāvat te. The commentators interpret the adverb tāvat in the sense of "first (prathamam)." This variant is no doubt responsive to the concern that Rāma has asked specifically about Indrajit, while Agastya begins by telling him the history of Rāvaṇa and his entire lineage. The commentators generally understand the verse to be elliptical and interpret it to mean that Agastya is saying that he will first tell about Rāvaṇa and then, later on, tell about Indrajit (tāvat prathamaṃ rāvaṇasya kulādi bravīmi paścād rāvaṇeś ca vakṣyāmīti śeṣaḥ—so Ct; Ck, Cg similarly). Agastya does not actually discuss Indrajit specifically until sarga 25.

4. "in the Kṛta Yuga" kṛtayuge: The Kṛta Yuga is the first, and most perfect, of the four yugas, or "cosmic eras," that together constitute one of the recurrent mahāyugas, or "great cycles."

"named Pulastya" pulastyo nāma: As several of the commentators note, Pulastya is one of the ten prajāpatis, or "lords of creatures," who are mind-born sons of the original Prajāpati Brahmā. See ManuSm 1.34–35.

"He was just like Grandfather Brahmā, as he was, indeed, the son of that Lord of creatures." prajāpatisutaḥ . . . sākṣād iva pitāmahaḥ: Literally, "Prajāpati's son, like the grandfather in person." Here, we must understand that the terms prajāpatiḥ, "Lord of creatures," and pitāmahaḥ, "grandfather," are both epithets of the primal creator divinity, generally known as Brahmā. The idea here, as noted by Cg, is that Pulastya is just like his father (pitṛtulyaḥ). Ck and Ct expand on the basis for the simile by noting that its real intent is that Pulastya is like the Grandfather in possessing, like him, "the abilities to reward and punish, produced by the power of his austerities (tapovaibhavajanitanigrahānugrahasāmarthyair iti bhāvaḥ—so Ct; Ck similarly)."

5. "need not be rehearsed" nānukīrtyāḥ: Literally, "are not to be proclaimed after." We agree with Cg, who understands the term to be a gerundive in the sense of "to be described (varṇyāḥ)." Cr, on the other hand, appears to take it as an instrumental of the noun anukīrtiḥ, glossing, "by telling and being repeated by others (kathanena . . . paropadeśena)."

"All this can be inferred merely from his epithet" vaktuṃ śakyaṃ hi nāmataḥ: Literally, "for [it is] capable of being expressed by [his] name." We understand with Ck, Cg, and Ct that the excellence of Pulastya's virtues can be grasped merely through the mention of his name (tatsaṃkīrtanata eva tadguṇādhikyaṃ vaktuṃ śakyam—so Ct). Cr, however, takes a different approach. His understanding is that the mere mention of "Prajāpati's son" is not sufficient to express [his virtues], but that one would understand that he is Prajāpati's son merely by seeing him (nāmato nāmoccāraṇenaiva vā prajāpateḥ putra iti vaktuṃ na śakyaṃ taddarśanamātreṇaivāyaṃ prajāpateḥ putra iti jñāyata ity arthaḥ).

Following verse 5, D7,10,11,T3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of two lines [43*]: "Since he was Prajāpati's son, he was beloved of the gods. Indeed, that man of great intellect was cherished[1] by all the world for his excellent virtues. (prajāpatisutatvena devānāṃ vallabho hi saḥ / iṣṭaḥ sarvasya lokasya guṇaiḥ śubhrair mahāmatiḥ //)"

[1] "cherished" iṣṭaḥ: Literally, "desired." KK and VSP read instead the awkward hṛṣṭaḥ, "delighted or excited," which is difficult to construe in this context. The variant is not noted in the critical apparatus. The commentators are silent, and no translator renders the variant. The reading may, perhaps, be a typographical error in KK that was later replicated in VSP. In the GPP (1920, p. 2732), the editor has noted this variant in a footnote to the verse (GPP 7.2.6).

6. "Because of his profound devotion to righteousness" dharmaprasaṅgena: Ck, Cg, and Ct understand the compound to refer to Pulastya's desire to practice austerities (tapaḥsaṃpādanecchayā). Cr similarly understands, "attachment to austerity (tapaāsaktyā)."

"the ashram of Tṛṇabindu" tṛṇabindvāśramam: Cg notes that Tṛṇabindu is the name of a seer (tṛṇabindur nāmarṣiḥ). D6,T1,2,G,M, and the text of Ck (and, as a variant, noted in KK) read the variant Tṛṇāgni. See note to verse 7 below.

"went . . . where he made his dwelling" gatvā nyavasat: Literally, "having gone, he dwelt." V2,D10,G1, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead gatvāpy avasat, "and having gone, he dwelt."

7. "But some young girls . . . distracted him" vighnaṃ kurvanti kanyakāḥ: Literally, "girls make an impediment or obstacle." The term kanyakāḥ refers to girls or young women who are unmarried. Here, the young women are clearly postpuberty, as they will face the threat of pregnancy. The diversion of a sage from his ascetic practices by the presence of beautiful young women is a cliché of the epic and purāṇic literature. See also Benoît's note (1999, p. 1709). Ct cites a maxim, the tṛṇāgninyāya, or the maxim of fire and straw, to illustrate his contention that the distraction caused by the women is not intentional. (vighnaṃ kurvanti tṛṇāgninyāyena. na tu buddhipūrvam.) It is curious that the maxim appears to echo the alternate name of the sage Tṛṇabindu; see note to verse 6 above. The idea would appear to be that the mere presence or proximity of fire sets grass ablaze. Cr offers another maxim that appears to have much of the same sense. This is the maxim of the contact of fire with a pot of ghee (vahnighṛtakumbhasambandhanyāya).

The words kurvanti and kanyakāḥ are marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. See notes to verse 28 below.

8. "gods" deva-: The manuscript tradition is divided here and the reading is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead ṛṣi-, "seers."

"and" ca yāḥ: Literally, "and who." The phrase is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition.

"used to come . . . in the course of their play" krīḍantyaḥ . . . upapedire: Literally, "they approached, playing."

9. "would always come to that place to play" taṃ deśaṃ gatvā krīḍanti: Literally, "having gone to that place, they play."

Following verse 9, D7,10,11,T3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert, while Ś,Ñ,V,B,D2,5,8,9,12, and Lahore and Gorresio substitute for 9ab and read after 9cd, a passage of one line [45*]: "Because that place where the twice-born sage Pulastya [dwelt] was so delightful (deśasya ramaṇīyatvāt pulastyo yatra sa dvijaḥ /)."

Following verse 9, D1,3,4,6,T1,2,G,M1–4,6–10 insert, while D7,10,11,T3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert following 45*, a passage of one line [46*]: "Singing, playing musical instruments, and dancing [those girls] (gāyantyo vādayantyaś ca lāsayantyas tathaiva ca /)."

Following 46*, D1,3,4,7,10,11,T1,2,G1,3,M1,3,6, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert, while D6,G2,M2,4,5,7–10 substitute for 7cd and read after 46*, a passage of one line [47*]: "Those blameless girls distracted[1] that ascetic sage (munes tapasvinas tasya vighnaṃ cakrur aninditāḥ /)."

[1] "distracted" vighnaṃ cakruḥ: Literally, "they made an obstacle or impediment." See notes to verse 7 above.

10. "furious" ruṣṭaḥ: The word is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. Ś,Ñ,V,B,D1–5,8,9,12,T3,M6, and KK and VSP read instead the synonymous kruddhaḥ.

"within sight of me" me darśanam: The phrase is ambiguous, as it leaves unclear who is the agent and who is the object of the seeing. In Hinduism, darśana, or "sight," is reciprocal between a deity or venerable person, on the one hand, and the worshiper or disciple on the other. Here, however, as is made clear in verse 14 below, Tṛṇabindu's daughter is impregnated the moment she sees Pulastya. Compare, though, verse 19 below where the issue is avoided. The motif of being cursed for seeing or being seen by a powerful being is found elsewhere in the literature. See 7.78.11–29 and notes. See, too, R. Goldman 1993; Eck 1998; and S. Goldman 2016.

11. "When they heard" śrutvā: Literally, "having heard. Ś,D2,7–12, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tasya, "of him."

"all the girls" tās tu sarvāḥ: Literally, "but or and they all (feminine)."

"who had been coming there" pratigatāḥ: Literally, "who came or went there." Ś,D2,7–12,M1, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead pratiśrutya, "having heard."

12. "his ashram" āśramapadaṃ tasya: Literally, "his ashram site." Cr understands the reference to be Pulastya's ashram (pulastyāśramam). This is made clear in verse 18 below.

Following verse 12, D7,10,11,T3,M3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of one line [50*]: "And there she did not see[1] any friend that had come (na cāpaśyac ca sā tatra kāṃcid abhyāgatām sakhīm /)."

[1] "And . . . she did . . . see" cāpaśyac ca sā: KK and VSP read instead sāpaśyat sthitā, "and standing . . . she did . . . see."

13. "Now at that very time, that [great seer]" tasminn eva tu kāle saḥ: This pāda is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. D6,7,10,11,T1,2,G,M1,4,5,7,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tasmin kāle mahātejāḥ, "at that time [the great seer] of immense blazing energy."

"shining with radiance through his austerities" tapasā dyotitaprabhaḥ: D1,3,4,6,7,10, 11,T1,2,G,M1,2,4–10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tapasā bhāvitaḥ svayam, "purified or sanctified through his own austerities." Cr glosses prakāśitaḥ, "illuminated, glowing," for bhāvitaḥ, thus giving the passage a similar sense to that of the critical reading.

14. "caught sight" dṛṣṭvā: Literally, "having seen." See note to verse 10 above.

"that sage, so rich in austerities" caiva tapodhanam: Literally, "and . . . having austerity for wealth." This is a common kenning for an ascetic. D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead vai tapaso nidhim, "indeed the storehouse of asceticism."

"she grew pallid" abhavat pāṇḍudehā sā: Literally, "she become one whose body was pale." The commentators agree that the pallor is caused by or is a sign of pregnancy (pāṇḍudehā garbhiṇītvāt—so Cg; Ck, Ct similarly).

"showed clear signs of pregnancy" suvyañjitaśarīrajā: Literally, "she was one in whom that which is produced in the body was clearly manifest." Cv, Ct, and Cr agree that the term śarīraja, "born in the body," is a kenning for a fetus (garbhaḥ) (suvyañjitaśarīrajā śarīrāj jayata iti śarīrajo garbhaḥ suprakāśito yasyāḥ sā—so Ct; Cv and Cr similarly).

15. "When she saw the appearance of her body, she was terrified. Thinking, 'What has happened to me?' she went and stood before her father." dṛṣṭvā paramasaṃvignā sā tu tadrūpam ātmanaḥ / idaṃ me kiṃ nv iti jñātvā pitur gatvāgrataḥ sthitā //: Literally,

"Having seen that form of herself, she was supremely frightened. Having realized, 'What indeed is this of me?' having gone, she stood before [her] father." The textual variants for this verse are numerous and scattered. GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read a somewhat different verse (= GPP 7.2.18; KK 7.1.18; VSP 7.2.18):

babhūva ca samudvignā dṛṣṭvā taddoṣam ātmanaḥ /
idaṃ me kiṃ tv iti jñātvā pitur gatvāśrame sthitā //

When she saw that defect of her body, she was frightened. Thinking, "What has happened to me?" she went and stayed in her father's ashram.

It appears from the context and the presumed naïveté of the virginal ashram girl that we are to understand her question to mean that she has no idea what is happening to her body. In other words, she is innocent of the facts of pregnancy. Cg, however, believes that she understands that she is pregnant but cannot imagine the cause of her condition (idaṃ me kim etat kimiti jñātvā garbhakāraṇam idaṃ kiṃ tv iti jñātvety arthaḥ). Ck understands similarly.

16. "How could you have come to have so unseemly an appearance?" kiṃ tvam etat tv asadṛśaṃ dhārayasy ātmano vapuḥ: Literally, "Why do you bear this inappropriate appearance of your body?"

17. "that sage so rich in austerities" tapodhanam: See note to verse 14 above.

19. "that a single one of my friends had come there" tatra kāṃcid apy āgatāṃ sakhīm: Literally, "any friend at all who had come there." Ś1,Ñ,V2,3,B1,3,D2,3,6–12,T3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read abhyāgatām for apy āgatām, lending the phrase the less emphatic sense of "none of my friends had come there."

"when I saw" dṛṣṭvā cāham: D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead dṛṣṭvā trāsāt, "having seen [I came] from fear."

21. "He realized" vijñāya: Literally, "having realized."

"Taking his daughter, he went" gṛhītvā tanayāṃ gatvā: Literally, "having taken the daughter, having gone."

22. "please accept as alms" bhikṣāṃ pratigṛhāṇemām: Literally, "Please accept this alms." Ct and Cg anticipate the objection on Pulastya's part that, as a celibate, he would have no use for a wife by arguing that since she freely offered herself, she must be accepted. They cite Vasiṣṭha Dharmasūtra 14.16 in substantiation of this claim. (nanūrdhvaretaso mama nānayā prayojanaṃ tatrāha svayam udyatām iti. "udyatām āhṛtāṃ bhikṣāṃ purastād apraveditaṃ / bhojyāṃ mene prajānātho hy api duṣkṛtakarmaṇaḥ" ity ukteḥ. svayam udyateyaṃ grahyaivety arthaḥ—so Ct; Cg similarly.) (Compare Āpastambīyadharmasūtra 1.6.19.13, which knows this verse as well, but with a slight variant: "bhojyāṃ mene prajāpatir api duṣkṛtakāriṇaḥ.") See, too, ManuSm 3.27.

23. "as you are subduing your senses" śrāmyamāṇendriyasya te: Literally, "of you whose senses are being overcome or subdued." KK and VSP read instead the simplex śramyamāṇa-, a reading unattested in the critical apparatus. This may be the result of a typographical error, but, in any case, the compound would have to be interpreted similarly.

24. "eager to accept the girl" jighṛkṣuḥ . . . kanyām: Ck, Cg, and Ct, perhaps concerned lest we think that Pulastya may be contemplating an illicit relationship, suggest that we add the phrase "only after having first taken her hand [in marriage] according to the proper procedure (yathānyāyaṃ pāṇigrahaṇapūrvakam iti śeṣaḥ—so Ct)." Cf. notes to 7.3.4.

25. "After the king had given her away, he returned to his own ashram." dattvā tu sa gato rājā svam āśramapadaṃ tadā: Literally, "But having given, the king went then to his own ashram site." The entire line is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. KK and VSP read for pāda a, dattvā sa tu yathānyāyam, "and he, having given in the proper fashion," while D6,7,10,11,G3,M10, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read dattvā tu tanayāṃ rājā, "and the king, having given his daughter." These same texts and printed editions read gataḥ, "went," for tadā, "then," of pāda b.

Following 25cd, Ñ2,V2,3,B,D6,7,10,11,T1–3,G,M, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of one line [53*]: "And that bull among sages was pleased by her virtuous conduct and character (tasyās tu śīlavṛttābhyāṃ tutoṣa munipuṃgavaḥ /)."

26. "Bless you" bhadraṃ te: D6,7,10,11,T1,2,G2,3,M1,3–5,7,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead suśroṇi, "O fair-hipped woman." See Tubb 2006.

"Therefore, I shall . . . grant you" tasmāt te vitarāmi: Literally, "Therefore, I grant you." D7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tasmād devi dadāmi, "therefore, my lady, I grant."

27. "Since you overheard . . . renowned as Viśravas" viśrutaḥ . . . tvayā . . . viśravāḥ: The child's name, Viśravas, literally, "Hearing," is thus derived from his mother's act of unintentional eavesdropping.

28. "young girl" kanyā: The term, used throughout the passage, normally refers to an unmarried woman or virgin. In this case, it is probably used intentionally to emphasize the fact that, despite her marriage, the young woman has conceived through magical means and is technically still a virgin. D6,7,10,11,T1,2,G2,3,M1,4,5,7, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read devī, "lady," instead, perhaps in an attempt to avoid the term kanyā and its implications. See notes to verse 7 above.

"with a delighted heart" praḥṛṣṭenāntarātmanā: The pāda is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition.

29. "That bull among sages, Viśravas" viśravā munipuṃgavaḥ: D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press, all with hiatus, read instead [yukto] abhavad viśravā muniḥ, "[he, endowed . . .] was the sage Viśravas." KK and VSP avoid the vowel hiatus, reading instead hy abhavat.

"filled will purity and righteousness" śaucadharmasamanvitaḥ: Ś1,D6,7,10,11,G2, 3,M1,2,4,5,7–10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead yaśodharmasamanvitam, "filled with glory and righteousness." Like the adjective vikhyātam below, the phrase must be construed with verse 28.

"was famed throughout the three worlds" sa tu lokatraye khyātaḥ: D6,7,10,11, G,M1,2,7–10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead triṣu lokeṣu vikhyātam. The meaning is similar to that of the critical reading, but the pāda, like the rest of the line, has its adjective [vikhyātam] in the accusative and so construes with the accusative viśravasam in verse 28 above. This would lend the passage the sense "soon gave birth to a son, Viśravas, endowed with glory and righteousness, and famed throughout the three worlds."

Following 29ab, Ñ,V2,B1,3,4,D3,5,7,10,11,T3,G1,M3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of one line [54*]: "[He was] learned, viewed all things as equal, and was devoted to the practice of religious vows (śrutimān samadarśī ca vratācāraratas tathā /)."

Sarga 3

2. "skillful" dakṣaḥ: D6,10,11,T1,M10, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead dāntaḥ, "subdued or controlled." KK and VSP read instead śāntaḥ, "tranquil, peaceful."

"He was wholly detached from all objects of the senses" sarvabhogeṣv asaṃsaktaḥ: Literally, "unattached in respect to all enjoyments." The verse consists only of a list of nominal attributes, and one must either construe it grammatically with the preceding verse or supply a verbal element, as we have done. Only Cs comments on this phrase. He offers two interpretations. The first is the obvious, explicit meaning that the sage is without desire, despite the availability of sensual objects, and so the term suggests his aversion to the things of this world. Cs also offers a rather esoteric reading in which the sequence is a single word, the sense of which is that Viśravas is unaffected by the arrows (iṣavaḥ) of Kāma, the god of love, for whom he uses the monosyllabic synonym "i." The idea here, according to Cs, is that even with his wealth of accomplishments, the great sage remains unmarried. (sarvabhogeṣu satsv apy asaṃsakto niḥspṛhaḥ. anena bhāvavairāgyaṃ sūcyate. sarvabhogeṣvasaṃsakta ity ekaṃ vā padam. sarvabhogeṣu tatsādhaneṣv er manmathasyeṣavo bāṇās tair asaṃsakto 'sambaddha iti vā. asyāpatyam iḥ. bhagavatputratvena, iḥ kāmaḥ, iyatyāṃ satyāṃ saṃpady akṛtavivāho mahāmunir iti bhāvaḥ.) The syllables [sarvabhog]eṣv asaṃsakto are marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition.

3. "Devavarṇinī" devavarṇinīm: Literally, "she of a divine appearance or complexion." Ck, Cg, and Ct understand the term to be a descriptive adjective, with the sense of "having an appearance equal to that of a divinity (devasamānarūpām)"—so Ck and Cg. Ct, however, adds that this is also the girl's name (devasamānarūpāṃ tannāmnīṃ ca). Translators are divided in this respect. Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 431), followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 380) and Benoît (1999, p. 1225), understands the word only as an adjective, while the other translators who, like us, share the critical reading, take it as a proper name. See S. Goldman 2016.

4. "in keeping with righteousness" dharmeṇa: Cr understands the term, no doubt correctly, to refer to the injunctions for the marriage ritual (vaivāhikavidhinā). Cf. notes to 7.2.24.

Following 4ab, B4,D6,7,10,11,T3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of one line [57*, line 1]: "[He accepted Bharadvāja's daughter in keeping with righteousness] with his mind intent on seeking progeny and considering his well-being[1] (prajān vīkṣikayā buddhyā śreyo hy asya vicintayan /)."

[1] "considering his well-being" śreyo hy asya vicintayan: The phrase is ambiguous because the referent of the genitive asya, "of him or of it," is not completely clear. One reasonable interpretation is that Viśravas is considering his own felicity or merit in producing a son, who will perform his funerary rites, etc. This interpretation appears to be followed in the translations of Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 432) and Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 380). Benoît (1999, p. 1226) also understands śreyaḥ to refer to Viśravas's own felicity but understands its cause to be his new bride rather than his potential offspring. Another interpretation is put forward by several of the commentators. Ct, who is paraphrasing Ck in this respect, understands that the phrase refers to Pulastya's reckoning on the virtuous qualities of his future son Vaiśravaṇa [Kubera] on the basis of his knowledge of the astrological texts. (tad guṇāguṇaparyālocikā jyotiḥśāstraviṣayā buddhiḥ. tayāsya vaiśravaṇasya śreyo vicintayan pulastyaḥ . . . tuṣṭo babhūva.) Cg and Cm understand similarly. This interpretation is followed by Dutt (1894, p. 1559) and Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 377), except that they understand Viśravas instead of Pulastya to be the subject of the participle vicintayan,"reckoning." Cr takes the pronoun asya to refer to the world in general and thus understands that Viśravas produces offspring for the benefit of the world (asya lokasya śreyo vicintayan san . . . apatyaṃ janayāmāsa). Gita Press accepts this interpretation in addition to that of the first one, rendering, "he began to think of begetting a son with a mind seeking the welfare of the people as well as with a view to promoting his spiritual welfare" (Gita Press 1969, vol. 3, p. 1913). See 57*, line 2, following notes to verse 6 below.

5. "With her . . . had" janayāmāsa tasyām: Literally, "he caused to be born in her or sired on her."

"righteous" dharmātmā: Ñ2,V1,2,B1–3,D1,3–7,10,11,T1, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead dharmajñaḥ, "that knower of dharma."

"a truly extraordinary child" apatyaṃ paramādbhutam: The pāda is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition.

"with all the virtues of a brahman" sarvair brahmaguṇaiḥ: Ck understands the virtues to be "tranquility, self-control, austerity, purity, etc. (śamo damas tapaś śaucam ityādi)," while Ct enumerates these virtues as "tranquility, austerity, purity, etc. (śamatapaḥśaucādiguṇaiḥ)." Cg lists them as "tranquility, self-control, etc. (śamadamādibhiḥ)."

6. "his grandfather" sa . . . pitāmahaḥ: Literally, "the grandfather." As Ck, Cg, and Ct note, the reference here is to Vaiśravaṇa's grandfather, Pulastya.

"saying": The word has been added.

Following 6ab, B4,D6,7,10,11,T3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of one line [57*, line 2]: "And foreseeing that his mind would be inclined toward the good[1] and that he would become the lord of wealth[2] [he chose . . . a name for him] (dṛṣṭvā śreyaskarīṃ buddhiṃ dhanādhyakṣo bhaviṣyati)."

[1] "his mind was inclined toward the good" śreyaskarīṃ buddhim: The commentators understand the reference to be to Vaiśravaṇa's mind, which will come to focus on austerities that will be the cause of his attaining that great good in the form of his status as the lord of wealth (dhaneśatvarūpaśreyaḥprāptihetubhūtatapoviṣayāṃ tasya buddhim—so Ct; Ck and Cg similarly).

[2] "that he would become the lord of wealth" dhanādhyakṣo bhaviṣyati: As indicated by Ck, Cg, Ct, and Cr, we have to understand the phrase as a direct quotation, i.e., "he will become the lord of wealth," and supply the quotation marker iti (bhaviṣyatīti).

7. "of Viśravas . . . like him" viśravasaḥ . . . viśravā iva: Literally, "of Viśravas . . . like Viśravas."

"Vaiśravaṇa" vaiśravaṇaḥ: The commentators are generally in agreement that the patronymic is derived from the substitution of the synonym Viśravaṇa for Viśravaḥ (viśravaso viśravaṇaṃ veti viśravaṇādeśaḥ—so Cg; Ck and Ct similarly).

8. "grew great as one of immense blazing energy, like a fire into which oblations are offered" avardhata mahātejā hutāhutir ivānalaḥ: For 8cd, Ś,Ñ,V1,3,B1,3,4,D,T3, and Lahore, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP substitute a similar passage of one line [59*]: "He grew great as one of immense blazing energy, like a fire that has been offered oblations (avardhatāhutihuto mahātejā yathānalaḥ /)."

9. "While that great sage was dwelling in his ashram, this idea occurred to him" tasyāśramapadasthasya buddhir jajñe mahātmanaḥ: We read the genitives in this line as a genitive absolute construction (sataḥ ṣaṣṭhī), which would lend the first line the literal sense of "While the great one was located in the ashram, an idea arose." It is also possible to take the construction as a possessive genitive, in which case the literal meaning would be "An idea arose on the part of that great one who was in the ashram." The verb jajñe, "it was born or arose," is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition.

"Controlling myself" niyataḥ: Literally, "restrained, curbed, or abstemious." D6,7,10,11, M10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead paramam, "highest," which would then modify dharmam, "righteousness," in pāda c.

10. "after each period of a thousand years" pūrṇe varṣasahasre tu: Literally, "but, when [a period of] a thousand years was completed." Ś,V1,D,T1–3,G3,M1,3,6,8,9, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead pūrṇe varṣasahasrānte, "when the end of a thousand years was completed." Our understanding of the critical reading and the variant is that Vaiśravaṇa performs each of the different practices mentioned in the following verse for a period of a thousand years, at the end of which he switches to the next. Cr understands the term -anta, "end," here to mean "middle," arguing that even though it ends in short "a," it has the sense of "in the middle." Compare notes to 6.114.35. Evidently he takes it here as an irregular variant for -antar, "in the middle." He then argues that the sage performs his different ascetic practices at the various appropriate times in the middle of the thousand-year period[s] in order to complete his vow. He also takes the adjective pūrṇe, "full," to mean "complete," which appears redundant in light of his reading -ante, and understands the phrase to mean "for the sake of the completion of his vows." (jalāśitvādiviśiṣṭo vaiśravaṇaḥ pūrṇe niyamapūrttyarthaṃ varṣasahasrānte varṣasahasramadhye taṃ tattatkāle vihitaṃ vidhiṃ vidhānaṃ akalpayad akarot. adanto 'py antaśabdo madhyavācī.)

"he adopted a different ascetic practice" taṃ taṃ vidhim avartata: Literally, "he engaged in this and that religious practice." In keeping with our reading of the phrase pūrṇe varṣasahasre, as indicated above, our understanding is that the practices referred to are carried out sequentially. This is the understanding of most of the translators consulted with the exception of Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 432), followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 380), who understands that he [i.e., Vaiśravaṇa] engaged in all of these activities without reference to sequence. D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read akalpayat, "he practiced," for avartata. Cr glosses, "he did or performed (akarot)," for this variant.

Following 10ab, D6,7,10,11,T1–3,G,M1 (after 9ab),2–5,7–10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of one line [60*]: "Constrained by a vow,[1] he performed harsh and very severe austerities (yantrito niyamenograṃ cakāra sumahat tapaḥ)."

[1] "by a vow . . . harsh" niyamenogram: D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP instead niyamair ugraiḥ, "by harsh vows."

11. "Thus he lived in turn only on water, only on air, and then on no sustenance at all." jalāśī mārutāhāro nirāhāras tathaiva ca: Literally, "He was an eater of water, he had wind for his food, and he was without food as well." See note to verse 10 above.

13. "my child of excellent vows" vatsa . . . suvrata: Literally, "O child . . . O [one] of good vows."

"Please choose" vṛṇīṣva bhadraṃ te: On the various uses of the word "bhadram" with an enclitic pronoun, see note to 6.6.4 and Tubb 2006.

"for I think that you deserve one" varārhas tvaṃ hi me mataḥ: Literally, "for my opinion [is that] you are worthy of a boon." D7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read mahāmate, "O [you] of great intellect," for hi me mataḥ, "for my opinion."

14. "I wish to be a world guardian" lokapālatvam iccheyam: Literally, "I would wish the state or condition of world protector." Indra, Yama, Varuṇa, and Kubera are traditionally considered the respective world guardians of the east, south, west, and north. See 6.105.1–3,9; 7.13.37; 7.20.18; 7.26.26; and App. I, No. 10, lines 18–19, and note 9. Cf. 7.94.3, where Brahmā is called guardian of the world.

"the keeper of all wealth" vittarakṣaṇam: Literally, "the protection of wealth." Ck, Cg, Ct, and Cr all read with the critical edition. Ck and Ct gloss, "the lordship of the heavenly treasures (vairājyanidhināthatvam)," while Cg glosses, "lordship of all wealth (aśeṣanidhināthatvam)." V2 and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read loka-, "world or worlds," for vitta-, "wealth." This reading is also ascribed to manuscript "jha" by the editor of KK. This reading makes Vaiśravaṇa ask for the redundant boons of being "a world protector (lokapāla)" and a "world guardian (lokarakṣaṇa)." This weak and inferior reading has been rendered by Dutt (1894, p. 1560), Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 432), Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 380), and Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1914). Only Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 378) and Benoît (1999, p. 1226) translate the reading of the critical edition. Kubera is identified as the lord or guardian of wealth and ruler of the yakṣas earlier in the epic (see, e.g., 6.4.16).

15. "And so" tataḥ: The reading is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. D6,7,10,11,T1,2,G,M, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP all read instead atha, "now or then."

"together with the hosts of the gods" suragaṇaiḥ sārdham: The reading is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition.

16. "I was just about to add a fourth to the group of world guardians" ahaṃ hi lokapālānāṃ caturthaṃ sraṣṭum udyataḥ: Literally, "I am eager to create a fourth among the world guardians." D6,7,10,11,G3,M10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read the emphatic particle vai for hi, "for."

17. "You shall have this position that I have created" tat kṛtaṃ gaccha: Literally, "go to that which was made." D10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead tad gaccha bata, literally, "Wonderful! Go to that." KK and VSP read instead tad gaccha tvaṃ hi, "you must go to that." This is unattested in the critical apparatus. The text of Cm, according to the critical apparatus, reads tvaṃ tu tad gaccha, "but you must go to that."

"and you shall obtain the lordship of all wealth" dhaneśatvam avāpnuhi: Literally, "attain the lordship of wealth." D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK and VSP read nidhīśatvam, "the lordship of treasure," for dhaneśatvam, "lordship of wealth."

"This very day you shall be the fourth among the world guardians—Yama, Indra, and Varuṇa" yamendravaruṇānāṃ hi caturtho 'dya bhaviṣyasi: Literally, "For you shall today be the fourth of Yama, Indra, and Varuṇa." D7,10,11,T3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead śakrāmbupayamānāṃ ca caturthas tvaṃ bhaviṣyasi, "and you shall be the fourth of Śakra, the lord of the waters, and Yama."

18. "And . . . this" etac ca: The phrase is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition.

"flying palace called Puṣpaka" puṣpakaṃ nāma vimānam: For a description of the Puṣpaka and Rāvaṇa's acquisition of it, see 7.15.29–31 and notes. See, too, 293* and note 5, following notes to 7.15.30, where its construction is also mentioned.

"You shall be the equal of the thirty gods" tridaśaiḥ samatāṃ vraja: Literally, "go to equality with the thirty." Ck, Cg, and Ct understand that Brahmā is changing Vaiśravaṇa's ontological status from that of a mere son of a seer to that of an actual divinity (na tv ṛṣiputratvenaiva tiṣṭhed ity arthaḥ—so Ct). Cr understands that Vaiśravaṇa will attain equality with the gods by virtue of his acquisition of the Puṣpakavimāna (puṣpakaṃ nāma vimānaṃ pratīgṛhṇīṣvāta eva tridaśaiḥ samatāṃ vraja).

19. "Farewell" svasti te 'stu: Literally, "may well-being be yours."

"this great boon" mahāvaram: D7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead varadvayam, "a pair of boons." This variant was probably introduced to reflect the fact that Vaiśravaṇa had really been awarded two boons. See verse 14 above.

Following verse 19, Ñ,V,B,D5–7,10,11,T3,G1,M10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of one line [61*]: "When he had spoken in this fashion, Brahmā departed for his own world[1] together with the thirty gods (ity uktvā sa gato brahmā svasthānaṃ tridaśaiḥ saha /)."

[1] "his own world" svasthānam: Literally, "his own place."

20. "the lord of wealth" dhaneśaḥ: KK and VSP read instead vane saḥ, "in the forest, he."

"prostrating himself in humility . . . words" vinayāt praṇato vacaḥ: D6,7,10,11,T,1,2, G2,3,M1–5,7–10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead prāñjaliḥ prayatātmavān, "with hands cupped in reverence that self-controlled [sage]."

21. KK and VSP transpose pādas ab and cd. This is not noted in the critical apparatus.

"from the lotus-born Brahmā" kamalayonitaḥ: Literally, "from the one whose womb or origin is a lotus." The word is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. D6,7,10,11,T1,2,G2,3,M1–5,7–10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead iṣṭaṃ pitāmahāt, "[a boon] desired from Grandfather [Brahmā]." See note to 7.2.4.

"But . . . not . . . a dwelling for me" nivāsaṃ na tu me: V1,B1,D5,10,11,G3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the slight variant nivāsanaṃ na me, "no dwelling for me."

22. "place for us to dwell" deśaṃ vāsāya naḥ: D6,7,10,11,G1,2,M1–5,7–10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead nivāsaṃ sādhu me, "a good dwelling place for me."

"where there would be no harm to any living being" na ca pīḍā bhaved yatra prāṇino yasya kasyacit: Literally, "and where there would be no oppression of any living thing whatsoever." As will become clear in verse 25 below, the island of Laṅkā is currently uninhabited, so Vaiśravaṇa's taking up residence there will not present any inconvenience to anyone. The idea is not that no creatures can come to harm in that place but that Vaiśravaṇa himself will not cause any harm.

23. "that knower of righteousness . . . knower of righteousness" dharmajña . . . dharmavit: Ś,Ñ1,V,D2,6–8,12,M7, and KK and VSP read the nominative dharmajñaḥ for the critical edition's vocative. Ś,Ñ1,V1,2,D2,5–12,T3, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read the vocative, sattama, "O excellent [Kubera]," for the critical edition's nominative dharmavit [that knower of dharma (Viśravas)], while V1,D5,6, and KK and VSP read the nominative sattamaḥ, "that excellent [Viśravas]."

Following verse 23, D6,7,10,11,T1–3,G1,3,M1,3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of one line [62*]: "On the shore of the southern ocean, there is a mountain called Trikūṭa.[1] On its peak there is [a city] as vast as great Indra's city. (dakṣiṇasyodadhes tīre trikūṭo nāma parvataḥ / tasyāgre tu viśālā sā mahendrasya purī yathā //)"

[1] "Trikūṭa" trikūṭaḥ: Literally, "having three peaks." This mountain is also mentioned at 7.5.21–22; 7.6.14, and 7.11.20. Because the city of Laṅkā is located on Trikūṭa, this mountain is mentioned numerous times in the Sundara- and Yuddhakāṇḍas (for references, see our respective indices).

24. Following verse 24, Ś2,3,Ñ,V,B,D1–7,9–12,T3,M6,10, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of one line [63*]: "You shall live there, bless you, and there you will enjoy yourself forever[1] (tatra tvaṃ vasa bhadraṃ te raṃsyase tatra nityaśaḥ /)."

[1] "and there you will enjoy yourself forever" raṃsyase tatra nityaśaḥ: D6,7,10,11,M10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead, laṅkāyāṃ nātra saṃśayaḥ, "[You shall live there] there in Laṅkā without a doubt."

Following 63*, D6,7,10,11,T3,M10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert, while T1,2,G,M1–4,7–9 insert after verse 24, a passage of one line [64*]: "It has moats[1] and ramparts of gold and is filled with weapons and engines of war[2] (hemaprākāraparikhā yantraśastrasamāvṛtā /)."

[1] "moats" -parikhā: KK and VSP read instead -parighā, "iron-beams," a variant not recorded in the critical apparatus.

[2] "filled with weapons and engines of war" yantraśastrasamāvṛtā: Unlike us and the translators consulted, who read the first two elements of the compound as a dvandva, Cg and Ct understand the compound to be a karmadhāraya, so that for them it means "filled with weapons in the form of engines of war (yantrarūpaiḥ śastraiḥ samāvṛtā)." For instruments of war that are positioned to protect Laṅkā in the Yuddhakāṇḍa, see 6.3.3–4,11,15,16,22.

25. "It was abandoned long ago by the rākṣasas" rākṣasaiḥ sā parityaktā purā: The rākṣasas were originally given Laṅkā by Viśvakarman at 7.5.17–26, and they were subsequently driven out of it by Viṣṇu at 7.8.21.

"the underworld Rasātala" rasātalatalam: Literally, "the level of Rasātala." This is the name of one of the nether regions, which are normally said to be seven in number. It is also mentioned at 7.8.7; 7.9.1–2; 7.11.1,5,6; 7.20.12; 7.23.3; and 7.61.34,35. Cf. 7.8.21 and note, where the rākṣasas are said to go to the underworld Pātāla.

Following verse 25, D6,7,10,11,T1–3,G,M1–5,7–10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of one line [65*]: "So Laṅkā is now deserted and has no lord (śūnyā saṃprati laṅkā sā prabhus tasyā na vidyate /)."

26. "You should resolve to live there." sa tvaṃ tatra nivāsāya rocayasva matiṃ svakām: Literally, "You must cause your own mind to favor living there." D6,7,10,11,T3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read gaccha putra yathāsukham for rocayasva matiṃ svakām. This lends the line the sense "You should go as you please, son, in order to live there."

27. "Then" tadā: The word is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition.

"when the righteous Vaiśravaṇa had heard his father's extremely righteous words" etac chrutvā tu dharmātmā dharmiṣṭhaṃ vacanaṃ pituḥ: Literally, "but, having heard this extremely righteous speech of the father, the righteous [one]." The entire line has been marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition.

"he settled in" niveśayāmāsa: Ñ1,V1,D6,7,10,11,T3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the more or less synonymous nivāsayāmāsa. Ck, who reads with the critical edition, glosses, "he inhabited, the meaning is 'He made his residence.' (niveśaṃ karoti niveśayati tasmāl liṭ. āvāsam akarod ity arthaḥ.)" Ct reads the variant but understands similarly. (nivāsayāmāsa. nivāsam akarod ity arthaḥ.) Ct and Cg, who also read the variant, then construe the verb syntactically with the instrumental plurals in verse 28, understanding, therefore, that Viśravas populated Laṅkā with thousands of rākṣasas (pramuditair nairṛtānāṃ sahasraiḥ saha nivāsayāmāseti sambandhaḥ).

"Laṅkā, which was situated on a mountaintop" laṅkāṃ parvatamūrdhani: Literally, "Laṅkā on a mountaintop."

28. "at his command, Laṅkā was filled" saṃpūrṇā tasya śāsanāt: Literally, "[it was] full from his command." As noted above, Cg and Ct read verses 27 and 28 together and understand the sense of the passage somewhat differently. The idea is that Vaiśravaṇa settled the city of Laṅkā, along with the rākṣasas. Ck, Cg, and Ct go on to understand that the city, as mentioned in 28cd, was filled not with rākṣasas but rather with wealth, grain, and other valuable things and not by the command of Vaiśravaṇa but rather by his [presumably benign] rule. (saṃpūrṇā dhanadhānyādisarvaiśvaryapūrṇā. śāsanāt pālanāt—so Ct.) This construction of the text is represented in the translations of Dutt (1894, p. 1561) and Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 379). Cr construes the verses as we do. See 198* and notes, following note to 7.11.25; and 201* and notes, following note to 7.11.26.

"always" sadā: T1,2,M1,3–5,7,9, and KK and VSP read instead saha, "together with." It is this reading that allows the commentators to read the instrumentals as ones of accompaniment rather than of agency.

29. "And so" atha: Ś,Ñ,V,B1,2,4,D,T3,G1, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead sa tu, "but or and he."

"in ocean-shrouded" samudraparidhānāyām: Literally, "which had the ocean for its cloak." D7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead samudraparikhāyāṃ saḥ, "in [Laṅkā] having the ocean for its moat, he . . ." KK and VSP read instead samudraparighāyāṃ tu, "and in [Laṅkā] having the ocean for its barrier." This variant is not recorded in the critical apparatus.

30. "taking the Puṣpaka flying palace" puṣpakeṇa: Literally, "with the Puṣpaka."

"dutiful" vinītātmā: Literally, "modest or well-trained." D7,10,11,M10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead dharmātmā tu, "but that righteous [one]."

"in great delight" susaṃhṛṣṭaḥ: Ś3,Ñ1,V1,D1,3,4,6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead vinītātmā, "modest, humble."

31. As elsewhere throughout the Uttarakāṇḍa, this verse presents a somewhat defective rhetorical figure in its complex simile. The major problem is that in comparing Vaiśravaṇa, who is being praised by the gods, etc., with the sun, which is simply accompanied "with its rays," there is no participle for the upamāna (sūryaḥ, "sun") corresponding to the participle abhiṣṭutaḥ, "praised," which modifies the upameya, saḥ, "he [i.e., Vaiśravaṇa]." In any case the parallelism is awkward as it is hard to understand how the sun would be "praised" by its rays. This less than deft use of alaṃkāra is characteristic of the style of the Uttarakāṇḍa, especially in its tag verses. See Brockington 1998, p. 376 on the distribution of tag verses in the Rāmāyaṇa.

"Haloed with splendor" śriyā vṛtaḥ: D5,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead sa vittapaḥ, "he, the lord of wealth."

"who were accompanied by the perfected beings and celestial bards" tathaiva siddhaiḥ saha cāraṇair api: Literally, "and together with the siddhas and cāraṇas as well." Ñ2,V2, 3,B1,2,4,D3,5,6,7,9,10,11, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tathāpsaronṛtyavibhūṣitālayaḥ,"and whose dwelling was adorned by the dancing of the apsarases." According to Ct and Cr, the ālaya, "abode," referred to here is the Puṣpaka flying palace (apsaronṛtyair vibhūṣitam ālayaṃ puṣpakaṃ yasya saḥ).

"haloed with radiance" ojasā vṛtaḥ: D1,3,4,6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead [a]vabhāsayan, "[he] causing to shine." Ct glosses the causative participle with the simplex participle śobhamānaḥ, "shining."

The meter is vaṃśasthavila (vaṃśastha).

Sarga 4

1. "that there had been rākṣasas in Laṅkā even before that time" pūrvam āsīt tu laṅkāyāṃ rakṣasām iti saṃbhavaḥ: Literally, "there was the existence of rākṣasas in Laṅkā earlier." The word pūrvam, "earlier," refers to the period before the occupation of Laṅkā by Dhanada Vaiśravaṇa, i.e., Kubera. The syntax of the line is awkward, scattered, and elliptical. We are inclined to agree with the interpretation of Cv, who understands the statement in pādas cd to be either a quote or a recapitulation of the words of Agastya alluded to in pāda a. Cv tries to improve the syntax slightly by suggesting that we move the quotation marker iti from its penultimate position in pāda d to the end of the pāda so as to include the word saṃbhavaḥ, "existence," in the quote. (rakṣasām iti saṃbhava ity atretiśabdo 'nte niveśyaḥ. agastyeritam ity anena pūrveṇa saṃbandhanīyaś ca.) See notes to 7.13.23. D10,11,T2,G3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP have a slightly easier construction, which substitutes the interrogative pronoun katham, "how," for the critical edition's pūrvam, "earlier, long ago." These texts then read for the last pāda, saṃbhavo rakṣasāṃ purā. This lends the line the sense "How is it there were rākṣasas in Laṅkā long ago?" It would seem that the question raised here is not articulated verbally, although some translators understand it in this fashion. It seems to us more likely, as several translators understand, that Rāma is merely thinking about how it is possible for rākṣasas to have lived in Laṅkā before the time of Vaiśravaṇa. Despite the fact that KK and VSP read with GPP, NSP, and Gita Press, Cg's commentary calls this interpretation into question. Not only does the critical apparatus fail to ascribe the variant reading katham, etc., to any manuscript associated with Cg, but Cg himself does not mention the interrogative adverb. His comment on the verse is that we should construe it to mean that when Rāma heard what had been stated [by Agastya] to the effect that there were rākṣasas in Laṅkā prior to its occupation by Dhanada [Kubera], that is to say, that there were rākṣasas in the waters, etc., he was filled with astonishment (laṅkāyāṃ dhanadādhiṣṭhānāt pūrvam api rakṣasāṃ saṃbhavo 'paḥsthānādisaṃbhava iti yad uktaṃ tac chrutvā vismayam āgata ity anvayaḥ). It appears that Cg is reading the same text as Cv.

2. "shaking his head in astonishment" śiraḥ kampayitvā . . . smayamānaḥ: Literally, "having shaken his head . . . being struck with wonder." We agree with the commentators in understanding the participle smayamānaḥ in the sense of "being astonished." The majority of translators—Gorresio (1870, p. 10), Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1916), Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 380), and Benoît (1999, p. 1228)—understand the verbal root √smi in its other sense of "to smile," but this seems contextually inappropriate. Our understanding is that Rāma is shaking his head to express his wonder. Benoît (1999, p. 1710), in a note, understands that Rāma is shaking his head from side to side in the familiar modern Indian gesture of agreement. But this also seems contextually improbable. In any case, it is not clear how far back the modern gesture can be traced.

"gazing fixedly at" muhur dṛṣṭvā: Literally, "having looked again and again or constantly." Cg understands, plausibly, that, despite the separation of the words, we should construe the adverb with the gerund kampayitvā, "having shaken," rather than with dṛṣṭvā, "having seen" (tato muhuḥ śiraḥ kampayitvā vismayam āgataḥ sann agastyaṃ dṛṣṭvābhyabhāṣata). Thus, he understands that Rāma shakes his head repeatedly.

"whose appearance was like that of the three sacrificial fires" tretāgnisamavigraham: Literally, "having a body equal to the three fires." The term tretāgni refers to the standard triad of fires that are placed on the vedic sacrificial ground, viz., the dakṣiṇāgni, gārhapatya, and āhavanīya.

3. "even before that time" pūrvam: Literally, "earlier." See note to verse 1 above.

"Upon hearing this from you, sir" itīdaṃ bhavataḥ śrutvā: D1,3,4,6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead śrutvedaṃ bhagavadvākyam, "having heard this speech of the holy one."

"I am astonished" vismayo janito mama: Literally, "in [lit., 'of'] me astonishment is produced." V2,B,D1,3,4,6,7,10,11,M6, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead jāto me vismayaḥ paraḥ, "in [lit., 'of'] me greatest astonishment is born." The commentaries of Ck, Cg, and Cm (critical edition, p. 645) read with the critical edition.

5. "those rākṣasas" te: Literally, "those." As Cr points out, the reference is to the ancient rākṣasas (paurvakālikarākṣasāḥ). These would be the rākṣasas for whom Viśvakarman created Laṅkā and who were driven from that city by Viṣṇu as described at 7.3.24–25.

"than . . . Kumbhakarṇa" kumbhakarṇāt: See note to 7.1.16.

"[than] . . . Prahasta" prahastāt: See 7.1.16; 7.5.35–36; 7.14.1–2; 7.15.4; and notes.

"[than] . . . Vikaṭa" vikaṭāt: See 7.1.16; 7.5.35–36; and notes.

6. "progenitor" pūrvakaḥ: Literally, "ancestor or forefather."

"What was the power of his austerities?" kiṃtapobalaḥ: Literally, "he [was] of what ascetic power?" Ñ1,V1,D1,3,4,7,10,11,T3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead ca balotkaṭaḥ, "and abounding in strength," lending the pāda the sense "And [what was the name] of that immensely powerful one."

"long ago" purā: Ś1,3,Ñ1,V1,D1–3,5–12,T3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead katham, "how." This would lend the pāda the sense "How were they driven out by Viṣṇu?"

7. "blameless sage" anagha: Literally, "O blameless [one]."

"Just as the sun dispels the dark . . . please dispel." nuda bhānur yathā tamaḥ: Literally, "[you] must drive away [curiosity] . . . as the sun, the darkness."

"this curiosity" kautūhalam: V2 and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead the synonymous variant kutūhalam.

"that has been produced in me" kṛtaṃ mahyam: Literally, "made for me." Ñ2,V2,B,D1, 3,4,6,7,10,11,M2,6,10, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read idam, "this," for kṛtam, "made."

8. "When . . . had heard . . . words" tu tac chrutvā . . . vacaḥ: D1,3,4,6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead vacaḥ śrutvā . . . śubham, "having heard those excellent words."

"Rāghava's . . . him" rāghavasya . . . rāghavam: Literally, "of Rāghava . . . to Rāghava."

"adorned as they were with such refinement" saṃskārālaṃkṛtam: As the commentators observe, this refinement involves words, sentences, and meaning (padavākyārthasaṃskārayutam—Ct; Ck, Cg, and Cr similarly).

"mildly astonished" īṣadvismayamānaḥ: Literally, "wondering slightly." Ct and Cg note that Agastya expresses astonishment at the realization that, although Rāma is omniscient, he is asking these questions. Ct understands that, although Rāma is omniscient, he is merely acting [as if he were astonished] (sarvajño 'py evaṃ nāṭayatīti vismayaḥ), while Cg understands that, even though Rāma is omniscient, he asks as if he did not know, and therefore there is astonishment [on Agastya's part] (sarvajño 'py ajānann iva pṛcchatīti vismitam). D1,3,4,6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read atha, "now," for īṣat, "slightly."

9. The verse presents a slightly confusing synopsis of one of the vedic and purāṇic creation stories. The commentators, making reference to Manusmṛti and some vedic texts, attempt to rectify its seeming redundancies and contradictions. Thus Ct, quoting Manusmṛti 1.8–9, explains that having first created the waters that lay under the earth, the creator, who was born of the waters, now took birth as Prajāpati. The Manusmṛti verse explains that in the beginning the creator made the waters and deposited his semen in them. This seed then turned into a golden egg, as radiant as the sun. From that egg was born Brahmā, the grandfather of all the worlds. (apaḥ sṛṣṭvā. bhūmer adhobhāgavartinīr apaḥ sṛṣṭvety arthaḥ. tatra salilasambhavaḥ prajāpatir abhūd ity anvayaḥ. "apa eva sasarjādau tāsu vīryam avāsṛjat / tad aṇḍam abhavad dhaimaṃ sahasrāṃśusamaprabham // tasmiñ jajñe svayaṃ brahmā sarvalokapitāmahaḥ" iti manūkteḥ.) Ck understands similarly to Ct, but introduces a number of additional quotes to support this view (for example, Aitareyopaniṣad 1.1.2). Cr seeks to avoid confusion by arguing that the epithet salilasaṃbhava really means "born from the lotus in the waters" (salilasaṃbhavaḥ salilāt salilapadmāt prādurbhūto babhūveti śeṣaḥ). He then explains that this figure incorporates the active, or passionate, principle of matter and becomes Brahmā (rajoguṇagrahaṇena brahmābhavad iti śeṣaḥ). Cg understands the terms salilasaṃbhava, "born from the waters," and padmasaṃbhava, "born from a lotus," to refer to one and the same individual, that is, Prajāpati, or Brahmā, who was born from a lotus in the water (salilasaṃbhavaḥ padmasaṃbhavaḥ salile padmasaṃbhava ity arthaḥ. prajāpatir brahmā). Cg, then, seeks to explain the confused sequence of creation by distinguishing the events by the different times at which they occur. He states that at the end of the day, the creator made the waters in the form of the ocean that lies beneath the earth. Then, at the end of the night, he took his birth as Prajāpati in the lotus growing from Viṣṇu's navel there in the waters (aharante apaḥ sṛṣṭvā bhūmer adhaḥ sthitāḥ samudrarūpiṇīḥ sṛṣṭvā rātryavasāne tatraiva salile viṣṇunābhikamale vartamānaḥ prajāpatiḥ).

"creatures" sattvān: Cg notes that the masculine gender for the neuter is irregular (sattvān jantūn asrjat. pūṃlliṅgatvam ārṣam).

10. "those creatures . . . their creator" te sattvāḥ . . . sattvakartāram: Literally, "those creatures . . . the maker of creatures."

11. "gently smiling" prahasann iva: Literally, "smiling slightly." According to Ck, Cg, and Ct, Prajāpati is smiling indulgently in his compassion for his own offspring who are afflicted by fear (bhayārditasvaprajāviṣayadayāvaśāt prahasann ity arthaḥ—so Cg; Ck and Ct similarly). According to Cs, Prajāpati's paternal amusement is more contemptuous than compassionate. He argues that the creator smiles at the thought of what weaklings his progeny are since they are unable to endure hunger and thirst. (prahasann iva. kṣutpipāsāsahanaṃ duḥśakam aho iti prahāsaḥ.)

"That bestower of self-esteem" mānadaḥ: This epithet is ambiguous in its meaning. Depending on whether one derives its final element from the root √dā, "to give," or √do, "to destroy," it can mean either "bestower of pride or esteem" or "humbler of pride." See note to 3309*, following note to 6.108.5. See, too, 6.13.7–8 and 6.110.6 and notes. Cf. 6.104.10 and note. In the present context it is not completely certain which sense is intended. But, given the context and the gloss of Cg, "granter of esteem or respect (bahumānadaḥ)," we believe the reference is to Prajāpati's efforts to bolster the confidence of his terrified offspring. V1,D7,10–11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead the vocative plural, mānavāḥ, "O men or O descendants of Manu," neither of which senses appears to fit the context. Cs is the only commentator to remark on this weak reading. He argues that by addressing his progeny with this term, Prajāpati indicates that he accepts their humanity (their mortality?) (mānavā iti sṛṣṭasattvasaṃbodhanena teṣām anumataṃ mānuṣatvaṃ svasyeti sūcayati). Several of the translators render this vocative as "men or descendants of Manu." Benoît (1999, p. 1710) adds a note in which he expresses his belief that Manu is intended in this version of Hindu cosmogony to be the first being created by the creator divinity and that all other creatures must therefore be descendants of Manu. But this seems both forced and anachronistic in this context.

"You must stand guard" rakṣadhvam: Literally, "you must protect." The commentators and most of the translators consulted understand that the implied object of the verb is "the waters," as suggested in verse 9 above.

12. "by those who were not hungry, who said, 'We shall stand guard,' and also by the others who were hungry, who said, 'We shall eat'" rākṣāma iti tatrānyair yakṣāmeti tathāparaiḥ / bhuñkṣitābhuñkṣitaiḥ: Literally, "[addressed] by those who were hungry and those who were not hungry, by some who said, 'We protect,' and by others who said, 'We eat.'" The point of this well-known verse is very clear. It is to provide an etymology for the names of two classes of supernatural beings, the rākṣasas and the yakṣas, respectively. However, the exact sense of the verse is far from transparent, and the commentators differ widely in their readings and interpretations of the precise meaning or meanings of the verbal roots and in the sense of the sequence bhuñkṣitābhuñkṣitaiḥ. The fundamental problem, it would seem, involves the meaning of the verb yakṣāma, evidently derived from a root √yakṣ. The problem is that apart from the etymological back formation in this verse, no such root in a contextually appropriate sense is to be found in the language. Some commentators, as we will note below, understand the root to mean "to worship," while others read it as a phonological variant for an attested root, √jakṣ, "to eat." By the same token, some commentators understand the sequence of the irregular participles bhuñkṣitābhuñkṣitaiḥ to mean "those who are hungry and those who are not hungry," while others take the latter term "not hungry (abhuñkṣita-)" to mean "thirsty." One commentator sees both terms as meaning "hungry." There is also some debate as to which of the two groups of creatures is which.

Despite the fact that the reading is yakṣāma and that the form jakṣāma, derived from the root √jakṣ, is not attested in any of the manuscripts collated for the critical edition, our translation follows the interpretation of Cg, and to some extent those of Cm and Cs, because we believe that this interpretation best suits the narrative context as we understand it. In our opinion the situation is as follows: Prajāpati's newly created beings, fearful of starvation, ask him to assign them some occupation, whereby, presumably, they might earn their living. He assigns them the job of guardians, apparently of the newly created waters. Those who are not actually suffering hunger accept his injunction to stand guard, apparently, in anticipation of being fed or rewarded at some later time. Some of them, however, are actually hungry and/or thirsty and require sustenance immediately. They announce that they will eat first, rather than attend to their duties.

KK, VSP, and Gita Press (GPP notes as a variant of Cg) attempt to solve the problem by reading the close phonological variant √jakṣ, "to eat," a variant noted only in Cm's commentary (critical edition, p. 645). Cg interprets the verse to mean: "Among those creatures some of them addressed Prajāpati, saying, 'We will stand guard.' Others said, 'We will eat.' Both verbs are first person plural imperatives. 'The root √jakṣ is used in the sense of eating and laughing' (DhātuPā 2.62 jákṣá bhákṣahásanayoḥ). Some said, 'We will not stand guard, but will eat.' But which ones said, 'We will stand guard?' and which ones said, 'We will eat?' The verse now explains that with the expression, 'the hungry and the non-hungry' . . . Those who were not hungry said, 'We will stand guard.' Those who were hungry said, 'We will eat.' That is the sequence. (anyaiḥ kaiścit sattvai rakṣāmety uktaḥ. tathāparair jakṣāmety uktaḥ prajāpatiḥ. ubhayam api loḍ uttamabahuvacanam. 'jakṣa bhakṣahasanayoḥ.' kaiścin na vayaṃ rakṣāma kiṃtu jakṣāmety uktaḥ. kai rakṣāmety uktaṃ kair vā jakṣāmety uktaṃ tatrāha bhukṣitābhukṣitair [—so KK, VSP] iti . . . abubhukṣitai rakṣāmety uktam. bubhukṣitais tu jakṣāmety uktam iti kramaḥ.)" This interpretation is followed more or less by Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 380). Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1916) reads the root √jakṣ in the sense of "to eat," but takes the compound (bhuñkṣitābhuñkṣitaiḥ) as Cm and Ct do (see below). This interpretation is reflected most closely in the commentary of Cm.

Ck's and Ct's interpretation differs radically, since they read the root √yakṣ to mean "to worship," and the second member of the compound, "not hungry (abhuñkṣita-)," to mean "thirsty." They understand the verse to mean that although all of the creatures were hungry and/or thirsty, some agreed to stand guard, while others said they would worship. This interpretation of the word "not hungry (abhuñkṣita)" is shared by Cm. (tatrādyāḥ rakṣāmeti prativacanaṃ dattavantaḥ. pare yakṣāmeti. yakṣa pūjāyām . . . abubhukṣitāḥ pipāsitāḥ—so Ct; Ck similarly.) This interpretation is followed in the translations of Dutt (1894, p. 1562), Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 434), Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 382), and Benoît (1999, p. 1228). Roussel and Shastri both understand the root √yakṣ to mean "to sacrifice," perhaps believing it to be derived from the root √yaj.

Cm understands with Cg that the root is √jakṣ, "to eat," and understands, like Ct and Ck, that the adjective abhuñkṣita is to be understood to mean "thirsty (tṛṣitāḥ)." Cm seems to understand that the thirsty rākṣasas are proposing to drink up the waters. (abubhukṣitaiḥ tṛṣitaiḥ sattvair apā jakṣyāma ity uktam ity arthaḥ.) Gita Press's translation is similar to this.

Cr, like Ct, understands the root √yakṣ to mean "to worship," but, unlike any of the other commentators, takes the sequence bhuñkṣitābhuñkṣitaiḥ as two uncompounded words, bhuñkṣitā[ḥ] and bhuñkṣitaiḥ, to mean that both sets of creatures are hungry, one group saying, "Although we are hungry, we will stand guard," and the other group saying, "Although we are hungry, we will worship." (bhuñkṣitā bubhukṣitā api vayaṃ rakṣāma ity anyaiḥ kaiścid bhuñkṣitair bubhukṣitair ukto bhuñkṣitā api vayaṃ yakṣāma pūjayāma ity aparair bhuñkṣitair uktaś ca . . . yakṣa pūjāyām iti dhator loṭi yakṣāmeti.)

Cs, as usual, takes his own path. He alone makes reference to a passage of two and a half verses that precedes our verse 12. KK, the lone edition to read these lines, inserts them in brackets as its verses 12–13. These lines are not acknowledged by the critical apparatus or in any other edition. Cs himself notes that these lines occur in a few manuscripts but are absent in most. Therefore, he feels that they must have been interpolated. Nonetheless, he comments upon them. The apparatus of KK notes that these lines are found only in two of the manuscripts (ca and cha) collated for that edition. (ity uktās te kṣudhāviṣṭā aṃbhāṃsy ādātum udyatā ity ārabhya sārdhaślokadvayaṃ kvacit pustakasaṃpuṭyāṃ vartate na vartate ca bahupustakeṣu. tena prakṣiptam iti bhāti. tathāpi vyākhyāyate.) A translation of the verses as they appear in KK reads as follows:

> Addressed in this fashion, those among them who were hungry were ready to drink up the waters. While the others said, "We shall guard the waters."
>
> When Prajāpati realized this, he said, in keeping with the meanings of the verbal roots, "The root √yakṣ means 'to eat (jakṣaṇe),' and √rakṣ, 'to protect (pālane).' Therefore, one [group] will be called 'yakṣaḥ' because of eating (yakṣaṇāt), and [the other,] 'rakṣaḥ' because of guarding (pālanāt)."

ity uktās te kṣudhāviṣṭā aṃbhāṃsy ādātum udyatāḥ / aṃbhāṃsy etāni rakṣāma uktavantas tathā 'pare // jñātvā prajāpatis teṣām āha dhātvarthasaṃyutam / yakṣeti jakṣaṇe dhātus tathā rakṣas tu pālane /
yakṣaṇād yakṣa ity uktas tathā rakṣas tu pālanāt //

These verses are clearly an attempt on the part of some scribe or scholiast to grapple with the semantic problems raised by the form yakṣāma. Cs says in part, "From the root √yakṣ we understand jakṣaṇa, in the sense of 'eating.' . . . Since, according to the tantras, there is no difference between the akṣaras ya and ja, it is said that the root √yakṣ has the sense of eating [jakṣaṇa] (yakṣetīti jakṣaṇe bhakṣaṇe . . . yajayor abhedasya tāntrikatvād yakṣeti jakṣaṇa ity uktiḥ)."

Cs continues his analysis with our verse. According to him, the creatures seem to hear or understand Prajāpati's order ["stand guard" rakṣadhvam] in two different ways and therefore respond to him as in our verse 12. "By 'rakṣaṇa [standing guard]' is meant the means of avoiding destruction or diminution of the existing waters by others. The meaning is that they replied, 'We will perform jakṣaṇa, that is, what was intended [by the word jakṣaṇa], has the form of worship, etc.' " Cs then regards the word yakṣāma largely as an echo of rakṣāma. He does not appear to make a very strong distinction between the two groups of creatures. (rakṣaṇaṃ tathaiva satīnām apām itarānapāyopāyam. jakṣaṇaṃ vaivakṣikaṃ pūjanādirūpaṃ kurma ity uttaritavanta ity bhāvaḥ. anuprāsena rakṣāmo yakṣāma iti dvaye 'vadann iti dhvaniḥ.) Cs in this way takes the positions of Ck, Ct, and Cr, who take √yakṣ in the sense of "worship."

A number of northern manuscripts as well as the printed editions of Lahore (7.3.12) and Gorresio (7.4.12) avoid the problem caused by the roots √yakṣ and/or √jakṣ by substituting forms of the roots √kṣaṇ or √kṣi "to destroy." But this still leaves the awkward derivation of the word yakṣaḥ. Gorresio in a note to the passage (1870, p. 312) remarks that, although the name rākṣasa can at least etymologically be derived from the root √rakṣ "to protect," the term yakṣaḥ cannot in any proper way be derived from the root √kṣi. He then alludes to the variant reading, yakṣāma, of what he terms the "northern redaction" of the text, interpreting its underlying root as do Ck and Ct in the sense of to "venerate or minister to." Thus, he argues that the yakṣas are the people who minister to Kubera.

13. See note to verse 12 above.

" 'We shall eat,' . . . yakṣas" yakṣāma iti . . . yakṣāḥ: Cg, who reads as in verse 12, jakṣāma, attributes the lack of alliteration to an irregular interchange of the two akṣaras [ja and ya] (varṇavyatyaya ārṣaḥ).

14. "Now among the former" tatra: Literally, "there." We agree with Ck, Ct, and Cr, who understand the adverb to refer to the two brothers' appearance among the lord's newly created, separate class of rākṣasas (tatra bhagavatsṛṣṭabhagavadvibhaktajātibhedarakṣomadhye—so Ck and Ct).

"Those two bulls among rākṣasas" rākṣasarṣabhau: D7,10,11,M10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead rākṣasādhipau, "those two overlords of the rākṣasas."

"just like Madhu and Kaiṭabha" madhukaiṭabhasaṃkāśau: These two asuras are well known in the Mahābhārata and purāṇic literature, although they are sometimes identified as dānavas (for example, MBh 3.194.13; 12.220.53) or rākṣasas (for example, BrahmP 118.10). They were supposed to have been produced from the earwax of Viṣṇu while he was asleep on the cosmic ocean. According to various texts, they attempted to kill Brahmā and were therefore slain by Viṣṇu. MBh 3.194.8–30. See, too, MBh 5.128.49 and 9.48.21. Cf. MBh 12.335.19–68. The only Rāmāyaṇa references to these two demons are found in the Uttarakāṇḍa. See 7.22.22–23; 7.55.11,12; 7.61.27; 7.94.5–6; and Prakṣipta III, sarga 3.48–53 (= App. I, No. 10, lines 98–108). See also notes to 6.44.37 and 6.105.12.

15. "Of the two of them" tatra: Literally, "there." We take the adverb as does Cr, who glosses, "between the two of them (tayor madhye)."

"did not desire a wife" na dārān so 'bhikāṅkṣati: D6,7,10,11,T1,G,M1,2,4,5,7–10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tapovanagatas tadā, "then [he] went to a penance grove." Ck and Ct understand, naturally enough, that Praheti enters the ascetic's grove because he is averse to worldly desires (viraktaḥ san). This, very likely, is to be understood as the reason Praheti is unwilling to marry, as indicated in the critical reading.

"to get married" dārakriyārtham: Literally, "for the sake of the wife-ceremony." D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead locative, dārakriyārthe, the sense, however, is the same.

16. "And so the immeasurable . . . Heti" ameyātmā: Literally, "the immeasurable [one]."

"terrifying . . . named Bhayā" bhayāṃ nāma bhayāvahām: Literally, "named Bhayā . . . who conveys fear." This adjective, like the variant below, is a play on the young woman's name, Bhayā, "Fear." B1,3,4,D5,7,10,11,M9, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead mahābhayām, "immensely fearsome."

17. "With her" tasyām: Literally, "In or On her."

"known as Vidyutkeśa" vidyutkeśa iti śrutam: Ś,Ñ,V1,3,B1,3,4,D1–6,8–12,M4,7, and Gorresio, Lahore GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead vidyutkeśam iti śrutam, substituting the accusative for the nominative, which appears to obviate the need for the iti.

18. "whose radiance was equal to that of a blazing fire" pradīptāgnisamaprabhaḥ: D7,10,11,T1–3,G3,M2,9,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead sa (T1,2,G3 pra-; M10,G1 su-)dīptārkasamaprabhaḥ, "he whose radiance was equal to that of the blazing sun."

"like a lotus in the midst of the waters" toyamadhya ivāmbujam: V2,T1,2,G3,M3,7,8, and the KK and VSP read instead toyamadhya ivāmbudaḥ, "like a cloud with water in its interior." This variant seems, in part, to address the peculiarity of the critical reading. It is unusual for a rākṣasa, whether a warrior or an ascetic, to be likened to a lotus. Comparisons of rākṣasas to storm clouds, however, are quite common, and the variant may also reflect the meteorological signification of Vidyutkeśa's name, which means "lightning-haired." This variant is rendered only in the translation of Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 381), who renders, "like the raineloud [sic]." See, for example, App. I, No. 18, lines 9–12, following note to 6.30; 1195*, following notes 6.55.70; 6.64.5–6; and Bhāsa's description of Ghaṭotkaca in Madhyamavyāyoga, verse 4.

19. "that night-roaming rākṣasa" niśācaraḥ: Literally, "the night-roaming [one]."

"the splendid bloom of youth" yauvanaṃ bhadram: Literally, "lovely youth."

20. "the daughter of Sandhyā, who was like Sandhyā herself in radiance" sandhyā-duhitaram . . . sandhyātulyāṃ prabhāvataḥ: The identity of Sandhyā in this verse is somewhat unclear. The name is used for a variety of females in the mythological tradition. The best known of these is the mind-born daughter of Brahmā, who becomes the divine personification of the three sandhyās, or "junctions," dawn, noon, and twilight, which have special religious significance in Hinduism. Thus, the reference to the term sandhyā in the upamāna is ambiguous. The simile can be interpreted to mean that the daughter was either as radiant as her mother, the goddess Sandhyā, or as radiant as the twilight itself. The problem here is that since Sandhyā is a goddess, how is it that her daughter is a rākṣasī? Several of the commentators struggle to explain the seeming anomaly. Ck understands that the reference is indeed to the tripartite goddess of the solar junctures produced from Brahmā Virāṭ. Her daughter, Sālakaṭaṅkaṭā was a rākṣasī because she was principally characterized by the passionate quality of matter (rajaḥ), and she was created by the Lord to be the mother of rākṣasas. (prabhāvataḥ sandhyātulyāṃ bhagavan keyaṃ sandhyā vairājītrirūpasandhyā. sandhyāyās tanayāṃ sālakaṭaṅkaṭākhyā[ṃ] rajaḥprādhānyād bhagavatā rakṣoyonitvena sṛṣṭāṃ ata eva tataḥ sā rākṣasīti.) Ct has a similar explanation as to why Sālakaṭaṅkaṭā is a rākṣasī. However, according to him, it is because she was created by the Lord primarily for protection (rakṣā), rather than, as in the case of Ck, to be primarily passionate (iyaṃ ca rakṣāprādhānyena bhagavatsṛṣṭatvād rākṣasī). Cs explains that, although Sandhyā is indeed a divinity, nonetheless, because of her being a rākṣasī in the sense that she was created by Brahmā primarily for protection, we should understand that her daughter, too, would be a rākṣasī (yady api sandhyāyā devatātvaṃ tathāpi rakṣaṇaprādhānyena brahmasṛṣṭatvena rākṣasītvāt tatputryā api rākṣasītvaṃ bodhyam). See, too, 7.8.22 and note.

21. "to someone" parasmai: Literally, "to another."

22. "the night-roaming rākṣasa" niśācaraḥ: Literally, "the night-roaming [one]."

"just as does magnanimous Indra with Paulomī" sārdhaṃ paulomyā maghavān iva: Literally, "like Maghavān with Paulomī." Paulomī is Sacī's patronymic; she is the wife of Indra. See 7.12.6 and note.

23. "Sālakaṭaṅkaṭā" sālakaṭaṅkaṭā: Shah (1975, p. 44 and 1976) conjectures that the -kaṭaṅkaṭa of the rākṣasī's name is of non-Aryan origin, noting that the word śālakaṭaṅkaṭa is also found at Yājñavalkyasmṛti 1.285. Shah, who cites the relevant line as "mitraś ca saṃmitaś caiva tathā śālakaṭaṅkaṭaḥ," understands that the reference there is to a single malefic deity. However, the Nirṇayasagar Press edition (1949) of the Yājñavalkyasmṛti reads tathā śālakaṭaṅkaṭau, clearly understanding a compound with two malefic deities, Śāla and Kaṭaṅkaṭa. Shah notes that this is the opinion of the commentators (1975, p. 45). Shah (1976) concludes by arguing that the word "sālakaṭaṅkaṭa may refer to a rattling, rumbling noise of sāla-trees or woods" (p. 112) and connects it to the possibility that the rākṣasas may have built their homes with sāla wood. He understands that those rākṣasas were then called Sālakaṭaṅkaṭas. He then concludes: "Whatever the original sense, it seems highly probable sālakaṭaṅkaṭa is a sanskritised, non-Aryan name of proto-Dravidian origin. These Sālakaṭaṅkaṭas, the arch-enemies of the Aryans of the Ikṣvāku race would raid, molest and kill the hermits colonising Janasthana, and the border regions of Kośala, the kingdom of the Ikṣvākus" (p. 113). See 7.6.7 and notes and Introduction, "Rākṣasas," p. 46, note 51. See, too, Ramadas 1925, p. 50, and Kibe 1928, p. 701.

"became pregnant by Vidyutkeśa, just as a bank of storm clouds becomes laden with water from the ocean" vidyutkeśād garbham āpa ghanarājir ivārṇavāt: Literally, "she obtained an embryo from Vidyutkeśa as does a line of clouds from the ocean." See note to verse 25 below.

24. "that rākṣasa woman" rākṣasī: For Ck, Ct, and Cs's comments on this issue, see notes to verse 20 above.

"as lustrous as lightning, the child of the clouds" ghanagarbhasamaprabham: Literally, "of equal luster to the embryo of the clouds." We follow Cg in taking the term ghanagarbha- as a kenning for "lightning" (ghanagarbho 'śaniḥ). This seems to be the most probable interpretation given the reference to splendor or radiance and the simile in the second part of the verse involving the embryo born of fire. This interpretation is reflected in the translation of Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1917). Gorresio (1870, p. 11) interprets similarly, yet tentatively, rendering, "splendente come il portato della nube (il fulmine?)." The other translations consulted follow the interpretation of Ct, who glosses, "possessing luster equal to that of a cloud whose embryo is water (jalagarbhameghasamakāntim)."

"just the Ganges gave birth to the child born of Agni" gaṅgā garbham ivāgnijam: Literally, "just as Gaṅgā [did] the embryo born of Agni." The reference, as several of the commentators note, is to the birth of the war god Skanda from the semen of Śiva, which was first deposited in Agni, the god of fire, and subsequently in the river goddess Gaṅgā. The story is widely known in the epic and purāṇic literature and found for example in Bālakāṇḍa 35–36 and notes (especially notes to Bālakāṇḍa 35). See also 7.16.1; 7.35.22; and notes.

25. "But no sooner had she given birth to . . . child . . . she forgot all about" tam utsṛjya tu sā garbham . . . / . . . vismṛtya: Literally, "having delivered or abandoned that infant . . . having forgotten." The verb ut + √srj is ambiguous here, as it can mean either "to abandon" or "to deliver or bring forth," as one might a child. We have chosen the latter as it seems better to fit the context in which Sālakaṭaṅkaṭā is the ultimate uncaring mother. However, both meanings would make sense. D1,3,4,6,7,10,11,G2,M10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, and Gorresio read for tam utsṛjya, "having delivered that [garbha]," samutsṛjya, "having delivered." Ś,Ñ,V1,3,B3,4,D,T,G3,M2,4,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, and Lahore read instead visṛjya, "having abandoned," which is redundant with [sam] utsṛjya, if it is understood in its sense of "to abandon." See note to verse 26 below.

"Vidyutkeśa's . . . than, eager to make love" vidyutkeśād ratārthinī: Literally, "from Vidyutkeśa, she, eager to make love." The critical reading forces us to take the ablative vidyutkeśāt with pāda a. This is apparently an elliptical reference to verse 23 above. See note to verse 23 above. Ś,Ñ1,V1,3,D,T3,G1, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, VSP, and Lahore read instead the compound vidyutkeśaratārthinī, "[she] eager to make love with Vidyutkeśa."

Following verse 25, D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of one line [72*, line 1 = GPP, NSP, Gita Press 7.4.25cd; KK 7.4.28cd; VSP 7.4.26ab]: "Then, when that infant,[1] whose cry was equal to the sound of a thundercloud, was abandoned (utsṛṣṭas tu tadā garbho ghanaśabdasamasvanaḥ /)."

[1] "that infant" garbhaḥ: For some reason, Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 435) mistakenly understands that the reference is to a second child of Sālakaṭaṅkaṭā.

See 72*, line 2, following notes to verse 26 below.

26. "Abandoned by her" tayotsṛṣṭaḥ: In this case, we believe the context better supports taking the verb ut + √srj in its sense "to abandon," although the sense "to give birth" is still possible here. See note to verse 25 above.

"put his hand in his mouth and cried like a mighty thundercloud" pāṇim āsye samādhāya ruroda ghanarāḍ iva: Literally, "having placed a hand in the mouth, he cried like the king of clouds."

In place of 26cd, D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read a passage of one line [72*, line 2 = GPP, NSP, Gita Press, 7.4.26cd; KK, 7.4.28ef; VSP, 7.4.26ef]: "Placing his fist in his mouth,[1] he cried rather softly[2] (nidhāya cāsye svāṃ muṣṭiṃ ruroda śanakair iva /)."

[1] "Placing his fist in his mouth" nidhāya cāsye svāṃ muṣṭim: Literally, "having placed his own fist in the mouth." D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read āsye svayaṃ, "in the mouth, by himself," for cāsye svām, "in the mouth his own [fist]." Cr, the only commentator to remark on this reading, understands the reflexive adverb svayam to refer to the infant's mouth, glossing, "in his own mouth (svamukhe)."

[2] "rather softly" śanakair iva: Literally, "a little faintly." D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read tadā, "then," for the particle iva. For some reason, Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 435), followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3. p. 383), translates the adverb śanakaiḥ as, "longtemps."

27. "At that very time, Lord Hara, mounted on his bull, together with Umā, was passing by through the heavens and spied the weeping rākṣasa child." athopariṣṭād gacchan vai vṛṣabhastho haraḥ prabhuḥ / apaśyad umayā sārdhaṃ rudantaṃ rākṣasātmajam //: Literally, "Now going overhead, Lord Hara, mounted on a bull, saw, together with Umā, the weeping child of the rākṣasa." D6,7,10,11,T1,2,G2,3,M1–5,7–10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead a passage of two lines [73*]: "Then, mounting his bull, accompanied by Pārvatī, the Lord,[1] who was traveling by the path of the winds, heard the sound of crying (tato vṛṣabham āsthāya pārvatyā sahitaḥ prabhuḥ / vāyumārgeṇa gacchan vai śuśrāva ruditasvanam //)."

[1] "the Lord" prabhuḥ: D6,7,10,11,M10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead śivaḥ, "Śiva."

28. "Moved by Pārvatī's tenderheartedness, Bhava" kāruṇyabhāvāt pārvatyā bhavaḥ: Literally, "because of Pārvatī's feeling of compassion." Our reading of the phrase follows that of Cr who, like us, restores the sandhi to the genitive pārvatyāḥ, "of Pārvatī" (pārvatyāḥ kāruṇyabhāvād dhetoḥ). This reading, we believe, is very much in keeping with the personification of Pārvatī in various myths where her feminine or maternal tenderness moves Śiva to act more compassionately or less violently. See, for example, MBh 12.278.1–38, where Pārvatī, considering Śukra her son, intercedes on his behalf, as Śiva, enraged, stands ready to strike the sage with his trident (Goldman 1977, pp. 60–72, passim). See, too, sarga 78 below, especially verses 21–28, where Pārvatī gives King Ila a boon that acts as a counter to Śiva's own curse. Compare KSS 1.3.16–22, where it is her own anger that she regrets. Ck and Ct take the form to be the instrumental singular pārvatyā, "by Pārvatī," and understand that Pārvatī's heart is filled with compassion and therefore he [Śiva] is urged on by Pārvatī (kāruṇyabhāvāt kāruṇyayukto bhāvaś cittaṃ tasmāt pārvatyā prerita iti śeṣaḥ).

"the slayer of Tripura" tripurahā: Tripura is the name of the three mythological cities of gold, silver, and iron created by the asura architect Maya and destroyed by the fiery arrows of Śiva (see notes to 6.59.73). It is also the name of the asura king who ruled those cities and who was likewise destroyed. Here the reference is to that king and not to the city. The Rāmāyaṇa clearly knows the story but refers to it sparingly (1.73.18; 1.74.12; 6.59.73; 6.83.34). For other sources of this well-known purāṇic story, see note to 6.59.73.

29. "in his desire to please Pārvatī" pārvatyāḥ priyakāmyayā: Cs notes that Śiva wishes to please Pārvatī, since she, like women in general, feels compassion for children who have no protectors (bāleṣu tatrāpi rakṣakarahiteṣu prāyeṇa strīṇām anukrośāt pārvatyāḥ priyakāmyayety uktam).

"a city that could fly through the sky" puram ākāśagam: Literally, "a sky-going city." Cr identifies this as one of the more familiar vimānas, or flying palaces, which has the form of a city (purākāravimānam).

30. "such that they should conceive and deliver a child at the very same moment and that the child should instantly become the same age as its mother" sadyopalabdhir garbhasya prasūtiḥ sadya eva ca / sadya eva vayaḥprāptir mātur eva vayaḥsamam //: Literally, "the instant conception and the instant birth of the fetus, and the instant age-attainment of equal age to the mother." V1,D10,11,M1,8, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read the grammatically awkward but semantically indistinguishable vayaḥprāptim for vayaḥprāptiḥ.

31. "Sukeśa" sukeśaḥ: This is the first time that the child's name has been mentioned. Ck, Cg, and Ct all remark that because it [will be] repeated [later], here we are to understand that the word sukeśa [lit., "having nice hair"] is the rākṣasa's name (sukeśa ity anuvādāt tannāmakatvam asya bodhyam—so Ct; Ck and Cg similarly). See, for example, 7.5.1.

"divine majesty" śriyam: Literally, "royal splendor, glory, or fortune." We believe that the term here refers to the godlike state of immortality conferred upon Sukeśa in verse 29 above, and not, as some translators understand, to material wealth.

"from Lord Hara" prabhoḥ . . . harasya pārśvataḥ: Literally, "from the side of Lord Hara." Cr glosses the adverb pārśvataḥ, "from the side of," as samīpe, "in the presence of."

"highly intelligent . . . moving through the sky" mahāmatiḥ khagaḥ: D6,7,10,11,T1,2, G2,3,M2–5,7–10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead mahān mahāmatiḥ, "that great one of great intellect."

The meter is vaṃśasthavila (vaṃśastha).

Sarga 5

1–2. "when . . . saw that the rākṣasa Sukeśa was righteous and had received those boons, he gave him" sukeśaṃ dhārmikaṃ dṛṣṭvā varalabdhaṃ ca rākṣasam . . . / . . . sukeśāya dharmeṇa dadau: Literally, "having seen the righteous rākṣasa Sukeśa, who had received boons, . . . he gave according to righteousness to Sukeśa." We have chosen to understand the adjectives dhārmikam and varalabdham as predicate adjectives since the context seems to indicate that Grāmaṇī gives his daughter to Sukeśa because he sees those virtues in his prospective son-in-law. Ck, Cg, Ct, and Cr note that we must read the compound varalabdham as a paranipāta, that is, a compound in which the word order is reversed, as labdhavaram, "by whom boons are obtained." Verse 1 lacks a finite verb to complete the syntax of the gerund dṛṣṭvā, "having seen." In order to construe the verse, we read it with verse 2 and its finite verb, "he gave (dadau)." Cr avoids the redundancy by supplying the verb prasasāda, "he was pleased," thus permitting verse 1 to stand as a complete sentence. D10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read dharmātmā, "righteous," for dharmeṇa, "in accordance with righteousness." In this reading, the adjective modifies Grāmaṇī.

"Grāmaṇī" grāmaṇīḥ: This is the name of one of the five gandharva lords who guard the sandalwood forest. See 4.40.40–41 (= GPP 4.41.42–43). See, too, Benoît 1999, p. 1711.

"Viśvāvasu" viśvāvasu-: The identification of this figure is uncertain. A gandharva of this name is referred to at Bhāgavatapurāṇa 7.4.14. According to Monier Williams (s.v.) it refers to various other minor mythological figures. All translations consulted render the name as we do, except for Dutt (1894, p. 1564) and Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 384). They both translate the term as "fire," as if the reading were vibhāvasu-, "fire or sun [lit., 'having radiance for its wealth']," a variant noted in the critical apparatus only in V2. See, too, 7.53.16 and note, where the name Viśvāvasu refers to the husband of Analā.

"just as Dakṣa gave Śrī herself" dakṣaḥ śriyam iva: The mythological reference here is uncertain. The simile makes it clear that Śrī is supposed to be a daughter of Dakṣa. The well-known Prajāpati Dakṣa is, indeed, blessed with a very large number of daughters, but none of them, as far as we are able to determine, is named Śrī. The best known of his daughters in the mythological literature is Satī, whom Dakṣa gave as a wife to Śiva. It is true, however, that the daughter whom he conferred upon Dharma, or Dharmadeva, is called Lakṣmī, and both names are, of course, used to refer to the goddess of fortune and consort of Lord Viṣṇu. See MBh 1.60.9–15. Perhaps this has led to a confusion or substitution of Śrī for Satī here.

The "da" of dakṣaḥ is marked as uncertain. Ś,V1,3,D2,6–12,T,G3,M3,4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead rakṣaḥśriyam, "[as if she were] the goddess of fortune of the rākṣasas." This rendering is found in the translation of Dutt (1894, p. 1564), Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1918), and Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 382). GPP (45.4.3) and NSP (45.4.3), however, read rakṣaḥ śriyam. This would lend the last pāda the sense "as did the rākṣasa, the goddess Śrī." This makes no mythological sense whatsoever. Roussel, apparently struggling with this awkward reading, appears to read the term rakṣaḥ incorrectly in the sense of guarding, rendering, "comme une (autre) Śrī dont il avait la garde" (1903, vol. 3, p. 436). His reading has been followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 384) and Benoît (1999, p. 1230).

Following 2ab, D6,7,10,11,T1,2,G,M1,3,5,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of one line [74*]: "She was famed throughout the world[1] and was endowed with beauty and youth (babhūva lokavikhyātā rūpayauvanaśālinī /)."

[1] "She was famed throughout the world" babhūva lokavikhyātā: D6,7,10,11,M10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead triṣu lokeṣu vikhyātā, "[was] famed in [all] the three worlds."

3. "as happy as a pauper who has come into wealth" dhanaṃ prāpyeva nirdhanaḥ: Literally, "like one without wealth having acquired wealth." In this context, the simile appears crude. It also suffers from the defect of liṅgabheda, or inappropriate gender, since the upamāna involves a masculine figure (pauper—nirdhanaḥ) acquiring a neuter object (wealth—dhanam), whereas in the upameya a feminine figure (Devavatī—devavatī) acquires a masculine object (husband—patim).

4. "With her at his side, that night-roaming rākṣasa" sa tayā saha saṃyuktaḥ . . . niśācaraḥ: Literally, "He, the night-roaming [one], joined together with her."

"a descendant of Añjana" añjanād abhiniṣkrāntaḥ: Literally, "gone forth from Añjana." Añjana is one of the diggajas, or guardian elephants of the quarters. He is identified as the guardian elephant of the northern or northwestern direction. See 7.31.28–29; 7.32.37; and notes. See MBh 6.60.50–51; 7.97.24–25; and AmaK 1.3.3. See note to 1.39.12.

5. "three . . . they were the equals of the three-eyed lord, Śiva" trīṃs trinetrasamān: Literally, "the three who were equal to the three-eyed [one]." Once again the simile seems awkward in that the three sons are compared to a single, albeit three-eyed, figure.

"with Devavatī" devavatyām: Literally, "on or in Devavatī." D6,7,10,11,M10, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead tataḥ kāle, "then in time."

"Mālyavān" mālyavantam: Mālyavān plays an important role as a counselor of Rāvaṇa in the Yuddhakāṇḍa. See 6.26.5– 6.27.15 and notes. See also Goldman and Goldman 2009, pp. 32–34, 50, 72, 84. See, too, 7.25.23–25 and notes.

"Sumālin" sumālim: The name is given as both Sumāli and Sumālin in the passage. We have used the latter throughout the kāṇḍa for the sake of consistency. See note to verse 34 below, where Cr comments on the discrepancy. See, too, 7.25.23–25 and notes.

"and Mālin, foremost among the mighty" māliṃ ca balināṃ varam: The pāda is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. The name is given as both Māli and Mālin in the passage. We have used the latter throughout the kāṇḍa for the sake of consistency.

Following 5ab, D6,7,10,11,M1, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert, while M10 substitutes for 5cd, a passage of one line [76*]: "He fathered three sons, whose forms were like the three sacred fires (trīn putrāñ janayāmāsa tretāgnisamavigrahān /)."

6. "the three worlds" trayo lokāḥ: According to Cr, the reference is to the agents of universal surveillance, that is, Brahmā, etc. (sarvāvalokanakarttāro brahmādayaḥ).

"the three sacred fires" trayaḥ . . . agnayaḥ: Literally, "the three fires." See note to 7.4.2 for the names of these fires.

"the three mantras" trayo mantrāḥ: It is not completely clear as to what is meant by the term mantra in this verse. Ck, Cg, and Ct and propose two alternatives. One, of course, is to the three vedas themselves, i.e., the Ṛgveda, Sāmaveda, and Yajurveda. The alternative is to the three śaktis, or powers, of the king, which are enumerated in the Arthaśāstra, Amarakośa, etc. These are mantraśakti, or the power of intelligence or council, prabhuśakti, or the power of lordship, and utsāhaśakti, or the power of active energy. (trayo mantrā utsāhaprabhumantraśaktayaḥ. trayo vedā vā—so Cg; Ck and Ct similarly.) The Kauṭilya Arthaśāstra (6.2.33) defines them as follows: "mantraśakti is the power of knowledge or intelligence (jñānabalam), prabhuśakti is the power of the treasury and the armed forces (kośadaṇḍabalam), and utsāhaśakti is the power of martial valor (vikramabalam) (śaktis trividhā—jñānabalaṃ mantraśaktiḥ, kośadaṇḍabalaṃ prabhuśaktiḥ, vikramabalam utsāhaśaktiḥ)." Cr understands the mantras to be those connected with the triad, Brahmā, etc. (trayo brahmāditritayasambandhino mantrāḥ).

"the three dreaded diseases" trayaḥ . . . āmayāḥ: Literally, "the three diseases." As far as we know the literature does not provide any specific list of three dreaded diseases, and we take the term here to refer generically to three serious illnesses. Ck, Cg, and Ct take the term to allude to [the illnesses] associated with the three doṣas, or "humors," of the Āyurvedic medical system: vāta, "wind," pitta, "bile," and śleṣma, "phlegm," the imbalance of which is thought to be the cause of disease (āmayatrayaṃ vātapittaśleṣmarūpam—so Ck and Ct; Cg similarly). Cr understands the reference to be to those serious illnesses that are of three kinds since they arise from the three humors (trayo vātāditritayajatvena trividhā āmayā mahārogā iva ghorā abhavann iti śeṣaḥ). Translators follow one or the other of these two readings.

7. "whose splendor was equal to that of the three sacred fires" tretāgnisamavarcasaḥ: Literally, "whose splendor was equal to the three fires. Ñ2,V2,B,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP all read the more or less synonymous tretāgnitejasaḥ. See notes to 7.4.2 for the names of these fires.

"continued to grow there like illnesses that have been neglected" vivṛddhim agamaṃs tatra vyādhayopekṣitā iva: Literally, "they went to increase there like neglected illnesses." Ct glosses upekṣitāḥ, "neglected," as "untreated or unmedicated (acikitsitāḥ)." Ck, Cg, Cm, Ct, and Cs all note the irregular sandhi between vyādhayaḥ and upekṣitāḥ.

8. "Realizing . . . and enormous lordly power from them" jñātvaiśvaryaṃ tato mahat: Literally, "Having realized the great lordship from that." D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read tapobalāt, "from the power of austerities," for tato mahat, "from that, enormous." KK (7.5.9ab) and VSP (7.5.9ab) read instead jñātveśvaratapobalāt, lending the half verse the sense "having realized [their father's acquisition of a boon] through the power of his austerities for the Lord [Śiva]."

"resolved" kṛtaniścayāḥ: Literally, "ones by whom a resolution is made."

10. "hard to accomplish in this world" bhuvi duṣkaraiḥ: Literally, "hard to do on earth." D6,7,10,11,M10, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read durlabhaiḥ, "difficult to obtain," for duṣkaraiḥ, "hard to do." T1,2,G3, and KK and VSP read ati-, "extremely," for bhuvi, "on earth," thus forming the compound atiduṣkaraiḥ, "exceedingly difficult to do." Among the translators consulted, only Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 382) renders this variant.

"self-control" -dama-: D6,7,10,11,T1,2,G3,M3,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead -śama-, "tranquility."

"they tormented" saṃtāpayantaḥ: Literally, "[they] tormenting." The form is a present participle, and the verse, which lacks a finite verb, can be loosely construed with the perfect viceruḥ, "they practiced," of verse 9, lending the sense "they practiced . . . austerities, tormenting with these austerities."

11. "mounted" āsthitaḥ: D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead āśritaḥ, "resorted to."

"four-faced Lord Brahmā" vibhūś caturvaktraḥ: Literally, "the four-faced Lord."

"addressed . . . saying" āmantrya . . . abhāṣata: Literally, "having addressed . . . he said."

13. "If . . . you . . . wish to grant us a boon" yadi no diśase varam: Literally, "if you allot a boon to us." Ct and Cr clarify by glossing, "you give (dadāsi)."

"may we become" bhavāma: The syllable -vā- is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition.

"powerful" prabhaviṣṇavaḥ: Because of its echoing effect, the adjective is not infrequently used in conjunction with the name Viṣṇu as it is at 7.6.20 and 7.7.19–21, However, it is also used to describe other powerful figures, as it is here and at 7.11.15,16 for the rākṣasas, and at 7.22.39 for Yama. The term is not found in the Rāmāyaṇa outside of the Uttarakāṇḍa. M3,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP all read prabhaviṣṇvaḥ. Ck, Cg, and Ct understand this to be an irregular formation of prabhaviṣṇu (prabhaviṣṇvo yaṇārṣaḥ). Cs understands this reading as defective and not belonging to the original text. He understands the correct reading to be the vocative prabhaviṣṇo, "O Lord," referring to Brahmā, the creator of the universe (he prabhaviṣṇo jagadutpādaka dhātaḥ). He then goes on to quote and dismiss the reading and explanation of Ct.

14. " 'It shall be so!' " evaṃ bhaviṣyatīti: Ś2,V2,3,B,D10,11,G1,2,M1,5,7,10, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead the second person plural bhaviṣyatha, "you [all] shall be."

"Lord" prabhuḥ: D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the synonymous variant vibhuḥ.

"who is so fond of brahmans" brāhmaṇavatsalaḥ: Ck, Ct, and Cs note that Brahmā is particularly fond of brahmans because they issued from his own mouth and are his eldest offspring (teṣāṃ svamukhajatvāj jyeṣṭhatvāc ca teṣu vātsalyam—so Ct). The brahmans are said to have been produced from the mouth of Brahmā (i.e., the primordial puruṣa), see ṚV 10.90.12.

"departed" prayayau: Ñ2,V2,B,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead sa yayau, "he went."

15. "those night-roaming rākṣasas" rātriṃcarāḥ: Literally, "these night-roaming [ones]." The word rātriṃcarāḥ, a variant of the more common niśācara, "night-roaming [one]," is very rare in the literature. In the Vālmīki Rāmāyaṇa it occurs only once outside of its usage here. See 3.40.1.

16. "Being slaughtered" vadhyamānāḥ: Ñ2,V2,3,B1,4,D7,T3,M4,5,10, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead bādhyamānāḥ, "being oppressed, harried." Lahore (7.4.17) reads both tair va[bā?]dhyamānāḥ).

"could find no one to save them" trātāraṃ nādhigacchanti: Literally, "they do not obtain a protector."

17. Following verse 17, Ś,Ñ1,V1,3,D1,2,4–12,T,G3,M3, and Lahore, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of one line [79*]: "of those [gods] who are great and possessed of power, blazing energy, and strength. Through your own blazing energy . . . (ojastejobalavatāṃ mahatām ātmatejasā /)."

18. "builder of mansions . . . build one" gṛhakartā . . . / . . . gṛhaṃ kuru: Literally, "maker of houses make a house."

"O highly intelligent lord" mahāmate: Literally, "O one of great intelligence."

19. "great" mahat: The word is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition.

21–22. "Trikūṭa" trikūṭaḥ: Literally, "having three peaks." Because the city of Laṅkā is located on Mount Trikūṭa, it is mentioned numerous times in the Sundara- and Yuddhakāṇḍas (for references, see respective glossaries and indices). This mountain is also mentioned at 62*, following notes to 7.3.23; 7.5.21–22; 7.6.14; and 7.11.20.

"inaccessible even to the birds and leveled on all four sides by stonecutters' tools" śakunair api duṣprāpe ṭaṅkacchinnacaturdiśi: Literally, "hard to reach even by birds, its four directions cut by chisels." Ck, Cg, Ct, and Cr tie the inability of the birds to reach the peak to its being cut. (śakunair api duṣprāpa ity atra hetuḥ. ṭaṅkacchinnacaturdiśīti—so Ck, Cg, and Ct; Cr similarly.) They do not, however, explain why this is so. Perhaps they are simply saying that the peak is no longer accessible because it has been cut away. On the other hand, it is possible that they understand that the stone has been cut so finely as to make it impossible for birds to perch or nest. We believe, however, that the two things are not necessarily related causally. The inaccessibility of the peak to birds may be simply a hyperbolic reference to its elevation. Our interpretation of the second compound understands that the peak of the mountain has been cut away and leveled on all four sides by stonecutters to form the foundation on which the city can be built. For other uses of the term ṭaṅka as a chisel, particularly for cutting stones, see 2.74.7 and RaghuVa 12.80. MW (s.v.), and Apte (s.v.) mistakenly include this verse among those that they cite in support of an additional use of the term to refer to a sharp peak, ridge, or declivity of a mountain, as, for example, at BhāgP 8.10.46.

"by Śakra" śakra-: V3,D10, and GPP substitute the all but contextually meaningless śakya- "possible or capable." No translator renders this reading.

"and its ramparts and gateways are of gold" svarṇaprākāratoraṇā: Literally, "having golden ramparts and gateways." D5–7,10,11,T1,2,M3,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead hematoraṇasaṃvṛtā, "surrounded by golden gateways."

Following 21ab ("On the shore of the southern ocean stands the mountain called Trikūṭa"), Ñ2,V1,2,B,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read a passage of one line [82*]: "And there is also another one, O lords of the rākṣasas, a second one called Suvela (suvela iti cāpy anyo dvitīyo rākṣaseśvarāḥ /)."

Following 22a ("It is thirty leagues in breadth"), D5–7,10,11,T1,M1–3,9,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead a passage of two half lines [83*]: "A hundred yojanas in length, surrounded by a rampart of gold (śatayojanam āyatā / svarṇaprākārasaṃvītā /)."

23. "most excellent rākṣasas" rākṣasasattamāḥ: Literally, "foremost among the rākṣasas." Ś,V1,3,B,1,3,4,D2,5–12,T2,G1,M1,6,7, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead rākṣasapuṃgavāḥ, "O bulls among rākṣasas."

"in that city" tasyām . . . puryām: B1,3,4,D10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead yūyam, "you [all]," for puryām, "in the city," lending the pāda the sense "You should live in that."

"the gods, the denizens of heaven" divaukasaḥ: Literally, "those heaven-dwelling [ones]." In the Rāmāyaṇa this common kenning is found most frequently in the Uttarakāṇḍa (7.18.19; 7.22.6; 7.30.7; 7.75.17; 7.76.3; and 7.91.8) although it is found sporadically outside of this book (see 1.64.13; 3.11.32; 4.41.35; 6.33.42; and 6.110.14).

Ck, Cg, and Ct all observe that pāda c is hypermetric (amarāvatīṃ samāsādyeti navākṣarapādatārṣī—so Ct).

24. "the citadel of Laṅkā" laṅkādurgam: The compound is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition.

"by your enemies, O destroyers of your foes" śatrūṇāṃ śatrusūdanāḥ: Literally, "of your enemies, O destroyers of your enemies."

25. "rākṣasas . . . Rāma" rāma rākṣasāḥ: Ñ2,V2,B1,2,4,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead rākṣasottamāḥ, "the foremost among the rākṣasas."

"they went . . . to the city of Laṅkā" gatvā laṅkāṃ tāṃ . . . purīm: Ñ2,B2,4,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead bhūtvā gatvā tām . . . purīm, giving the lines the sense "having become [ones who had thousands of followers], they went to that city."

26. "those night-roaming rākṣasas . . . dwelt there happily" viharanti niśācarāḥ: Literally, "the night-roaming [ones] amused or diverted themselves." Ñ2,V2,3,B,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead nyavasan rajanīcarāḥ, "the night-roaming [ones] dwelt or passed the time."

Following verse 26, Ñ,V2,3,B,D1,4,6,7,9–11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of one line [85*]: "Now at this very time, Rāghava, as she pleased[1] . . . (etasminn eva kāle tu yathākāmaṃ ca rāghava)."

[1] "as she pleased" yathākāmam: Literally, "according to pleasure." This half verse construes with 27ab, which describes the gandharva woman Narmadā.

27. "At that time": In the absence of any transitional passage such as 85* (following notes to verse 26 above), we have added the phrase "At that time."

"who had prospered through her various virtues" nānādharmasamedhitā: Literally, "[she] prospered by various dharmas." The precise sense of the term dharma is hard to determine as it can mean either virtuous or religious practices or qualities in general. Ñ,V2,B,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead babhūva raghunandana, "there was, O delight of the Raghus."

"the goddesses Hrī, Śrī, and Kīrti" hrīśrīkīrti-: Literally, "Modesty, Fortune, and Fame."

28. "Although she was not a rākṣasa woman" sā . . . arākṣasī: Literally, "she, the non-rākṣasī."

"to those three rākṣasas" teṣāṃ rākṣasānām: Literally, "of those rākṣasas." The reference is, of course, to the three sons of Sukeśa—Mālyavān, Sumālin, and Mālin. We have added the number to avoid confusion with the reference to the rākṣasas in general in verse 26.

"in order of their age" jyeṣṭhakrameṇa: Literally, "sequentially from the eldest."

29. "were . . . given by their mother" mātrā dattāḥ: Ñ2,V2,B,D6,7,10,11,M6, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read dattā mātrā by transposition.

"illustrious" mahābhāgāḥ: The syllable -gā is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition.

"under the lunar asterism presided over by Bhaga, the god of marriage" nakṣatre bhagadaivate: Literally, "in the lunar asterism whose divinity is Bhaga." Cg and Ct identify the asterism as Uttarāphālgunī, which according to Apte (s.v. bhaga, uttaraphālgunī-) is the twelfth lunar mansion. Compare note to 7.6.33, where Cg associates Pūrvaphālgunī with Bhaga and Uttarāphālgunī with Aryamān, while Ct is silent regarding this. See, too, MBh 1.8.13 and 6.3.14.

30. "Lord" prabho: Ñ,V2,B2–4,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tadā, "then."

"they amused themselves with their wives" bhāryābhiḥ saha cikrīḍuḥ: Literally, "they played together with [their] wives." The pāda is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. Ñ2,V2,B,D5–7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read cikrīḍuḥ saha bhāryābhiḥ by transposition.

31. "the beautiful Sundarī" sundarī nāma sundarī: Literally, "the beautiful woman (sundarī) named Sundarī [the beautiful one]." See notes to verse 32 below for her offspring. See, too, notes to verses 35–36 below, regarding Kaikasī.

"with her" tasyām: Literally, "on or in her."

32. "Vajramuṣṭi" vajramuṣṭiḥ: Vajramuṣṭi fought with the monkey Nīla at 6.33.12 but was slain by Mainda at 6.33.28.

"Virūpākṣa" virūpākṣaḥ: There are apparently three rākṣasas with this name. See note to 7.1.16.

"the rākṣasa Durmukha" durmukhaḥ . . . rākṣasaḥ: The reference here is clearly to the rākṣasa who was counted among the forces of Rāvaṇa's army in the Yuddhakāṇḍa (6.8.6 and 6.9.1–5) and should not be confused with the monkey of the same name (6.21.23; 6.587*, following note to 6.29.11; 6.46.17; 7.1; and notes).

"Suptaghna" suptaghnaḥ: One of the rākṣasas of Rāvaṇa's forces (6.9.1–5), who, although engaging with and wounding Rāma (6.33.11, 26) in battle, is killed by Rāma, as the narrative is reconstructed in the critical edition (6.33.27). Vibhīṣaṇa, however, includes this name among those of the rākṣasas slain by the monkey forces at 1686*, following notes to 6.77.9–11. See, too, 3383*, following notes to 6.111.7.

"Yajñakopa" yajñakopaḥ: See 32* and notes, following notes to 7.1.20.

"and Matta and Unmatta as well" mattonmattau tathaiva ca: Matta is a variant name of the rākṣasa Mahāpārśva, one of Rāvaṇa's generals in the Yuddhakāṇḍa. Similarly, the name Yuddhonmatta or Unmatta is found as an alternative name for Mahodara. See notes to 6.57.16; 6.58.43–44, 1292*, following note 6.58.43–44; 6.59.1–3; 6.83.5 (here Pramatta); and 3383*, following notes to 6.111.7. These two rākṣasas are also mentioned at 32*, following notes to 7.1.20.

"And . . . Sundarī had a beautiful daughter" abhavat kanyā sundaryām sundarī: Literally, "there was a beautiful one [sundarī] in Sundarī [sundaryām]." See note to verse 31 above. See, too, 7.25.23–25 and 7.53.16 and notes.

33. "Her name was Ketumatī" nāmnā ketumatī nāma: Literally, "named Ketumatī by name." This redundant expression is not uncommon in the poem. For its use elsewhere in the Rāmāyaṇa, see notes to 6.38.25. Ñ2,V,B1–2,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read rāma, "O Rāma," for nāma.

"and she was dearer to him than life itself" prāṇebhyo 'pi garīyasī: Literally, "weightier than even life breaths."

34. "the night-roaming rākṣasa" niśācaraḥ: Literally, "the night-roaming [one]."

"Sumālin" sumālī: Cr notes the discrepancy in the stems (ikārānto 'pi sumāliśabdaḥ). See note to verse 5 above.

35–36. "Prahasta" prahastaḥ: Prahasta was one of Rāvaṇa's counselors and generals. Therefore, he is mentioned in numerous passages in the Yuddhakāṇḍa (see index). Rāvaṇa claimed that he had severed the head of Rāma (6.22.22). In the Uttarakāṇḍa, he is one of Rāvaṇa's ministers who accompany him into battle against the yakṣas (7.14.1–2 and 7.15.4).

"Akampana" akampanaḥ: Akampana was one of Rāvaṇa's powerful generals, who engaged with and was killed by Hanumān (6.43–44, especially, 6.44.28–29). A second rākṣasa of this same name is introduced at 6.47.14. The commentators assure us that he is different from the rākṣasa killed by Hanumān and that this one was a son of Rāvaṇa (see note to 6.47.14). A rākṣasa named Akampana is known to the southern recension of the Araṇyakāṇḍa. He was the sole survivor of the forces of Khara and Dūṣaṇa in the Daṇḍaka forest, and he returned to Laṅkā to inform Rāvaṇa of his relatives' destruction at the hands of Rāma (App. I. No. 10, following note to 3.29.35). Whether this figure is the same as either of the two Akampanas in the Yuddhakāṇḍa is not clear.

"Vikaṭa" vikaṭaḥ: A rākṣasa of this name is not known to the critical edition prior to this kāṇḍa. See note to 7.1.16.

"Kālakārmuka" kālakārmukaḥ: The name is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. Ñ2,V2,B,D6,7,10,11,G1, and Gorresio, GPP, Gita Press, and VSP read instead kālikāmukhaḥ, "Kālikāmukha." Cf. 3.22.31–32, where a rākṣasa named Kālakārmuka was one of the twelve mighty warriors flanking Khara when he attacked Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa and thus was among the 14,000 rākṣasa forces killed by Rāma in the Daṇḍaka forest.

"Dhūmrākṣa" dhūmrākṣaś cātha: Literally, "and then [there was] Dhūmrākṣa." Ñ2,V2,B1,4,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the slight variant dhūmrākṣaś caiva, "and even Dhūmrākṣa." Dhūmrākṣa is the name of a powerful rākṣasa chosen by Rāvaṇa to lead an attack on the monkey forces (6.41.18). He fought with and was eventually killed by Hanumān (6.42.1–37, esp., verses 34–37; see also note to 37). In the Uttarakāṇḍa, he is one of Rāvaṇa's ministers who accompanied him into battle against the yakṣas (7.14.1–2 and 7.15.6–8). See, too, 32* and note 3, following notes to 7.1.20.

"Daṇḍa" daṇḍaḥ: There appears to be no other reference in the Rāmāyaṇa to a rākṣasa of this name. Compare Uttarakāṇḍa sargas 71–72 where the story of King Daṇḍa is told.

"immensely powerful Supārśva" supārśvaś ca mahābalaḥ: Literally, "and the immensely powerful Supārśva." A rākṣasa of this name is among those listed by Vibhīṣaṇa as slain in battle by the monkey forces (6.77.9–11). A second rākṣasa of this name was a minister of Rāvaṇa who managed to dissuade the enraged overlord of the rākṣasas from slaying Sītā (6.80.50–57 and notes).

"Saṃhrādi" saṃhrādiḥ: A rākṣasa of this name is among the five mentioned by Mahodara, who were to participate in a ruse to force Sītā to submit to Rāvaṇa (6.52.22). Vibhīṣaṇa lists his name among those rākṣasas slain by the monkey forces at 1686*, following note to 6.77.9–11.

"Praghasa" praghasaḥ: This refers to at least four different figures in the Rāmāyaṇa, three of whom are rākṣasas. In the Sundarakāṇḍa, a rākṣasa named Praghasa was one of Rāvaṇa's five field marshals slain by Hanumān (5.44.2–3,31,35). In the Yuddhakāṇḍa, there is a rākṣasa named Praghasa who engaged with (6.33.10) and was killed by Sugrīva (6.33.24). Vibhīṣaṇa also lists this name among those rākṣasas slain by the monkey forces at 1686*, following notes to 6.77.9–11. However, there is another rākṣasa named Praghasa whom Vibhīṣaṇa lists as one of his four counselors at 6.28.7 (cf. note to verse 39 below), and he is mentioned by the commentators elsewhere in this kāṇḍa (see notes to 6.10.12; 6.11.3; 6.28.32; 6.33–34). Along with Vibhīṣana, these four rākṣasas took on human form and fought on the side of Rāma. Obviously, the reference here is not to the monkey named Praghasa who accompanied Hanumān to protect the western gate of Laṅkā (6.31.30 and note; 587*, following note to 6.29.11; and 683*, following note to 6.32.17).

"the rākṣasa Bhāsakarṇa" bhāsakarṇaś ca rākṣasaḥ: Literally, "and the rākṣasa Bhāsakarṇa." This is the name of one of Rāvaṇa's five field marshals slain by Hanumān (5.44.2–3,32,35).

"Rākā" rākā: The syllable rā is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. On the name Rākā (v.l. rakā), see S. Goldman 2016.

"Puṣpotkaṭā" puṣpotkaṭā: On Puṣpotkaṭā, see S. Goldman 2016.

"Kaikasī of the bright smile" kaikasī ca śucismitā: Literally, "and Kaikasī of the bright smile." This is the name of a daughter of Sumālin, the wife of Viśravas, and the mother of Rāvaṇa and his siblings. For the story of Kaikasī's marriage and pregnancies, see Uttarakāṇḍa sarga 9. See, however, note to 6.26.5, where Cg states that some commentators understand Mālyavān to be Kaikasī's father. See, too, S. Goldman 2016.

"and Kumbhīnasī" kumbhīnasī ca: See 7.25.23–25 and notes; cf. 6.7.7 and note.

37. "lovely-eyed . . . With her eyes like lotus petals . . . of yakṣa women" padmapatrākṣī svakṣī yakṣī-: Note the alliteration of the sound kṣ.

"Vasudā" vasudā: The syllable -dā is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. Ś,N1,V1,3,B2,D2,5,8,9,12,T2,3,M3, and KK and VSP read instead vasudhā.

38. "with her" tasyām: Literally, "in or on her."

39. "Those night-roaming rākṣasas" niśācarāḥ: Literally, "The night-roaming [ones]."

"Anala, Anila, Hara, and Saṃpāti" analaścānilaś caiva haraḥ saṃpātir eva ca: At 6.28.7 the names of the four counselors of Vibhīṣaṇa are given as Anala, Śarabha, Saṃpāti, and Praghasa. The commentators are silent on the discrepancy. At 6.28.32–34, Rāma states that Vibhīṣaṇa and his four companions (i.e., ministers) will take on human form to confront Rāma's enemies.

40. "by . . . the night-roaming rākṣasas" niśācaraiḥ: Literally, "by the night-roaming [ones]."

"dānavas" -dānavān: D6,7,10,11,M10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead yakṣān, "yakṣas." This makes the pāda hypometric.

The meter is vaṃśasthavila (vaṃśastha).

41. "those rākṣasas, unstoppable as a mighty gale, tore through the world" jagadbhramanto 'nilavad durāsadāḥ: Literally, "as irresistible as the wind, they wandered the world."

"Intent and equal to Mṛtyu himself in battle" raṇe ca mṛtyupratimāḥ samāhitāḥ: D6,7,10,11,M10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead raṇeṣu mṛtyupratimānatejasaḥ, "whose blazing splendor in battles was equal to that of Death himself."

"they . . . destroyed the sacred rites" kratukriyāṇāṃ praśamaṃkarāḥ: Literally, "the extinguishers of ritual performances."

The meter is vaṃśasthavila (vaṃśastha).

Sarga 6

1. "Since . . . were being slaughtered by those rākṣasas" tair vadhyamānāḥ: Literally, "while they were being slaughtered by them."

Following verse 1, V1,D7,10,11,T3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of two lines [89*]: "[God of gods and] the creator and ender of the world, the unborn,[1] of unmanifest form, the support of all the worlds, the supreme guru who must be propitiated (jagatsṛṣṭyantakartāram ajam avyaktarūpiṇam / ādhāraṃ sarvalokānām ārādhyaṃ paramaṃ gurum //)."

[1] "the unborn" ajam: This typical epithet of the Supreme Being, who is typically understood as being primordial, is read somewhat differently by Cs. In an effort to show that Śiva cannot be the primal deity, he glosses the epithet as "born from the Lord 'A' (ajaḥ ād bhagavato jayata iti)." The syllable "a" is sometimes used as a name of various divinities, principally, Viṣṇu, but also Kṛṣṇa, Śiva, Brahmā, Indra, etc. (Apte, s.v. "a"). He supports this interpretation with a verse found in both the Mahābhārata (12.328.12) and the Bhāgavatapurāṇa (12.5.1) to the effect that Brahmā was born from the Lord's [Viṣṇu's] grace and Rudra [Śiva], from his anger (yasya prasādajo brahmā rudraś ca krodhasaṃbhavaḥ—so MBh).

2. "the three-eyed foe of Kāma and Tripura" kāmāriṃ tripurāriṃ trilocanam: For Śiva as the foe of Kāma, see notes to verses 25 and 29 below. See, too, 1.22.10–14 for Viśvāmitra's narration of how Kāma became Anaṅga. For Śiva as the foe of Tripura, see

7.4.28 and notes; 321*, lines 5–7, following notes to 7.16.29; and 419*, lines 1–2, following notes to 7.21.26. Here Tripura is, as at 7.4.28, the name of a demon.

3. "harrier of your foes" ripubādhana: B4,D1,3,4,10,11,M4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead ripubādhanaiḥ, which makes the compound refer to the sons of Sukeśa. Cr understands the compound to be aripubādhanaiḥ [the initial "a" would be elided following the final "e" of bādhyante], which he explains as "Those who have no enemies are great (na ripavo yeṣāṃ te mahānta ity arthaḥ)." Cr continues, explaining that the sons of Sukeśa oppress even such people. (tān api bādhante. taiḥ sukeśaputraiḥ sarvāḥ prajā bādhyante.)

4. "Our ashrams, which were places of refuge, no longer offer sanctuary." śaraṇyāny aśaraṇyāni āśramāṇi kṛtāni naḥ: Literally, "our ashrams [which were] places of refuge have been rendered places of no refuge." Note the hiatus between pādas a and b. As Ck, Cg, and Ct observe, the ashrams were formerly places of sanctuary for the gods, ancestors, guests, birds, beasts, and so forth (devapitratithipaśupakṣyādirakṣaṇārhāṇi).

"Śakra has been cast out of heaven, and they disport themselves there as if they were he." svargāc ca cyāvitaḥ śakraḥ svarge krīḍanti śakravat: Literally, "Śakra has been made to fall from heaven and they play in heaven like Śakra." D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead svargāc ca devān pracyāvya, in place of pāda c, while Ś,Ñ2,V2,3,D2,6–8,10–12,T3, and Lahore, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read devavat for śakravat. For those manuscripts and editions reading these variants, the second half of the verse would have the sense "having cast the gods from heaven, they play in heaven like the gods."

5–6. "I am Candra, the moon god! I am Ravi, the sun god!" candro 'haṃ ravir apy aham: Literally, "I am Candra and I am Ravi as well."

"those rākṣasas, O Lord, arrogant through the gift of their boons" iti te rākṣasā deva varadānena darpitāḥ: Ś,Ñ1,V1,3,D2,5,8–12,T3, and Lahore, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead a passage of one line [92*]: "so saying, the rākṣasas Mālin, Sumālin, and Mālyavān [harry us] (iti mālī sumālī ca mālyavāṃś caiva rākṣasāḥ)."

"reveling in battle" samaroddharṣāḥ: The word -uddharṣa can mean either "delighted" or "courageous." Ck glosses, "those who delight in battle (samara uddharṣaḥ saṃtoṣo yeṣāṃ te)," while Ct glosses, "those who have perseverance in battle (samare saṃgrāma uddharṣa utsāho yeṣāṃ te)."

"harry us" bādhante: Literally, "they harry or torment." The verb is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition.

7. "protection as we are overcome with fear" bhayārtānām abhayam: Literally, "nonfear . . . of those afflicted with fear."

"fearsome" aśivam: Note the implicit play on the name of the god Śiva.

"who are a thorn in the side of the gods" devakaṇṭakān: Literally, "those thorns of the divinities." See Shah (1975, pp. 44–47 and 1976, p. 110), who, following the lead of Ramadas (1928, p. 345), understands the term devakaṇṭaka here and at Yuddhakāṇḍa 112.13 to be a synonym of Amarakaṇṭaka and concludes that "It seems highly probable that Laṅkā was situated on the Amarakaṇṭaka—the Trikūṭa parvata" (Shah, 1975, p. 47). See 7.4.23 and notes and Introduction, "Rākṣasas," p. 37, note 5. See, too, Kibe 1928, pp. 700–701.

8. "dark blue" nīlalohitaḥ: Literally, "blue-red or purple." Śiva is often described in the literature and rendered in paintings as having a deep blue color. This is the only use of this epithet of Śiva in the Rāmāyaṇa. However, the compound, as an adjective, is found at 5.1.4, where it describes the colors of the minerals on Mount Mahendra. Most of the translators take the term here to refer to a dark reddish color. See, for example, Benoît's note (1999, p. 1712). Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 385) renders the term as if it were another of Śiva's epithets, nīlakaṇṭha, translating, "of . . . the blue throat." Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1923) ignores the term. While the kenning, nīlakaṇṭha, is not common in Vālmīki, it is found twice in the reconstructed text of the Uttarakāṇḍa (7.55.20 and 7.78.17) and once as the variant nīlagrīva in the apparatus (317*, lines 4–6, following notes to 7.16.24).

"being partial to Sukeśa, said" sukeśaṃ prati sāpekṣa āha: Literally, "having expectation or concern with regard to Sukeśa, he said." As pointed out by Ck, Cg, and Ct, Śiva has an almost paternal relation to Sukeśa and his descendants, since it was he who rescued the infant rākṣasa and granted him boons (see 7.4.27–31). As Ct puts it, "Because he [Śiva] had saved Sukeśa's life and since Mālyavān, etc., are Sukeśa's descendants, Śiva considers it to be inappropriate for him to kill any of them himself (sukeśasya svenojjīvitatvān mālyavadādīnāṃ tatputratvāt svakartṛkatatsaṃhārasyānaucityaṃ manvāna ity arthaḥ). Ck and Cg understand similarly. In much the same vein, Cr argues that, having once saved Sukeśa, now, too, Śiva wishes to save him from himself (pūrvaṃ svarakṣitvād idānīm api svasmāt tadrakṣākāṅkṣī karpardī śivo devagaṇān prāha). See note to verse 26 below. The sequence -kṣa āh- is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. Ś,Ñ,V,B,D,T3,M1, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read the synonymous sāpekṣaḥ prāha for sāpekṣa āha.

9. "these asuras" te 'surāḥ: The term asura is an unusual one to use in reference to rākṣasas, especially in the context of this passage, which deals with the origin and lineage of the rākṣasa race. Lahore (7.5.9), Gorresio (7.6.9), GPP, and VSP render the sequence without an avagraha ('), leaving the term surāḥ, which can only be interpreted as a plural vocative, "O gods." In this reading, pāda b would mean: "They are not to be killed by me, O gods!" Gita Press, KK, and VSP read the sequence with the avagraha. All translators consulted understand the term to be the vocative surāḥ, with the exception of Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1923), whose text reads with the critical edition. The commentators do not gloss the term. The printed text of Cr appears to read surāḥ (without an avagraha). However, he explains the phrase in such a way as to suggest that he understands asurāḥ. He says: "Those [a]suras are not to be killed by me, that is to say, because they were protected by me, they ought not to be killed. (te [*']surāḥ mamāvadhyā mayā pālitatvād dhantum anarhāḥ.)" The critical apparatus offers no help. All considered, we are inclined to believe that the vocative surāḥ is probably intended, although the evidence is not sufficient to support an emendation of the critical text. Cf. notes to verse 27 below. For other ambiguities depending on the presence or absence of an avagraha, see notes to verse 27 and 99*, note 6, following notes to verse 32 below; 7.30.31; and 7.73.10.

"some advice" mantram: The term in contexts such as this has the connotation of counsel or secret. Ck, Cg, Ct, and Cr gloss, "means or strategy (upāyam)."

See verse 27 below, which is a close variant of this verse.

10. "You must exert yourselves in the following manner" evam eva samudyogaṃ puraskṛtya: Literally, "having put exertion to the fore in this very way." Ñ1,V1,3,D10,11, T1,2,G3,M1–4,8,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read etam, "this," for evam, "in this fashion." This substitution has a bearing on how some of the commentators understand the term samudyogam, "energy or effort." We understand it as do Ck, Cg, and Ct, who take the term to be the opposite of delaying (samudyogaṃ na tu kālāntarīyam ity arthaḥ). Cr, on the other hand, understands the term to be a reference to an effort that takes the form of expressions of their [the gods'] own abjection, etc. [that is to say, the expressions that the gods have first made to Śiva and are now being directed to bring to Viṣṇu's attention] (etaṃ svadainyoccāraṇādirūpaṃ samudyogam). See notes to verses 21 and 52 below. See, too, 7.13.19 and notes.

"O bulls among gods" surārṣabhāḥ: The syllable -bhāḥ is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. Ś1,B1,D6,7,10,11,M2,7–9, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead maharṣayaḥ, "O great seers." Cs is uncomfortable with Śiva's apparent neglect of the gods and understands the compound maharṣayaḥ here to be an epithet of the gods, which means "O wise ones (he jñāninaḥ)." He argues that this is because the narration has primarily concerned the gods from the outset (upakrame devaprādhānyakathanam).

11. "afflicted as they were by fear of the night-roaming rākṣasas" niśācarabhayārditāḥ: Literally, "[they] afflicted by fear of the night-roaming [ones]."

12. "Afflicted with fear of Sukeśa's sons" sukeśatanayārditāḥ: D6,7,10,11, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead sukeśatanayān prati, "regarding the sons of Sukeśa."

"God" devam: The word is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition.

"In their agitation" saṃbhrāntavat: We follow Ck and Cg in taking the adverb to refer to the condition of the gods as being agitated (saṃbhrāntāḥ santaḥ). Ct and Cr, however, understand the term to be an adjective modifying the speech of the gods. Cr interprets, "words characterized or marked by fear (sambhrāntavad bhayaviśiṣṭaṃ vākyam)," while Ct understands, "fitting to those who are agitated (sambhrāntavat sambhrāntārham [vākyam])."

13. "who resemble the three sacred fires" tretāgnisaṃnibhaiḥ: See note to 7.4.2 for the names of these fires.

"our places" sthānāni . . . naḥ: See notes to verses 20 and 24 below.

14. "With that as their base" tatra sthitāḥ: Literally, "situated or established there."

"those night-roaming rākṣasas" kṣaṇadācarāḥ: Literally, "the night-roaming [ones]." Cr glosses, "rākṣasas (rākṣasāḥ)." For other occurrences of this term in the Uttarakāṇḍa, see 7.11.19, 40; and 7.27.26. Outside of these few references, in the critical edition of the Rāmāyaṇa, this kenning is found only in the Araṇyakāṇḍa (3.28.4,9; 3.31.23; and 3.47.7).

15. "As a favor to us" asmatpriyārtham: Literally, "for the sake of our favor." V2,D6, 7,10,11,M10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP instead asmaddhitārthāya, "for our sake or benefit."

"Please make an offering . . . of their lotuslike faces severed by your discus" cakrakṛttāsyakamalān nivedaya: Literally, "offer the discus-cut-face-lotuses." The use of the metaphor maps the bloody act of decapitation onto the paradigm of the worship of a deity with a floral offering, in this case Yama, the god of death. See the introduction to the Yuddhakāṇḍa on the aestheticization of violence (Goldman and Goldman 2009, pp. 22–25).

Following 15ab, D6,7,10,11,M10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of one line [94*, line 1]. These same manuscripts insert an additional line following verse 16ab [94*, line 2]: "We have come to you for refuge. Please be our recourse, Lord of the gods.[1] [Please kill[1]] in battle those frenzied[2] lords of the rākṣasas, so arrogant because of their boon,[3] together with their kinsmen.[4][2] (śaraṇaṃ tvāṃ vayaṃ prāptā gatir bhava sureśvara[1] / rākṣasendrān samare hṛṣṭān sānubandhān varoddhatān[2] //)"

[1] "Please kill": We have followed the commentators in supplying a verb. Ct, for example, indicates that we should add the verb "please kill (jahīti śeṣaḥ)."

[2] "frenzied" hṛṣṭān: KK and VSP read instead duṣṭān, "wicked or evil."

[3] "so arrogant because of their boon" varoddhatān: D6,7,10,11,M10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead madoddhatān, "arrogant from their intoxication or pride."

[4] "together with their kinsmen" sānubandhān: Ck, Cg, Ct, and Cr understand the term anubandha, "kinsmen, relations," to refer to their rākṣasa followers (sānubandhān sānucarān rākṣasān—so Ct).

16. "For when danger arises, there is none to equal you as grantor of protection for us." bhayeṣv abhayado 'smākaṃ nānyo 'sti bhavatā samaḥ: Literally, "In dangers, there is no other giver of safety [lit., 'non-danger'] for us who is equal to you." D6,7,10,11,T1,2,G1,3, M3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read vinā, "without," for samaḥ, "equal." This lends the pāda the sense "without you, there is no other . . . " Compare verse 17 below.

Following 16ab, D6,7,10,11,M10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of one line [94*, line 2]. See note to verse 15 above.

17. "who inspires fear in his enemies, granted protection" abhayaṃ bhayado 'rīṇāṃ dattvā: Literally, "having given non-fear, the giver of fear to enemies." Compare verse 16 above.

18. "I realize that . . . And I also know about" jāne . . . jāne: Literally, "I know . . . I know."

"grown arrogant through the boon of Lord Śiva" īśānavaradarpitam: Literally, "proud from the boon of Īśāna." Īśāna, an epithet of Śiva, is used only one other time in the Rāmāyaṇa (7.7.34). The word -darpitam is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition.

19. "I shall slaughter in battle" sūdayiṣyāmi saṃgrāme: D6,7,10,11,T1,2,G,M1–5,7–10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead nihaniṣyāmi saṃkruddhaḥ, "enraged I shall slaughter."

"who have transgressed all bounds" samatikrāntamaryādān: Ck understands the word maryādā, "limit or boundary," to be "the law concerning who is and who is not to be harried (bādhyābādhyavyavasthā)," while Ct understands, "the law regarding those who are and are not to be killed (vadhyāvadhyavyavasthā)."

"You need not be anxious" bhavata vijvarāḥ: Literally, "[you all] be devoid of anxiety." pāda d = 7.6.30d.

20. "by the powerful Lord Viṣṇu" viṣṇunā prabhaviṣṇunā: Literally, "by Viṣṇu, the powerful [one]." This adjective is used here in conjunction with the name Viṣṇu because of its echoing effect. See note to 7.5.13.

"their respective abodes" yathāvāsam: Literally, "according to abode." See notes to verses 13 above and 23 below.

21. "the night-roaming rākṣasa" niśācaraḥ: Literally, "the night-roaming [one]."

"the mission" samudyogam: Literally, "exertion or undertaking." Compare notes to verse 10 above and verses 23 and 52 below.

"of the wise gods" vibudhānām: Literally, "of the wise [ones]." This is a common kenning for the gods.

22. "I have heard" kila: The particle is frequently used to indicate that the speaker has heard about an action through the report of others. See Emeneau 1969, pp. 244–48. See 5.65.4–6, 10; 6.19.13; 6.38.6; 6.70.27; and notes.

"have joined forces" saṃhatya: Literally, "having come or met together." V3,D6,7, 10,11,M9,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the more or less synonymous saṃgamya, "having assembled." Cr understands that the gods and seers have approached Śaṅkara (śaṅkaraṃ saṃgamya).

"have said this to three-eyed [Śaṅkara]" idam ūcus trilocanam: D6,7,10,11,M10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead idaṃ vacanam abruvan, "[they] spoke these words [to Śaṅkara]."

23. "have put forth their energies" samudyuktāḥ: Literally, "engaged [in an undertaking]." See notes to verses 10 and 21 above and notes to verse 52 below. D7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead samuddṛptāḥ, "very arrogant, haughty." This reading creates a redundancy in light of the nearly synonymous -uddhatāḥ in pāda b. See note to verse 38 below.

24. "We have been defeated . . . we cannot even remain in our own homes" abhibhūtāḥ sma na śaktāḥ sma . . . / sveṣu veśmasu saṃsthātum: The use of the middle voice (ātmanepada), sma, "we are," for the normally parasmaipada smaḥ root √as is not rare in the epic.

GPP, NSP, and Gita Press attempt to address the irregularity by reading the first instance as the normative parasmaipada, smaḥ. This variant is not noted in the critical apparatus.

The phrase "we cannot even remain in our own homes (sma na śaktāḥ sma . . . / sveṣu veśmasu saṃsthātum)" highlights a certain contradiction in the gods' narrative. Although it accords with their statement at verse 13 above that the rākṣasas have usurped their places [in heaven], the text notes in verse 20 that they happily returned to their respective abodes. D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read the synonymous sadmasu, "in the houses or homes," for veśmasu.

"O lord of Umā" umāpate: This epithet is relatively rare in the Rāmāyaṇa, occurring only five times in the critical edition. It is found only once in the Bālakāṇḍa (1.42.2), and four times in the Uttarakāṇḍa (here and at 7.31.31, 7.78.16, and 7.81.16). Cf. 7.78.12 and notes, where the synonymous umeśa is used. D10,11,T1,2,G,M2,3,5,7–10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead prajāpate, "O Lord of creatures." Cr wishes to distinguish this epithet from the same one commonly used of Brahmā, and so he explains, "prajāpati means 'O protector of creatures by means of punishing the wicked' (duṣṭanigrahadvārāprajārakṣaka)."

25. "O foremost of those who burn! Burn up" daha pradahatām vara: Śiva is known for the fiery destruction of his foes, such as Kāma and Tripura. See notes to verse 2 above and 7.4.28.

"by uttering the syllable 'Hum'" huṃkṛtena: Literally, "by the production of 'Hum.'" The syllable "Hum," which is expressive of anger, is often used in the literature by powerful individuals as a destructive weapon. Compare 1.39.27, where the sage Kapila uses it to incinerate the 60,000 sons of Sagara. Cf. 1.54.5–6 and 1.74.17.

26. "Śiva, the slayer of Andhaka" andhakasūdanaḥ: Literally, "the slayer of Andhaka." Andhaka is one of the great asura enemies of Śiva known from the epics, purāṇas, etc. (e.g., 6.33.6 and note, and LiṅgaP 1.93.7). There are numerous versions of the slaying of Andhaka by Śiva. See, for example, Śivapurāṇa, Rudrasaṃhitā, Yuddhakhaṇḍa 42–46.

"shaking his head and his hand" śiraḥ karaṃ ca dhunvānaḥ: Clearly Śiva shakes his head and waves his hand to indicate his refusal to comply with the gods' request. As noted above (see verses 8 and 9 and note to verse 8), Śiva demurs on the grounds of his quasi-paternal relationship with the rākṣasas. Ck, Cg, Ct, Cr, and Cs all comment on this in various ways. Cg, for example, understands that the gesture indicates Śiva's intolerance of the words of the gods (suroktasyāsahyatādyotanam). Ck, Ct, and Cs see Śiva's refusal as an example of the proverb that one should not cut down even a poison tree [that one has planted] (viṣavṛkṣo 'pīti nyāyena svavadhānarhā ityāśayeneti bhāvaḥ—so Ct). The proverb of the "poison tree (viṣavṛkṣa)" is quoted in full at Kumārasambhava 2.55cd and PañcT 1.268. Cs also believes that Śiva's gestures with his head and hand are intended to reassure or comfort the gods (śiraādidhūnanaṃ devasāntvanārtham). Cr takes Śiva's gestures as a sign of his unwillingness to kill [the rākṣasas] (śiraḥ karaṃ ca dhunvāno hananābhāvasūcakatvena cālayamānaḥ san).

27. "It is not for me to kill the sons of Sukeśa in battle" avadhyā mama te sukeśatanayā raṇe: Literally, "The sons of Sukeśa are not to be slain by me in battle."

"O gods" devāḥ: See note to verse 9 above.

pādas cd = 7.6.9cd.

28. "will slay them in battle" haniṣyati sa tān yuddhe: Ñ,V2,B,D3,6,7,10,11,M6, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead harir nārāyaṇaḥ śrīmān, "the majestic Hari Nārāyaṇa."

29. "Not having received what they desired from Hara, they . . . that foe of Kāma" harān nāvāpya te kāmaṃ kāmārim: The critical text plays with the repetition of the word kāma-. Ñ,V2,B,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead harād avāpya te mantraṃ kāmārim, "having received that advice from Hara, they . . . the foe of Kāma." See notes to verses 2 and 25 above for Śiva as a foe of Kāma.

30. "were addressed thus" uktāḥ: Literally, "were addressed."

"I shall slaughter the foes of the gods." surārīn sūdayiṣyāmi: Ś,Ñ,V,B1,2,4,D1,2,4–12,T3, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead surārīṃs tān haniṣyāmi, "I will kill those foes of the gods."

"You need not be anxious, O gods." surā bhavata vijvarāḥ: Literally, "O gods, be ones without anxiety." Ñ,V2,B,D7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read nirbhayāḥ, "fearless," for vijvarāḥ, "without anxiety," lending the pāda the sense "You should have no fear, O gods." Pāda d = 7.6.19d.

31. "Thus . . . Hari has vowed to the terrified gods to kill us" devānāṃ bhayabhītānāṃ hariṇā . . . pratijñāto vadho 'smākam: Literally, "of those gods frightened by fear, our death was promised by Hari." The syntax of the genitive plural is somewhat awkward. Cr seeks to rationalize it by adding "in the midst (madhye)," i.e., "in the midst of the terrified gods."

"Therefore you must think of some appropriate response." tac cintayatha yat kṣamam: Literally, "what is appropriate, you should think of that." Ñ2,V2,B2–4,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read the slight variant cintyatām yad iha kṣamam, literally, "what is appropriate here, is to be thought of."

32. "This Nārāyaṇa, who desires to kill us, is extremely difficult to defeat." duḥkhaṃ nārāyaṇaṃ jetuṃ yo no hantum abhīpsati: D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read for pāda d, yo no hantum ihecchati, "who desires to kill us here." Ś,V1,3,D2,3,8,9,12, and KK and VSP omit 32cd. KK shows the line in brackets between verses 38 and 39.

Following 32ab, Ś,Ñ2,V,B1(lines1–5),3,4,D2,3,6–13 (D6,7,10,11 omit lines 10,11 see 99*, note 10 below), and Lahore (omits lines 2,3,7), Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert, while Ñ1,D1,4,5,T2,3 insert after verse 32, a passage of eleven lines [99*]: "Namuci,[1] Kālanemin,[2] Prahlāda[3] that foremost of heroes, Rādheya,[4] Bahumāyin,[5] the righteous Lokapāla,[1–2] Yamala, Arjuna, Hārdikya, Śumbha, and Niśumbhaka as well. All these mighty and immensely powerful asuras and dānava lords[6] had never been heard of as being defeated when they entered battle.*[7][3–5] All of them had offered hundreds of sacrifices. All of them possessed the power of illusion.[8] All of them were expert in all divine weapon-spells, and all of them sowed terror among their enemies.[6–7] And yet Nārāyaṇa slaughtered them by the hundreds and the thousands.[8] Realizing this, all[9] of you must do what is appropriate.[9] All this that was fitting was uttered by righteous and glorious Mālyavān, endowed with forbearance, and he obtained a long life[10][10–11]."

[1] "Namuci" namuciḥ: The story of Indra and Namuci is popular and known from the earliest literature, e.g., ṚV 1.53.7 and 8.14.13 and TaiBr 1.6–7. These versions are summarized by Keith (1925, pp. 130–31). The story is also related at MBh 9.42.28–31. For additional references, see notes to 4.11.22. On its inclusion in the Rāmāyaṇa, see Pollock 1991, p. 39, note 74 and p. 41, note 83 (note that the reference should be to 6.44.17). Cf. 7.1.3, where the name Namuci is given as a variant reading for the sage named Namucu.

[2] "Kālanemin" kālanemī ca: Ñ,V1,3,D3,5,9–11,T2,3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead kālanemiś ca, "and Kālanemi."

[3] "Prahlāda" prahlādaḥ: Ñ2,V3,B1,D6,7,10,11,T2,3, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP instead saṃhrādaḥ, "Saṃhrāda." Clearly the variant reflects concern that the asura Prahlāda, far from being slain by Viṣṇu, is throughout the literature represented as his devotee.

[4] "Rādheya" rādheyaḥ: Cs identifies this figure as the son of an asura woman named Rādhā. (rādheyaḥ rādhānāmnī kācanāsurastrī. tatputraḥ.) Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p.

387) understands the matronymic to refer to the Mahābhārata warrior Karṇa, but this cannot be correct, because the latter is neither an asura nor is he slain by Viṣṇu. Raghunathan's opinion is shared by Benoît in a note (1999, p. 1713), where he identifies Karṇa as an incarnation of Naraka, identifies Hārdikya as Kṛtavarman, and notes that these two figures appear in the Mahābhārata. Benoît provides no citations. In the Mahābhārata, Hārdikya, son of Hṛdika, is a patronymic for Kṛtavarman (e.g., MBh 1.57.88). At MBh 1.61.15, a daitya by the name of Aśvapati takes birth as a king by the name of Hārdikya.

[5] "Bahumāyin" bahumayī: Some translators, like us, understand this to be a proper name, while others take it as an epithet meaning "possessing great powers of illusion or magic."

[6] "dānava lords" dānavendrāḥ: Ñ2,B1,3,4,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead dānavāś caiva, "and the dānavas."

[*7] "All . . . had never been heard of as being defeated when they entered battle" sarve samaram āsādya na śrūyante 'parājitāḥ: Literally, "all having come to battle were never heard of as undefeated." The critical edition, as well as GPP, NSP, KK and VSP, all read the double negative, yielding the sense "were not heard of as undefeated." Among the translators consulted, only Benoît (1999, p. 1235) renders the double negative, translating, "ne sont pas restés invaincu sur le champ de bataille, que l'on sache." Lahore (7.6.33) and Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1924) read the sequence without the avagraha, śrūyante parājitāḥ, "were never heard of as defeated." We believe that, in the context, this is probably the correct reading, despite the preference of many editors for the avagraha, and we have rendered accordingly. See notes to verse 9 above.

[8] "possessed the power of illusion" māyāvinaḥ: Ś1,Ñ,V,D6,7,10,11,T2,3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP instead māyāvidaḥ, "were knowers of the power of illusion."

[9] "Realizing this, all" etaj jñātvā tu sarve vai: Ñ2,V1,2,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead sarveṣām for sarve vai. This lends the pāda the sense "realizing this about them all."

[10] Ñ2,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP omit lines 10–11.

33. "as might Bhaga and Aṃśa to Vāsava" bhagāṃśāv iva vāsavam: Bhaga and Aṃśa are two of the original group of eight [later twelve] deities said to be the sons of Aditi and the seer Kaśyapa and known by the matronymic Ādityas. In the later mythology Indra (Vāsava) is considered to belong to this group, and, as king of the gods, would be regarded as the eldest of the Ādityas and their leader. This provides the basis for the simile in which the two younger brothers deferentially address their elder. For Amśa, see ṚV 2.1.4; 2.27.1 and MBh 1.218.33; and for Bhaga, see ṚV 2.1.7 and 2.27.1. Cg, the only commentator to read with the critical edition, understands the term aṃśa not as a proper name but in its sense of "portion or fragment." He then takes the dvandva compound to refer to "Bhaga and his fragment," by which he means Bhaga and his fellow Āditya Āryamān, the god of hospitality and marital accord. Ck and Cg further identify Bhaga as the presiding divinity of the nakṣatra Pūrvaphālgunī and Aryamān as that of Uttarāphālgunī (bhagaḥ pūrvaphalgunī nakṣatradevatā. tadaṃśo 'ryamottaraphalgunī nakṣatradevatā—so Cg). Ct notes the critical reading as a variant and, like Cg, sees the reference as being to Bhaga and Aryamān, although he makes no reference to their astrological association. Cf. note to 7.5.29 where Cg and Ct claim that Bhaga is the presiding divinity of Uttarāphālgunī.

Ñ2,V2,B,D6,7,10,11,M6,10, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read aśvinau, "the Aśvins," for bhagāṃśau.

34. Benoît (1999, p. 1713) notes that the pious duties of which Mālin and Sumālin boast in this verse correspond closely to those prescribed for the kshatriya class at Manusmṛti

1.89, with the exception of Manu's injunction that the ruling class should practice detachment from objects of the senses. Benoît speculates that this later omission may suggest that the rākṣasas are not fully dharmic or that their dharma is different from that assigned to humans. He also suggests that the difference might correspond to the different types of dharmic activities, which are said by Manu to be appropriate to the different yugas.

"studied the vedas" svadhītam: Literally, "well studied or well instructed." The sequence "sva-" is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition.

"have adhered to our proper duties" svadharmaḥ sthāpitaś ca naḥ: Literally, "and our svadharma is established." The term svadharma normally refers to the duties appropriate for a person by virtue of his or her particular varṇa, or class, and āśrama, or stage of life, and the brothers appear to be summing up their practice of the appropriate duties of their class as detailed in the first two pādas. This concept, most famously enunciated at Bhagavadgīta 3.35, informs the social order articulated in the Rāmāyaṇa. Nevertheless, the term itself is not frequently encountered in the Rāmāyaṇa. See 6.80.53; 7.11.38; and notes, where the term is used in the context of Rāvaṇa's proper duty. D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead sudharmaḥ sthāpitaḥ pathi, literally, "proper dharma is/was established on the path." According to Ck and Ct, the term sudharma refers to "proper or excellent dharma," which the rākṣasa brothers have established by means of those activities, such as vedic study, that they have previously performed properly. (sudharmaḥ śobhano dharmaḥ. pathi sthāpitaḥ. prāksamyaganuṣṭhitair adhyayanādibhir iti śesaḥ—so Ct; Ck similarly.) Cr understands that the phrase means that the rākṣasas have established proper dharma as a family tradition and, moreover, that the power they derive from these practices will ensure that they are victorious (pathi kulaparaṃparāyāṃ sudharmaḥ sthāpita etenaitatkarmaprabhāvād asmākaṃ vijayo bhaviṣyatīti sūcitam). KK and VSP read sudharmaḥ prāpitaḥ pathi, "proper dharma has been set on the path," a reading unrecorded in the critical apparatus. Cg does not comment on this odd reading. The term svadharma occurs thirteen times in the critical edition of the Rāmāyaṇa (1.6.17; 1.20.7; 1.72.11; 2.25.2; 2.26.16; 2.98.61; 2.104.24; 4.18.11; 4.24.10; 5.18.5; 6.80.53; 7.6.34; 7.6.11; but cf. 1.1.75). Note that our comments on the frequency of the term svadharma in the Rāmāyaṇa should be emended to indicate that the reference at 6.80.53 is the only one in the Yuddhakāṇḍa, not in the entire epic.

35. "With mighty rivers in the form of our weapons, we have plunged deep into the imperturbable ocean that is the host of the gods." devasāgaram akṣobhyaṃ śastraughaiḥ pravigāhya ca: Literally, "and having plunged into the unshakable ocean of gods with weapon-floods." The figure thoroughly exploits the common epic metaphor of a great army or host as an ocean. The image suggested is that of strong rivers or currents of water in the form of the armed rākṣasas penetrating the mass of the oceanlike hosts of the gods. This is explicitly noted by Cr, who glosses, "an ocean in the form of the gods (devarūpasamudram)." Cf. 6.7.12–13; 6.46.25–28; and notes. Ñ2,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead śastraiḥ samavagāhya ca, "and having plunged into with weapons." This reading somewhat weakens the aquatic metaphor but is clearly based on the same idea as the critical reading. All translators consulted render the metaphor in one way or another. Benoît alone appears to understand the verse literally rather than metaphorically. He sees the rākṣasas as having actually plunged into the "divine ocean." In a note (1999, p. 1713), he remarks that their [the rākṣasas'] plunge into the ocean is merely one among their numerous misdeeds. He then links this passage to the fact that the deity of the ocean, Sāgara, has close links with the Ikṣvāku dynasty. We are aware of no such episode or misdeed on the part of the rākṣasas and believe that Benoît has failed to understand the reference to the ocean of the gods as a metaphor.

"We have always defeated them in battle." jitā devā raṇe nityam: Literally, "The gods have always been defeated in battle." Ñ,V2,B1,3,4,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead jitā dviṣo hy apratimāḥ, "For [we] have defeated [our] incomparable enemies."

"For us there is no fear of death." na no mṛtyukṛtaṃ bhayam: Literally, "There is not for us [any] fear or danger produced by death." Commentators differ in their understanding of the intention of this phrase. Ct understands that since the rākṣasas have already defeated the gods, they are in no danger of being killed. He adds, however, that the real meaning is that since there is nothing left for them to accomplish, they would suffer no loss even in death. (yato dviṣo devā jitās tat tasmād asmākaṃ mṛtyukṛtaṃ bhayaṃ nāstīty arthaḥ. kartavyāvaśeṣābhāvān mṛtyāv api na kṣatir iti bhāvaḥ.) Ck's text appears to be similar to that of Ct's but is defective in parts. Cr, as indicated in the note to verse 36 below, understands that the rākṣasas anticipate no danger of suffering death at the hands of the gods, including Nārāyaṇa, who will not dare to stand before them in battle (dviṣo jitā ata eva pramukhe saṅgrāme sthātuṃ nārāyaṇādayo bibhyati tat teṣām asmākaṃ mṛtyukṛtaṃ bhayaṃ no nāsti).

36. "all of them fear" sarva eva hi bibhyati: Literally, "they all indeed fear." Ñ2,V2, B,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead sarve bibhyati sarvadā, "they all always fear."

37. "It is no fault of Viṣṇu" viṣṇor doṣaś ca nāsti: Cm and Ct (as second alternative) explain the critical reading. They understand that Viṣṇu has no reason of his own to vow to destroy the rākṣasas (viṣṇor asmadvadhapratijñāyāṃ yaḥ kāraṇaṃ syāt tādṛśo viṣṇoḥ sahajo doṣo nāstīty arthaḥ). D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead viṣṇor dveṣasya nāsty eva. This lends the first half of the verse the sense "There is no reason for Viṣṇu's antipathy, O lord of the rākṣasas." Ck, Cg, and Ct (first alternative) explain, " 'There is no reason for Viṣṇu's antipathy.' The sense is that this is no cause on our part for having offended him" (asmābhis tadapakārākaraṇād iti bhāva—so Cg; Ck and Ct similarly).

"It is the fault of the gods alone" devānām eva doṣeṇa: Literally, "through the fault of the gods alone." Ct understands the fault here to be the gods' incitement (upajāpena). See note to verse 38 below.

38. "Therefore, this very day, putting forth our energies and surrounded by all of our troops" tasmād eva samudyuktāḥ sarvasainyasamāvṛtāḥ: See note to verse 23 above. D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead tasmād adyaiva sahitāḥ sarve 'nyonyasamāvṛtāḥ. This lends the line the sense "therefore, this very day, all of us united and protected or surrounded by one another."

"we shall willingly slaughter . . . on account of whom" jighāṃsāmo yebhyaḥ: Literally, "we desire to kill on account of whom." KK and VSP read instead jighāṃsāma ebhyaḥ, "we desire to kill on account of those," a variant not noted in the critical apparatus. Cg notes that the desiderative (sannanta) jighāṃsāmaḥ, "we desire to kill," must be understood in its simplex meaning "we [will] kill," and that the desiderative is irregular (jighāṃsāma iti svārthe sannārṣaḥ).

"trouble" doṣaḥ: Compare note to verse 37 above.

39. "When Mālin and Sumālin and their elder brother, the lord Mālyavān, . . . in this fashion" iti mālī sumālī ca mālyavān agrajaḥ prabhuḥ: D3,G1,M4, and VSP omit this line. KK places pādas ab in brackets, as its 45ab, noting that the passage is known only to four of its manuscripts. For 39ab, Ś,Ñ1,V1,3,D1,2,4,5,7–12,T3, and Lahore, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP substitute a passage of one line [101*]: "Having taken counsel in this fashion, those mighty ones, relying on all of their troops[1] (evaṃ saṃmantrya balinaḥ sarvasainyasamāśritāḥ //)."

[1] "relying on all their troops" sarvasainyasamāśritāḥ: V1,D7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead sarvasainyam upāsitāḥ. This sequence is extremely difficult to construe. The only commentator to make an attempt at doing so is Cr, who gamely offers, "having protected [their] troops (pālitasainyāḥ)." D1,4,5, and KK and VSP read instead sarvasainyasamāvṛtāḥ, "surrounded by all [their] troops."

"all three rākṣasas" rākṣasāḥ sarva eva te: Literally, "all those rākṣasas." In keeping with the simile in the last line of the verse, we have added the word "three" to show that the reference is specifically to the three brothers rather than to the rākṣasas in general. Ś,Ñ1,V1,3,B,D5,7–12,T3, and Lahore, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead sarve nairṛtapuṅgavāḥ, "all those bulls among the sons of chaos."

"Jambha, Vṛtra, and Bala" jambhavṛtrabalāḥ: These are the names of three demons who are killed by Indra. At MBh 7.77.17cd and 7.142.21cd, Indra is said to have killed Jambha. The great primordial serpentine asura, Vṛtra, "the Encloser," is the paradigmatic enemy of the vedic divinity Indra. The story of Vṛtra is told at Uttarakāṇḍa sargas 75–77. See notes to 7.75.4. Indra kills Vala/Bala at ṚV 1.4, 8.14.7, etc. At MBh 12.99.48–49, Indra mentions killing Vṛtra, Bala, and others. Ñ1,D7,10,11,T3, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead jambhavṛtrādayo yathā, "just like Jambha, Vṛtra, and so on." KK (7.6.46) reads with the critical edition, except that it substitutes the name jṛmbha- for jambha-. The critical apparatus of KK shows the variant of Ct found in GPP and NSP (7.6.46) as known to seven of its manuscripts. VSP (7.6.45) reads as in the critical edition.

Following verse 39, D7,10,11,T3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of two lines [103*]: "When they had taken counsel together in this fashion, Rāma, those gigantic and immensely powerful rākṣasas all went forth for battle exerting themselves to the fullest (iti te rāma saṃmantrya sarvodyogena rākṣasāḥ / yuddhāya niryayuḥ sarve mahākāyā mahābalāḥ //)."

40–42. "Then" tataḥ: Ñ2,V2,B2–4,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead gatāḥ, "[they] went."

"mounted on": The text lists all of the mounts in the instrumental so that a literal meaning would be "with their chariots, etc." We have added the phrase "mounted on" to provide syntactic continuity.

"on . . . splendid elephants" vāraṇendraiś ca: Literally, "with elephant lords." Ñ2,V1,2,B1,3,4,D2,6,7,9–11,G2, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead vāraṇaiś caiva, "and with elephants."

"on . . . horses as huge as mountains" hayaiś ca girisaṃnibhaiḥ: Literally, "and with horses resembling mountains." The word giri- is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition (see errata to the critical edition, p. 665). Ñ,V2,B1,2,4,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read kari-, "elephant," for giri-, "mountain." This lends the compound the sense "resembling elephants."

"on . . . dolphins" śiṃśumāraiḥ: Literally, "with śiṃśumāras." This term normally refers either to the Gangetic dolphin or some species of crocodilian. Ś,Ñ,V,B,D,T1,G2, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead the synonymous variant śiśumāraiḥ. Dutt (1894, p. 1571) renders, "purpoises [sic] and adds the following note, "How purpoises [sic] could be pressed into the service passes my conception, unless, Siśumāra have any other meaning." Apparently Dutt did not find it strange that the warriors would ride fish, snakes, and the other assorted creatures mentioned in the passage. For other descriptions of the oddly assorted menagerie that makes up the mounts of the rākṣasa armies, see 6.53.28 and note; and note to 1335, following notes to 6.60.11.

"on . . . serpents" bhujaṅgamaiḥ: Literally, "with serpents." In his comments to 6.53.28 (see note), Cg mentions that it is conceivable to ride snakes as long as they are large ones (sarpādīnāṃ mahāśarīrāṇāṃ vāhanatvaṃ saṃbhavatīti bodhyam).

"on . . . gaur" sṛmaraiḥ: Literally, "with gaur." We follow Cg and Ct, who understand this animal to be the gavaya, a species of ox that is usually identified as either the wild gaur (Bos gaurus) or the domesticated gayal or mithun (mithan) (Bos frontalis). See 7.31.18 and note. Cf. 3.13.23; 3.41.10; 4.59.15; and notes.

43. "all those beings who dwelt in Laṅkā" laṅkālayāni . . . bhūtāni: Literally, "all those beings who had Laṅkā for their abode." The commentators differ as to the identity of these beings. Cg and Ct, no doubt looking ahead to 104*, line 3 (see below), understand them to be the local divinities (tatratyāni daivatāni). Ck, however, interprets the reference to be to the pan-Indian deities, including Śiva, Viṣṇu, Bhadrakālī, etc. (śivaviṣṇubhadrakālyādīni). Cr, on the other hand, sees them as animals, etc. (paśuprabhṛtīni). The reference could also be to those who remain in the city after the departure of the troops. These would include rākṣasa women and children.

"foreseeing the destruction of the city" laṅkāviparyayaṃ dṛṣṭvā: Literally, "having seen the destruction of Laṅkā." Cr, alone among the commentators, offers an explanation as to how the residents are able to predict the catastrophe that awaits them. He observes that they can foresee the disaster through the evil omens that will be described in the following verses (viparyayaṃ kuśakunādinā laṅkāyā vidhvaṃsaṃ dṛṣṭvā jñātvā).

Following verse 43, Ñ2,V2,B1,4,D6,7,10,11,M3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of three lines [104*]. Many other manuscripts insert this passage, in whole or in part, after 41, 43ab, or 43cd. "Borne by splendid chariots, the rākṣasas, in their hundreds and thousands, proceeded swiftly with great effort to the world of the gods.[1–2] And the divinities departed by the very same road that the rākṣasas had taken.[1][3]"

[1] "And the divinities departed by the very same road that the rākṣasas had taken." rakṣasām eva mārgeṇa daivatāny apacakramuḥ: The translators consulted differ as to the identity of the divinities mentioned here and, therefore, also as to what they are actually doing. In keeping with Cg's and Ct's interpretation of verse 43, we understand them to be the local divinities of Laṅkā, who, like rats fleeing a sinking ship, are escaping the doomed city, along with the columns of troops (rakṣasāṃ mārgeṇa tadyātrayā sahaivāpacakramur apagatāḥ—so Ct). Ck interprets similarly but, as noted above, understands the divinities to be the pan-Indian gods and goddesses. This interpretation is followed by Gorresio (1870, p. 20), Dutt (1894, p. 1572), Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1925), and Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 388). On the other hand, Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 442), followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 390) and Benoît (1999, p. 1236), understands that the deities in question are the foes of the rākṣasas, who flee from the approaching army.

Following 104*, GPP (in brackets between 7.6.52–53), KK (7.6.53ab), and VSP (in brackets, 7.6.53ab), insert a passage of one line, which is largely a repetition of 7.6.43cd. The situation as it appears in GPP, KK, and VSP is not made clear in the critical apparatus. The line as it is found in GPP, KK, and VSP is bhūtāni bhayadarśīni viṣamasthāni sarvaśaḥ, "All those beings, anticipating the danger, were placed in a perilous situation."

44. "set in motion by Kāla" kālājñaptāḥ: Literally, "ordered by Kāla." We agree with Ck, Cg, Ct, and Cr, who understand, "impelled by Kāla (kālapreritāḥ—so Ck, Cg, Ct; Cr similarly)."

"swiftly arose" utthitā drutam: Ñ2,V1,2,B,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead samutthitāḥ, "arose."

"presaging the destruction" abhāvāya: Literally, "for the nonexistence."

45. "The clouds rained down bones and hot blood." asthīni meghā varṣanti uṣṇaṃ śoṇitam: For blood raining down as an evil omen, see App. I, No.16, lines 9–10, following notes to 6.15.33; 6.26.22; 6.31.5; 6.41.33; 6.45.926*–36; 6.83.33; 6.94.15; and notes. Cf.

1674*, lines 5–7, following notes 6.76.21. Note the hiatus between varṣanti and uṣṇam. Ñ2,V2,B,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read the perfect (liṭ) vavṛṣuḥ, "they rained," for varṣanti, "they rain."

"The ocean breached its shore" velāṃ samudro 'py utkrāntaḥ: Ñ2,V,D7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead velāṃ samudrāś cotkrāntāḥ, "And the oceans breached the shore."

"and the mighty mountains shook" calante cācalottamāḥ: Literally, "and the foremost of immovable [ones] moved." Ñ2,V2,B,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead celuś cāpy atha bhūdharāḥ, "those supporters of the earth [i.e., mountains] moved."

46. "Thousands of malevolent spirits whirled about, dancing" bhūtāḥ paripatanti sma nṛtyamānāḥ sahasraśaḥ: Literally, "Malevolent beings by the thousands ran about, dancing." Ñ2,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead a passage of two lines [107*, line 3; 106*]: "She-jackals of horrible appearance howled fearsomely.[107*, line 3] The very elements themselves appeared to be crashing down one after the other. [106*] (vāśyantyaś ca śivās tatra dāruṇaṃ ghoradarśanāḥ [107, line 3] / saṃpatanty atha bhūtāni dṛśyante ca yathākramam [106] /)."

See, too, notes to verses 47 and 48 below.

"with a sound like that of thunder" ghananādasamasvanān: The editors of the critical edition have marked the syllables -nādasamasvanān as uncertain. Ñ2,V1,2,B1,3,4,D6,7,10, 11,T1,2,3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the nominative plural ghananādasamasvanāḥ, which would then modify the "she-jackals" of 107*, line 3.

47. "And a great" mahac cāpi: The sequence cāpi, "and also," is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. Ś,Ñ,V,B1,2,D,T3,M6, and Lahore, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read cātra, "and here," for cāpi.

"wheeling flock of vultures" gṛdhracakram: Literally, "a circle of vultures." Ct and Cr gloss gṛdhrasamūhaḥ, "a mass or flock of vultures."

"circled above the rākṣasas like the wheel of time itself" rākṣasānām upari vai bhramate kālacakravat: Ñ2,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead rakṣogaṇasyopariṣṭāt paribhramati kālavat, "[it] wheeled about like Kāla above the rākṣasa hosts." T1,2,G1,3,M3,7, and KK and VSP read instead rākṣasānām upari khe bhramate 'lātacakravat, "wheeled in the sky above the rākṣasas like a wheel of flaming brands."

Following verse 47, Ñ2,B4,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of two lines [107*, lines 1, 2]. The textual evidence for the insertion of passage 106* (following notes to verse 46 above) and 107* is quite complex. We have followed the sequence of lines found in GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP. See, too, notes to verses 46 above and 48 below. "Doves with red feet[1] and sārikās[2] flew swiftly about. Crows cawed and two-footed cats[3] screeched (kapotā raktapādāś ca sārikā vidrutā yayuḥ [107, line 1] / kākā vāśyanti tatraiva biḍālā vai dvipādikāḥ [107, line 2])."

[1] "Doves with red feet" kapotā raktapādāḥ: The appearance of white doves with red feet is among the numerous evil omens that are said to presage the destruction of the rākṣasas in the Yuddhakāṇḍa. See notes to 6.26.28; cf. 6.67.5.

[2] "sārikās" sārikāḥ: Probably the common mynah bird, Acridotheres tristis. See notes to 6.26.29 and 6.94.25. Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 442), followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 391), understands the reference to be to crows (corneille), who share the feature of "red-footedness" with the doves. Benoît (1999, p. 1236) understands similarly but takes the bird in question to be a blackbird (merlette). Based on the sequence at 6.26.28–29, it seems likely that only the doves are represented as having red feet.

[3] "two-footed cats screeched" vāśyanti . . . biḍālā vai dvipādikāḥ: We understand with Cr that malformed cats are crying, along with the crows, etc., mentioned earlier in the verse (kākādayo tatraiva vāśyanti). Gita Press (7.6.58), KK (7.6.57), and VSP (7.6.57) read dvipādayaḥ, "elephants, etc.," in place of dvipādikāḥ, "two footed." This reading is clearly rendered only in the translation of Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1926). Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 388), who probably shares this reading, renders, oddly, "cats and other felines." We believe that he may have misread dvipādayaḥ as some form of dvīpin, a term used for a variety of jungle cats. Ñ2,V, and GPP (7.6.58) and NSP (7.6.58) read biḍālāya dvipādakāḥ, a collocation that seems virtually impossible to construe in this context and is probably a typographical error. Translators who normally render the texts of GPP and NSP seem to ignore the peculiar dative singular biḍālāya and translate it as if it were a nominative plural. Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 442), followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 391) and Benoît (1999, p. 1236), translate in this way and understand that the cats merely appear rather than utter cries.

48. "But disregarding those dire omens" tān acintya mahotpātān: Literally, "not having thought about those great omens." Ñ2,V2,B1,2,4,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead utpātāṃs tān anādṛtya, "having disregarded those omens."

"arrogant as they were in their strength" balagarvitāḥ: Literally, "arrogant through strength." V2,B2,D10,11,T2,G2,M1,3,5, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP the more or less synonymous baladarpitāḥ, "proud or arrogant through [their] strength."

Following verse 48, Ś,Ñ1,V1,3,B1,2,3 (after 47 due to omission),D1–5,8,9,12,T3 insert a passage of 3 lines [107*], while Ñ2,B4,D6,7,10,11 insert lines 1, 2 after verse 47 and line 3 after 46ab, and V2 inserts lines 1, 2 after 48ab and line 3 after 48cd. See notes to verses 46 and 47 above for a translation and discussion of the order of 106* and 107* in the printed editions consulted.

49. "night-roaming rākṣasas" rajanīcarāḥ: Ñ2,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead sumahābalaḥ, "of tremendous power." This epithet in the singular would refer exclusively to Mālin. KK and VSP (and noted in GPP) read instead the plural sumahābalāḥ, in which case the epithet would refer equally to all three brothers. This variant is not noted in the critical apparatus.

"preceded them, just as the three sacred fires precede the sacrificial rites" āsan puraḥsarās teṣāṃ kratūnām iva pāvakāḥ: Literally, "they were the forerunners of them just as are the fires of the rites." This somewhat awkward simile draws its inspiration, no doubt, from the text's frequent comparison of the three brothers to the tretāgni, or three fires of the vedic sacrifice. See note to 7.4.2 for the names of these fires. Ñ2,D5–7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead puraḥsarā rākṣasāṇāṃ jvalitā iva pāvakāḥ, "They preceded the rākṣasas like blazing fires."

50. "the night-roaming rākṣasas" niśācarāḥ: Literally, "the night-roaming [ones]."

"placed their faith in" āśrayante: Literally, "they had recourse or sought refuge in."

"unshakable as Mount Mālyavān" mālyavantam ivācalam: Literally, "like the unshakable [one] (i.e., mountain), Mālyavān." We have attempted to bring out the underlying meaning of the common kenning for mountain, acala, "the unmoving [one]." According to Law (1954, pp. 21–22) the mountain Mālyavān is in the Kiṣkindhyā country, and a mountain of this name is found in the Kiṣkindhākāṇḍa (see 4.27.1 and note).

"all creatures" dehinaḥ: Literally, "embodied [ones]." Ñ2,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead devatāḥ, "divinities."

"the Creator" dhātāram: The reference is, of course, to Brahmā. The first syllable, dhā-, is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition.

51. "under Mālin's command" mālivaśe sthitam: Literally, "fixed in the control of Mālin."

52. "expedition" samudyogam: Literally, "effort, exertion." See notes to verses 10 and 21 above. Cf. note to verse 23.

"he resolved to fight" dadhre yuddhe tato manaḥ: Literally, "then he set his mind on battle." Ñ2,V2,B,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead cakre yuddhe tadā manaḥ, "then he made up his mind with regard to battle."

Following verse 52, D6,7,10,11,G2,M1,2,5,7,9,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of nine lines [108*]: "With his weapons and quivers at the ready, he mounted Vainateya, taking up his celestial armor, which was equal in radiance to a thousand suns.[1–2] Then the lotus-eyed Lord[1] tied on two shining quivers filled with arrows and fastened his sword-belt[2] and shining sword, along with those magnificent weapons—the conch, the discus, the mace, the horn bow,[3] and the sword.[4][3–5] Mounted upon Vainateya, who resembled a golden mountain,[5] Hari[6] sped onward for the destruction of the rākṣasas.[6–7] In his yellow garments, the dark lord Hari, mounted on Suparṇa's back, resembled a storm cloud laced with lightning on the peak of a golden mountain. [8–9]"

[1] "the lotus-eyed Lord" kamalekṣaṇaḥ: Literally, "the lotus-eyed [one]."

[2] "his sword-belt" śroṇisūtram: Literally, "hip-string." As Ct notes, this must be a belt or rope for fastening a sword (khaḍgabandhanabhūtam). Apte (s.v. śroṇi-) cites this passage for this sense of the term.

[3] "horn bow" -śārṅga-: This is the composite bow commonly associated with Viṣṇu. See below Prakṣipta II, sarga 5.16 and notes. See notes to 6.35.24; 6.62.28; and 6.105.14. See, too, Emeneau 1953, pp. 80–82.

[4] "sword . . . those magnificent weapons . . . and the sword" khaḍgam . . . -khaḍgāṃś caiva varāyudhān: KK and VSP, apparently in an effort to address partially the redundancy, substitute -khaḍgākhyapravarāyudhān for khaḍgāṃś caiva. This creates a compound with the sense "[and] those splendid weapons known as . . . sword."

[5] "who resembled a golden mountain" suvarṇagirisaṃkāśam: D10,11, and Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead suparṇaṃ girisaṃkāśam, which lends the line the sense "mounted upon Suparṇa Vainateya, who resembled a mountain." GPP and NSP, perhaps as a result of a typesetter's error, read saṃpūrṇam, "full," for suparṇam, "Suparṇa," which is virtually impossible to construe in the context. This reading is not noted in the critical apparatus.

[6] "Hari" hariḥ: D6,7,10,11,M6, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead prabhuḥ, "lord."

53. "Lauded by the apsarases and the foremost gandharvas . . . together with the gods, perfected beings, seers, and great serpents, he" sa devasiddharṣimahoragaiś ca gandharvamukhyāpsarasopagītaḥ: As it stands it would appear that Viṣṇu advances to battle accompanied by the gods, perfected beings, and so on, as he is being lauded by the gandharvas and apsarases. The compound gandharvamukhyāpsarasopagītaḥ is problematic on several accounts. It can be read to mean either "lauded by the foremost of the gandharvas and the apsarases" or "the gandharvas and the foremost apsarases." Moreover, the sandhi between apsarasaḥ and upagītaḥ seems highly irregular, although well attested in the critical apparatus. Finally the syllables -mukhyāpsara- are marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. Cv feels that the critical reading is the correct one (samyakpāṭhaḥ). For gandharvamukhyāpsarasopagītaḥ, Ñ2,3,V2,B2,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read the facilior gandharvayakṣair upagīyamānaḥ, which separates the words gandharva- and yakṣa- from the compound, thus allowing the compound devasiddharṣimahoragaiḥ to be governed by the participle upagīyamānaḥ, "being lauded." A translation of the line would then be "Being lauded by gandharvas and yakṣas [as well as by the gods, perfected beings, etc.]." Ñ2,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read siddhadevarṣi-, by transposition, which yields the same meaning.

"wielding his excellent discus, sword, ploughshare, and the rest" cakrāsisīrapravarādidhārī: Literally, "bearing the most excellent discus, sword, and ploughshare, etc." The compound could also be read to mean "bearing the discus, sword, the most excellent ploughshare, and the rest." The ploughshare (sīra) is not normally a weapon associated with Viṣṇu himself but rather with Balarāma, the co-avatāra of his manifestation as Kṛṣṇa. On the ploughshare as a weapon or a weapon shaped like a ploughshare, see note to 6.83.23–25 (hala). Ñ,V2,B1,2,3,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead cakrāsiśārṅgāyudhaśaṅkhapāṇī, "with the discus, sword, horn bow, weapons, and conch in his hands." The compound could also be read as a dvandva with the sense "having the discus, sword, and horn bow for his weapons and the conch in hand."

"he advanced upon the army of the enemies of the gods" samāsasādāmaraśatrusainyam: V2,D10,11,M1, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read asura-, "the asuras," for amara-, "the gods," while D10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read -sainyaśatruḥ for -śatrusainyam. This lends the pāda the sense "That enemy of the armies of the asuras advanced." In addition to reading asura- for amara-, KK and VSP, not noted in the critical apparatus, read -sainyaśatrūn. This somewhat awkward reading lends the pāda the sense "he advanced upon his enemies, the army of the asuras." This reading is rendered only in the translation of Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 389).

The meter is upajāti.

54. "like a dark lord of mountains, its boulders shaken loose" calopalo nīla ivācalendraḥ: Literally, "like the dark lord of the mountains, whose rocks are shaken." Ñ2,3,V2,B3, D4,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead calopalaṃ nīlam ivācalāgram, "like a dark mountain peak whose boulders are shaken." KK and VSP have a reading similar to that of the critical edition but substitute the neuter calopalam for the critical edition's calopalaḥ. The meaning of this variant becomes somewhat obscure because the adjective, "whose boulders were shaken" or "by whom boulders were shaken," must now modify the army, the upameya (subject of comparison), rather than the mountain, the upamāna (object of comparison). Cg merely notes that the compound is a bahuvrīhi, but does not fully elucidate its meaning.

The meter is upajāti.

55. "sharp" śītaiḥ: D1–4, and KK and VSP read instead śaraiḥ, "with arrows."

The meter is vaṃśasthavila (vaṃśastha).

Sarga 7

1. "Just as storm clouds pelt a mountain with torrential rains, thundering storm clouds in the form of rākṣasas pelted that mountain in the form of Nārāyaṇa with torrents of arrows." nārāyaṇagiriṃ te tu garjanto rākṣasāmbudāḥ / avarṣann iṣuvarṣeṇa varṣeṇādrim ivāmbudāḥ //: Literally, "But thundering, those rākṣasa-clouds showered the Nārāyaṇa mountain with arrow-showers as clouds do a mountain with showers." The verse is rhetorically awkward in its superimposition of a simile upon a metaphor with the same terms. Ct simply notes that the opening figure is a metaphor (rūpakam idam). Cr acknowledges the rūpaka implicitly by analyzing the compound nārāyaṇagirim to mean "a mountain in the form of him [Nārāyaṇa] (nārāyaṇagiriṃ tadrūpaparvatam)." Cs, seemingly disturbed by the redundancy of the figures, offers a rather odd interpretation, according to which there is no metaphor. Instead, he proposes that clouds having the characteristics of rākṣasas pelt with showers having the form of weapons a particular mountain called Nārāyaṇa. Cs sees this as an example of the figure nidarśana, in which a specific instance serves as a general illustration. (nārāyaṇagiriṃ nārāyaṇākhyaparvataviśeṣam astrarūpavarṣeṇārdayanto rākṣasalakṣaṇāmbudā abhipetur iti śeṣaḥ. varṣeṇevādrim ambudā iti sāmānyato nidarśanam.) See verse 46 and notes below. See, too, 6.90.2 for a normative version of this simile.

"pelted . . . with torrents of arrows" avarṣann iṣuvarṣeṇa: Literally, "they showered with arrow-showers." V1,3,D1,7–12,T3, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead ardayanto 'stravarṣeṇa, "striking with showers of astras." KK and VSP read instead vavarṣuḥ śaravarṣeṇa, "they showered with showers of arrows."

2. "Surrounded . . . shrouded" vṛtaḥ: Literally, "surrounded."

"by the dark chieftains of the night-roaming rākṣasas" nilair naktaṃcarottamaiḥ: Literally, "by the black or dark blue most excellent [ones] among the night-roaming [ones]." The kenning naktaṃcara-, "night-roaming [one]," occurs only six times in the critical edition, four of them occurring in this sarga (verses 7,33,43,46), one in the Sundarakāṇḍa (5.4.7) and once more in the Uttarakāṇḍa (7.32.67).

"resembled" ivāsīt: Literally, "he was like." D10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead ivāyam, "he, like."

"by clouds releasing torrential rains" varṣamāṇaiḥ payodharaiḥ: Literally, "by raining clouds."

3–4. "As locusts swarm into a field of grain" śalabhā iva kedāram: Literally, "like locusts, a meadow." As Cr notes, we must understand the term kedāra, "meadow, water-meadow," in the sense of "rice paddy or grain fields (śālyādikṣetram)."

"and flies enter a mountain" maśakā iva parvatam: Literally, "like flies, a mountain." The basis for this element in the mālopamā is far from clear. Commentators such as Cg and Cv, who share the critical reading, make no effort to elucidate it. Gorresio (1870, p. 21), the only translator consulted to have this reading, oddly renders, "in una brocca di latte le mosche." Ś,D1–5,7–12,T2, and Lahore, GPP, NSP, and Gita Press, perhaps in an attempt to make sense of the simile, read pāvakam, "fire," in place of parvatam, "mountain," lending the passage the sense "as flying insects enter a flame." Lahore (7.6.3) then corrects to the standard simile, reading pataṃgā iva pāvakam, "as moths [enter] the fire."

"as living beings might plunge into a pot of nectar" yathāmṛtaghaṭaṃ jīvāḥ: Literally, "like living things, a pot of amṛta." The word jīvāḥ is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. D7,10,11,T1,2,G1,3,M3,5,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read daṃśāḥ, "biting or stinging insects," for jīvāḥ, "living things." The commentators who share this reading understand the creatures in question to be some kind of fly or wasp found in the forest (vanamakṣikāḥ— Ck, Cg, Ct, and Cr) and then understand amṛta to refer to honey (madhu or kṣaudram).

"or crocodiles" makarā iva cārṇavam: See notes to 5.7.6 and notes to verses 7–8 below. See, too, Hora 1952, p. 68.

"as all the worlds enter him at the time of universal destruction, so . . . did those arrows . . . plunge into Hari" hariṃ viśanti sma śarā lokās tam iva paryaye: Literally, "the arrows enter Hari as the worlds [enter] him at the inversion." As Ck, Cg, Ct, and Cr note, the reference here is to the notion that at the time of the periodic destruction of the universe, all beings are absorbed once more into the body of Lord Viṣṇu (viparyaye pralayakāle lokā yathā hariṃ viśanti tadvat—so Ct). D7,10,11,T2,M3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read the virtually synonymous phrase lokā iva viparyaye, "like worlds at the destruction [of the worlds]," for lokās tam iva paryaye.

"powerful as thunderbolts and swift as the wind or thought itself" vajrānilamanojavāḥ: The compound would appear to mean "possessing the speed of the vajra, the wind, and thought." However, since the vajra, either in the sense of "thunderbolt" or "weapon of Indra," is conventionally known more for its powerful impact rather than its speed, we are inclined to follow Ck and Ct, who understand the compound to mean "whose strength was that of the vajra and whose speed that of the wind or thought (vajrasārā anilamanovaj javo vego yeṣāṃ te—so Ct). Cg similarly takes vajra separately from the other two upamānas, understanding that the arrows were like torrents of thunderbolts (vajrā vajradhārā iva sthitāḥ).

5–6. "elephant riders" gajadhūrgatāḥ: Literally, "[ones] located on top of elephants." V1,3,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read the variant gajamūrdhagāḥ, "on the heads of elephants." KK and VSP read -pṛṣṭhagāḥ for -dhūrgatāḥ, lending the compound the sense "on the backs of elephants."

"with their splendid steeds" sadaśvaiḥ: Literally, "with good horses." V1,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tathāśvaiḥ, "and with horses."

"moving through the air" ambarecarāḥ: The syllables -carāḥ are marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. Ś,D2,6–12,G1,M1,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead ambare sthitāḥ, "standing in the sky." Ct appears to understand this variant to suggest that all of the rākṣasa warriors with their mounts, not just the foot soldiers, are hovering in the sky (syandanādibhiḥ sahāmbare sthitās tadgatāḥ).

"made Hari hold his breath as the exercise of breath control does a twice-born brahman" nirucchvāsaṃ hariṃ cakruḥ prāṇāyāma iva dvijam: Literally, "They rendered Hari devoid of breath as does breath control a twice-born [one]." The sense in which Hari is said to be rendered "breath-less" here is not entirely clear. The force of the simile would appear to suggest that, like a brahman practicing the yogic exercise of breath control, Hari is suspending his own breathing, either out of exertion or in his surprise at the intensity of the rākṣasa assault. On the other hand, the idea may be that the vast crush of rākṣasas, mounts, and weapons that are surrounding him have literally choked off Hari's air. Cg understands, "making Hari 'breath-less,' that is to say, lacking any room or time (anavasara) [to catch] his breath (hariṃ nirucchvāsaṃ cakrur ucchvāsānavasaravantaṃ kṛtavantaḥ)," which still leaves room for ambiguity. The syllable -ma[ḥ] of prāṇāyāma[ḥ] is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. Ś2,3,V1,2,B,D1,3–7,10–12,T,G,M5–7,10, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP show a variant that maintains the number parallelism of the simile, reading the plural prāṇāyāmāḥ, "breath control exercises." The term prāṇāyāma is rare in the Rāmāyaṇa. Outside of this occurrence, it is found only at 2.4.33.

7–8. "Harried . . . like a mighty whale by shoals of fish" tudyamāno mīnair iva mahātimiḥ: Literally, "like a great whale being prodded or wounded by fish." The image here appears to be of some large marine creature attacked by huge numbers of smaller predator fish. On the identity of sea creatures in the Rāmāyaṇa, see note to 5.7.6. On the identity of the term timi, see 6.4.78–80. See, too, Hora 1952, p. 68. The word tudyamānaḥ, "being prodded," is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. B3,D6,7,10,11,G3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tāḍyamānaḥ, "being struck." The compound mahātimiḥ, "great whale," is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. D6,7,10,11,T1,2,G,M1–5,7–10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead mahodadhiḥ, "a great receptacle of waters," i.e., "the ocean." This lends the simile the somewhat odd sense "like the ocean lashed by fish." Perhaps the image here is that of a still body of water agitated by swarms of fish.

"by the night-roaming rākṣasas" niśācaraiḥ: Literally, "by the night-roaming [ones]."

"Viṣṇu . . . he cut into pieces no bigger than sesame seeds" ciccheda tilaśo viṣṇuḥ: Literally, "Viṣṇu cut into pieces by [i.e., like] sesame seeds." D6,7,10,11,M10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead ciccheda viṣṇur niśitaiḥ, "Viṣṇu cut with sharp [arrows]."

"horn bow" śārṅgam: See note to 108*, following note to 7.6.52.

"in that great battle . . . the bodies of the rākṣasas" gātrāṇi rākṣasānāṃ mahāhave: D6,7,10,11,T1,G1,3,M2–10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead durdharṣo rākṣasebhyo 'sṛjac charān, "The unassailable [Viṣṇu] released arrows at the rākṣasas." This variant, with its finite verb asṛjat, "he released," makes verse seven an independent syntactical unit.

"with his . . . thunderbolt-headed" vajravaktraiḥ: Literally, "having vajra faces." Ñ2,V3,B2,3,D6,7,11,M10, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead vajrakalpaiḥ, "like vajras or thunderbolts."

9. "Driving away that hail of arrows, as does the wind a shower of rain that has sprung up" vidrāvya śaravarṣaṃ tam varṣam vāyur ivotthitam: Literally, "having driven away that shower of arrows as does the wind a rain shower that has sprung up." D1,3,4,6,7,10,11,T1,2,G1,3,M3,5,6,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read śaravarṣeṇa, "with [his] shower of arrows," for śaravarṣaṃ tam, "that shower of arrows." This reading deprives the gerund vidrāvya, "having dispelled," of a clear direct object and forces varṣam, "rain shower," to do double duty as the object in both the upameya and upamāna as shown by Cr (varṣaṃ vāyur iva śaravarṣeṇa vidrāvya). Cs attempts to rationalize this reading by understanding that the term varṣam refers to a mass of raining clouds, and also, by way of illustration, to the massed ranks of the rākṣasas. (varṣaṃ pravarṣamāṇameghajātam. rākṣasajātaṃ ca dārṣṭāntike grāhyam.) VSP (7.7.9) and GPP, noted as Cg's variant, read for varṣaṃ vāyur the compound varṣavāyur, literally, "rain-wind." This would lend the line the sense "Viṣṇu like a rainy-wind [gale?] with his shower of arrows." This variant is not noted either in the critical apparatus or in KK (7.7.9) and no translator renders it.

"Viṣṇu, the Supreme Spirit" puruṣottamaḥ: Literally, "Puruṣottama." The term puruṣottama is only used twice in this kāṇḍa: here and at 7.27.10, where it also refers to Viṣṇu. For Rāma identified as puruṣottama (or the Supreme Spirit), see 6.105.14,28; 6.107.17,30; and notes.

10. "Mightily" sarvaprāṇena: Literally, "with all his life breath." As in verse 40 below, the commentators agree that the phrase means "with all [his] strength or extreme effort" (sarvabalena—so Ck, Cg, and Ct; atiprayatnena—so Cr).

"that king of conches" śaṅkharāṭ: The term rāj (rāṭ) is also used at the end of a compound in a similar sense at 7.4.26. Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 443) and Benoît (1999, p. 1238) render, "cette reine des conques," apparently because the noun conque is feminine in French. Similarly, Roussel renders the masculine ambujaḥ, "born of the waters," as "fille de l'eau." Benôit renders, "Née dans les eaux."

"like a storm cloud at the end of a cosmic age" yugānte jalado yathā: D6,7,10,11, T1,2,G,M2–5,7–10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead trilokyaṃ vyathayann iva, "terrifying, so it seemed, the three worlds."

11. "The" so 'tha: Literally, "Now, that." The sequence is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition.

"as a lion, the king of beasts, does forest elephants in rut" mṛgarāja ivāraṇye samadān iva kuñjarān: Literally, "as the king of beasts in the forest [terrifies] rutting elephants." The simile is defective in two ways. First, the lion is compared directly to the sound of the conch, while no explicit reference is made to the lion's roar. Cs seeks to remedy this problem by glossing siṃhadhvanir iva, "like the lion's roar [lit., 'sound']." Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1928) and Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 390) render the upamāna in this fashion to complete the simile. Several manuscripts as well as Gorresio (7.7.11) read variants that correct the simile by making the upamāna the lion's roar, rather than the lion. Second, the simile exhibits the fault of punarukti, "redundancy," in using the comparative particle iva twice. See notes to verses 17 and 19–21 below.

12. "The horses could not keep their footing" na śekur aśvāḥ saṃsthātum: Literally, "the horses were unable to stand."

"the elephants were stripped of all their ardor" vimadāḥ kuñjarābhavan: Literally, "the elephants became devoid of excitement or rut." The adjective vimada contains a kind of pun, since mada, here "ardor [for battle]," also means, as in the previous verse, the state of rut or musth to which male elephants are subject. Dutt (1894, p. 1575) and Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 390) understand it in this latter sense. Ck, Cg, and Ct note the irregular sandhi between kuñjarāḥ and abhavan (Ck and Cg) and suggest that the imperfect has an irregular loss of its augment (Ck, Cg, and Ct).

"The warriors" yodhāḥ: V3,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead vīrāḥ, "the heroes."

"unmanned" durbalāḥ: Literally, "weak."

13. "horn bow" śārṅgam: See note to 108*, following note to 7.6.52.

14. "loosed from" -dhanuścyutaiḥ: Literally, "fallen from the bow." D3,6,7,10,11,M1, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead -karacyutaiḥ, "loosed from the hand."

"the remaining" cānye: Literally, "and the others [rākṣasas]." The sequence is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition, and the referent of anye, "others," is unclear. In the absence of the epic convention of repeating the pronoun anye to indicate "some . . . others," etc. (see, for example, 6.15.29, 6.48.44, and 6.62.49), the term is best understood here as differentiating the rākṣasas slain now from those who were felled earlier by the sound of Viṣṇu's conch in verse 12 above. D6,7,10,11,T1,2,G1,3,M1–5,7–10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP avoid the problem, substituting saṃkhye, "in battle."

"fearsome" bhīmāḥ: D6,7,10,11,M10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead bhūmau, "to [lit., 'on'] the ground."

15. "Those injurious and inimical rākṣasas gushed forth blood in streams from the wounds inflicted by Adhokṣaja's arrows, just as mountains might a golden stream." vraṇair vraṇakarārīṇām adhokṣajaśarodbhavaiḥ / asṛk kṣaranti dhārābhiḥ svarṇadhārām ivācalāḥ //: Literally, "Through the wounds of the wound-causing enemies, produced by the arrows of Adhokṣaja, they flowed forth blood through streams as mountains do a golden stream." The verse as constructed by the critical edition is essentially impossible to construe meaningfully. Given the context, the implicit subject of the sentence must be the rākṣasas, who are mentioned in the preceding verse. Yet, even though the genitive plural compound vraṇakarārīṇām, "of the wound-causing enemies," in pāda a must similarly describe the rākṣasas, it is impossible to construe it with the implicit nominative plural subject. The idea expressed in the verse is, however, fairly clear and repeats the epic trope in which wounded and bleeding warriors are likened to mountains gushing streams tinted red with mineral ores. (Compare, for example, 267*, following notes to 7.14.2; and 1289*, lines 17–20, following notes to 6.58.51.) No printed edition, commentator, or translator reads with the critical text. In order to bring out the apparent sense of the verse, we read the genitive plural compound as if it were in apposition to the implicit nominative plural subject rākṣasāḥ and take it as a karmadhāraya, which refers to them as both injurious and enemies. A possible, but equally unattractive, alternative is to read the compound as a tatpuruṣa, in the sense of "the enemies of the wound-maker, i.e., Viṣṇu." But this does not address the syntactical difficulty. Textual evidence for pādas ab is scattered, with many manuscripts substituting readings that eliminate the problems addressed above. Ś,Ñ,V,B3,4,D1,2,4,5,7–12,T3, and Lahore substitute for pādas ab a passage of one line [112*]: "The wounds of those splendid elephants caused by Viṣṇu's arrows (vraṇāni varanāgānāṃ viṣṇubāṇakṛtāni tu)." D10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead vraṇāni paragātrebhyo viṣṇucakrakṛtāni hi [Cg reads vai for hi]. This lends the lines the sense "From the limbs of the enemies, the wounds made by Viṣṇu's discus." In these variants, the subject of the finite verb in the sentence, kṣaranti, "they pour out," becomes vraṇāni, "wounds," rather than the implied rākṣasas of the critical reading. This, however, in turn, causes a rhetorical difficulty in the form of a liṅgabheda in which the neuter vraṇāni becomes the upameya for the masculine upamāna acalāḥ, "mountains," in pāda d. It appears that only five Malayalam manuscripts (M4,6,7,8,9) support the critical reading, and we question the editor's reconstruction of pādas ab.

16. "The blare . . . the twang . . . and . . . war cry . . . the cries" -ravaś cāpi . . .-ravas tathā . . . ravāṃś cāpi . . . -ravaḥ: Literally, "the sound . . . the sound . . . the sounds . . . the sound." We understand with Cr that the final occurrence of the term ravaḥ refers specifically to a [war] cry uttered by Viṣṇu (viṣṇumukhoccārito ravaḥ). This is the understanding of the translators consulted, with the exceptions of Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 390) and Benoît (1999, p. 1238). Both translators understand the final term, i.e., the sound of Viṣṇu (vaiṣṇavo ravaḥ), to refer collectively to the sounds made by the conch and the bow. Ck and Ct understand that the particle api, following the plural accusative ravān, suggests that the sounds produced by Viṣṇu swallowed up not only the cries of the rākṣasas but their life breaths as well (apinā prāṇāṃś ca—so Ct).

"horn bow" śārṅgam: See note to 108*, following note to 7.6.52.

"drowned out" grasate: Literally, "it swallowed."

Following verse 16, Ñ2,V2,3 (after first occurrence),B continue after 113*, while D1, 3,4,6,7,10,11,S (except T3) insert, a passage of two lines [114*]: "With his arrows, Hari cut off their necks, and cut down their charioteers,[1] their arrows, bows, chariots, flag staffs, banners, and quivers (teṣāṃ śirodharān sūtāñ śaradhvajadhanūṃṣi ca / rathān patākās tūṇīrāṃś ciccheda sa hariḥ śaraiḥ //)."

[1] "cut off their necks, and cut down their charioteers" śirodharān sūtān . . . ciccheda: Literally, "he cut their necks and charioteers." D10,11,M7, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read for sūtān, "charioteers," dhūtān, "shaking," which would then modify śirodharān, "necks."

17–18. "waves" ūrmayaḥ: Ś,Ñ1,V1,D2–3,5–12,T3,M2,4,6–10, and Lahore, GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead vāryoghāḥ, "torrents or floods of water."

"like serpent lords from a mountain" parvatād iva nāgendrāḥ: Literally, "like nāga lords or the best of nāgas from a mountain." Translators are divided as to whether to take nāga in its sense of "elephant or serpent." Both are possible given the context. We, however, agree with Cr, who glosses mahāsarpāḥ, "great serpents," as we believe the force of the mālopamā basically suggests linear objects proceeding in lines from a central point and that snakes fit the trope better than bulky elephants. V2,B, and the text of Gorresio substitute pātālāt, "from the underworld Pātāla," for parvatāt, "from a mountain." This reading would also accord better with the interpretation of nāga as "great serpents." Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1928) and Benoît (1999, p. 1238) translate as we do.

"torrents of water" vāryoghāḥ: Ŝ,V1,3,D2,3,5,12,T3,G1,M3,6,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead dhāroghāḥ, "torrents of streams."

"arrows—arrows loosed" bāṇā vinirmuktāḥ . . . iṣavaḥ: The terms bāṇāḥ and iṣavaḥ are basically synonymous. Cv, the only commentator to read with the critical edition, attempts to remove the redundancy by quoting the Vaijayantī, which notes that, among other meanings, the term bāṇa can refer specifically to a featherless type of arrow (bāṇas tu gatapattriṇa iti vaijayantī). D6,7,10,11,T3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read the synonymous śarāḥ, "arrows," for bāṇāḥ. This does little to address the redundancy. The commentators who share this variant attempt to deal with this in one of two ways. Cr, relying on the term's underlying root √śrī, "to rend or destroy," understands the term śarāḥ, "arrows," as vighātakāḥ, that is, as an adjective meaning "lethal or destructive," which then modifies iṣavaḥ, "arrows," in 18c. This interpretation is represented only in the translation of Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1928). Ck and Ct read the term with the participle vinirmuktāḥ, "loosed," in 18a and understand the phrase to refer to the arrows only when they are on the point of being released and thus argue that the phrase should be construed separately from that in which the arrows (iṣavaḥ) actually "fly forth (nirdhāvanti)." (vinirmuktā ādikarmaṇi ktaḥ. vinirmoktuṃ prakrāntāḥ śarā āsann iti pṛthagyojyam.)

"horn bow" śārṅgam: See note to 108*, following note to 7.6.52.

"set in motion by Nārāyaṇa" nārāyaṇeritāḥ: V1,D10,11,T1,2,M5, and GPP and NSP read instead the ablative singular nārāyaṇeritāt, in which case the adjective modifies Viṣṇu's horn bow rather than his arrows.

19–21. Dutt's (1894, p. 1575) sequence of animals differs somewhat from that of the printed editions, the critical apparatus, and other translators. He renders, "and even as an elephant pursueth a tiger, a tiger a wolf, a wolf a dog, a dog a cat, a cat a snake, or a snake a rat." A term for wolves (kokāḥ) appears in place of śvānaḥ, "dogs," in only three manuscripts collated for the critical edition (B2,3,4).

"by a powerful Viṣṇu" viṣṇunā prabhaviṣṇunā: See note to 7.5.13.

"by a śarabha" śarabheṇa: This refers to a terrifying, mythical, eight-legged beast, which is said to be stronger than a lion (Apte, s.v. śarabha). For a description of the mythical creature called śarabha, see Ṛtusaṃhāra 1.23. See Prakṣipta I, sarga 5.5 and notes. See, too, notes to 6.31.39.

"leopards by a tiger" vyāghreṇa dvīpino yathā: The pāda is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition.

"dogs by a leopard" dvīpinā ca yathā śvānaḥ: Literally, "like dogs by a leopard." D1,3,4,6,10,11,T1,2,G,M1,2,5,8–10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead dvīpineva yathā, "as by a leopard like . . ." Note the repetition of the two comparative markers yathā and iva. See notes to verse 11 above and verse 27 below.

"cats by a dog" śunā mārjārakā yathā: Literally, "like cats by a dog." V2,3,D1,7,T1,2,G3,M1,2,4,7,8, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead the singular mārjārakaḥ, "a cat," which breaks the parallelism.

"some of the rākṣasas fled . . . while others lay sprawled on the ground" te rākṣasāḥ . . . dravanti . . . śāyitāś ca mahītale: Literally, "those rākṣasas ran and lay on the surface of the earth." Our understanding, following Cr, is that there are implicitly two groups of rākṣasas—those who flee and those who are killed (drāvitāḥ santo dravanty anye ca mahītale śāyitā nihatā ity arthaḥ). Cs understands that some of the rākṣasas, frightened by others who are fleeing from Viṣṇu, also flee, and as they bump into one another, they fall to the ground. (viṣṇunā dravanti. taiś ca bhītair anye 'pi drāvitāḥ. parasparasaṃmardena mahītale śayitāś ca.) Ck and Ct appear to understand that there is only one group, which lies on the ground after running (anudrutyeti śeṣaḥ).

"in battle" yuddhe: Ñ2,V3,B4,D1,4–7,10,11,M10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead sarve, "all [the rākṣasas]."

22. "he made his conch, born of the waters, resound, as the king of the gods does a storm cloud" vārijaṃ nādayāmāsa toyadaṃ surarāḍ iva: Literally, "he caused the water-born [one] to sound as the king of the gods [does] a water-giver." Note the similar kenning for conch, ambuja, "born of the waters," at verse 10 above. The syllables nāda- are marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. V1,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read pūra- for nāda-, yielding the form pūrayāmāsa, "he caused to be filled up." With this variant the idea appears to be that Viṣṇu fills his conch with air, as Indra does a cloud [with water], and this is how the translators render the variant. Cr, apparently in an effort to avoid the differing notions of filling with air and with water, takes the term vārija to mean not "conch," but "ocean." Presumably, the idea is that Viṣṇu fills up the ocean with the bodies of the slain rākṣasas (rākṣasānāṃ sahasrāṇi ni- hatya vārijaṃ samudraṃ pūrayāmāsa). See 1396* and notes, following notes to 6.61.67, for the practice of disposing of rākṣasa battle casualties in the ocean.

23. "Overwhelmed" -grastam: Literally, "swallowed up or afflicted." V1,3,D6,7,10, 11,G1,M10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead -trastam, "frightened."

"rākṣasa" rākṣasam: The reading is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition.

"broke ranks" prabhagnam: Literally, "was broken."

24. "had broken ranks" prabhagne: Literally, "when . . . had been broken."

"covered . . . with a hail of arrows" śaravarṣeṇa āvavāra: Literally, "He covered with a shower of arrows." Note the vowel hiatus. The word -varṣeṇa is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. D7,10,11,T1,2,G3,M2,6,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read nivavāra, "he drove back or warded off," for āvavāra, "he drove back."

Following verse 24, Ś,Ñ,V,B,D2,3,5–12,T3, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of four lines [116*]: "But he [Sumālin] covered him [Hari], as dense fog might the sun, and the rākṣasas recovered their strength and regained their fortitude.[1–2] Then, in a rage,[1] that rākṣasa, arrogant in his strength, uttering a mighty roar and seeming, as it were, to give new life to the rākṣasas . . . [3–4]."

[1] "Then, in a rage" atha tenaiva roṣeṇa: Literally, "Now, by that very rage." D7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead so 'bhyapatad roṣāt, "he attacked out of anger."

25. "Raising a gold-ornamented hand, as an elephant might its trunk" utkṣipya hemābharaṇaṃ karaṃ karam iva dvipaḥ: Literally, "having thrown up a hand [karam] whose ornament was golden, like an elephant its trunk [karam]." Ś,Ñ1,V1,3,D2,5–12,T3, and Lahore, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read lambābharaṇam, "with pendant or hanging ornaments," for hemābharaṇam, "having golden ornaments." In addition, Ñ1,V1,D6,7,10,11,T3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read the participle dhunvan, "shaking or waving," for the first karam, "hand," in pāda b. This reading forces what is now the sole occurrence of the word karam to serve double duty in its senses of both "hand" and "trunk." According to Cr, this thus lends the half verse the sense of "having raised a hand on which the ornament was hanging, like an elephant shaking his trunk (lambābharaṇaṃ lambāyamānam ābharaṇaṃ yasmin taṃ karam utkṣipya dvipaḥ karam iva dhunvan). " Ct does not read lambābharaṇam as a bahuvrīhi compound, but rather as a simple karmadhāraya. Thus, for him, the line means "having thrown up, that is, having flung about, his pendant, i.e., hanging ornament, like an elephant [shaking] his trunk. (lambābharaṇaṃ lambamānam ābharaṇam utkṣipya vimucya. dvipaḥ karam iva śuṇḍā-daṇḍam iva.)"

26. "But even as Sumālin roared" sumāler nardatas tasya: Literally, "while or despite the fact that Sumālin roared." The pāda is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. We read the pāda as a genitive absolute of disrespect (anādare ṣaṣṭhī).

"so that the rākṣasa's horses ran wild" aśvāś ca bhrāntās tasya tu rakṣasaḥ: Literally, "and the horses of that rākṣasa wandered or wheeled about." Ck, Cg, Ct, and Cr understand the participle bhrāntāḥ, "wandered about," as "of unregulated gait" (anavasthitagatikāḥ—Ck, Ct, and Cg; Cr similarly).

27. "The rākṣasa lord Sumālin was dragged away by those horses as they ran wild, just as is a man lacking self-control, by the horses in the form of the senses when they run wild." tair aśvair bhrāmyate bhrāntaiḥ sumālī rākṣaseśvaraḥ / indriyāśvair yathā bhrāntair dhṛtihīno yathā naraḥ //: Literally, "The rākṣasa lord Sumālin was caused to wander by those wandering horses just as is a man devoid of self-control by the wandering sense-horses." See Kaṭhopaniṣad 1.3.3–9 for the well-known metaphor of the body as the chariot and the horses as the senses. Once again we find the redundant repetition of a comparative word, here yathā. The first occurrence of the word yathā, "like," is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. Cv, who reads with the critical edition and is the only commentator to note the redundancy, states that the double occurrence of the word yathā is for the completeness [of the comparison] (yathāśabdadvayasya nirvāhaḥ). Ñ2,V2,B2–4,D10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press avoid the redundancy by substituting the upasarga pari-, "around or about," for the first yathā, "like." The pari- is added to the participle bhrāntaiḥ, lending the sense "wandering around." Although the critical apparatus ascribes the critical reading to Cg, both KK and VSP read, like GPP, paribhrāntaiḥ, "wandering around." See notes to verses 11 and 19–21 above.

Following verse 28, Ñ2,V2,3,B insert following 117*, while D6,7,10,11,M3, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert after 27ab, a passage of one line [118*]: "Then [Mālin ran toward] great-armed Viṣṇu, who was advancing on the battlefield (tato viṣṇuṃ mahābāhuṃ prapatantaṃ raṇājire /)."

Following 118*, D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP continue, while Ś,Ñ1,V1,3 (after first occurrence of 28ab),D1–5,8,9,12,T,G,M1–5,7–10 insert after 27, a passage of one line [119*]: "As Sumālin's chariot had been dragged off by the horses, [Mālin ran] toward the chariot of Viṣṇu[1] (hṛte sumāler aśvais tu rathe viṣṇurathaṃ prati /)."

[1] "toward the chariot of Viṣṇu" viṣṇuratham: According to Cv, the term is a kenning for Garuḍa (viṣṇurathaṃ prati garuḍaṃ prati). The syntax of the line might make it appear that the chariot is being drawn toward that of Viṣṇu, and, indeed, both Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 391) and Benoît (1999, p. 1239) translate in this fashion. We believe that Ck and Ct are correct in understanding that Sumālin's chariot is being dragged in all directions by the wild horses and that Mālin, who, according to Ck and Ct, has jumped off his chariot, is racing toward Viṣṇu (sumāle rathe 'śvair hṛta itas tato 'pakṛṣyamāṇe sati rathād avaplutya viṣṇurathaṃ prati dhanuḥ pragṛhya yukto 'bhyadravat—so Ct). Translators, except Raghunathan and Benoît as noted, understand similarly.

28. "a bow and arrows" saśaraṃ dhanuḥ: Literally, "a bow with an arrow or arrows." D6,7,10,11,M11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead sa śarāsanam, "he . . . a bow."

"in battle" yuddhe: The word is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. D6,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the polysemic term yuktaḥ, which in this context could mean "ready or equipped." Translators render variously and the commentators are silent.

"Loosed from Mālin's bow" māler dhanuścyutāḥ: The sequence is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition.

"adorned with gold" kārtasvaravibhūṣitāḥ: The word kārtasvara, "gold," is rare in the Rāmāyaṇa, and used only in two other instances: at 5.2.49 and 5.7.12.

"struck . . . and passed through" viviśuḥ . . . āsādya: Literally, "they entered, after having reached."

"like birds through Mount Krauñca" krauñcaṃ patrarathā iva: The trope is common; for a discussion of its relevance and use, see note to 6.55.12. This simile is used once more in the Uttarakāṇḍa (Prakṣipta I, sarga 3.33–34 = App. I. No. 1, lines 196–199).

29. "shaken . . . troubled" cukṣubhe: Literally, "he shook or was troubled."

"by worldly cares" ādhibhiḥ: Literally, "by mental troubles."

30. "twanging his bowstring" maurvīsvanaṃ kṛtvā: Literally, "having made the sound of a bowstring." G1 and Gita Press (7.7.34), KK, and VSP read the gerund śrutvā, "having heard," for kṛtvā, "having made." In this variant, the twanging sound would be that of Mālin's bow. This reading is represented in the translations of Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1929) and Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 391).

"bearer of the sword and mace" asigadādharaḥ: T1,2,G2,3,N1,3,5, and KK and VSP read instead ariniṣūdanaḥ, "slayer of enemies." This reading is represented only in the translation of Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 391).

31. "the vajra or lightning" vajravidyut-: The term vajra can refer both to a thunderbolt or bolt of lightning, and the particular weapon of Indra. In this case, we have chosen the latter to avoid redundancy with vidyut, "lightning." Cs understands the compound to mean either that some of the arrows shone like lightning and others shone like the vajra or that all of them shone like one or the other at different times or places. (kecid vidyutprabhāḥ kecid vajraprabhāḥ. kvacid kvacid iti vā.)

"just as, long ago, the great serpents drank the nectar" nāgā iva purāmṛtam: Literally, "like the nāgas the nectar long ago." Although the nāgas never actually drink the amṛta or soma, the drink of immortality, they do lick the darbha grass upon which it rested before it was stolen by Garuḍa (MBh 1.29.8–10). This episode is said to be the rationale for why all serpents have split tongues (MBh 1.30.18–20). See Benoît's note (1999, p. 1714) to this passage where he refers generally to the episode of Garuḍa's stealing the nectar. D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read sudhārasam, "essence of nectar," for purāmṛtam, "as long ago . . . the amṛta." Cs believes that this reference is to the legendary fondness of snakes for milk. He glosses, "milk-fluid (kṣīrarasam)."

32. "Hari powerfully . . . Mālin's diadem" mālimauliṃ harir balāt: Ñ,V2,B,D1,3,4,6,7,10, 11,M2,6,7,10, and Gorresio (7.7.37), GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead śaṅkhacakragadādharaḥ, "the bearer of the conch, discus, and mace." The reference is to Viṣṇu.

"chariot, battle standard, bow, and" rathaṃ ca sadhvajaṃ cāpam: Literally, "the chariot together with its battle standard and the bow." D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead mālimauliṃ dhvajaṃ cāpam, "Mālin's diadem, battle standard, [and] bow."

"forcing Mālin to retreat" mālinaṃ vimukhaṃ kṛtvā: Literally, "having made Mālin one whose face was averted." Cr takes the adjective vimukham somewhat differently, understanding that Viṣṇu actually disfigures Mālin's face with his arrows (viṣṇur mālinaṃ śarair vimukhaṃ vikṛtānanaṃ kṛtvā). Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 445) appears to take vimukham as a noun in the sense of "trouble or confusion." He renders, "Dans le trouble où il jeta Māli." In this he is followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 394).

33. "Robbed of his chariot" virathaḥ: Literally, "devoid of or lacking a chariot."

"foremost of night-roaming rākṣasas" naktaṃcarottamaḥ: Literally, "foremost among the night-roaming [ones]." See notes to verse 2 above.

"a mace . . . with it in hand" gadām . . . gadāpāṇiḥ: Literally, "mace . . . mace in hand."

34. Here, as earlier, the author employs multiple similes. As in verse 1 above, the two figures seem more or less redundant. Cs, concerned, as before (see note to verse 1), about the seeming redundancy of tropes, attempts to differentiate the two similes. He offers two alternative explanations for the double simile. In the first one, he suggests that the example of Indra and the mountain is unsuitable to the case of Mālin and Garuḍa [and therefore, presumably, a second and more appropriate illustration is provided]. Cs's second explanation is that the two illustrations supplement each other in that one is an example of concomitance (anvaya) and the other of non-concomitance (vyatireka). Presumably, in the case of Indra and the mountain, the example is of anvaya, or concomitance, because Indra's vajra invariably destroys the mountain, whereas the case of Yama and Śiva is an example of vyatireka, or non-concomitance, presumably because Śiva, like Garuḍa, is not destroyed. (tātkālikaparāvṛttyanukūlaṃ vajreṇendro yathācalam iti nidarśanam. prācīnaṃ tv antato gatvā garuḍānanurūpam iti mantavyam. prācīnam anvayani- darśanaṃ dvitīyaṃ vyatirekanidarśanam iti vā vivekaḥ.) Compare, too, the mālopamās in verses 3–4 and 19–21 above.

"With that mace . . . Garuḍa . . . in battle" sa tayā garuḍaṃ samkhye: Literally, "he [struck] Garuḍa with it in battle." D6,7,10,11,T2,G1,3,T2,M2,4,5,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead gadayā garuḍeśānam, "[he struck] with the mace the lord of garuḍa(s)." Ck, Cg, and Ct, who share this reading, point out that the term garuḍa here must be taken as a synonym for birds (garuḍānāṃ pakṣiṇām īśānaṃ garuḍam—so Ck, Ct; Cg similarly).

"he struck" [a]bhyahanat: The sequence [a]bhy- is marked as uncertain by the critical editors. Note the unusual conjugation of abhi + √han in the first gaṇa.

"just as Yama, the ender of all things, struck Lord Śiva" īśānam iva cāntakaḥ: On the term Īśāna, see notes to 7.6.18. According to Ct and Cs, the reference is to a well-known purāṇic story in which a battle took place between Śiva and Yama Antaka for the purpose of protecting the sage Mārkaṇḍeya and some king in the Śveta forest. It is in the course of this battle that Yama is said to have struck Śiva with his weapon (śvetāraṇye mārkaṇḍeyarakṣaṇārthaṃ kasyacid rājño rakṣaṇārthaṃ ceśānāntakayor yuddham abhūt tadāntakena rudroparyāyudhāprakṣepaḥ kṛta iti purāṇaprasiddheyaṃ kathā—so Ct). Dutt (1894, p. 1577) refers to this story as well in his note. The story of Mārkaṇḍeya's austerities and his boon of immunity from old age and death is told at Bhāgavatapurāṇa 12.8–10, esp. 12.10.36. See, too, O'Flaherty 1976, pp. 231–37, esp. p. 232.

The word antakaḥ is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition, although the textual evidence does not seem to support this notation. Ñ2,B2,3, and the text of Gorresio read instead andhakaḥ, a reference to a demonic foster son/foe of Śiva, slain by his father for lusting after his mother. See, for example, MatsyaP 55.16; 156.11–12; 179.2–40; 252.5–19, etc. Other than this, a number of additional northern manuscripts (Ś,V1,D2,3,5,8,12) read a substitute passage [121*] as does one southern manuscript (T3). But according to the principles of the critical edition (G. H. Bhatt 1960, p. xxxiv), this does not seem sufficient evidence to mark the term as uncertain.

35. "reeling from the pain" vedanāturaḥ: Literally, "afflicted with pain."

"forced the god to retreat from the battlefield" raṇāt parāṅmukhaṃ devaṃ kṛtavān: Literally, "[he] made the god one with a face turned away from battle or the battlefield."

36. "After Mālin had made Garuḍa force the god to retreat from the battlefield" parāṅmukhe kṛte deve mālinā garuḍena vai: Literally, "When the god had been made to face away by Mālin indeed by [means of] Garuḍa." We understand mālinā to be the subject (kartṛ) of the participle kṛte and garuḍena to be the instrument (karaṇa). Cr, the only commentator to note the construction, understands that Mālin and Garuḍa are acting in concert. He glosses, "Mālin together with Garuḍa (mālinā garuḍena saha)."

"a mighty roar" mahānādaḥ: D6,7,10,11,M10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the synonymous mahāñ śabdaḥ, "a great sound."

37. The critical edition incorrectly numbers this as a second verse "36."

"Even turn though he had been forced to retreat" parāṅmukho 'pi: Literally, "even though his face was averted." See verses 35 and 36 and notes above.

"Viṣṇu, the younger brother of Indra of the tawny steeds" harihayānujaḥ: Literally, "the one born after him of the tawny or bay steeds." For the use the epithet harihaya, haryaśva, and the like, for Indra and the commentator's understanding of this term, see notes to 6.78.27; 6.90.5–7; and 6.95.15.

"the roar of the roaring" nadatāṃ nādam: Note the alliteration. The sequence is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. M9 and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read ruvatām, "crying," for nadatām, "roaring," while D1,3,4,6,7,9–11,T1,2,G1,3, M1,2,4–8, and VSP and KK 7.7.41 read ravatām, "crying," for nadatām, "roaring," and D3, 6,10,11,T1,2,G,M1,2,4,5,7–10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read ravam, "cry," for nādam, "roar." These variants enhance the alliteration of the pāda, reading rakṣasāṃ ruvatāṃ (or ravatāṃ) rāvam.

"hurled" utsasarja: Literally, "he released."

"his discus in his desire to kill Mālin" cakraṃ mālijighāṃsayā: D6,7,10,11,T1,2,G, M2–5,9,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead synonymous māleś cakraṃ jighāṃsayā, "his discus out of a desire for the destruction of Māli."

Following 37ab, D6,7,10,11,G2,M3,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of one line [125*]: "Twisting about on the lord of birds[1] in his anger, the holy Lord Hari [hurled his discus] (tiryag āsthāya saṃkruddhaḥ pakṣīśe bhagavān hariḥ /)."

[1] "Twisting about on the lord of birds" tiryag āsthāya . . . pakṣīśe: Literally, "Having mounted sideways or transversely on the lord of birds." Evidently, the idea here, as suggested by Ct, is that Viṣṇu, seated on the back of Garuḍa, who is facing away from the battlefield, now twists his neck around (tiryag iti vimukhe pakṣīśe tiryag valitagrīvam āsthāya sthitvā).

38. "Its radiance . . . lighting up . . . with its own radiance" -ābhāsaṃ svabhāsā bhāsayan: Literally, "[its] light lighting up with its own light." Note the alliteration.

"that discus, like the wheel of time itself" kālacakranibhaṃ cakram: Literally, "the wheel resembling Kāla's or time's wheel." Ct argues that the discus is like the spinning wheel of time, which consists of days, months, etc., and that what the simile expresses is the impossibility of thwarting it. (dinamāsādirūpeṇa parivartamānakālacakrasadṛśam. tenāpratighātyatvam uktam.) Dutt (1894, p. 1577) observes in a note that Crā makes a similar comment.

"severed" apātayat: Literally, "it caused to fall."

39. "just as did Rāhu's long ago" purā rāhuśiro yathā: Literally, "just as Rāhu's head, long ago." Rāhu is the demon of the eclipse, whose bodiless head is thought to periodically swallow the sun and moon for their role in betraying him as the thief who stole the nectar of immortality. According to the legend of the churning of the ocean, Rāhu stole the nectar of immortality and had just begun to drink it when, alerted by the sun and the moon, Viṣṇu beheaded him. Since he had partially swallowed the nectar, his head remained immortal. See MBh 1.17.3–8 and BhāgP 8.9.24–26.

40. "the gods . . . shouting" suraiḥ . . . /. . . vādibhiḥ: Literally, "by the gods who were saying."

"uttered with all their might" sarvaprāṇasamīritaḥ: Literally, "uttered with all life breath[s]." As in verse 10 above, the commentators understand sarvaprāṇena to mean "with all strength or extreme effort (sarvabalena—so Ck, Cg, and Ct; atiprayatnena—Cr).

41. "they fled back to Laṅkā" laṅkāṃ prati vidhāvitau: D6,7,10,11,G1,M2,9,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the more or less synonymous laṅkām eva pradhāvitau.

42. "Once . . . had recouped his strength and turned back" samāśvastaḥ saṃnivṛtya: Literally, "comforted, having turned back." The idea, as Cr notes, is that Garuḍa [now having recovered from the injury from Mālin's mace] returns to the battlefield (raṇabhūmim āgamya).

"great-minded" mahāmanāḥ: M10 and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead yathā purā, "just as before."

"he . . . drove . . . before him" drāvayāmāsa: Literally, "he caused to run or flee."

Following verse 42, V2,B3,D6,7,10,11,T1,G1,M6, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read verses 48–49.

43. "the night-roaming rākṣasas" naktaṃcarān: Literally, "the night-roaming [ones]." See notes to verse 2.

"just as great Indra, armed with lightning, might with his thunderbolts" yathāśanībhiḥ sataḍin mahendraḥ: Literally, "as [might] Mahendra with lightning with [his] thunderbolts." D7,10,11,T1,2,G1,3,M2–4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read mahābhraḥ, "a great storm cloud," for mahendra. In this case, the simile has the sense of "as might a great storm cloud laced with lightning with its thunderbolts." Cr, the only commentator to remark on the simile, understands the reference here to be, in fact, to Viṣṇu, whose dark body is imaginatively fancied as a storm cloud and whose characteristic yellow garments thus resemble lightning (sataḍin mahābhraḥ tadabhimānideva iva śarīrasya mahābhropamā pītāmbarasya taḍidupamā). Cv notes the gender discrepancy of the masculine abhraḥ for the expected neuter abhram (abhraśabdasya puṃstvam ṛṣinipātanāt). VSP and KK (7.7.50) both read the masculine nominative plural mahābhrāḥ, which is unnoted by the critical apparatus. This variant creates a problem because it violates the norm of number agreement between the upameya and the upamāna. The only translator who appears to grapple with this reading is Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 392), who treats the simile very freely, rendering, "as the thunderbolt scatters the great rain-clouds with lightning playing on them."

The meter is upajāti.

44. "their bodies scattered and torn" apadhvastaviśīrṇadeham: D6,7,10,11,T1,2,G1,3, M3–5,7–9, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead apadhvastavinītaveṣam. This lends the compound the sense "with garments disordered and carried away." Ck and Ct, however, understand the compound somewhat differently. They interpret it to mean that the arrows have removed the army's orderly garments (śarair apadhvasto durīkṛto vinītaveṣaḥ saumyaveṣo yasya tat—so Ct; Ck similarly).

"their entrails spilling forth" viniḥsṛtāntram: The sequence -[ā]ntram is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition.

"seemed to have gone mad" unmattanibhaṃ babhūva: Literally, "it became as if mad." D10,11,M5, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read unmattataram for unmattanibham, lending the phrase the sense "went completely mad." Ck, Cg, and Ct understand that the army has completely lost its ability to distinguish between its comrades and its enemies (unmattataram atiśayena vismṛtasvaparavivekam). Cr understands simply that the troops had lost the ability to discriminate (vismṛtavivekaṃ babhūva).

The meter is upajāti.

45. "flailing" vegāḥ: Literally, "agitated or violent movements."

"of the night-roaming rākṣasas" niśācarāṇām: Literally, "of the night-roaming [ones]."

"were similar to the screams and flailing of those who were slaughtered by the one who was himself a lion long ago" purāṇasiṃhena vimarditānām: Literally, "of those slaughtered by the ancient lion." The complex simile is awkward and overdetermined. As Cg and Ct and the translators agree, this must be a reference to the story of the destruction of the asuras and their leader Hiraṇyakaśipu by Viṣṇu in his avatāra as the man-lion, Narasiṃha (purāṇasiṃhena narasiṃhena—so Ct). A number of manuscripts, as well as Gorresio, no doubt in an effort to gloss the slightly obscure reading, read purā nṛsiṃhena, "long ago by the man-lion," for purāṇasiṃhena, "by the long-ago lion." The story is widely known in the mythological literature, with the earliest known version being found in the Mahābhārata (3.27*53–62). See, for example, HariVaṃ 31.32–43 and ŚivaP Rudrasaṃhitā 2.5.4–43.

The meter is upajāti.

46. "Covered" saṃchādyamānāḥ: Literally, "[They] being covered." D6,7,10,11,G2,M10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead te vāryamāṇāḥ, "they, being driven back." Cr reads the variant participle in its other possible sense, glossing āvriyamāṇāḥ, "being covered," to make it synonymous with the critical reading. Translators consulted who share the vulgate variant understand it in one or the other of these senses.

"those black storm clouds in the form of the night-roaming rākṣasas . . . like black storm clouds" naktaṃcarakālameghāḥ . . . iva kālameghāḥ: Literally, "those black-clouds [that were] night-roaming [ones] . . . like black clouds." Once again the author has combined a metaphor and simile with the same upamāna (kālamegha), resulting in the comparison of something to itself. See notes to verse 1 above. On the kenning naktaṃcarā-, see notes to verse 2 above.

"dropping" samutsrjantaḥ: Literally, "releasing." We believe that the context supports the interpretation of Ck, Cg, and Ct, who gloss, "[they] abandoned (tyaktavantaḥ)." The idea here clearly is that the broken ranks of rākṣasas are dropping their weapons as they flee. Several of the translators consulted, however, probably under the influence of the text's repetition of the compound bāṇajāla, "masses of arrows," understand that the retreating rākṣasas are still shooting their arrows. See Dutt (1894, p. 1578), Gorresio (1870, p. 25), and Benoît (1999, pp. 1240–41).

"driven by the wind" vāyupraṇunnāḥ: Ñ1,B1, and KK and VSP read instead vāyuprabhinnāḥ, "scattered by the wind."

The meter is upajāti.

47. "hacked to pieces" bahudhā vibhaktāḥ: Literally, "divided many times or many ways." V2,D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead dvividhā vibhinnāḥ, "cut in two."

The meter is upajāti.

48–49. V2,B3,D6,7,10,11,T1,G1,M6, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read these two verses after verse 42.

"Their necks were lopped off by the ploughshare." lāṅgalaglapitagrīvāḥ: We follow Ck, Ct, and Cr, who gloss glapitāḥ, normally, "exhausted or heated," as "removed (hṛtāḥ)"—so Ct; Ck and Cr similarly. Apte (s.v. glapita) cites this verse alone in support of this meaning.

50. "As they were being hurled down with their necklaces and earrings slipping off, the night-roaming rākṣasas, resembling black storm clouds, completely filled the sky so that it looked as if it were filled with black mountains that were being hurled down." tadāmbaraṃ vigalitahārakuṇḍalair niśācarair nīlabalāhakopamaiḥ / nipātyamānair dadṛśe nirantaraṃ nipātyamānair iva nīlaparvataiḥ //: Literally, "Then the sky, [filled] without interval by the night-roaming [ones] who, with slipped necklaces and earrings, were comparable to black storm clouds and who were being thrown down, looked as if it [were completely filled] with black mountains that were being thrown down." This verse is contextually and rhetorically deficient even by the relatively low standards of this whole section. The image of the sky being covered with falling rākṣasas, as with mountains, appears awkward and the explicit or implicit substitution of the earth (see note below) seems little better because in the preceding verse the rākṣasas were said to be falling from the sky into the ocean. On the whole, we are inclined to agree with Ck's judgment (the variant he knows contains the term kṣitiḥ, "earth"). He rejects the verse on the grounds of its inherent inconsistency and regards it as unworthy of comment. (tadā kṣitir ityādika ekaślokaḥ kvacid asti. tad avyākhyeyam asaṃgatasvarūpatvāt.)

"slipping off . . . the sky then" tadāmbaraṃ vigalita-: D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the metrically correct vilambamānair maṇi- "[with their] pendant-jeweled [necklaces and earrings]." This reading deprives the verse of an explicit subject to be modified by the adjective nirantaram, "without a gap," i.e., "completely covered," in pāda c. Ct and Cr suggest that the implicit subject is the earth (bhūmaṇḍalam—Ct, bhuvasthalam—Cr), and most of the translators consulted who follow the vulgate reading supply the term accordingly. A few manuscripts (T1,2,G3) actually substitute the phrase tadā (tathā—T2) kṣitiḥ, "then, the earth."

The meter is vaṃśasthavila (vaṃśastha), with a hypermetric pāda a in rucirā.

Sarga 8

1. "as the retreating army was being slaughtered" hanyamāne bale tasmin . . . pṛṣṭhataḥ: Literally, "as that army was being slaughtered from the rear." The idea, as Ck, Cg, and Ct understand it, is that we should construe the adverb with the participle hanymāne, "as . . . being slaughtered," and add the gerund anudrutya, "having pursued," to indicate that Viṣṇu is slaughtering the fleeing rākṣasas. (pṛṣṭhata iti. anudrutyeti śeṣaḥ.) Cr construes the adverb with the participle saṃnivṛttaḥ, "turned back," in pāda c, but this seems redundant.

"by the lotus-navelled Viṣṇu" padmanābhena: Literally, "by the lotus-navelled [one]." This is a common epithet of Viṣṇu. It derives from the version of the creation myth in which a lotus rises from the navel of the sleeping Viṣṇu. From that lotus emerges Brahmā, who proceeds with the actual work of creation. See Prakṣipta III, sarga 3.44–45. See, too, 6.105.16 and note.

"when it has gone beyond its shore" velātigaḥ: V3,D7,10,11,T1,2,G3,M5, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead velām etya, "having reached the shore."

2. "with rage" kopāt: Ś2,D5–7,10,11,M5, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead the synonymous krodhāt.

"the night-roaming rākṣasa" niśācaraḥ: Literally, "the night-roaming [one]."

"then . . . harsh" paruṣaṃ tadā: D1,3,4,6,7,10,11,T1,2,G,M, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead puruṣottamam, "[he spoke to] Puruṣottama."

"to the lotus-navelled Viṣṇu" padmanābham: Literally, "to the lotus-navelled [one]." See note to verse 1 above.

3. "immemorial" sanātanam: D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead purātanam, "ancient."

"code of the warrior" kṣatradharmam: V1,3,B1,D10,11,G1, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the taddhita derivation kṣātra-, "pertaining to the kshatriyas," for kṣatra, "warrior." This turns the tatpuruṣa compound into a more or less synonymous karmadhāraya.

"like some commoner" yathetaraḥ: Literally, "like another." We understand that the term refers to someone of low or simple nature, as do Ct, Cr, and Cg, who gloss, respectively, "like an ordinary person (prākṛtajana iva)," "like an evil person (pāpātmeva)," or "like a lowly person (kṣudrajana iva)."

"broken" bhagnān: D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead bhītān, "frightened."

"and have no heart to fight" ayuddhamānasaḥ: Literally, "not battle-minded."

4. "O Lord of the gods . . . commits" karoti sureśvara: T1,2,G1,2,M1,2,4,7–10, and KK and VSP read instead the nominative singular karoty asuretaraḥ, "[a god] one other than an asura [who] commits." Ck takes the term in a wider sense to refer to anyone whose nature is other than that of an asura (anasuraprakṛtikaḥ).

"A killer who" yaḥ . . . sa hantā: The construction also lends itself to a slightly different interpretation: "He who commits the sin of killing a fleeing foe, he is a mere murderer or assassin and therefore does not attain heaven." Some translators have interpreted in this way.

"of slaying a fleeing foe" parāṅmukhavadham: Literally, "the slaying of one whose face is averted."

"of the virtuous" puṇyakarmaṇām: Literally, "of those whose actions are meritorious."

"after death" gataḥ: Literally, "departed." We understand, with Ct, that the reference is to the afterlife. He glosses, "having left this body (ito dehād gataḥ san)." A number of manuscripts (Ñ,V2,B,D3,T1,G2,M3,5), and the text of Ck (noted as a v.l. by Ct) and Gorresio read the facilior hataḥ, "killed, slain." Ct glosses the variant as "slain by fate (daiva-hata ity arthaḥ)." Cv glosses, "dead (mṛtaḥ)."

5. "But if you still crave combat" yuddhaśraddhātha vā te 'sti: Literally, "or [if] there is of you desire or welcome of battle."

Following verse 5, Ś2,Ñ,V,B,D1,4,6,7,10,11,T1–3,G,M, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of one line [131*]: "Seeing that Mālyavān had taken his stand like Mount Mālyavān (mālyavantaṃ sthitaṃ dṛṣṭvā mālyavantam ivācalam /)." See 7.6.50. The textual evidence indicates that this line should have been included in the critical text. The editors of the critical edition are silent as to the reasons for its relegation to the critical apparatus.

6. "addressed . . . saying" uvāca: Literally, "he said or spoke to."

"I promised protection . . . in the form of the annihilation of the rākṣasas" mayā-bhayam / rākṣasotsādanaṃ dattam: Literally, "by me fearlessness, that is, the annihilation of the rākṣasas, was granted."

"This is the fulfillment of that." tad etad anupālyate: Literally, "so that [vow] is being kept or protected." Ck, Cg, and Ct understand Viṣṇu's rationalization [i.e., that he is keeping his vow] to suggest that he is not, in fact, guilty of the sin of which he has been accused by Mālyavān (parāṅmukhavadhoktadoṣaḥ svapratijñāpālanaparasya nāstīti—so Cg).

7. "even if it costs me my life" prāṇair api: Literally, "even with life breaths."

"you all" vaḥ: Literally, "you [plural]."

"even should you flee to the underworld Rasātala" rasātalagatān api: Literally, "even if [you] have gone to Rasātala." See notes to 7.3.25.

8. "But even as the god . . . was speaking in this fashion" devam evaṃ bruvāṇaṃ tu: D6,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead devadevaṃ bruvāṇaṃ tam, "as that god of gods was speaking."

"and roared" rarāsa ca: D6,7,10,11,M3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead bhujāntare, "between the arms," that is, "in the chest," thus describing the locus of the javelin strike.

9. "shooting from a storm cloud" meghasthā: Literally, "located in a cloud."

10. "beloved of the javelin-wielder Skanda" śaktidharapriyaḥ: Literally, "beloved of or fond of the javelin bearer." The śakti, "javelin," is the characteristic weapon of Skanda. All the commentators identify this deity by one or the other of his names or epithets. Ck, Ct, and Cr all identify the figure as Guha, while Cg identifies him by his name Subrahmaṇya. Cg notes, "This is to be considered worship or homage pertaining to Maheśvara or (possibly) to the son of Maheśvara (i.e., Skanda) (māheśvarārcanaṃ cintyam)." The identification is further confirmed by the simile in verse 11 below. See MBh 3.214–221 and L'Hernault 1978.

"pulled out" cotkṛṣya: Literally, "and having pulled out." The sequence is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition.

"taking aim, hurled it at Mālyavān" mālyavantaṃ samudiśya cikṣepa: Literally, "having designated Mālyavāṇ, he hurled."

11. "Govinda's" govinda-: This is the only occurrence of the Vaiṣṇava epithet Govinda, normally used of Kṛṣṇa, in the critical text of the Rāmāyaṇa.

"sped onward" prāyāt: Literally, "it proceeded or went forward."

"heading straight for" kāṅkṣantī: Literally, "seeking or desiring." Cr glosses, "being [one] desiring to kill (hantum icchantī satī)."

"like a blazing meteor heading straight for a mountain of collyrium" maholke-vāñjanācalam: Literally, "like a great meteor or comet [toward] a collyrium mountain." The simile draws its force from the comparison of the śakti, "javelin," to a bolt of lightning (see verse 9 above) and the huge dark body of the rākṣasa to a mountain of collyr-

ium. T1,G1,3,M3, and KK and VSP read māhendrīva, "like [the javelin] belonging to great Indra," in place of maholkeva, "like a blazing meteor."

12. "It fell" apatat: Ś,Ñ2,V,B2,D5,10,G1,M1,2, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead āpatat, "it rushed toward."

"splendid with the luster of his necklace" hārabhāsāvabhāsite: Literally, "radiant with the radiance of a necklace." Ś,Ñ1,V1,3,D1,2,4,8–11,M5, and Lahore (hārabhārasamanvite), GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read -bhāra-, "weight or mass," for -bhāsa-. This lends the compound, as Ck and Ct note, the sense of "shining with the multitude of necklaces (hārabhāro hārasamūhas tenāvabhāsite)."

13. "His armor pierced by that javelin" tayā bhinnatanutrāṇaḥ: Literally, "his body-protector pierced by that." As Cr notes, the meaning here is that Mālyavān's body itself is pierced (bhinnagātra ity arthaḥ).

"fell into a profound stupor" prāviśad vipulaṃ tamaḥ: Literally, "he entered a deep darkness." Ck, Cg, Ct, and Cr gloss "stupor (moham)" for "darkness (tamaḥ)."

14. "a lance of black iron" kārṣṇāyasaṃ śūlam: On the meaning of the terms kārṣṇāyasam and kālāyasa, see notes to 6.3.12 and 6.60.22. D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read the synonymous kālāyasam.

"in the middle of his chest" stanayor antare: Literally, "between the breasts."

15. "And then . . . having struck the younger brother of Vāsava" tathaiva . . . vāsavānujam / tāḍayitvā: Literally, "And in the same way having struck the younger brother of Vāsava." The compound vāsavānujam, a common epithet of Viṣṇu, is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. Northern manuscripts (Ś,Ñ,V,B,D1–5, 8,9,12), and Gorresio (7.8.16) and Lahore (7.7.15) read instead so 'ruṇānujam, "he [also struck] [Garuḍa], the younger brother of Aruṇa." Since verse 16 below makes it clear that Mālyavān had struck both Viṣṇu and Garuḍa, this reading might be viewed as a type of correction of the southern and critical reading, which fail to mention the attack on Garuḍa at this point.

"that night-roaming rākṣasa" niśācaraḥ: Literally, "the night-roaming [one]."

"stepped back" apakrāntaḥ: Literally, "[he] strode away." Ck and Cg understand that Mālyavān steps backward (pṛṣṭhata iti śeṣaḥ). According to Ct, Mālyavān turns his back on Viṣṇu (pṛṣṭhataḥ parāvṛttaḥ—so Ct).

16. "a mighty cheer" mahāñ śabdaḥ: Literally, "a great sound." As Cr indicates, we should add "on the part of the rākṣasas (rākṣasānām)."

18. "turned toward Laṅkā and . . . fled" laṅkām abhimukho yayau: Literally, "facing Laṅkā, he went."

19. "fled" yayau: Literally, "he went."

20. "Rāma" rāma: T1,G3,M3, and KK and VSP read instead tena, "by him," which must then construe with hariṇā, "by Hari," in pāda b.

"their foremost leader slain" hatapravaranāyakāḥ: The bahuvrīhi compound is ambiguous, because it could refer to the death of one or more of the rākṣasa leaders. Since, however, their principal chief, Mālin, is the only rākṣasa leader actually mentioned as having been killed, we, unlike the translations consulted, understand the reference to be to Mālin alone. But compare Benoît's note to the passage (1999, p. 1715).

21. "to stand against Viṣṇu in battle" viṣṇuṃ pratiyoddhum: Literally, "to fight against Viṣṇu."

"overcome with fear" bhayārditāḥ: V1,3,D6,7,9–11,T3, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead balārditāḥ, "afflicted with [Viṣṇu's] strength or power." Cs notes that it is Viṣṇu's strength or power (viṣṇubalārditāḥ). Dutt (1894, p. 1580) renders, "inflated with pride," evidently misreading baladarpitāḥ for balārditāḥ.

"the underworld known as Pātāla" pātālam: Literally, "Pātāla." See 138*, following notes to verse 25 below, where the rākṣasas are said to go to Rasātala as they do at 7.3.25.

Cf. 7.9.1–2 and 7.11.1, where the rākṣasa Sumālin leaves Rasātala. See, too, App. I, No. 9, lines 28–29, following notes to 6.13.5, where it states that Rāvaṇa may enter the underworlds known as Rasātala or Pātāla. Here the two names appear to be regarded as interchangeable, generic designations of the underworld.

22. "delight of the Raghus" raghunandana: The compound is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. Ñ2,D1,4,6,7,10,11,T1,G1,3,M1–3,6,8–10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead raghusattama, "best of the Raghus."

"in the lineage of Sālakaṭaṅkaṭā" vaṃśe sālakaṭaṅkaṭe: Ck and Ct remind us that Sālakaṭaṅkaṭā is the wife of Vidyutkeśa. Thus, she is the grandmother of Mālin, Sumālin, and Mālyavān, and so the matriarch of the rākṣasa lineage (sālakaṭaṅkaṭa iti sālakaṭaṅkaṭā mālyavadādeḥ pītāmahī vidyutkeśasya patnī tasyā ayaṃ sālakaṭaṅkaṭaḥ—so Ck). Cg understands similarly but adds that the adjective prakhyātavīryāḥ, "of renowned valor," refers specifically to the rākṣasas of that lineage. (sālakaṭaṅkaṭā mālyavadādīnāṃ pitāmahī vidyutkeśapatnī tasyāḥ saṃbandhī sālakaṭaṅkaṭaḥ. tasmin vaṃśe prakhyātavīryāḥ.) See 7.4.20 and notes. See, too, Introduction, "Rākṣasas," pp. 45–46.

"rallied around the rākṣasa Sumālin" sumālinaṃ samāsādya rākṣasam: Literally, "having reached or approached the rākṣasa Sumālin." The idea, no doubt, is that Sumālin has succeeded his slain elder brother Mālin as lord.

"dwelt there" sthitāḥ: Literally, "[they] stayed."

23. "Now the rākṣasas that you yourself killed, illustrious Rāma, were known as the Paulastyas. But Sumālin, Mālyavān, Mālin, and their followers were all much more powerful than Rāvaṇa." ye tvayā nihatās te vai paulastyā nāma rākṣasāḥ / sumālī mālyavān mālī ye ca teṣāṃ puraḥsarāḥ / sarva ete mahābhāga rāvaṇād balavattarāḥ //: The syntax of the verse is somewhat ambiguous and lends itself to two possible interpretations. Our translation follows the interpretation of Ck, Cg, Ct, and Cr, who understand the Paulastya rākṣasas referred to in pādas a and b to be those of the current generation, i.e., Kumbhakarṇa, etc., whom Rāma and his allies slew in the Yuddhakāṇḍa (paulastyāḥ pulastyavaṃśyās tvayā ye kumbhakarṇādayo hatās tebhyas tathā rāvaṇāc ca mālyavadādayo balavattarāḥ—so Ct). It is also possible, however, to understand that the entire verse refers only to the earlier generation of rākṣasas, whom Rāma in his proper form as Nārāyaṇa killed in ancient times. This latter interpretation, as far as we can determine, is clearly reflected only in the translations of Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 448) and Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 397). The translations of Dutt (1894, p. 1580) and Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 394) appear to avoid the issue by failing, in effect, to translate pādas ab (or, in the case of Raghunathan, the entire verse).

"illustrious Rāma" mahābhāga: Literally, "blessed or illustrious [one]." Ś,Ñ,V,B2,D2,5–12,M1,4,6,7, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead the masculine plural mahābhāgāḥ, which would then make the epithet refer to the rākṣasas of old.

24. "There is no one, conqueror of citadels, even among the gods, who could kill those rākṣasas" na cānyo rakṣasāṃ hantā sureṣv api puraṃjaya: Literally, "there is no other killer of rākṣasas even among the gods, conqueror of citadels." D6,7,10,11,G, M1,2,4,5,8–10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead na cānyo rākṣasān hantā surārīn devakaṇṭakān, "There is no other one to kill the rākṣasas, those enemies of the gods, those thorns in the side of the gods." See notes to 7.6.7. Ck, Ct, and Cs note that the construction of hantā, "killer" with the sixth (genitive case) is prohibited here by Pā 2.3.69. (rākṣasān hantā tṛn. na loka iti ṣaṣṭhīniṣedhaḥ—so Ct; Ck and Cs similarly.)

25. "four-armed" caturbāhuḥ: The word -bāhuḥ, "arm," is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition.

"the unconquerable" ajeyaḥ: Ś1,Ñ,V2,3,B,D1,2,4–6,8,9,T1,3,G2,3,M1–4,6–10, and Lahore, Gorresio, KK, and VSP, in order to avoid the hiatus, read instead hy ajeyaḥ, "for the unconquerable." D7,10,11,G1,M5, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead hy ajayyaḥ,

"for the unconquerable," while Ś2,3,D12 read tv ajeyaḥ. Given the manuscript evidence, it is hard to understand the choice of the editors (of the critical edition), because only V1,D3,T2 read with the critical edition.

Following verse 25, Ś,Ñ,V,B1–3,D1 (following 136*),2,3,4 (following 136*),5–8,9 (following 138*),10–12,T3, Lahore, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of two lines [137*]: "The Creator, who in age after age restores righteousness when it has been destroyed,[1] who is always prepared[2] to kill the dasyus, but is loving toward those who seek refuge with him . . . (naṣṭadharmavyavasthātā kāle kāle prajākaraḥ / nityodyato dasyuvadhe śaraṇāgatavatsalaḥ /)."

[1] "who . . . restores righteousness when it has been destroyed" naṣṭadharmavyavasthātā: Ñ1,D7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead the genitive plural naṣṭadharmavyavasthānām, literally, "of those by whom the establishment of righteousness is destroyed." Cr, the only commentator to remark on this elliptical reading, understands that the compound must be read closely with the term kāle, "in time," which follows it and which then refers to the time of destruction. Thus, according to Cr, the sense of the phrase is that Viṣṇu is born at the time of the destruction of the rākṣasas, who destroy the establishment of righteousness. (naṣṭādharmavyavasthā yais teṣāṃ rakṣasāṃ kāle vināśasamaye kāle . . . viṣṇur utpadyate.)

[2] "who is always prepared" nityodyataḥ: D7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead utpadyate, "is born."

Following 137*, Ñ,V2,B1–3,B4 (following 25),D1,4,6,7,9 (following 25),10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of eight lines (consisting of two four-pāda verses) [138*]: "Now, lord of kings, I have narrated to you the entire history of the origin[1] of the rākṣasas just as it occurred. Now, foremost of the Raghus, you should learn all about the origin and unequalled power[2] of Rāvaṇa and his sons.[1–4] For a long time, the mighty rākṣasa Sumālin, together with his sons and grandsons, wandered through the underworld known as Rasātala,[3] oppressed with fear of Viṣṇu. Therefore, the lord of wealth occupied Laṅkā.[5–8] (eṣā mayā tava narādhipa rākṣasānām utpattir adya kathitā sakalā yathāvat / bhūyo nibodha raghusattama rāvaṇasya janmaprabhāvam atulaṃ sasutasya sarvam[1–4] // cirāt sumālī vyacarad rasātale sa rākṣaso viṣṇubhayārditas tadā / putraiś ca pautraiś ca samanvito balī tatas tu laṅkām avasad dhaneśvaraḥ[5–8] //)"

[1] "the entire history of the origin" utpattiḥ . . . sakalā: Literally, "the entire origin."

[2] "the origin and unequalled power" janmaprabhāvam atulam: Literally, "the incomparable birth and power."

[3] "the underworld known as Rasātala" rasātale: Literally, "in Rasātala." Ñ,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead rasātalam, "[roamed about] Rasātala." See verse 21 and note above, where Sumālin and the rākṣasas are said to have relocated to Pātāla, whereas at 7.9.1 Sumālin leaves Rasātala.

The meter of lines 1–4 is vasantatilakā.

The meter of lines 5–8 is vaṃśasthavila (vaṃśastha).

Sarga 9

1–2. "left Rasātala" rasātalāt: Literally, "from Rasātala." The syntax is elliptical and the commentators suggest supplying a gerund, such as nisṛtya, "having left" (so Ct), āgamya, "having come" (so Cr), or tyaktvā, "having abandoned" (so Cg). See 7.8.21, where the residence of Sumālin and his rākṣasas is first said to be in Pātāla. Cf. 138*, note 3, following notes to 7.8.25, where Sumālin is said to have resorted to Rasātala.

"his unmarried daughter" kanyāṃ duhitaram: Since the terms kanyā and duhitṛ can both mean "daughter," Ct and Cr attempt to narrow the semantic range of the former term. Ct glosses the expected meaning, "unmarried (avivāhitām)." However, Cr, deriving the term from the root √kan, which Whitney (1885, p. 17) identifies as "doubtless the same" as √kam, "to desire," glosses, "desirable (kamanīyām)."

"who was like Śrī but for the lotus" vinā padmam iva śriyam: Literally, "like Śrī without a lotus." The lotus is one of the characteristic attributes of the goddess of fortune. See verse 5 below, where Kaikasī is compared to Śrī with her lotus.

"Then" atha: D6,7,10,11, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tadā, "then."

"Kubera, the lord of wealth" dhaneśvaram: Literally, "the lord of wealth."

"going by in the flying palace Puṣpaka" gacchantaṃ puṣpakeṇa: Literally, "going with the Puṣpaka." Cs addresses the elliptical phrase by noting that we should add the adverb "along with (saha)," and understands that Kubera is mounted in the flying palace (puṣpakeṇa vimānena saha gacchantaṃ tadārūḍham iti yāvat). For a description of the Puṣpaka and Rāvaṇa's acquisition of it, see 7.15.29–31 and notes. See, too, 293*, following notes to 7.15.30, where its construction is also mentioned.

Following 2cd, Ñ,V2,3,B,D6,7,10,11,T1,G,M1–5,7–10, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of one line [139*]: "But that lord of the rākṣasas then, wandering over the earth[1] (rākṣasendraḥ sa tu tadā vicaran vai mahītalam /)."

[1] "over the earth" mahītalam: Ñ,V2,3,B,D7,10,11(D7,10,11—first time),M1, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead the locative singular mahītale, "on the earth."

Following verse 2, D3,5,6,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of one line [141*]. See note to verse 3 below for translation.

3. "him going by . . . and resembling Agni, the purifier" gacchantaṃ pāvakopamam: Literally, "[him] going, who was similar to Pāvaka." Ck and KK and VSP read svacchandam for gacchantam, "going." This variant can be read either as an adjective in the sense of "wild or wanton," or, more probably, as an adverb with an implicit verb of motion, as suggested by Ck, who glosses, "coming and going at his own free will (svacchandaṃ gamanāgamanam)." KK and VSP in addition read for pāvakopaman, "similar to Pāvaka," tapanopamam, "similar to the blazing [one, i.e., the sun]."

"who was called by the name Kaikasī" kaikasīṃ nāma nāmataḥ: Literally, "named Kaikasī by name." This redundant expression is not uncommon in the poem. For its use elsewhere in the Rāmāyaṇa, see notes to 6.38.25. See, too, 7.23.19; 7.32.26; 7.67.3; and notes.

GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP repeat a number of lines following verse 2 and between 3ab and cd. The sequence of verses in those texts is as follows: 2ab; 2cd; 139*; 2ef; 141*; 3ab; 142*; 2ab (repeat); 139* (repeat); 3cd.

". . . [taking with him his unmarried daughter, who was like Śrī but for the lotus.][2cd] Then the lord of the rākṣasas, roaming the surface of the earth,[139*] [spied the lord of wealth (Kubera) going by in the Puṣpaka,][2ef] who was going to see his father [Viśravas], the brahman[1] son of Pulastya.[141*] [He (Sumālin) saw him (Kubera) going by, looking like an immortal god and resembling (Agni,) the purifier.][3ab] That[2] exceedingly wise [rākṣasa], filled with astonishment, returned to Rasātala from the world of men. For the benefit[3] of the rākṣasas he thought: 'What would be the best action[4] such that we might prosper?'[142*, lines 1–3] [He who with his earrings of burnished gold resembled a black storm cloud,] [2ab] that lord of the rākṣasas, roaming the surface of the earth [139*] . . ."

[1] "brahman" dvijam: Literally, "twice-born." D7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead vibhum, "lord."

[2] "That" saḥ: D1,3–7,10,11,M6, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead san, "being," lending the line the sense "being entered into Rasātala."

[3] "For the benefit" hitārtham: Literally, "for the sake of the well-being or welfare." D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead ity evam, "in this fashion."

[4] "best action" kṛtaṃ śreyaḥ: D5–7,10,11,G3,M2,9,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read the gerund kṛtvā, "having done," for kṛtam, "action, [what was] done." This lends the line the sense "having done what virtuous action?"

4. B3,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP show the sequence of lines somewhat differently, reading 4ab, 5cd, 4cd, 5ab. The sequence would thus read:

> "Your youth is passing, daughter, it is time to give you away.[4ab] Still, you have not been chosen by any suitor out of fear of rejection.[5cd] Intent on practicing righteousness, we have all made every effort on your behalf.[4cd] For you, dear daughter, are endowed with every virtue, like Śrī with her lotus.[5ab]"

"Intent on practicing righteousness, we have all made every effort on your behalf." tvatkṛte ca vayaṃ sarve yantritā dharmabuddhayaḥ: Literally, "For your sake, with minds on righteousness, we are all controlled." Ck, Cg, and Ct are in general agreement that yantritāḥ, normally, "controlled or disciplined," here means "having made exertion or effort (kṛtaprayāsāḥ—so Ck, Cg, and Ct)." Cv is more explicit, glossing, "We have all made efforts on your behalf for the sake of acquiring a distinguished groom (tvatkṛte tava viśiṣṭavaraparigrahārthaṃ yantritāḥ)."

5. "dear daughter" putrike: On the term putrikā, see note to verse 6 below.

"like Śrī with her lotus" śrīḥ sapadmeva: V3,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead śrīḥ sākṣād iva, "like Śrī incarnate." Compare verses 1–2 above, where Kaikasī is said to be like Śrī without her lotus.

"Still, you have not been chosen by any suitor out of fear of rejection." pratyākhyānāc ca bhītais tvaṃ na varaiḥ pratigṛhyase: Literally, "You are not taken by grooms, who are frightened of rejection." Ck and Ct propose that one could alternatively understand the line to mean that Kaikasī has not been married because her own family is fearful of rejection by potential grooms ([yadvā—Ct] pratyākhyānabhītair asmābhis tvaṃ varaiḥ parigṛhyase pratigrahaṃ na kāryase—Ck and Ct). Cs expands upon this, saying: "If one were to say that '[for fear] of rejection,' then one might ask, "Why '[for fear] of rejection?' It is because of the fear of being humiliated by not being chosen by the immensely powerful (mahābalasya) Sumālin. [And] since it is said that a girl is powerless (abalātvena) [to accept on her own?], we are unable to ask [for her]. Thinking thus, the suitors, who are seeking a maiden, are afraid and have not asked for you. (pratyākhyānān neti vadet kimiti pratyākhyānād apuraskaraṇe tiraskaraṇaśaṅkāyā mahābalasya sumālinaḥ. kila bālāyā abalātvena varaṇe na śaktir asmākam iti bhītaiś ca varaiḥ kanyākāmukair na parigṛhyase na yācyase.)"

For the sequence of verses in B3,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP, see note to verse 4 above.

6. "a burden" duḥkham: Literally, "misery or pain.

"dear daughter" putrike: As in verse 5 above, we take the suffix -kā as a diminutive in its sense of endearment. D6,7,10,11,M1, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead kanyake, "dear girl or daughter." See 7.12.11 and note. On the term putrikā and its use, primarily in the Mahābhārata, see Brodbeck 2009, pp. 49–56, 64–65, passim; and Brodbeck 2011a. See, too, S. Goldman 2016.

"who might wish to marry" varayet: Literally, "he might ask or sue for."

7. "A young girl will always remain a source of suspicion for three families" kulatrayaṃ sadā kanyā saṃśaye sthāpya tiṣṭhati: Literally, "A young girl, having placed a threesome of families in suspicion, remains always." As Cg, Ck, and Ct note, the idea here is that family members always worry that the woman might lapse from the path of virtue (katham asyāś cāritrabhraṃśo na bhaviṣyatīty evaṃ kulatrayaṃ cintākrāntaṃ bhaviṣyatīty arthaḥ). See 7.12.11 and note.

"she is given" pradīyate: Ñ2,V,B2,D6,10,11,T1,M6, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead ca dīyate, "and she is given."

8. "you must approach" gaccha: Literally, "[you] go." Ñ1,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead bhaja, "worship, resort to." Ct glosses, "serve, wait upon (sevasva)."

"that foremost of eminent sages" munivaraśreṣṭham: The syllable -ra- is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. Ś2,3,Ñ,V,B2–4,D2,5–9,12,T3,M1,3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read munivaraṃ śreṣṭham, "the excellent foremost of sages."

"ask him yourself to marry you" varaya svayam: Literally, "[you] ask for or sue for [him] yourself." The idea, as Ck notes, is that Kaikasī is to approach Viśravas on her own without the intervention of her father and ask the sage be her husband (viśravasaṃ svayam eva gatvā bhartāraṃ varaya).

9. "sons . . . who will be just like the lord of wealth" īdṛśās te bhaviṣyanti putrāḥ . . . yādṛśo 'yaṃ dhaneśvaraḥ: Literally, "just as is Dhaneśvara, so will be your sons."

"equal in blazing energy to the sun" tejasā bhāskarasamāḥ: Literally, "equal to the maker of light through blazing energy." D6,7,10,11,T1,2,G2,3,M1,2,4,5,7,9,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read the masculine singular tejasā bhāskarasamaḥ, making the phrase modify Kubera, lord of wealth. This, in turn, causes some consternation on the part of Cs, since Kubera, as his name suggests, is generally represented as having an ugly or deformed body (kutsitaṃ beruṃ śarīraṃ yasya). Cs therefore argues that Kubera is to be regarded as splendid as the sun by virtue of his blessedness or good fortune rather than by any physical beauty (bhāskarasama ityādikaṃ saubhāgyād eva na saurūpyānurūpyāt).

Following verse 9, Ñ,V2,3,B,D1,3,4,6,7,10,11,T1,G,M, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert, while Ś,V1,D2,5,8,9,12,T3, and Lahore insert line 2 after verse 9, a passage of two lines [145*]: "Once the young girl had heard those words, out of respect for her father,[1] she[1] approached and stood waiting at the place where Viśravas was performing austerities.[2] (sā tu tadvacanaṃ śrutvā kanyakā pitṛgauravāt [1] / tatropagamya sā tasthau viśravā yatra tapyate [2] //)."

[1] "she" sā . . . sā: Literally, "she . . . she." Cs, evidently disturbed by the repetition of the pronoun, argues on the basis of the Viśvakośa's definition of the term saḥ (sā) in the sense of either "anger or effectuator (saḥ kope sādhake ca)" that one occurrence of the pronoun should be read as an adjective, indicating that Kaikasī is either harboring some mental resentment that her father has failed to take an active hand in arranging her marriage or that the term sā (saḥ) simply indicates that she must effectively arrange the marriage on her own (sā saḥ kopo 'syā astīti sā. pitā svayaṃvaravaraṇaṃ kṛtvā na vivāhitavān iti mānasaroṣavatī . . . sa bhāvapradhānaḥ. sādhakatāsyā astīti sā).

Since virtually all manuscripts collated for the critical edition admit line 2, its omission from the critical text is highly questionable.

10. "resembling a fourth sacrificial fire" caturtha iva pāvakaḥ: Literally, "like a fourth purifier." The idea here is that by virtue of his own inherent blazing splendor, Viśravas resembles an additional sacrificial fire, along with the standard three of the rite he is performing. See note to 7.4.2 for the names of the three sacred fires.

"was performing the agnihotra rite" agnihotram upātiṣṭhat: Literally, "he performed the agnihotra." The agnihotra is a sacrifice performed at sunrise and sunset, during which oblations of milk, ghee, and gruel are offered to Agni, the fire god. Ck, Cg, and Ct believe that this must have been the agnihotra performed in the evening (rather than the morning rite). (upātiṣṭhat pradoṣe 'gnihotraṃ kṛtavān ity arthaḥ.)

11. "that fearsome hour" tāṃ dāruṇāṃ velām: Ck, Cm, and Ct remind us that this is the dread evening hour (pradoṣakālam ity arthaḥ). Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 399) in his notes to verse 17, mentions that the inauspiciousness derives not so much from the time itself as from the interruption of the sage's devotions. Benoît (1999, p. 1716), however, notes that the twilight hour is the one at which the rākṣasas and other demons begin to roam about. Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 632) refers to a similar incident in the Bhāgavatapurāṇa (3.14) in which Diti is cursed by her husband Kaśyapa for the same poor choice of approaching him during twilight. As a result of this transgression, she, too, is cursed to beget two fearsome demons (Hiraṇyakaśipu and Hiraṇyākṣa).

"out of respect for her father" pitṛgauravāt: We understand the compound as in 145* (following note to verse 9 above) to refer to Kaikasī's natural deference to her father's authority, which leads her to follow his instructions regardless of the inappropriateness of the hour. This is in agreement with Cg's understanding of the compound (pitṛgauravāt pitari bahumānāt). Ck and Ct, however, understand that Kaikasī, because of her father's venerableness (pitṛgauravāt), that is to say, his great power and fame, intrudes upon the sage, thinking that as the daughter of so lofty a personage as Sumālin, she cannot be treated lightly by some ordinary seer (mahābalaparākramatvena [jagat—Ck] khyātasya sumālinaḥ putry aham ato na prākṛtenarṣiṇānādaraṇīyety āśayenety arthaḥ).

"before the seer" agratas tasya: Literally, "before him."

"her gaze lowered to her feet" caraṇādhomukhī: Literally, "she whose face was lowered to the feet." Ck, Cg, Ct, and Cs understand that Kaikasī has lowered her face to put her gaze on or near the feet. This is presumably a gesture of bashfulness (caraṇam avalokayad adhaḥ pravartitaṃ mukhaṃ yasyāḥ sā caraṇādhomukhī—so Ck and Ct). Based on their next line (146*, see below), we believe that they, as do we, think she is looking down at her own feet. Cr, however, understands that Kaikasī has fixed her gaze on the seer's feet (caraṇādhobhāge mukhaṃ yasyāḥ sā. ṛṣicaraṇam avalokayantīty arthaḥ). Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 396), Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 398), and Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1935) all understand as we do, while Dutt (1894, p. 1582), alone, explicitly understands with Cr, translating, "hanging her head down towards his feet." The translations of Gorresio (1870, p. 30), Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 449), and Benoît (1999, p. 1244) are ambiguous in this respect. See 7.22.26 and notes.

Following verse 11, D1,3,4,6,7,10,11,S insert a passage of one line [146*]: "That charming woman repeatedly scratching the ground with the tip of her big toe[1] . . . (vilikhantī muhur bhūmim aṅguṣṭhāgreṇa bhāminī /)."

[1] "with the tip of her big toe" aṅguṣṭhāgreṇa: Cg, the only commentator to offer an explicit interpretation of the gesture, believes that it is a physical manifestation of her worry or anxiety (cintānubhāvaḥ).

12. "Looking" vīkṣya: Literally, "having looked." KK and VSP read instead the synonymous prekṣya.

"blazing, as it were, with his vital energy" dīpyamāna ivaujasā: V2,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead dīpyamānāṃ svatejasā, "[she] blazing with her own splendor," which makes the phrase refer to Kaikasī rather than the sage.

13. "Where have you come from and for what reason? What can I do for you?" kuto vā tvam ihāgatā / kiṃ kāryaṃ kasya vā hetoḥ: Literally, "From where have you come here? What is to be done and for what reason?" We agree with Cg, who understands the adverb kutaḥ in a spatial sense, glossing, "from what region or country (kasmād deśāt)." Cr, on the other hand, understands it in its sense of "why," glossing, "from what reason (kuto hetoḥ)." This then becomes redundant with the phrase kasya vā hetoḥ, "for what reason," a phrase for which Cr offers no gloss. We agree with Ck, Cg, Ct, and Cr that by the phrase kiṃ kāryam, "What is to be done?" Viśravas is asking how he can be of service (kiṃ kāryaṃ mayā kartavyam—so Cg; Ck, Cg, and Cr similarly).

14. "intention" me matam: Ck, Cg, and Ct gloss, "desire (abhimatam—Ck and Ct; abhilāṣitvam—Cg). They understand that her intention is to obtain the sage as her husband (me mataṃ tvadbhartṛkatvābhilāṣitvam—so Cg; Ck and Ct similarly).

"through your own power" ātmaprabhāvena: as noted by Cr, the reference here is to the supernatural power of omniscience that the sage would have acquired through the practice of austerities (ātmanaḥ svasya prabhāvena tapobalena). As Ck, Cg, and Ct point out, Kaikasī appeals to Viśravas's power of omniscience. Because of the force of her embarrassment in his presence, she believes that to speak in her own words would be inappropriate (tasya lajjāvaśāt svavācā kathanam anucitam iti bhāvaḥ—so Ct).

15. "But, brahman, you must know that I" kiṃtu viddhi hi māṃ brahman: D1,3,4, 6,7,10,11,M6,7, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead kiṃtu māṃ viddhi brahmarṣe, "But, brahman-seer, you must know that I."

"I am known by the name Kaikasī" kaikasī nāma nāmnāham: Literally, "I am named Kaikasī by name." See note to verse 3 above.

16. "Entering into meditation" gatvā . . . dhyānam: Literally, "having gone to meditation."

Following verse 16, Ñ,V,B,D1,3,4,6,7,10,11,S insert a passage of one line [148*]: "You desire sons from me, woman whose gait is that of a rutting elephant[1] (sutābhilāṣo mattas te mattamātaṅgagāmini /)."

[1] "woman whose gait is that of a rutting elephant" mattamātaṅgagāmini: Some translators, apparently disturbed by the comparison of a woman's gait to that of a male elephant in rut, attempt to modify the sense of the epithet. Gorresio (1870, p. 31) and Benoît (1999, p. 1244) simply feminize the elephant and understand the animal to be excited by love. Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 449) appears to understand the term -gāminī, "possessing the gait," in the sense of "approaching," and understands that Kaikasī has come in order to find a rutting elephant, i.e., the potent sage himself. He renders, "toi qui viens trouver un éléphant ivre de Mada."

17. "at a fearsome hour" dāruṇāyāṃ velāyām: See notes to verse 11 above.

"now learn" śṛṇu: Literally, "[you] hear!"

18. "fearsome, fearsome . . . fearsome" dāruṇān dāruṇa- . . . dāruṇa-: Since Kaikasī had approached Viśravas at a fearsome or inauspicious hour (dāruṇā velā), the sage predicts that her children's character will be similarly fearsome (dāruṇa). See note to verse 11 above.

19. "sons such as these are not worthy of you, a descendant of Lord Brahmā" nedṛśāḥ putrās tvatto 'rhā brahmayonitaḥ: Literally, "Such sons are not worthy of you, whose origin is Brahmā." D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio (7.9.25), GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read a variant of pāda cd and then insert an additional passage of one line [152*]: bhagavan īdṛśān putrāṃs tvatto 'haṃ brahmavādinaḥ [19cd variant] / necchāmi sudurācārān prasādaṃ kartum arhasi [152*] //, "Holy one, I do not want sons of such bad character as these from you, an expounder of the vedas. Please grant me your favor."

Following 152*, D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio (following verse 19), GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of two lines [151*]: "And when Viśravas that bull among sages had been addressed in this fashion[1] by that young girl, he spoke to Kaikasī once again as might the full moon to Rohiṇī[2] (kanyayā caivam uktas tu viśravā munipuṃgavaḥ / uvāca kaikasīṃ bhūyaḥ pūrnendur iva rohiṇīm //)."

[1] "And . . . in this fashion" caivam: Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tv evam, "but in this fashion." The variant is not noted in the critical apparatus.

[2] "as might the full moon to Rohiṇī" pūrṇendur iva rohiṇīm: Rohiṇī is the name of the ninth nakṣatra and is considered to be the principal wife of Candra, the moon.

20. "Then, regarding her concern, the sage said, 'Your youngest son' " athābravīn munis tatra paścimo yas tavātmajaḥ: Literally, "Then, regarding that, the muni said, 'He who [will be] your last son . . . ' " Ñ,V2,B,D1,3,4,6,7,10,11,M6, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP, some of which mark the beginning of the quote with 151* (see 151*, following note to verse 19 above) read instead paścimo yas tava suto bhaviṣyati śubhānane, "your youngest son, fair-faced woman, shall be . . ."

"shall be" bhaviṣyati: Literally, "he shall be." Ñ2,V2,B,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead na saṃśayaḥ, "no doubt." These manuscripts and editions place the verb bhaviṣyati, "he shall be," in the prior half of the verse. See note above.

"worthy of . . . lineage" vaṃśānurūpaḥ: Literally, "conformable to the lineage."

21–22. For additional descriptions of Rāvaṇa, see, for example, 3.30.5–20; 5.8.5–26; 5.20.24–27; and 5.47.2–14.

"very fearsome child" sudāruṇam: Literally, "very fearsome [one]." The passage contains ten descriptive adjectives but no specific substantive.

"He had ten heads" daśaśīrṣam: Literally, "having ten heads." Ñ2,V3,B4(daśagrīva-), D6,7,10,11,G1, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead daśagrīvam, "having ten necks."

"He had . . . hair that glowed like fire" dīptamūrdhajam: Literally, "possessing blazing hair."

23. For passages in the Yuddhakāṇḍa listing various inauspicious omens, see index ("omens, inauspicious"). Compare the omens at the birth of Duryodhana (MBh 1.107.28–30).

"The moment he was born" jātamātre tatas tasmin: Literally, "Then, when he was just born." Ś,Ñ1,V1,3,D2,5,8,9,12,T3, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read tasmiñ jāte, "when he was born, for jātamātre, "when [he] was just born." KK and VSP read tu tatkāle, "but at the time of that [birth]."

"jackals, their mouths emitting flames" sajvālakavalāḥ śivāḥ: Literally, "jackals having flaming mouthfuls." The idea is clearly the conventional one that these jackals are belching or vomiting flame. See 6.45.34; 6.53.42; and notes, for examples of jackals emitting flames from their mouths as an inauspicious omen.

"circled in a clockwise direction" apasavyāni maṇḍalāni pracakrire: Literally, "they made non-leftward or contrary circles." The term apasavyāni can be understood as referring to either the left or the right, as several of the commentaries note in their comments at 6.45.33 (see notes to 6.45.33). The idea that they propose is that the normally auspicious clockwise circling (pradakṣiṇa) is rendered inauspicious when it is done by inauspicious creatures, such as jackals. The phrase is used a number of times in the Yuddhakāṇḍa, where the commentators expend considerable energy in explicating its precise meaning or meanings. Here, however, they evince no particular interest in the phrase. As in earlier occurrences (6.45.33; 6.53.42; 6.94.4), the translators differ among themselves and, in some cases, even in their own interpretations of different occurrences of the phrase. Gorresio (1870, p. 31), as in the Yuddhakāṇḍa, declines to specify the direction in which the creatures are moving, rendering merely, "in cerchi infausti." Dutt (1894, p. 1583) here understands, "began to gyrate on the left," whereas at 6.45.33 (1894, p. 1269), he renders, "at the right hand," and at 6.53.42, he translates (1894, p. 1311), "at the left." Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 450) here understands, "à droite." Earlier, at 6.45.33, Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 166) reads, "de gauche à droite," and at 6.53.42, he has "à sa droite" (1903, vol. 3, p. 201). Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 399) translates here, "circling from left to right," as he did in the Yuddhakāṇḍa (1959, vol. 3, pp. 141, 175). Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1936) translates, "circled from left to right," whereas at 6.45.33 (1969, vol. 3, p. 1567), it renders, "anti-clockwise," while at 6.53.42 (1969, vol. 3, p. 1616), "right to left." Raghunathan here renders, "from right to left" (1982, vol. 3, p. 397), but earlier at 6.45.33 and 6.53.42 (1982, vol. 3, pp. 140, 175) he translates "left to right." Pagani in the Yuddhakāṇḍa (1999, p. 1001) first translates, "de droite à gauche," at 6.45.33, while at 6.53.42 (1999, p. 1033) she settles for, "vers la gauche." Benoît (1999, p. 1245) translates here, "de droite à gauche." For additional discussions of this issue, see 6.45.33; 6.53.42; 6.94.4; and notes, especially note to 6.53.42. Ñ,V2,B,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead pracakramuḥ, "they walked," for cakrire, "they made." Gorresio reads vicakramuḥ, "they advanced."

24. "The god rained down blood" vavarṣa rudhiraṃ devaḥ: Cg, as earlier, identifies the god in question as Parjanya, the vedic rain god associated with or even identified with Indra. For blood raining down as an omen, see 6.26.22 and notes. On Parjanya as the rain god, see 6.116.88 and notes.

"and the clouds made a harsh rumbling" meghāś ca kharanisvanāḥ: See, for example, 6.45.926*–36 and notes, where the harsh rumbling of clouds is included among the inauspicious omens.

"The sun vanished from the sky" prababhau na ca khe sūryaḥ: Literally, "and the sun did not shine in the sky." Compare 6.83.32; and notes. Ñ2,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read sūryo vai, "the sun, indeed," for khe sūryaḥ, "the sun in the sky," lending the phrase the sense "and the sun did not shine." For examples of the sun not shining or vanishing from the sky, see 6.45.35; 6.83.36; and notes.

"and great meteors crashed to the ground" maholkāś cāpatan bhuvi: Literally, "great meteors fell on the ground." See, for example, 6.45.35; 6.83.36; and notes.

Following verse 24, Ś,Ñ,V,B,D,T3,4,M3, and Lahore (7.8.26), Gorresio (7.9.32), GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of two lines [153*]: "The earth shook,[1] very fierce winds blew, and the ocean, imperturbable lord of rivers, was agitated (pṛthivī pracakampe ca vavur vātāḥ sudāruṇāḥ / akṣobhyaḥ kṣubhitaś caiva samudraḥ saritāṃ patiḥ //)."

[1] "The earth shook" pṛthivī pracakampe ca: Literally, "and the earth shook." Ñ2, V2,B1,3,4,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead cakampe jagatī caiva, "and indeed the world shook."

25. "He was born with ten heads, and so he shall be called Daśagrīva, 'Ten Necks.'" daśaśīrṣaḥ prasūto 'yaṃ daśagrīvo bhaviṣyati: Literally, "born having ten heads, this one will be 'Daśagrīva.'" Ś,Ñ,V1,3,D2,6–12, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read daśagrīvaḥ, "having ten necks," in place of daśaśīrṣaḥ, "having ten heads," thus making the name and the description identical. Ct brings up the issue—discussed by the commentators at earlier points in the poem—of why Rāvaṇa sometimes is said to have ten heads and twenty arms, while at others he is said to have only one head and two arms. Since his natural state, as we see from this passage, appears to be the ten-headed one, Ct observes that through his power of assuming any form at will, Rāvaṇa assumes the one-headed two-armed form when he is in such places as the women's quarters (daśagrīva iti kāmarūpatvāc cāntaḥpurādāv ekavaktratvaṃ dvibhujatvaṃ cāsyeti bodhyam). See notes to 6.47.106; 6.50.11; 6.90.31; and 6.92.20 for a discussion of when Rāvaṇa does and does not have multiple heads and arms. See, too, 5.8.5–9,13,19; 5.20.24; 5.47.2–14; and notes. Cf. 7.19.14, where Rāvaṇa has just one head even though he is in a battle situation. In the previous kāṇḍas, the term daśagrīva is understood to be an epithet of Rāvaṇa and has been rendered as "ten-necked Rāvaṇa." However, Daśagrīva does not obtain his best-known epithet Rāvaṇa until sarga 16 (7.16.27) of the present kāṇḍa. Therefore, to avoid the anachronism, we do not use the term Rāvaṇa unless it actually appears in the text.

26. "whom no one in this world exceeded in sheer size" pramāṇād yasya vipulaṃ pramāṇaṃ neha vidyate: Literally, "greater than the measure of whom no measure here exists." Cr explains, "than whose bodily size no greater bodily size exists (yasya pramāṇāc charīravaipulyād vipulam adhikaṃ pramāṇaṃ vaipulyaṃ na vidyate)." Cg suggests that we add the phrase "among beings that are standards of measurement (pramāṇabhūteṣv iti śeṣaḥ)." Compare 7.1.17 and note, where the same phrase occurs.

27. "youngest" paścimaḥ: Literally, "last." Cr glosses, "youngest (kaniṣṭhaḥ)." See notes to verse 20 above.

Following verse 27, Ñ2,V2,3 (line 1 only),B1,2,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of three lines [155*]: "When that exceedingly virtuous rākṣasa[1] was born, a shower of flowers fell. And the war drums[2] of the gods sounded in the heavens, and then[3] a voice was heard in the sky, crying, 'Wonderful! Wonderful![4]' "

[1] "that exceedingly virtuous rākṣasa" mahāsattve: Literally, "the one of great virtue or strength." The semantic range of the term sattva includes "character, spirit, consciousness, virtue, strength, courage, wisdom," etc. Translators have rendered variously.

[2] "the war drums" dundubhayaḥ: The dundubhi is normally identified as a war drum (6.53.27 and notes), but this drum can also be used for celebratory events (6.116.30). See 7.19.25; 7.26.45; and notes.

[3] "And . . . then" tathā /. . . tadā: Literally, "and, then." KK and VSP read instead tadā / . . . tathā, "then . . . and," by transposition.

[4] "a voice was heard . . . crying, 'Wonderful! Wonderful!' " vākyam . . . sādhu sādhv iti tat: Literally, "that speech, 'Excellent! Excellent!' " Ct completes the elliptical expression by adding the verb "there was (āsīt)," while Cr adds, "it was heard (aśrūyata)."

28. "There, in the great forest, they grew to be immensely powerful beings. But among them, it was the cruel Daśagrīva who was a source of terror to the worlds." te tu tatra mahāraṇye vavṛdhuḥ sumahaujasaḥ / teṣāṃ krūro daśagrīvo lokodvegakaro 'bhavat //: Ś,Ñ,V,B,D2,5–12,T3,4, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tau tu tatra mahāraṇye vavṛdhāte mahaujasau / kumbhakarṇadaśagrīvau lokodvegakarau tadā //, "There in the great forest, those two—Kumbhakarṇa and Daśagrīva—grew to be immensely powerful and sources of terror to the worlds." Ck, Cg, and Ct identify the forest as the locus of their father's, Viśravas's, ashram (pitur viśravasa āśramāraṇye—so Ck and Ct).

29. "evil . . . terrifying the three worlds" trailokyaṃ trāsayan duṣṭaḥ: D10,11,T3, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead trailokye nityāsaṃtuṣṭaḥ, "[roamed about] in the three worlds, never sated." As Ct explains, the idea here is that no matter how much Kumbhakarṇa eats, he is never sated (kiyad api bhakṣaṇe na kadācid api saṃtuṣṭaḥ). KK and VSP read trailokyaṃ bhakṣayan nityāsaṃtuṣṭaḥ, "devouring [the great seers, he roamed] the three worlds, never sated." KK and VSP read bhakṣayan nityāsaṃtuṣṭaḥ, by transposition.

"who were devoted to righteousness" dharmasaṃśritān: Literally, "clinging to or supported by dharma." The word -saṃśritān is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. Ñ2,V2,B,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio (7.9.38), GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead dharmavatsalān, "loving righteousness."

The word ha, the final syllable of pāda d, is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition.

30. "never deviating from the path of righteousness" nityaṃ dharmapathe sthitaḥ: Literally, "always standing on the dharma-path." Ñ2,3,V2,3,D7,10, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read dharmavyavasthitaḥ, "established in dharma," for dharmapathe sthitaḥ, "standing on the dharma-path," while Ñ1,B,D6,9,11, and Gorresio, KK, and VSP read dharme vyavasthitaḥ, "established in dharma." See note to 7.10.3.

"with his senses controlled" niyatendriyaḥ: Literally, "by whom the senses were restrained." Ñ2,V3,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead vijitendriyaḥ, "by whom the senses were conquered."

"practicing vedic study and restricting his diet" svādhyāyaniyatāhāraḥ: The construction of the compound is awkward and its meaning somewhat ambiguous. Translators and commentators alike have offered various interpretive strategies. We more or less follow the interpretation of Ck and Ct, who read the central term niyata, "restrained, fixed, constant," both forward and backward, with the first and last members of the compound. The compound thus means that Vibhīṣaṇa is both constant in his practice of vedic recitation and restricted or controlled in his diet. (svādhyāyaniyato niyatāharaś cety arthaḥ—so Ct.) Cr takes the compound as a bahuvrīhi incorporating a caturthī tatpuruṣa and having the sense "whose diet was restricted for the purpose of vedic study (svādhyāyāya vedādhyayanāya niyata āhāro yasya)." Cs understands similarly (svādhyāyārthaniyato niyamita āhāro yasya). Cg appears to take the term āhāraḥ, "food, diet," as some sort of derivative of the term ahaḥ (ahan) "day." Thus, he understands the compound to mean that Vibhīṣaṇa practices daily vedic recitation. (svādhyāyaṃ niyatam āhāraḥ. ahar ahar iti svādhyāyaniyatāhāraḥ.) A number of northern manuscripts and Lahore (7.8.32) and Gorresio (7.9.39) read the facilior, which is similar to the interpretation of Ck and Ct. This reading breaks up the compound into two separate elements: svādhyāyī, "one practicing vedic recitation," and niyatāhāraḥ, "one who controls his diet." Translators consulted generally agree with the interpretation of Ck and Ct. Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 450), however, understands the compound in a way that is grammatically possible but culturally improbable. He takes it to mean that Vibhīṣaṇa's vedic study constitutes his constant diet. He renders, "il faisait de l'étude des Vedas sa constant nourriture." In this he has been followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 400), who renders, "the study of the Veda being his chief nourishment." Cf. 7.2.7,13,14,27 and 7.3.2.

31. "divine lord of wealth" vitteśvaro devaḥ: Literally, "the lord of wealth, the god." Ś,Ñ,V2,3,B,D6,7,10,11, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead vaiśravaṇaḥ, "Vaiśravaṇa," for vitteśvaraḥ, "lord of wealth."

"came" āgacchat: V3,D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead āgataḥ, "[he] came."

"in his flying palace, the Puṣpaka" puṣpakena: Literally, "by or with the Puṣpaka." See notes to verse 1–2 above.

"immensely powerful" mahaujasam: Ñ,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead, dhaneśvaraḥ, "the lord of wealth."

32. "When Kaikasī saw Kubera" taṃ dṛṣṭvā kaikasī: Literally, "Kaikasī, having seen him."

"thinking like a rākṣasa" āsthāya rākṣasīṃ buddhim: Literally, "having recourse to a rākṣasa thought." Among the editions and translations consulted, only Gorresio's reading (7.9.41) is somewhat similar to that of the critical edition. He reads āgamya rākṣasīṃ buddhim, which he translates, "eccitata dalla sua mente di Rācsasa" (Gorresio 1870, p. 32). Ñ2,V3,B3,4,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead āgamya rākṣasī tatra, "that rākṣasa woman, having come there."

33. "even though your status as his brother makes you his equal" bhrātṛbhāve same cāpi: Literally, "even though the state of being brothers is the same."

"just look at your own condition" paśyātmānam īdṛśam: Literally, "you should see yourself as such." The commentators agree that Kaikasī is contrasting Daśagrīva's wretched condition with the splendor of his brother's state. Ck, Cg, and Ct explain, "[yourself] which has the form of some common rākṣasa, utterly devoid of the divine splendor that is Kubera's (kuberavaddivyavaibhavarahitaṃ prākṛtarakṣorūpam ity arthaḥ—so Ct)." Cg understands the reference to be specifically to Daśagrīva's impoverished state (daridram ity arthaḥ).

34. "my son . . . you will quickly become" bhavasi me putra śīghram: Ñ2,V,B,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tvam api me putra bhaveḥ, "you, too, my son, should become."

35. "intolerable envy" amarṣam atulam: Literally, "unequaled impatience or anger."

36. "mother . . . soon" acirān mātaḥ: Ñ,V2,3,B,D1,3,4,6,7,9–11,M6, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead [o]jasā caiva, "and with power," lending the line the sense "I shall soon become the equal to or even greater than my brother in power."

"my brother's equal or" tulyo bhrātrādhiko 'pi vā: Literally, "equal or even superior to my brother." Ñ2,V2,3,B,D6,7,9–11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead bhrātṛtulyo 'dhiko 'pi vā, "the equal of or with my brother or even superior."

37. "Filled with that jealous rage" krodhena tenaiva: Literally, "with that very anger or passion." The reference is to Daśagrīva's "intolerable envy" mentioned in verse 35. KK and VSP read instead the synonymous tenaiva kopena. This variant is not noted in the critical apparatus.

"Gokarṇa" gokarṇam: The word gokarṇa as a place-name occurs two other times in the Rāmāyaṇa (see 1.41.12; 5.33.73; and notes). In both places the reference appears to be to a mountain in the Himalayas rather than to the well-known Śaivite pilgrimage site on the western coast of India in modern Karnataka. The Mahābhārata apparently knows a Gokarṇa located in the Himalayas (1.32.2; and possibly 1.209.24). But compare MBh 3.83.22, 3.86.12; RaghuVa 8.33; etc., where references to Gokarṇa clearly indicate a location in the south.

Following 37ab, Ś,Ñ2,V,B1–3,D,T3,4 (after second occurrence of 37ab), and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of one line [157*]: "Wishing to accomplish an all-but-impossible[1] feat, he set his mind on austerities (cikīrṣur duṣkaraṃ karma tapase dhṛtamānasaḥ /) ."

[1] "all-but-impossible" duṣkaram: Literally, "difficult to accomplish."

Following verse 37, Ñ,V2,3,B,D1,3,4,6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of four lines (consisting of four pādas) [159*]: "The rākṣasa of fearsome valor practiced[1] unequaled austerities there together with his younger brothers.[1–2] Thus he gratified the lord, Grandfather Brahmā, who[2] being gratified, granted him boons assuring him a victory.[2–4] (sa rākṣasas tatra sahānujas tadā tapaś cacārātulam ugravikramaḥ / atoṣayac cāpi pitāmahaṃ vibhuṃ dadau sa tuṣṭaś ca varāñ jayāvahān /)"

[1] "practiced" cacāra: B2 and KK and VSP read instead cakāra, "he made or practiced."
[2] "who" saḥ: Literally, "he."

The meter is vaṃśasthavila (vaṃśastha).

Sarga 10

1. "asked the twice-born brahman" abravīd dvijam: Literally, "he spoke to the twice-born [one]." D6,7,10,11,M10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read munim, "sage," for dvijam, "twice-born [one]."

"How . . . practice their austerities . . . and what . . . was the nature of their austerities" katham . . . kīdṛśaṃ tu tadā . . . tapas ceruḥ: Literally, "And how then did they perform austerity of what sort?" Ñ2,V2,B2–4,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read tepuḥ, "they practiced austerities," for ceruḥ, "they performed," but this has no semantic impact on the verse.

"of great ascetic vows" mahāvratāḥ: Literally, "those having great vows." D6,7,10,11, G1,2,M2,4,5,7–10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead mahābalāḥ, "those having great power."

2. "And regarding that . . . there" tu . . . tatra . . . /. . . tatra: The repetition of the adverb tatra in the verse is awkward. We take the first occurrence to be in reference to Rāma's question and the second to the Gokarṇa ashram where Rāvaṇa and his brothers were practicing austerities (see 7.9.37 and note). See, too, 160*, following notes to 7.9.3.

"whose thoughts were focused" prayatamānasam: Literally, "of controlled or restrained mind." The compound, or its synonymous variant prayatātman, can also refer specifically to a pious or devoted person, as in Bhagavadgītā 9.26. Indeed, a few manuscripts, V1,B4,T3, and Gorresio's edition (7.10.2), read the term in the nominative as an epithet of the sage Agastya, in which case this latter interpretation is particularly apposite. Gorresio (1870, p. 33) renders, "Agastya il cui animo è sempre mai tenuto in freno." D5–7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead suprītamānasam, "whose heart or mind was delighted." Compare 7.10.5 and note below.

3. "At that time" tadā: D6,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tataḥ, "after that."

"constantly devoted to righteousness" nityaṃ dharmaparāyaṇaḥ: D6,7,10,11,T2,3,G,M (except M8), and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead nityaṃ dharmapathe sthitaḥ, "always standing on the dharma-path." This pāda equals 7.9.30b.

"practiced the austerity of the five fires" tatāpa . . . pañcaṣv agniṣv avasthitaḥ: Literally, "practiced austerities positioned among five fires." The reference is to the well-known ascetic practice in which one surrounds oneself during the hot season with four blazing fires, with the summer sun overhead counting as the fifth. The pañcāgnitapaḥ is well documented in the literature. See, for example, MBh 1.81.15; YājñaSm 3.52; ManuSm 6.23; etc. D6,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tatāpa . . . pañcāgnīn paritaḥ sthitah. This awkward reading is rendered more intelligible by Cr, who suggests that we read the participle sthitaḥ, "standing," as an unmarked causative, lending the passage the sense "having established five fires, he practiced austerities (pañcāgnīn sthitaḥ sthāpitaḥ san tatāpa)."

"during the hot season" graiṣmike kāle: D6,7,10,11,M10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead grīṣmakāle tu, "but in the hot season."

4. "During the rainy season, drenched with rainwater" varṣe meghodakaklinnaḥ: Literally, "in the rainy season, wet with cloud-water." Ś,Ñ,V,B,D2,5–12,T3,4, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead meghāmbusikto varṣāsu, "during the rains, wet with cloud-water." Compare ManuSm 6.23 and the commentaries of Kullūka, Medhātithi, etc.

"the heroic posture" vīrāsanam: This is a yogic or meditative posture. According Ck, Cg, and Ct, it consists of placing the right leg on the left thigh (vāmorūpari dakṣiṇajaṅghāṃ pratiṣṭhāpya sthitir vīrāsanam). According to the Haṭhayogapradīpikā 1.21, the position involves sitting cross-legged, i.e., with one foot on the opposite thigh and the other under the opposing thigh (ekaṃ pādaṃ tathaikasmin vinyased uruṇi sthiram / itarasmiṃs tathā coruṃ vīrāsanam itīritam //). See, too, Gheraṇḍasaṃhitā 2.17 (ekapādam athaikasmin vinyased ūrusaṃsthitam / itarasmiṃs tathā paścād vīrāsanam itīritam //). Neither of these postures seems to correspond to what contemporary yoga teachers call the vīrāsana, in which both feet are folded back against the thighs on their respective sides of the body.

"during the cold season" śaiśire kāle: Ŝ1,Ñ,V,B,D3,5,6,8,10,11,M4,7, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the synonymous śiśire [śiśiram—V1] kāle.

"he remained constantly immersed in water" jalamadhyapratiśrayaḥ: Literally, "whose shelter was in the midst of the waters." This appears to be a variation on the practice mentioned at ManuSm 6.23 and YājñaSm 3.52, where the ascetic should wear wet clothing in the winter.

5. "passed" aticakramuḥ: D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead apacakramuḥ, "they glided by or slipped away."

"intent" prayatamānasya: Literally, "of him piously exerting [himself]." Compare verse 2 and note above.

6. "he stood on one foot" pādenaikena tasthivān: Standing on one foot is one of the classic self-mortifications. Compare MBh 1.81.15, where Yayāti is said to have stood on one foot for six months.

7. "became agitated" kṣubhitāḥ: Literally, "[were] agitated." The critical reading, although sound textually, seems odd contextually. It is a commonplace in the literature for the gods to be shaken or agitated by the extreme ascetic practices of individuals. But in this case, especially in light of the dancing of the apsarases and the raining of flowers, which are conventional signs of pleasure, the agitation of the gods seems somehow misplaced. Ñ1,V,B2–4,D7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead tuṣṭuvuḥ, "they praised [him]."

8. "For yet another five thousand years" pañca varṣasahasrāṇi . . . caiva: Literally, "and for five thousand years." As becomes clear in the following verse, the total period of Vibhīṣaṇa's asceticism is, like his brother's, ten thousand years. Ck and Cg believe that by the conjunctive particle ca, "and," we are to understand that Vibhīṣaṇa continues to stand on one foot (cakāreṇa pūrvavad ekapādasthitiḥ samuccīyate).

"gazed steadily" anvavartata: Literally, "he followed." Staring at the sun is another one of the forms of self-mortification. Apte (s.v. anu +√vṛt) cites this passage in support of his contention that the verb can mean "to serve or to worship." Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1938), alone among the translators consulted, renders it in this fashion. The reading is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition.

"and his mind fixed upon vedic recitation" svādhyāyadhṛtamānasaḥ: D1,4,6,7,10,11,M1, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead the synonymous svādhyāye dhṛtamānasaḥ.

9. "passed . . . whose mind was tightly controlled . . . as they might for a heavenly being in the Nandana garden" gatāni niyatātmanaḥ . . . /. . . svargasthasyeva nandane: Literally, "[years] passed of [him] whose mind was controlled, as of one situated in heaven in Nandana." We, like several other translators, agree with Ck, Cg, and Ct, who take the term svargasthasya, "[one] situated in heaven," as a kenning for "god (devasya)." It is also possible, perhaps, to take it as an adjective referring directly to Vibhīṣaṇa, lending the simile the sense "as if he were in heaven in the Nandana garden." This interpretation is represented in the translations of Gorresio (1870, p. 34), who renders, "come egli fosse nel Nandana in cielo," and Gita Press (1969, vol. 3. 1938), which translates, "as though he stayed in the Nandana Vana." According to Cr, the simile suggests that Vibhīṣaṇa is completely without any [negative] mental impressions (etad upamālaṅkāreṇa vibhīṣaṇasya vāsanārāhityaṃ sūcitam). It is not entirely clear what Cr means by this. Either he is suggesting that the denizens of heaven no longer recall the impressions of their previous lives or that Vibhīṣaṇa in his state of inner concentration has no such recollections of either his previous lives or his painful penances.

D6,7,10,11,T1,2,G,M1,5,7–10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP transpose pādas b (gatāni niyatātmanaḥ) and d (svargasthasyeva nandane).

10. "their ten-faced brother" daśānanaḥ: Literally, "the ten-faced [one]."

"he offered one of his heads into the fire as an oblation" śiraś cāgnau juhāva saḥ: Literally, "and he offered a head into the fire."

12. "Now at the end of the tenth period of a thousand years" atha varṣasahasre tu daśame: Literally, "now, but in the tenth [set of] a thousand years."

"the righteous rākṣasa was just about to sever" chettukāmaḥ sa dharmātmā: Literally, "that righteous [one] desired to cut." D6,7,10,11,G2,M2,3,9,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead chettukāme daśagrīve, "when Daśagrīva was desirous of cutting."

"when Grandfather Brahmā came there" prāptaś cātra pitāmahaḥ: Literally, "and the grandfather came here." Ñ1,V2,B2–4,D6,7,10,11,M3,7,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read prāptas tatra, "[he] arrived there," for prāptaś cātra, "[he] arrived here."

Following verse 12, M2,9, and KK [in brackets as 13ab] insert, while G2 substitutes for 13ab, a passage of one line [162*]: "along with the gods, gandharvas, perfected beings, seers, and kinnaras (devagandharvasiddhaiś ca ṛṣibhiḥ kiṃnaraiḥ saha /)." Note the hiatus.

13. "My child! My child!" vatsa vatsa: D6,7,10,11,M4,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tava tāvat. The indeclinable tāvat here can be read in at least two ways. It can be read as a particle of emphasis to indicate that Brahmā is highly pleased, or in its sense of "to such an extent or so much," to indicate that Brahmā is gratified with what Rāvaṇa has done up until this point, i.e., in cutting off nine of his ten heads. Of those translators who appear to render the term, Dutt (1894, p. 1583), Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1938), Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 452), and Benoît (1999, p. 1246) read it in the former sense, while Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 399) appears to take it in the latter, rendering, "You have done enough to propitiate me."

14. "Shall I grant a wish for you" kiṃ te kāmaṃ karomi: The neuter kim must be taken as an interrogative particle, rendering these words of Brahmā a question. The word kim is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. Ś,Ñ1,V1,3,D1–4,7,8,10–12,T3,4,G1, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead the masculine singular pronoun kaṃ kāmam, yielding the different sense of "what desire of yours shall I grant?" B2,3, and KK and VSP read the demonstrative pronoun tam for kim, yielding the sense "I shall grant that desire of yours."

15. "Then" tataḥ: The word is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. D3,6,7,10,11,S (except T3,4), and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead atha, "now."

16. "and so" ataḥ: The word is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. D1,3,4,6,7,10,11,S (except T3,4), and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead aham, "I."

"immortality" amaratvam: In the critical text, Rāvaṇa himself immediately qualifies his request by asking to be invulnerable only to supernatural beings (verses 17,18). Compare 321* and notes, following notes to 7.16.29. For Rāvaṇa's qualified boon of invulnerability, see 1.14.12–15 and notes. On the motif of Rāvaṇa's boon, see Pollock 1991, pp. 21–43. See, too, 5.49.23–26. See also note to verse 30 below.

Following verse 16, Ñ,V2,3,B,D2,4,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of four lines [163*]: "Addressed in this fashion, Brahmā then said to Daśagrīva, 'There can be no total immunity from death[1] for you. You must choose[2] a different boon.'[1–2] Then, O Rāma, when Daśagrīva had been addressed in this fashion[3] by Brahmā, the creator of the universe,[4] he cupped his hands before him in reverence and said this.[3–4]"

[1] "total immunity from death" sarvāmaratvam: Literally, "total immortality." See note to verse 30 below.

[2] "You must choose" vṛṇīṣva vai: Literally, "you must surely choose." D3,4,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read me, "from me," for the emphatic particle vai.

[3] "When Daśagrīva had been addressed in this fashion" evam uktas . . . daśagrīvaḥ: Literally, "Daśagrīva addressed in this fashion." D3,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read ukte for uktaḥ, turning the phrase into an elliptical absolute construction with the sense "when this had been said [by Brahmā], Daśagrīva."

[4] "by . . . the creator of the universe" lokakāriṇā: D3,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the synonymous lokakārtṛṇā.

17. "let me be" syām: Literally, "may I be." V3,D6,7,10,11,S (except T3,4,M6) read instead the pronoun [a]ham, "I." This leaves the verse without an explicit finite verb, a lack that Cr seeks to remedy by supplying the verb bhaveyam, "may I become."

"forever" śāśvatam: D5,8,10,11,T1,3,G2,3,M1,3,5,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the vocative singular śāśvata. This would then construe with the vocative prajādhyakṣa, "Lord of creatures," in pāda a, yielding the sense "O eternal Lord of creatures."

18. "O Lord worshiped by the immortal gods" amarapūjita: Literally, "O [you] worshiped by immortals."

"I do not care" na . . . cintā mama: Literally, "of me there is no care or anxiety."

"Indeed, I regard all . . . as if they were mere straws" tṛṇabhūtā hi me sarve: Literally, "indeed, for me, all [creatures] . . . are or become straw." Ś,V3,D2,6–12,T1,2,M1,3, and Lahore, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read te, "those," for me, "of me," while V2,B1,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP manye, "I think," for sarve, "all." On other uses of the word tṛṇa, "straw," as an idiomatic metaphor for something taken lightly, see 3.54.1; 5.19.2–3; 5.56.7; and notes and note to 6.31.50.

19. "Rāma" rāma: D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the nominative singular devaḥ, "the god or lord," which then construes with brahmā, "Brahmā."

20. "It will be just as you wish" bhaviṣyaty evam evaitat tava: Literally, "This will be just so for you." D6,7,10,11,T1,2,4,G,M2,5,7–9, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead bhaviṣyaty evam etat te vacaḥ, literally, "These words of yours will be thus," that is to say, "Your words shall come to pass in this fashion."

"And now, since I am pleased, hear my additional auspicious words." śṛṇu cāpi vaco bhūyaḥ prītasyeha śubhaṃ mama: Literally, "And also hear the additional auspicious speech of me who am pleased now or here." The word bhūyaḥ, which we have rendered here as an adjective of speech, in the sense of "more or additional," can also be read adverbially in the sense of "further or once more," which would then construe with the verb śṛṇu, "hear." D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead varaḥ . . . śubhaḥ, "auspicious boon."

Following 20ab, D6,7,10,11, M10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of one line [164*]: "And, Rama, having spoken in this fashion to Daśagrīva, Grandfather Brahmā[1] . . . (evam uktvā tu taṃ rāma daśagrīvaṃ pitāmahaḥ /)."

[1] "Grandfather Brahmā" pitāmahaḥ: Literally, "the Grandfather."

21. Following verse 21, Ñ,V,B1,3,4,D1,3,4,6,7,9–11,S, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read a passage of two lines [165*]: "And I will grant another handsome form,[1] so difficult to obtain, which according to your will, will conform to what you desire with your mind (vitarāmi ca te saumyarūpam anyat sudurlabham / chandatas te 'nurūpaṃ ca manasā yat tavepsītam //)." According to the critical reading, it appears that Brahmā is granting Daśagrīva two boons here. One is the handsome form that is described earlier in the poem at Sundarakāṇḍa 8.5–9 and 47.2–14, and the second boon is that Daśagrīva will be able to change his form to be able to take on any form at will. This latter boon seems somewhat otiose in light of the fact that the capacity to change one's form at will (kāmarūpitvam) seems in the epic to be shared by virtually all of the rākṣasas, not to mention the vānaras, the gods, and powerful ascetics. See, for example, 7.24.33; 7.57.22; 7.98.17; and notes. See also Goldman and Goldman 2009, pp. 25–26. Cs notes that we should understand that this boon is the sowing of the seed of Rāvaṇa's destruction (idam eva rāvaṇamāraṇabījāvapanam iti mantavyam). Presumably he is referring to Rāvaṇa's fatal error in taking on the form of a sage to enable him to abduct Sītā (Araṇyakāṇḍa sarga 44ff.).

[1] "another handsome form" saumyarūpam anyat: Cv, who reads largely with the critical text, but substitutes anyaiḥ, "by others," for anyat, "another," understands that the handsome form granted to Daśagrīva here will be his permanent, natural form, not the temporary, optional form that he will be able to assume at will and that will be unattainable by others (vitarāmi ca te saumyarūpam anyaiḥ sudurlabham ity ukte sarvadā saumyarūpam eva na kāmarūpam iti śaṅkitvā tat parihārārtham āha chandata ityādi tena rāvaṇasya saumyarūpatvaṃ nityam asaumyarūpatvam āgantukam ity uktam). See notes to 7.9.25. The phrase saumyarūpam anyat could also be read as saumya rūpam anyat, lending the line the sense "I shall give you another form, O gentle one."

GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read a slight variant on these lines, which gives Daśagrīva only one boon. They read instead:

vitarāmīha te saumya varaṃ cānyaṃ durāsadam / chandatas tava rūpaṃ ca manasā yad yathepsitam // [GPP 7.10.24cd–25ab]

"And,[1] gentle sir, I shall give you another boon, difficult to obtain: Your appearance shall be just as you desire in your mind, according to your will."

[1] "And" ca: GPP omits the word ca, "and."

Following 165*, GPP (in brackets 7.10.25cd) and KK and VSP (7 ..10.25cd) insert a passage of one line, noted in the errata to the critical apparatus (p. 666) [165(1)*]: "This will come to pass for you without a doubt, rākṣasa, as a result of my boon (bhaviṣyati na saṃdeho madvarāt tava rākṣasa)."

22. "When . . . had been addressed in this fashion by Grandfather Brahmā" evaṃ pitāmahoktasya: Literally, "thus, of him who had been addressed by the grandfather." D9 and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead evaṃ pitāmahoktaṃ ca, which gives the sense "and such was the speech of the grandfather."

"those heads . . . materialized" śīrṣāṇi yāni tāny utthitāni vai: Literally, "which heads, those indeed sprang up." D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read punaḥ for yāni, lending the phrase the sense "those heads indeed sprang up once more," while KK and VSP read uditāni, "grew," for utthitāni, "sprang up," lending the sense "those heads indeed grew back once more."

23. "Prajāpati" prajāpatiḥ: V1,D6,7,10,11,M1,5, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead pitāmahaḥ, "the Grandfather."

24. "knower of righteousness" dharmajña: D6,7,10,11,M10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead dharmātman, "O righteous one."

"with you, for your mind is focused on righteousness" tvayā . . . dharmasaṃhitabuddhinā: Literally, "by you whose mind is concentrated on dharma."

25. "as is the moon with its beams" candramā iva raśmibhiḥ: Ś,Ñ,V,B,D,T3,4,M6, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the synonymous candramā raśmibhir yathā.

26. "in that you, the guru of the worlds, have appeared in person before me" yan me lokaguruḥ svayam: Literally, "since the guru of the worlds in person for me." The pāda is elliptical, and we agree with Cr that it is best fleshed out by adding words to the effect that Brahmā has actually come into Vibhīṣaṇa's presence (lokagurur bhavān yat svayaṃ me samīpam āgata iti śeṣaḥ).

"But if you are pleased . . . what boon you should give to me" prīto yadi tvaṃ dātavyaṃ varaṃ me: Literally, "If you are pleased, a boon should be given to me." D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead prītena yadi dātavyo varo me, "If a boon is to be given to me by the one who is pleased . . ."

Following verse 26, Ñ,V2,3,B,D1,3,4,6,7,10,11,T,G1,3,M, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of two lines [167*]: "May my mind always be on righteousness,[1] even should I be in dire straits.[2] And, holy one, may the divine weapon-spell of Brahmā reveal itself to me, even though it has not been taught.[3] (paramāpadgatasyāpi dharme mama matir bhavet / aśikṣitaṃ ca brahmāstraṃ bhagavan pratibhātu me //)"

[1] "righteousness" dharme: Ct argues on the basis of the quote that "Rāma is dharma incarnate" (3.35.13), that here, by the term "dharma," "Nārāyaṇa" is meant. For otherwise, Ct continues, Vibhīṣaṇa's wish would become redundant in light of the wish he expresses in verse 27. (mama dharme nārāyaṇe matir bhavet. rāmo vigrahavān dharma ity ukter atra dharmapadena nārāyaṇaḥ. anyathā sā sā bhavatu dharmiṣṭhety anena paunaruktyaṃ syāt.)

[2] "even should I be in dire straits" paramāpadgatasyāpi . . . mama: Literally, "[the mind] of me, even having come to the greatest catastrophe." Ck and Ct understand the reference to be to the calamitous condition that one might obtain through entanglements in worldly life (paramāpadgatasya sāṃsārikavyavahārataḥ paramām āpadaṃ prāptasyāpi).

[3] "the divine weapon-spell of Brahmā . . . even though it has not been taught" aśikṣitaṃ . . . brahmāstram: Literally, "the untaught brahmāstra." Cg understands, as do we, that the reference is to the mantra, or weapon-spell, that controls the great, destructive weapon of Brahmā (brahmāstraṃ brahmāstramantram). Ck and Ct, however, understand the term far more broadly to refer to knowledge of the absolute or brahmavidyā, which, they believe, Vibhīṣaṇa is requesting to have imparted to him, even without the instruction of a qualified guru. They understand that this boon is for the purpose of the elimination of the obstacles to the perfect mastery of the entire knowledge of the absolute Brahman. (aśikṣitam. sadgurūpadeśaṃ vināpy ity arthaḥ. brahmāstraṃ brahmavidyā . . . etad varaṇam aśeṣabrahmavidyāsiddhipratibandhakanivṛttaye—so Ct; Ck similarly.)

27. "each and every stage of life in this world . . . And may I always uphold the righteous conduct appropriate to every stage." yeṣu yeṣv āśrameṣv iha /. . . taṃ taṃ dharmaṃ ca pālaye: Literally, "in each and every stage of life here . . . may I protect each and every dharma." V1,B1,2,D6,7,10,11,M5,6, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read ca, "and," for iha, "here." KK and VSP read taṃ tu, "but that," for taṃ tam, "that that." Our interpretation, like that of Dutt (1894, p. 1587), Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1940), and Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 400), follows that of Cr, who understands the phrase to refer elliptically to the modes of proper behavior appropriate to the different āśramas, or the four stages of life, prescribed in the brāhmaṇical texts. (yeṣu yeṣv āśrameṣu brahmacaryādiṣu yā yā me buddhir jāyate jayeta sā sā dharmiṣṭhā tattadāśramocitadharmaviśiṣṭā bhavatv ata eva taṃ taṃ dharmam ahaṃ pālaye pālayeyam.) Gorresio (1870, p. 35) simply understands that Vibhīṣaṇa wishes to do his duty whatever it may be. In this interpretation he appears to have been followed by Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 453), Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 403), and Benoît (1999, p. 1248). See 2.98.57–58 and notes; see notes to 6.80.52 (varṇa), and Brockington 1998, p. 428.

28. "Most munificent Lord" paramodāra: Literally, "O supremely generous [one]."

"beyond the reach" durlabham: Literally, "hard or impossible to obtain."

29. "Since you are so supremely righteous" dharmiṣṭhas tvaṃ yathā: Ñ,V1,2,B2,D2,5,7,9–11,T3,4,G,M3,6, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read the vocative singular dharmiṣṭha for the nominative singular dharmiṣṭhaḥ. This lends the passage, according to Cr, the sense "O supremely righteous [one], just as you are [righteous], so is this request of yours. Therefore, all this shall surely come to pass. (he dharmiṣṭha! yathā tvaṃ tathaiva etat tava prārthanam ata etad bhaviṣyaty eva.)" According to the critical apparatus, Cv reads the vocative as well. However, the transcriptions of the manuscripts of Cv available to us are ambiguous in this respect. The version generously made available to us by the director of the Oriental Institute, Baroda, gives both readings, without, however, indicating that either is a variant. The Adyar Library version appears to read with the critical edition; however, the "-ṣṭhaḥ" in question has been written in superscript, which raises the question as to whether it is a simple mistake, an emendation, or a correction on the part of the transcriber.

30. "dragger of your foes" amitrakarṣaṇa: D6,7,10,11,M6,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead amitranāśana, "O destroyer of your foes."

"no thought of yours is ever unrighteous" te . . . nādharme jāyate buddhiḥ: Literally, "of you a thought is not born in unrighteousness."

"immortality" amaratvam: It will be recalled that immortality was the boon requested by Rāvaṇa at verse 16 above. In the critical text, he himself immediately qualifies his request by asking to be invulnerable only to supernatural beings (verses 17,18). In many northern manuscripts (Ñ,V2,3,B,D2,4,7,10,11) and in Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP, however, Brahmā specifically refuses to grant complete freedom from death to Rāvaṇa (163*, see notes following verse 16 above), thus forcing Rāvaṇa to choose the lesser, conditional boon. Ck and Ct here offer what amounts to an explanation of the differential treatment of the two brothers, arguing that it is precisely because the selfless and virtuous Vibhīṣaṇa does not ask for the boon of immortality that Brahmā grants it to him. This, the commentators conclude, should lead us to understand that the selfless worship of god is, in fact, the means to accomplish all ends. (evam aprārthitam amaratvaṃ brahmaṇaḥ sakāśād dharmabalāl labdhaṃ vibhīṣaṇeneti niṣkāmatayā devopāsanaṃ sarvārthasādhanam iti bodhyam—so Ct; Ck similarly.) The question still remains as to what exactly constitutes amaratva in the mind of the poet and his audience. Cr glosses simply, "the state of being devoid of death or deathlessness (maraṇarāhityam)." Ck glosses, "the state of being eternal (nityatvam)." We are not, however, to understand that Vibhīṣaṇa is, like Kubera, made an immortal on a par with the gods (7.3.18), or even like his ancestor Sukeśa, who is granted immortality by Śiva (7.4.29). Instead, we understand, as suggested by Cs, that the particular type of immortality granted here is that of becoming a cirajīvin, or "long-lived one (cirajīvitām)," a condition that enables individuals to live on, from age to age, without exactly becoming divinities. This interpretation is in keeping with the traditional inclusion of Vibhīṣaṇa as one of the seven eminent beings—among humans, demons, and monkeys—who are regarded as cirajīvins. The traditional list includes the following seven figures drawn from the epic and purāṇic texts: Aśvatthāman, Bali, Vyāsa, Hanumān, Vibhīṣaṇa, Kṛpa, and Paraśurāma (aśvatthāmā balir vyāso hanumāṃś ca vibhīṣaṇaḥ / kṛpaḥ paraśurāmaś ca saptaite cirajīvinaḥ //). See 720* and notes, following notes to 7.36.21; and 7.98.22–23 and notes.

31. "But, Rāma, tamer of your foes, just as . . . was about to grant a boon to Kumbhakarṇa" kumbhakarṇāya tu varaṃ prayacchantam ariṃdama: Literally, "as [he] was granting a boon to Kumbhakarṇa, O tamer of your foes." D6,7,10,11,G2,M10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead ity uktvā kumbhakarṇāya varaṃ dātum avasthitam (G2 [-tuṃ] vyavasthitam; M10 and KK and VSP upasthitam), "to him [Prajāpati], who, having spoken in this fashion, was prepared to grant a boon to Kumbhakarṇa."

32. "evil-minded wretch" durmatiḥ: Literally, "evil-minded one."

33. "He has devoured . . . he has also devoured" anena bhakṣitāḥ: Literally, "were devoured by him." We have broken the verse into two sentences to distinguish Kumbhakarṇa's heavenly depredations from his earthly ones.

"seers and men" ṛṣayo mānuṣāḥ: Cr suggests that we add the word "many (bahavaḥ)."

Following verse 33, D7,10,11,T2,4,M3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of two lines [170*]: "Since the rākṣasa did this even without first having obtained a boon,[1] he would surely devour the three worlds if he[2] were to get one (alabdhavarapūrveṇa yat kṛtaṃ rākṣasena tu / yady eṣa varalabdhaḥ syād bhakṣayed bhuvanatrayam //)."

[1] "Since the rākṣasa did this even without first having obtained a boon" alabdhavarapūrveṇa yat kṛtaṃ rākṣasena: Literally, "since it was done by the rākṣasa who had previously not obtained a boon." D7,10,11,T3,4,M3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead alabdhavarapūrṇeṇa, "non-fulfilled through an obtained boon." Cr explains: "Since this, that is to say, the devouring of many, was done by the rākṣasa Kumbhakarṇa, who had not obtained a full boon, that is to stay, a state of fulfillment, therefore, if he were to obtain a boon, that is to say, to have reached a state of fulfillment, then he would devour the three worlds (alabdhavarapūrṇena na labdho varaḥ pūrṇaḥ pūrṇāvasthā ca yena tena rākṣasena kumbhakarṇena yad yasmād dhetoḥ kṛtaṃ bahūnāṃ bhakṣaṇam iti śeṣaḥ. tasmād dhetor yady eṣa pūrṇāvastho varalabdhaḥ syāt tarhi bhuvanatrayaṃ bhakṣayet)."

[2] "if he" yady eṣaḥ: KK and VSP read instead tad eṣaḥ, "then, he."

34. "And so the welfare of the worlds will be assured, and he himself will be brought down." lokānāṃ svasti caiva syād bhaved asya ca saṃnatiḥ: Literally, "And there would surely be welfare of the worlds and of him there would be a lowering." Cg, the only commentator to remark on the critical reading, glosses, "discipline or punishment (śikṣā)," for saṃnatiḥ, "lowering." Ñ,V,B,D1–4,9–11,T3,4,M3,8 and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read evaṃ, "in this way," for eva, "surely." Ñ2,V3,B1–3,D10,11,T3,M5, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read saṃmatiḥ, "wish or honor," for saṃnatiḥ, "lowering." Ck, Ct, and Cr understand the term in its sense of saṃmānam, "honor." The idea being, no doubt, that Kumbhakarṇa, though tricked, will still be spared the dishonor of being denied a boon. This interpretation has been followed by Dutt (1894, p. 1587), Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1940), and perhaps by Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 400), who renders, "while giving him satisfaction." Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 453), followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 403), understands the phrase to mean that Kumbhakarṇa will receive his

"just deserts." He renders, "et lui aura sa juste récompense." Benoît (1999, p. 1248) paraphrases the expression, rendering, "sans toute fois provoquer la colère du rākṣasa à ton égard." Gorresio (1870, p. 36) takes the term saṃmatiḥ in its sense of "wish or desire," rendering, "ed abbia colui ciò che gli sta in mente."

35. "called to mind the goddess Sarasvatī . . . she, called to mind" acintayat . . . cintitā . . . devī sarasvatī: Literally, "he thought of [her] . . . thought of, the goddess Sarasvatī." We agree with the commentators and translators in understanding that Sarasvatī must be supplied as the object of the verb acintayat, "he thought." Sarasvatī, the goddess of speech, learning, and the arts, is frequently represented as the wife of Brahmā. Dutt (1894, pp. 1587–88) appears to misunderstand what is happening. He takes the verb √cint in its senses of "to think" and "to worry." He understands that the goddess Sarasvatī is already present among the other gods, and thus he translates, "Brahmā . . . pondered. The goddess, Saraswati, who was by his side was also agitated with anxiety." The goddess is known elsewhere in the Rāmāyaṇa (6.105.21).

37. "O goddess of speech! You must become the speech that the gods desire to hear from the rākṣasa lord." vāṇi tvaṃ rākṣasendrasya bhava yā devatepsitā: Literally, "O speech! You become [that speech] which the gods desire of the rākṣasa lord." The syntax of the critical reading is elliptical and unique among printed editions and translations that we have consulted, even though it is apparently textually fairly well supported (Ñ2,3,V1,3,D5,6,G,M [except 3,5]). We have fleshed out the meaning in keeping with our understanding of what Brahmā is asking Sarasvatī to do. Most editions and commentators include a specific nominative form of the word "speech" by reading the nominative vāṇī, "speech," in place of the vocative vāṇi, "O speech," in pāda c, as in the case of Lahore (7.10.36) and Ś,B4,D1–4,8,9; by substituting the nominative singular vāk, "speech," for the feminine relative pronoun yā, "which/that," in pāda b as in the case of Ñ1,B2,D7,10, 11,T1,2,M3,5, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press; or both, as does Gorresio (7.10.43cd). The sense of these variants is, thus, much the same as the fleshed-out reading of the critical edition that we propose. Only KK and VSP (= 7.10.43cd) read both the vocative vāṇi and the pronoun yā with the critical edition. In addition, KK and VSP read the variant rākṣasendrāsye, "in the rākṣasa lord's mouth," for rākṣasendrasya, "of the rākṣasa lord." This variant is translated only by Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 400), who renders, "Occupy the tongue of the great Rākshasa." This reading partially remedies the ellipsis by yielding the sense "O speech! Become that which the gods desire in the mouth of the rākṣasa lord." Ct, who does not, of course, follow this reading, alludes to its intent at any rate, glossing, "You must become that speech which the gods desire in his mouth (asyāsye devatepsitā devānām iṣṭā vāg bhava)."

38. "she entered the rākṣasa's mouth" praviṣṭā sā: Literally, "she entered." As Cr suggests, one must supply the words indicating that she entered Kumbhakarṇa's mouth (praviṣṭā kumbhakarṇasya mukha iti śeṣaḥ).

39. "What I desire is to sleep for many years." svaptuṃ varṣāṇy anekāni . . . mamepsitam: Ct recapitulates his earlier elaborate discussion of the exact length of time of Kumbhakarṇa's periods of sleep, arguing that the period mentioned here is not in contradiction with the period of six months mentioned at 6.48.12. He argues that this is so because the earlier curse of Brahmā only specifies the minimum period during which Kumbhakarṇa must sleep and that his actual sleep might be much longer. (evam ity atra ṣaṇmāsād arvāg jāgaraṇaṃ neti niyamaḥ. tadadhikā nidrā tu bhavaty eveti varasvarūpaṃ bodhyam. ata eva ṣaṇmāsān svapitīti pūrvaṃ vibhīṣaṇoktyā varṣāṇy anekānīti kumbhakarṇoktyā ca na pūrvoktasya virodhaḥ.) Cr quotes Ct at length, but claims that the latter's opinion is dubious on the grounds that we are dealing with a completely different boon here and that you cannot really extract the same meaning from the current śloka (bhaṭṭoktiś cintyā tasya varāntaratvād atratyavarabodhakaślokenedṛśārthālābhāc ceti dik). For a detailed discussion of the curse/boon of Kumbhakarṇa, see note to 6.48.12 and R. Goldman 2006.

40. "Grandfather Brahmā . . . together with the gods" saha devaiḥ pitāmahaḥ: Literally, "The Grandfather together with the gods." D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead brahmā suraiḥ samam, "Brahmā together with the gods."

"left him and proceeded to heaven" muktvā taṃ prayayau divam: Literally, "having left him, he went to heaven." D6,7,10,11,T1,2,G,M1,2,4,5,6,7,9,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead rākṣasaṃ taṃ jahau punaḥ, "once again, he left that rākṣasa."

Following verse 40, Ñ,V2,3,B,D1,3,4,6,7,10,11,T1,2,G1,3,M1–3,5(line 2 only),6,8–10, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of two lines [176*]: "Now once the gods together with Brahmā had gone[1] to the heavens, Kumbhakarṇa,[2] released by Sarasvatī, came to his senses[3] (brahmaṇā saha deveṣu gateṣv atha nabhastalam / vimukto 'sau sarasvatyā svāṃ saṃjñām agamat tataḥ //)."

[1] "Now once . . . had gone" gateṣv atha: D6,7,10,11,M10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead gateṣu ca, "And once."

[2] "Kumbhakarṇa" saḥ: Literally, "he."

[3] "came to his senses" svāṃ saṃjñām agamat tataḥ: Literally, "then he went to his own consciousness." Cr glosses, "natural state (prakṛtim)," for "his own consciousness (svāṃ saṃjñām)." The idea here is that with the departure of Sarasvatī, Kumbhakarṇa is once more able to think and speak for himself.

41. "in his misery" duḥkhitaḥ: Literally, "miserable or unhappy."

"What kind . . . why" kīdṛśaṃ kiṃ nu: Literally, "of what kind, what indeed." To avoid the redundancy, we follow Cr, who glosses kim, "what," as kim artham, "why." Ñ,V2,3,B,D1,3–7,10,11,T,G2,M2,5,6,9, and Gorresio and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead īdṛśaṃ kim, lending the sequence the sense "What kind of speech is this?"

Following verse 41, D6,7,10,11,T1,2,G,M1–5,7–9, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of one line [179*]: "I think that I have been deluded by the gods acting in concert[1] (ahaṃ vyāmohito manye devair iti samāhitaiḥ /)."

[1] "I think that I have been deluded by the gods acting in concert." ahaṃ vyāmohito manye devair iti samāhitaiḥ: Literally, "I think that I am deluded by the gods, who had assembled together." D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead ahaṃ vyāmohito devair iti manye tadāgataiḥ, lending the line the sense "I think that I have been deluded by the gods, who had come at that time."

42. "a forest of śleṣmātaka trees" śleṣmātakavanam: According to Ck, Cg, and Ct, this would be the three brothers' father's (i.e., Viśravas's) penance grove, which, according to them, had a large number of this type of tree (śleṣmātakavanaṃ tatpracuraṃ pitus tapovanam). For the ritual use of śleṣmātaka wood, see 1.13.18 and note. Brockington (1984, p. 107) identifies the śleṣmātaka as the uddāla (Cordia myxa [L.]).

Sarga 11

1. "those night-roaming rākṣasas" tān vai niśācarān: Literally, "those very night-roaming [ones]." Ñ1,V1,D5–7,10,11,T,G,M1,3,5,8, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead caitān niśācarān, "and those night-roaming [ones]."

"came up from Rasātala" udatiṣṭhat . . . rasātalāt: Literally, "he arose from Rasātala." For the persistent variation in the identification of the rākṣasas' underworld refuge between Pātāla and Rasātala, see note to 7.8.21.

2. "filled with bitter indignation" susaṃrabdhāḥ: Literally, "greatly infuriated or enraged." The idea is that the ministers are filled with resentment at having been driven out of Laṅkā and confined to the underworld through fear of Viṣṇu. See 7.3.25; 7.8.21; and notes.

3. "And surrounded by all those bulls among rākṣasas, Sumālin" sumālī caiva taiḥ sarvair vṛto rākṣasapuṃgavaiḥ: D6,7,10,11,M10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead sumālī sacivaiḥ sārdhaṃ vṛto rākṣasapuṃgavaiḥ. This variant reading lends the line the sense "Together with his ministers, Sumālin, surrounded by the bulls among the rākṣasas." As Cr observes, this variant makes a distinction between Sumālin's ministers and his general supporters (rākṣasapuṃgavair vṛtaḥ sumālī sacivaiḥ sārdham).

4. "my son" putra: Literally, "O son." D5–7,10,11,M3,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead vatsa, "dear child."

"long-cherished" cintitaḥ: Literally, "thought or brooded about."

"such a boon" varam īdṛśam: D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead varam uttamam, "most excellent or supreme boon."

"from the ruler of the triple world" tribhuvanaśreṣṭhāt: Literally, "from the most excellent or best [one] in the triple world."

5. "banished" gatam: Literally, "gone."

"O great-armed hero" mahābāho: Literally, "O great-armed [one]."

6. "For, broken by him again and again" asakṛt tena bhagnā hi: D6,7,10,11,M10, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead asakṛt tadbhayād bhagnāḥ, "broken again and again from fear of him." KK and VSP read instead asakṛt tadbhayād bhītāḥ, "frightened again and again from fear of him."

"fleeing" vidrutāḥ: Literally, "fled."

7. "once inhabited by the rākṣasas" rākṣasoṣitā: Literally, "inhabited by the rākṣasas." KK and VSP read instead rākṣasocitā, "fit for or suitable for the rākṣasas." This reading is rendered only by Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 401), who translates, "and would be a worthy residence for us Rākshasas."

8. One might also, perhaps, read the two optative verbs, syāt and bhavet, found in this verse, as markers of two conditional clauses, which would then be resolved only by the future forms of √bhū in verse 9 (bhaviṣyasi, "you will be"). This would make the two verses one complex sentence with the sense "If it were possible to win back Laṅkā, and if one were to do it, then you [Daśagrīva] would become the lord of Laṅkā and ruler of the rākṣasas." This interpretation is more or less followed by Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 401).

"by conciliation, bribery, or force" sāmnā dānena . . . tarasā vā: These are three of the four strategic means (upāyas) specified in the dharma- and nītiśāstra by which kings achieve their objectives: viz., conciliation (sāman), gifts or bribery (dāna), the sowing of discord (bheda), and violence or coercion (daṇḍa). The use of the word taras, "force," is somewhat unusual, as the more common terms are daṇḍa, "coercive force," or yuddha, "war." One of this classical list, bheda, or sowing dissension, is omitted here for some reason. Benoît, in his note to the passage (1999, p. 1717), argues that this is because the adversary in question, Vaiśravaṇa, is Rāvaṇa's half brother. This set of four upāyas is a commonplace of the literature. See, for example, ArthŚā 9.6.56–61 and 9.7.68–80; and ManuSm 7.198. See 5.2.27; 5.34.16; and notes. See, too, 6.9.8; and notes. Cf. notes to 6.31.48–49.

"it ought to be done" kṛtaṃ bhavet: Literally, "it should or would be done." Ck, Cg, and Ct understand, "If that were possible then our purpose would be accomplished (sāmādinā laṅkāṃ pratyānetuṃ yadi nāma śakyaṃ syāt tadā naḥ kāryaṃ kṛtaṃ bhavet—so Ck and Ct; Cg similarly). Cr understands similarly, glossing, "then our purpose would be accomplished (tadā kṛtam asmatprayojanaṃ sādhitaṃ syāt)."

9. See note to verse 8 above.

"immensely powerful warrior" mahābala: Literally, "O immensely powerful [one]."

Following 9ab, V1,D7,10,11,T,3,4,M3 (inserts after verse 9), and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of one line [183*]: "And through you, the rākṣasa race, although it has been in decline,[1] shall be raised up once more[2] (tvayā rākṣasavaṃśo 'yaṃ nimagno 'pi samuddhṛtaḥ)."

[1] "although it has been in decline" nimagno 'pi: Literally, "even though sunk."

[2] "shall be raised up once more" samuddhṛtaḥ: Literally, "raised up or saved." The spatial metaphor of descent and ascent here echoes the actual anticipated physical ascension of the rākṣasas from the underworld, Rasātala, to the lofty peaks of Mount Trikūṭa.

10. "You must not speak in this fashion." nārhasy evaṃ prabhāṣitum: D6,7,10,11, T1,2,G,M1,2,4,7–10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead nārhase vaktum īdṛśam, "You should not utter such [words]." Compare this variant with that found at notes to verse 12 below.

"revered elder" guruḥ: Literally, "guru." Kubera is, it will be recalled, Rāvaṇa's elder half brother.

Following verse 10, D6,7,10,11,T1,2,G1,3,M1,3,6,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of one line [187*]: "Sumālin,[1] rebuked by the even more powerful[2] lord of the rākṣasas (sumālī rākṣasendreṇa pratyākhyāto balīyasā /)."

[1] "Sumālin" sumālī: D7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead sāmnā hi, "through conciliation or gently," while KK and VSP read sāmnāpi, "even through conciliation."

[2] "the even more powerful" balīyasā: D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead garīyasā, "even more important or even more authoritative."

Following 187*, these same manuscripts and editions continue with a passage of one line [188*]: ". . . knowing what he had in mind,[1] the rākṣasa [Sumālin] said nothing (kiṃcin nāha tadā rakṣo jñātvā tasya manogatam)."

[1] "what he had in mind" tasya manogatam: Literally, "that which had gone to his mind." D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tasya cikīrṣitam, "what he intended to do."

Following 188*, T1,M1,3,10, and KK and VSP insert, while Ś,Ñ,V,B,D1–5,7–12,T2–4, G1,3,M6, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, and Gita Press substitute for 11ab, a passage of one line [189*]: "Now after some time,[1] to Rāvaṇa, who was living there . . . (kenacit tv atha kālena vasantaṃ tatra rāvaṇam /)."

[1] "after some time" kenacit . . . kālena: Ñ2,V2,B2–4,D1,3,4,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the synonymous kasyacit . . . kālasya.

11. Ś,Ñ,V,B,D1–5,7–12,T2–4,G1,3,M6, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, and Gita Press substitute for 11ab a passage of one line [189*] (translated following note to verse 10 above).

"the night-roaming rākṣasa" niśācaraḥ: Literally, "the night-roaming [one]."

"purposeful" sakāraṇam: D6,7,10,11,T1,2, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead sa rāvaṇam, "he . . . to Rāvaṇa."

12. "you should not speak in this fashion" nārhas tvaṃ vaktum īdṛśam: Literally, "you are not worthy to speak such." D1,3,4,6,7,10,11,M4,7,10, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead the finite verbal form nārhase, "you should not," for nārhas tvam. This variant makes the pāda identical with the variant reading found at note 10 above.

"these words of mine" cedaṃ vaco mama: The phrase is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition.

13. "It is said . . . together" sahite kila: D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read either hi te, "for, those two" (GPP, NSP, Gita Press), or hite "[those two] affectionate or beneficent" (KK, VSP), in place of kila, the marker of a received narrative, commonly translated as "it is said." Cg, the only commentator to remark on the reading, takes the term hite together with sahite to mean mutually affectionate (anyonyānurakte). Only Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 402) translates the two terms separately, rendering, "They were greatly attached to each other and lived in perfect amity," while Benoît (1999, p. 1250), who reads the text as it appears in GPP, Gita Press, and NSP, renders only the adjective sahite as "si liées."

"Aditi and Diti" aditiś ca ditiś ca: The two sisters, well known throughout the literature, are the mothers of the gods and demons, respectively. See 1.44.14 and notes.

14. "the daityas" daityān: VSP (7.11.16) and KK (7.11.16) read instead putrān, "sons."

"They were all sons of Kaśyapa." kaśyapasyātmasaṃbhavān: Literally, "those who were born from the body of Kaśyapa." The syntax of the verse would make it appear that the epithet refers only to the daityas. However, the mythological background, as well as the particular thrust of Prahasta's argument, makes it clear that both the gods and demons are sons of Kaśyapa by his two wives. Of the translators consulted who share the critical reading, only Dutt (1894, p. 1590) fails to make it clear that both the gods and the demons are the sons of Kaśyapa. The northern manuscripts and editions—Ś,Ñ,V, B,D2,5,8,9,12,T,3,4, and Lahore (7.11.15ab) and Gorresio (7.11.16ab)—substitute for pādas ab a passage of one line [191*]: "The gods, lords of the triple world, were born to Aditi (adityāṃ jajñire devās tasyāṃ tribhuvaneśvarāḥ)." This reading places the gods and demons in different syntactical structures and thus prevents at least the grammatical ambiguity.

15. "long ago this earth" pureyam . . . mahī: B1,D6, and KK and VSP read instead the awkward purīyam for pureyam. This reading would seem to add the city (presumably, Laṅkā) to the list of the daityas' properties. No commentator or translator appears to acknowledge this variant.

"together with its forests, oceans" savanārṇavā: Ś2,3,D7,8,12,T2, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read the inferior and awkward vasanārṇavā, an apparent case of metathesis of the syllables sa and va. The most intelligible rendering of this variant would be to take it as a bahuvrīhi compound with the sense of "with its dwellings and oceans," although this is far from satisfactory. Those translators who render this variant—Dutt (1894, p. 1590); Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 402); and Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 455), followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 405)—read it as if it were an appositional karmadhāraya with a paranipāta, i.e., arṇavavasanā, "having the oceans for its garment or covering." The commentators are silent.

"Thus, they became the more powerful." te 'bhavan prabhaviṣṇavaḥ: Literally, "they became powerful." The idea here is that, as rulers of the earth, the daityas became more powerful than their half brothers. On the word prabhaviṣṇavaḥ, see note to 7.5.13.

16. "the powerful Lord Viṣṇu" prabhaviṣṇunā viṣṇunā: Literally, "by the powerful Viṣṇu." See note to 7.5.13.

17. "You, sir, would not be the only one to engage" na . . . eko bhavān eva kariṣyati: Literally, "you, sir, indeed will not do [this] alone." The word eva is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition.

"in such enmity" etat . . . viparyayam: Literally, "this enmity." Ck, Cg, and Ct note that the enmity here is fraternal treachery (bhrātṛdroharūpam). Cr takes the term more generally to refer to the appropriation of cities, etc., belonging to others (parasvāmikapurādisvādhīnīkaraṇam).

"for it was engaged in long ago by the gods themselves" surair ācaritaṃ pūrvam: Literally, "this was practiced formerly by the gods." Ś,V1,3,B3,D2,5–12,T3,4,G1, and Lahore, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead surāsurair ācaritam, "practiced by the gods and the asuras."

"Therefore, you should do as I say." kuruṣvaitad vaco mama: Literally, "you must carry out or obey my words."

18. "by the evil-minded Prahasta" prahastena durātmanā: D6,7,10,11,M6,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead prahṛṣṭenāntarātmanā, "with a delighted heart or mind."

"Very well" bāḍham: The term bāḍham as an expression of agreement is rarely used in the Rāmāyaṇa. Other examples are found at 1.66.1; 2.91.8; 6.65.4; and 7.63.14.

19. "filled with delight" tenaiva harṣeṇa: Literally, "with that very same delight." Cr explains that Daśagrīva's delight springs from his resolution to seize the city of Laṅkā (tena laṅkāpuraṃ prāpsyāmīti niścayajanitena harṣeṇopalakṣito daśagrīvaḥ). The reading seems to fit contextually better with the variant reading noted in the preceding verse, which may have, in fact, inspired it.

"with the night-roaming rākṣasas" kṣaṇadācaraiḥ: Literally, "with the night-roaming [ones.]." See verse 40 and notes, below. See, too, 7.6.14; 7.26.26; and notes. See also 3.28.4; 3.28.9; 3.31.23; and 3.47.7.

"to the forest" vanam: Cg and Ck note that this is the śleṣmātaka forest mentioned earlier. Ck identifies this as Daśagrīva's father's [Viśravas's] ashram (pitrāśramam). See 7.10.42 and notes. According to the Baroda manuscript of Cv, the reference is to the wooded parklands around Laṅkā (laṅkopavanam) (p. 162). Ct, who reads 19cd with 20ab as a single verse (= GPP 7.11.21) understands with Cv that the forest mentioned must be in the vicinity of Laṅkā (vanaṃ laṅkāsamīpavanam). This interpretation seems more appropriate because we see from the following verse that Daśagrīva and his rākṣasas have gone to Mount Trikūṭa (see verse 20 and note below).

20. "When . . . had reached Mount Trikūṭa" trikūṭasthaḥ sa tu tadā: Literally, "and he, then, situated on Trikūṭa." Because the city of Laṅkā is located on Trikūṭa, this mountain is mentioned numerous times in the Sundara- and Yuddhakāṇḍas (for references, see the respective indices).

"the night-roaming rākṣasa" niśācaraḥ: Literally, "the night-roaming [one]."

"he dispatched Prahasta . . . saying" preṣayāmāsa: Literally, "he sent." The direct speech of Daśagrīva in the following verse is not introduced with any verbal element indicating speech.

"skilled in speech" vākyakovidam: D10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read the nominative singular vākyakovidaḥ in place of the accusative singular, thus making the epithet apply to Daśagrīva himself.

21. "You must go" gatvā tvam: Literally, "having gone, you." B1,4,D6,7,10,11,M10, and Gorresio, GPP, VSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the second person imperative gaccha, "you must go," for the gerund gatvā, "having gone." The word tvam, "you," is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition.

"using my own words" vacanān mama: Literally, "from my speech." D6,7,10,11, and GPP, VSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead vacasā mama, "with my speech."

"that bull among the rākṣasas, sons of chaos" nairṛtapuṃgavam: Literally, "the bull among nairṛtas." The epithet seems a rather peculiar one to ascribe to Kubera, who is nowhere in the literature said to be a rākṣasa. On the other hand, he is said to rule in Laṅkā, which is repopulated by rākṣasas at 7.3.28. Only Cg attempts to grapple with the seeming inconsistency. He explains that the compound "bull among the nairṛtas" refers to Kubera and that Kubera is entitled to this epithet because he is the lord in Laṅkā of those rākṣasas who had previously [prior to Daśagrīva's return] stayed there. (nairṛtapuṃgavaṃ kuberam. laṅkāyāṃ pūrvasthitanairṛtādhipatyāt.) A large number of manuscripts (Ś,Ñ2,V,2,3,B,D5,7,8,12,T2,3,G1,3,M1,2,6–9) and Lahore and Gorresio avoid this awkward issue by reading the vocative nairṛtapuṃgava, "O bull among nairṛtas," or rākṣasapuṃgava, "O bull among rākṣasas," which are perfectly appropriate epithets for Daśagrīva. See 7.14.6 and notes.

22. "It is not right, gentle and blameless brother, that you have occupied it." tvayā niveśitā saumya naitad yuktaṃ tavānagha: Literally, "It has been occupied by you, gentle [one]. This is not proper for you, blameless [one]." The causative of ni + √viś has a number of meanings, including "to build, to found, and to populate." See notes to 201*, note 2, following notes to verse 25 and verse 34 below.

23. "If you . . . were to surrender it peacefully" bhavān yadi sāmnaitāṃ dadyāt: Literally, "If you were to give this [city] through conciliation." The sequence sāmnai is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. D7,10,11,G2,M5, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead no hy adya, which lends the passage the sense "for if you were to give [it] to us today."

"you would be doing me a favor while adhering to righteousness" kṛtā bhaven mama prītir dharmaś caivānupālitaḥ: Literally, "a favor of mine would be done and righteousness would be observed or protected."

24. D5–7,10,11,S (except M6) substitute for 24ab ("Addressed in this fashion, Prahasta, who was skilled in speech"), a passage of one line [196*]: "Proceeding in this fashion to the city of Laṅkā, Prahasta . . . to the giver of wealth[1] (sa tu gatvā purīṃ laṅkāṃ prahasto dhanadaṃ tathā /)."

[1] "in this fashion . . . Prahasta . . . to the giver of wealth" prahasto dhanadaṃ tathā: D5–7,10,11,M10, and GPP, VSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead dhanadena surakṣitām, "which was well guarded by the lord of wealth."

D5–7,10,11,S then substitute for 24cd ("went and reported the entire speech of Daśagrīva to the lord of wealth") a passage of one line [197*]: "He [Prahasta] addressed these words to the supremely magnanimous guardian of wealth (abravīt paramodāraṃ vittapālam idaṃ vacaḥ /)."

Following 197*, D5–7,10,11,S continue with a passage of eight lines [198*]: "O great-armed lord of bestowers of wealth! O you of excellent vows! I have been sent into your presence as a messenger by your brother Daśagrīva.[1–2] Now, immensely wise lord of wealth, learned in all the śāstras, hear[1] the words that the ten-faced lord spoke:[3–4] 'It is said that this city of Laṅkā,[2] wide-eyed lord,[3] was enjoyed long ago by the rākṣasas of fearsome valor, led by Sumālin.'[5–6] Therefore, dear son of Viśravas, you should now hand it over to him who is requesting[4] it in so conciliatory a fashion.[7–8]"[5]

[1] "O . . . lord of bestowers of wealth . . . as a messenger . . . immensely wise . . . hear" dautyena dhanadeśvara / tac chrūyatāṃ mahāprājña: Literally, "in the role of a messenger, O lord of givers of wealth, hear that, O immensely wise [one]." The compound dhanadeśvara, "O lord of bestowers of wealth," is found elsewhere, but rarely, in the literature. See, for example, KSS 1.2.19 and LiṅgaP 2.46.15. D5–7,10,11,M10, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press all read sarvaśastrabhṛtāṃ vara, "O foremost of all those who bear weapons," for the second half of line 2 (dautyena dhanadeśvara), while D5–7,10,11 omit the first half of line 3 (tac chrūyatāṃ mahāprājña); GPP reads in brackets, unnumbered, between GPP 7.11.26 and 27; Gita Press reads the line as 7.11.12a; and NSP omits.

[2] "this city of Laṅkā" iyam . . . purī laṅkā: D6,7,10,11,M8,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read ramyā, "fair or lovely," for laṅkā, "Laṅkā."

[3] "wide-eyed lord" viśālākṣa: Literally, "O wide-eyed [one]."

[4] "to him who is requesting" yo 'yam . . . yācatas tasya: D10,11,M10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead so 'yam. In this reading, lines 7 and 8 become separate sentences rather than relative and independent clauses, respectively.

[5] Translators differ somewhat in their judgment as to which if any of the above lines are the direct speech of Daśagrīva and which are Prahasta's paraphrase. The text itself does not make this very clear. In our opinion, given the critical reading, the only lines that can arguably be said to be a direct quotation of Daśagrīva's words would be lines 5–6.

25. "who was skilled in speech" vākyaviśāradaḥ: D7,10,11,G1,M5,10, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead vākyavidāṃ varaḥ, "foremost of knowers of speech."

"from Prahasta . . . to him" prahastāt . . . prahastaṃ tam: Literally, "from Prahasta . . . to him, Prahasta."

Following verse 25, D5–7,10,11,M3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of two lines [201*]: "Laṅkā was given to me by my father when it was deserted by the night-roaming rākṣasas.[1] O rākṣasa, I have populated it[2] through such means as gifts, honors, and the like[3] (dattā mameyaṃ pitrā tu laṅkā śūnyā niśācaraiḥ / niveśitā ca me rakṣo dānamānādibhir guṇaiḥ //)."

[1] "by the night-roaming rākṣasas" niśācaraiḥ: Literally, "by the night-roaming [ones]."

[2] "O rākṣasa, I have populated it" niveśitā ca me rakṣaḥ: Literally, "And [Laṅkā] was caused to be occupied by me, O rākṣasa." M3 and KK and VSP read instead nivāsitā ca me yakṣaiḥ, "and by me it was populated with yakṣas." See notes to verse 22 above.

[3] "through such means as gifts, honors, and the like" dānamānādibhir guṇaiḥ: Literally, "with expedients beginning with gifts, [and] honors." The use of the term guṇa here is somewhat unusual. We have taken it in the sense similar to the one it has in nītiśāstra, where it refers to the six expedients a king may use in his relations with other states. Typically the ṣaḍguṇas are sandhi, vigraha, yāna, sthāna (or āsana), saṃśraya, dvaidha (or dvaidhībhāva). For the definitions of these guṇas, see Prakṣipta III, sarga 1.23 (= App. I, No. 8, line 348) and notes.

26. "Please enjoy them without impediment of any kind." bhuṅkṣvaitad dhatakaṇṭakam: Literally, "Enjoy this whose obstacles [lit., 'thorns'] have been destroyed." Kubera's intention is that he will remove himself as a rival to Daśagrīva's sovereignty. D5–7,10,11,M10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead bhuṅkṣva rājyam akaṇṭakam, "enjoy the kingdom, which has no impediment [lit., 'thorns']."

Following verse 26, Ñ,V2,3,B,D3–7,10,11,T1,M3,6,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of one line [202*]: "My kingdom and my wealth shall be shared[1] together with you (avibhaktaṃ tvayā sārdhaṃ rājyaṃ yac cāpi me vasu /)."

[1] "shall be shared" avibhaktam: Literally, "undivided, whole." We follow the interpretation of Ct, who suggests adding the imperative verb astu, "let it be," and takes the sense to be that it will all become joint property. He understands, "Let my kingdom and my wealth be undivided with you and in the same way yours, with me. (mama rājyaṃ vasu ca tvayāvibhaktam astv iti śeṣaḥ. evaṃ tvadīyam api mayeti—so NSP.)" GPP separates tvayāvibhaktam, "undivided with you," into tvayā vibhaktam, "divided with you." But this is not supported by the text or other versions of Ct. GPP, alone among the printed editions, reads atibhaktam, which is evidently a typo. However, the editor has provided two alternative readings, one of which, abhibhaktam, he ascribes to Cr, despite the fact that Cr's commentary reads with the critical edition. The critical apparatus shows no variants whatsoever for its reading. See, too, 7.23.11; 7.34.39; and notes.

27. "Rest assured" bhadraṃ te: Literally, "may you be well, blessings upon you." The expression is a widely used politeness formula in the epic, often serving to soften the force of an injunctive. As such, it could possibly be read with the imperative pratīkṣasva, "wait" in pāda c. See Tubb 2006.

The textual support for this verse is very questionable. It is omitted by D3–7,10,11,S. Since the verse is missing in the entire southern recension, it is not clear on what grounds it has been included in the critical text. See Bhatt 1960, p. xxxiv.

28. "he approached his father . . . his elder" jagāma pitur antikam / . . . gurum: Literally, "he went to the proximity of his father . . . the guru."

"what Rāvaṇa wanted" rāvaṇasya yad īpsitam: Literally, "what was desired of Rāvaṇa." This is the first time in Agastya's biography of Daśagrīva that the name Rāvaṇa has been used. See verse 39 below and notes to 7.9.25.

29. "an emissary with the message" dūtam: Literally, "a messenger."

"give back" dīyatām: Literally, "let it be given."

"sage of excellent vows" suvrata: Literally, "O [one] of excellent vows."

30. "spoke these words to the giver of wealth" uvāca dhanadaṃ vākyam: V1,3,D5–7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead prāñjaliṃ dhanadaṃ prāha, "addressed the giver of wealth, whose hands were cupped in reverence."

31. "said this in my presence as well" uktavān mama saṃnidhau: Literally, "he spoke in my vicinity."

"and I warned him repeatedly" mayā . . . bahudhoktaḥ: Literally, "by me he was addressed many times." D3,10,11,T2–4,G,M1,2,5–9, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read the synonymous bahuśoktaḥ, "addressed many times," for bahudhoktaḥ. Ck, Cg, and Ct all note the irregular double sandhi (bahuśokta iti sandhiś chāndasaḥ—so Ck, Cg; Ct similarly).

32. "You will surely bring ruin upon yourself!" dhvaṃsasva: Literally, "Be destroyed or Perish!" D10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead the second person present indicative dhvaṃsase ca, "and you are being destroyed." KK and VSP read instead the third person present indicative dhvaṃsate ca, "he [i.e., you] is being destroyed." This variant is not noted in the critical apparatus. We understand both the imperative form and indicative variant of the intransitive verb √dhvaṃs here to be a malediction in which Viśravas is foretelling Daśagrīva's doom. This interpretation is followed by Gorresio (1870, p. 40), reading his variant (= 7.11.36) dhvaṃsa dhvaṃseti, "Be destroyed! Be destroyed!" Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 456); Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 406); Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1944); and Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 403), all of whom read the present indicative, interpret similarly. The commentators, however, understand the verbal root √dhvaṃs in a transitive or even causative sense. They understand Viśravas to be telling Daśagrīva that, in requesting the return of Laṅkā, he is breaching all bounds of propriety. Thus Cr suggests that we supply as a direct object "the limit of propriety or boundary (maryādām iti śeṣaḥ)." Ck, Cg, and Ct similarly gloss, "you have become one who has transgressed the bounds of righteousness and statecraft (dhvastadharmanyāyamaryādo jāyase [Cg—jāyate])." Among the translators consulted, only Dutt (1894, p. 1591) follows this interpretation, rendering, "Thou disregardest (thy religion and honor)."

"will work to your advantage" śreyobhiyuktam: Literally, "conjoined with welfare or felicity."

33. "Deluded by the granting of his boon . . . because of my curse" varapradānasaṃmūḍhaḥ . . . mama śāpāt: The boon is, of course, that of near invulnerability granted by Brahmā at 7.10.16–20; while the curse, as the commentators remind us, is the one pronounced by Viśravas, Daśagrīva's father, when Kaikasī, Daśagrīva's mother, approached him at an inopportune time (mama śāpāt tanmātṛdarśanakālakṛtāt—so Ck, Cg, and Ct). See 7.9.17–18 and notes. Ñ,V2,B,D1,3,7,T3,4,G1,M1,2,9, and Gorresio, KK, and VSP read the synonymous varapradānāt saṃmūḍhaḥ for varapradānasaṃmūḍhaḥ, "deluded by the granting of the boon."

"this very evil-minded rākṣasa" sudurmatiḥ: Literally, "the very evil-minded [one]." D3,T3,4,G1,M3,4, and KK and VSP read instead sa durmatiḥ, "that evil-minded [one]."

34. "great-armed hero" mahābāho: Literally, "O great-armed [one]!"

"Mount Kailāsa" kailāsaṃ dharaṇīdharam: Literally, "Kailāsa, the upholder of the earth." The compound dharaṇīdhara is a kenning for mountain.

"and found a city where you may dwell" niveśaya nivāsārtham: Literally, "populate for the sake of dwelling." We follow Ck, Cg, and Ct, who suggest that we supply the word "city (puram iti śeṣaḥ—so Ct; Ck and Cg similarly)." Cr understands that we should supply the phrase "your own followers" as the object of niveśaya, lending the whole phrase the sense "you should establish your own followers [there] to live (nivāsārthaṃ niveśaya svānugān saṃsthāpaya)." See notes to verse 22 above.

35. "There . . . flows" tatra: Literally, "There [is]."

"the best of rivers" nadīnāṃ pravarā: D5–7,10,11,M10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the synonymous nadīnām uttamā.

Following verse 35, D5–7,10,11,G2,M1–5,7,9,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of one line [207*]: "as well as with water lilies, blue lotuses, and other highly fragrant [flowers] (kumudair utpalaiś caiva anyaiś caiva sugandhibhiḥ /)." Note the hiatus.

Following 207*, D5–7,10,11,G2,M1–5,7,9,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP continue, while Ñ,V2,3,B,D1,3,4,T,G1,3,M6,8, and Gorresio insert after verse 35, a passage of two lines [208*]: "The gods, gandharvas, apsarases, great serpents, and kinnaras, who are given over to pleasure, constantly resort to it[1] and always enjoy themselves there (tatra devāḥ sagandharvāḥ sāpsaroragakiṃnarāḥ / vihāraśīlāḥ satataṃ ramante sarvadāśritāḥ //)."

[1] "constantly resort to it" sarvadāśritāḥ: Literally, "[they] constantly resort or take recourse to."

36. "you cannot possibly engage in hostilities with this rākṣasa" na . . . kṣamaṃ tvayā tena vairaṃ . . . rakṣasā: Literally, "hostility with him is not bearable by you." Ñ,V3,B1,2, D1,3,4,6,7,10,11,M6,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read tavānena, "of you with him," for tvayā tena "by you with him."

37. "and so" tu: G2 and KK (7.11.43) and VSP (7.11.46) read instead [ā]śu, "immediately." This variant is rendered only in the translation of Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 404).

"with his wives, townsfolk" sadārapauraḥ: Literally, "together with [his] wives and townsfolk." D5–7,10,11,M10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead sadāraputraḥ, "together with [his] wives and sons."

See note to verse 38 below for the sequence of verses in other editions.

38. "Meanwhile, Prahasta" prahastas tu: Literally, "And Prahasta." Ñ,V2,B,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead prahasto 'tha, "Now, Prahasta."

"and reported everything, saying" sarvaṃ nyavedayat: Literally, "he reported everything." The verse lacks a verb of speaking, which we have supplied. Ñ,V3,B,D1,3,4,6,7,10,11,M6, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead just such an expression, vacanam abravīt, "he spoke speech."

"thirty leagues in breadth" triṃśadyojanam āyatā: This measurement is consistent with the statement of Viśvakarman at 7.5.21–22. Cf. 6.30.18–20, where Trikūṭa is said to be one hundred yojanas in breadth and 606*, following notes to 6.30.18–20, where a number of printed editions understand Laṅkā to be thirty yojanas wide. Ñ,V3,B,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP (KK second time only at 7.11.46) read instead tyaktvaināṃ dhanado gataḥ, "having abandoned it [Laṅkā], the giver of wealth has departed."

"there carry out the duties of your station" svadharmaṃ tatra pālaya: Literally, "there protect [your] svadharma." The term svadharma normally refers to the duties belonging to a person by virtue of his or her particular varṇa, or class, and āśrama, or stage of life. Our understanding is that here Prahasta is urging Rāvaṇa to take up the rājadharma, or duties of a king in Laṅkā. See 7.6.34 and notes.

The sequence of lines as recorded in the critical apparatus is complex and somewhat difficult to reconstruct. According to the critical apparatus, the great majority of southern manuscripts read the following sequence: 37; 38cd; 215*; 38ab; 213*; 38cd (second time with variant); 38ef. This sequence of verses is found only in KK (as verses 7.11.43, 44 [in brackets], 45–46). GPP and NSP read: 37; 38ab; 213*; 38cd; 38ef as their verses 44–46; VSP and Gita Press read the same sequence as their verses 46–48.

Thus, the text of KK would read: "[Addressed in this fashion, he accepted those words out of respect for his father and so, departed together with his wives, sons,[1] ministers, vehicles, and wealth].[37] [The city of Laṅkā, thirty leagues in breadth, was now deserted.][37cd] It had instantly become deserted, Rāma, empty of people and free from danger.[215*] [Now Prahasta went back to Daśagrīva][38a] and delighted at heart, he spoke these words to that great rākṣasa, who was accompanied by his ministers and his younger brothers:[38b–213*] ['The city of Laṅkā is now deserted.][38c] [Having abandoned it, the giver of wealth has departed.][38d variant] [Enter it with us and carry out the duties of your station.'][38ef]"

The printed editions of GPP, NSP, Gita Press, and VSP would read: "[Addressed in this fashion, he accepted those words out of respect for his father and so departed together with his wives, sons,[1] ministers, vehicles, and wealth.][37] [Now Prahasta went back to Daśagrīva 38a] and delighted at heart, he spoke these words to that great rākṣasa, who was accompanied by his ministers and his younger brothers.[38b–213*] ['The city of Laṅkā is now deserted.][38c] [Having abandoned it, the giver of wealth has departed.] [38d variant] [Enter it with us and carry out the duties of your station.'][38ef]"

[1] "sons" -putrāḥ: See notes to verse 37 above.

39. "Then, when the rākṣasa Rāvaṇa had been addressed in this fashion by Prahasta" evam uktaḥ prahastena rāvaṇo rākṣasas tadā: D6,7,10,11,M10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead evam ukto daśagrīvaḥ prahastena mahābalaḥ, "Addressed in this fashion by Prahasta, the immensely powerful Daśagrīva . . .” On the use of the name Rāvaṇa, see verse 28 and note above and notes to 7.9.25.

“along with his brothers, his troops, and his followers” sabhrātā sabalānugaḥ: D7,10,11,M10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead bhrātṛbhiḥ sabalānugaiḥ, “with his brothers and their troops and followers.”

Following verse 39, Ñ,V2,B,D1,3,4,6,7,10,11,S, and Gorresio insert a passage of one line [216*]: “[that city which had] well laid out grand avenues and had been abandoned by the giver of wealth.”

Following 216*, D6,7,10,11,M3,6,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP continue with a passage of one line [217*]: “That foe of the gods ascended [to it], just as the lord of the gods does to heaven (āruroha sa devāriḥ svargaṃ devādhipo yathā /).”

40. “ten-faced rākṣasa” daśānanaḥ: Literally, “ten-faced [one].”

“by the night-roaming rākṣasas . . . with night-roaming rākṣasas” kṣaṇadācaraiḥ . . . / . . . niśācaraiḥ: Literally, with the night-roaming [ones] . . . with the night-roaming [ones].” On the term kṣaṇadācara, see note to 7.6.14.

“densely populated” nikāmapūrṇā: Literally, “extremely full.”

The meter is vaṃśasthavila (vaṃśastha).

41. “Then . . . as is Amarāvatī, the city of Indra, smasher of citadels” puraṃdarasyeva tadāmarāvatīm: Literally, “then like Amarāvatī of the citadel smasher.” D1,3,4,6, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read yathā, “just as,” for tadā, “then.” D7,10,11,G2, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read the metrically correct puraṃdaraḥ svar iva for puraṃdarasyeva, “like of the smasher of citadels.” This lends the pāda the sense “just as [did] the smasher of citadels Amarāvatī in heaven.”

“on that mountain” girau: As Ck, Cg, and Ct point out, the mountain is Kailāsa. Compare verse 34 above.

“a city” purīm: As noted by Ck and Cg, this is the city of Alakā.

The meter is rucirā with a hypometric pāda d in the vaṃśasthavila meter. Cg argues that the metrical irregularity should be understood as an epic anomaly (atra chandobhaṅga ārṣo jñeyaḥ). Ck, acknowledges the metrical flaw, but argues that despite the metrical irregularity, the critical reading is the correct one (atra chandobhaṅgavyāvṛtaye puraṃdarasyeva tadāmarāvatīm iti paṭhanīyaḥ). Ct, whose reading corrects the anomaly, notes the critical reading as a variant but rejects it on metrical ground (iti pāṭho ’yuktaś chandobhaṅgābhāvāya).

Sarga 12

1. “Once Daśagrīva had been consecrated as the lord of the rākṣasas” rākṣasendro ’bhiṣiktas tu: Literally, “the lord of the rākṣasas [being] consecrated.”

“he and his two brothers” bhrātṛbhyāṃ sahitaḥ: Literally, “[he] accompanied by two brothers.” Ś,V2,3,B,D,T1,2,M1,2,6–10, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read the instrumental plural bhrātṛbhiḥ in place of the instrumental dual bhrātṛbhyām. Although the Uttarakāṇḍa, and, indeed, the epic, focuses most of its attention on Rāvaṇa’s two principal brothers, Kumbhakarṇa and Vibhīṣaṇa, it appears that he has other, less prominent, cousin-brothers, including Khara and Dūṣaṇa (e.g., at 3.16.20; 3.17.25; 6.92.18; and notes) and Mahodara and Mahāpārśva (e.g., at 6.56.4; 6.57.16; 6.58.1; 6.59.1–3; 6.83.5; and notes). See, too, 7.24.28 and notes. This variant reading is, perhaps, an allusion to these other figures.

“he . . . considered giving away in marriage their sister, the rākṣasa woman Śūrpaṇakhā” tataḥ pradānaṃ rākṣasyā bhaginyāḥ samacintayat: Literally, “then he considered the gift of [his] rākṣasī sister.”

2. "He gave in marriage his sister" dadau tām . . . / svasām: Literally, "he gave that sister." Ś,Ñ,V,B,D2,5,8,9,12,T3,4,M3, and Lahore, Gorresio, KK,VSP, and Gita Press read instead svasāram . . . / dadau, "he gave [his] sister."

"to . . . the son of Kālaka" kālakeyāya: The name Kālakeya can be understood in several ways. We follow Cg, who glosses, "the son of Kālaka (kālakaputrāya)," an apparent reference to the demon Kālaka, son of the sage Kaśyapa and Kālakā, one of the sixty daughters of Dakṣa, mentioned at 3.13.10–17ab. This understanding is shared by Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 404). The term could also be a matronymic derived from Kālakā (see 3.13.11–17ab), and this interpretation is reflected in the translations of Gorresio (1870, p. 41) and Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1945). The term Kālakeya also refers to a group or class of demons, as noted by Cs, who glosses, "counted among that group (tadgaṇagaṇitāya)." This group is mentioned at 7.23.15 and 7.24.21. See, too, notes to 6.7.9–10. D10 and GPP and NSP read instead kālakeyendrāya, "to the lord of the Kālakas or Kālakeyas." On the basis of the variant kālakendrāya, several translators, including Dutt (1894, p. 1593), Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 457), and Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 407), understand that Vidyujjihva is the king of the Kālakas. In the Mahābhārata, the Kālakeyas are said to be defeated by Arjuna (MBh 5.155.27), and at MBh 3.99–103, Agastya, by drinking all the ocean's water, routs the Kālakeyas, who are hiding at the bottom of the ocean. Various purāṇas use the term Kālakeya to designate an entire class of asuras. Stories involving them are found at BrahmP 3.7.255; 4.29.76; MatsyaP 6.23; 171.59; VāyuP 40.15; and ViṣṇuP 1.21.9, etc.

"to . . . named Vidyujjihva" vidyujjihvāya nāmataḥ: This dānava is slain by his brother-in-law Rāvaṇa during the latter's battles with the Kālakeyas (see 443* and note 2, following notes to 7.23.15). He is not to be confused with the rākṣasa lord and master of illusion known in the Sundarakāṇḍa (see 5.5.18, 24; and notes) and Yuddhakāṇḍa (see 6.22.6–43). See also 443*, note 2, following 7.23.15. See, too, Goldman and Goldman 2009, pp. 84–85. D7,10,11,M4, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read rākṣasaḥ, "the rākṣasa," for nāmataḥ, "by name." The reference then is to Daśagrīva himself.

3. "Now . . . after giving away his sister in marriage" atha dattvā svasāraṃ saḥ: Literally, "now having given his sister, he." D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read svayaṃ rakṣaḥ, "the rākṣasa, himself," for svasāraṃ saḥ, "his sister, he."

"the king was wandering about hunting" mṛgayāṃ paryaṭan nṛpaḥ: D7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead mṛgayāṃ aṭate sma tat, "he roamed that [forest], hunting." We agree with Cr, who understands that the neuter pronoun tat refers to the forest (tad vanam).

"Maya" mayam: Maya is the chief architect of the asuras. See 4.50.10–14; 6.88.2; and notes.

4. "the night-roaming rākṣasa" niśācaraḥ: Literally, "the night-roaming [one]."

"you . . . who stay alone" bhavān ekaḥ: Literally, "you alone." Cr, evidently concerned by the fact that Maya is accompanied only by his daughter, glosses the word ekaḥ, "one or alone," as "without any other man (puruṣāntararahitaḥ)." See below 220*, a southern insert, which supplies an explicit finite verb (tiṣṭhasi) that is only implicit in the critical text.

"in this forest unpeopled save by wild beasts" nirmanuṣyamṛge vane: The most obvious way to read the compound is to understand that the forest is devoid both of humans and animals. Cr, the only commentator to remark on the term, first glosses the phrase in this way, indicating that it represents a forest from which humans and animals have departed and which is, therefore, extraordinarily frightful (nirgatā manuṣyamṛgā yasmād atibhayaṅkaram ity arthaḥ). All translators consulted interpret the compound in this way. Cr, however, offers an additional interpretation that we feel is more contextually apposite, which indirectly addresses the very real question of why Daśagrīva would be hunting in a forest devoid of game. He says that we can read the compound to mean that the forest contained animals but no people, that is to say, it was frequented only by animals (kiṃca nirmanuṣyā manuṣyarahitā mṛgā yasmin mṛgamātrasevitam ity arthaḥ).

Following verse 4, D6,7,10,11,T1,3,M3,4,6,7,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of one line [220*]: "And why do you stay with this fawn-eyed girl (anayā mṛgaśāvākṣyā kim arthaṃ saha tiṣṭhasi)." The insert provides a finite verb, "you stay" (tiṣṭhasi), which is merely implicit in the critical reading.

5. "And then . . . said to that night-roaming rākṣasa" tv athābravit . . . niśācaram: Literally, "And now he said to the night-roaming [one]." Ś1,V3,D5–7,10,11,G1,2, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead tadābravīt, "then he said," for tv athābravīt, "and now he said."

"everything about myself" sarvam . . . idaṃ mama: Literally, "all this of mine." D1,3,4, 6,7,10,11,M7,10, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read tava, "of you," for mama, "of me." This lends the phrase the sense "[I will tell] you everything."

6. "As you may have heard" śrutapurvā yadi tvayā: Literally, "if she was previously heard of by you."

"my boy" tāta: Ñ2,D5–7,10,11,M6, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead tatra "there."

"Hemā" hemā: On Hemā, see 4.50.14–17 and notes; and S. Goldman 2010b.

"Paulomī" paulomī: This is the daughter of Puloman, a demon. She is also called Śacī and is the wife of Indra. On Paulomī, see 4.38.6–7; 5.57.9; and notes.

7. "For five hundred years, my boy, I was infatuated with her." tasyāṃ saktamanās tāta pañca varṣaśatāny aham: Literally, "for five hundred years, child, I [was] one whose mind or heart was attached to her." D11 and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead tasyāṃ bhakta-[Gorresio—sakta-]manā hy āsaṃ [Gorresio—cāsaṃ] daśavarṣa-śatāny aham, "for one thousand years, I was one whose mind or heart was wholly devoted to her."

"this is the fourteenth year since she has been gone" sā . . . gatā varṣaṃ caturdaśam: Literally, "she is gone for a fourteenth year." The sense of the reading appears to be that Hemā has been away from her husband for a period of fourteen years. This seems to accord with the interpretations of Ck, Cg, Ct, and Cs of their variant reading, according to which Hemā had been gone for thirteen years, when, in the fourteenth year, Maya builds the city described in the following verses. Thus, Ñ2,V3,D5,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read trayodaśa samā gatāḥ, "thirteen years [have] passed," for gatā varṣaṃ caturdaśam, "[she is] gone for a fourteenth year." See notes to verse 8 below. According to Gorresio's edition (7.12.7), this is the thirteenth year of Hemā's absence (sā ca . . . gatā varṣatrayodaśe).

8. "For Hemā's sake" tasyāḥ kṛte ca hemāyāḥ: Literally, "and for the sake of that Hemā." D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead varṣaṃ caturdaśaṃ caiva, "and [this is] the fourteenth year." The commentators generally understand that a fourteenth year, following the thirteen years mentioned in their reading, has now elapsed (varṣaṃ caturdaśa saṃkhyāviśiṣṭaṃ gatam ity arthaḥ—so Ck and Cg). Cr makes it explicit that Maya's construction of the golden city takes place after the fourteenth year following the departure of Hemā, presumably in the fifteenth year. (sā hemā . . . gateti śeṣaḥ. tata ārabhya trayodaśa samā varṣāṇi gatāḥ. caturdaśaṃ ca varṣaṃ gataṃ tato 'nantaraṃ hemamayaṃ puraṃ mayā . . . nirmitam.) Cs disagrees. According to him, Hemā has been absent attending to her duties to the gods for a full thirteen years, and Maya's construction project takes place in the fourteenth year itself. (trayodaśasamās trayodaśavarṣam abhivyāpya. daivatakāryeṇa devatoddaiśyakakāryaviśeṣeṇa gatā. caturdaśaṃ varṣaṃ tasmin.)

"I then constructed . . . an entire city of gold" sarvaṃ hemapuraṃ mayā . . . nirmitaṃ tadā: Literally, "an entire city of gold was constructed by me." D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tato hemamayaṃ puram . . . nirmitaṃ mayā, "then a city made of gold . . . [was] constructed by me." Presumably the idea is that Maya creates the fabulous city of gold in an effort to entice his beloved whose name, Hemā, "the golden [one]," it echoes. According to Ck, Cg, and Cm, this appears to be the name of the city "Hemapura [Gold City]" (hemamayaṃ puraṃ hemapuram). Ct understands somewhat differently, glossing, "filled with gold (suvarṇapracuram)." Cm notes that the city called Hemapura is located in the cave known as Ṛkṣabila (hemapuraṃ nāmarkṣabile nagaram). This is undoubtedly the enchanted cavern with its forests and mansions of gold built by Maya for his beloved Hemā and into which the southern search party of monkeys led by Aṅgada wanders. See 4.49.19–29 and notes to verse 12 below.

"through my creative power" māyayā: Literally, "through māyā." We agree with Ck and Cg, who gloss, "marvelous power of construction (vicitranirmāṇaśaktyā)." This sense of the term māyā is more in keeping with its theological use as the divine or supernatural power of Brahmā or other divinity to create the phenomenal world rather than the sense of more transient illusion in which it occurs earlier in the epic. For māyā in the former sense (creative energy), see 1.15.12–13 and notes. For māyā in the latter sense, see 1.28.7; 1.29.10; 3.52.13; 3.64.9; 6.7.9–10; 6.22.6–43; 6.31.55; 6.36.9; and notes. See, too, S. Goldman 2010a. Cm expands this definition somewhat, glossing, "the power which is the cause of constructing marvelous things (vicitravastunirmāṇahetubhūtayā śaktyā)."

"inlaid with diamonds and lapis" vajravaidūryacitram: Literally, "variegated with diamonds and lapis." On the various uses of the word vaidūrya in the Rāmāyaṇa, see 3.30.9; 4.13.7–8; 5.1.2–3; 6.67.13; and notes.

9. "finding no pleasure" aratiṃ vindan: D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead avasaṃ dīnaḥ, "I dwelt, dejected."

"out of that city" tasmāt purāt: D7,M1–3, and GPP (7.12.10) read instead tasmāt purā, "therefore or from that, long ago." No other printed edition consulted shares the reading of GPP.

10. "nourished in Hemā's womb" asyāḥ kukṣau vivardhitā: Literally, "made to grow in her womb."

"to find her a husband" bhartaram . . . asyāḥ . . . mārgitum: Literally, "to seek a husband for her." It seems a strange choice on Maya's part to abandon a presumably well-populated city to seek a potential son-in-law in a wilderness that has already been described as nirmanuṣya-, "devoid of humans." The commentators are silent. See verse 5 above.

11. This verse closely paraphrases 7.9.6ab and 7cd. See 7.9.6,7 and notes.

"For men" narāṇām: Literally, "of or among men." D6,7,10,11,T1–3,G3,M3,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead sarveṣām, "among all" (as in 7.9.6b).

"two families" dve kule: At 7.9.7 a similar sentiment is stated by Sumālin, Rāvaṇa's grandfather. There, however, he claims that three families are put at risk of losing their honor through having an unmarried daughter. He specifies the three families as those of the girl's mother, her father, and the family into which she is to be married. Neither the text nor the commentators here indicate which two of the three families are intended. Only Dutt (1894, pp. 1593–94) and Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 408) indicate which families they believe are intended. Both indicate, reasonably enough, that the families intended are the first two mentioned by Sumālin at 7.9.7ab, that is, the families of the mother and father. Dutt, alone, expounds upon this issue in a note in which he observes:

The lines, namely, of her father and mother. The line of a mother as distinct from that of a father would be impossible under the present economy of Hindu society in as much as, as soon as a girl is married, she by that ceremony leaves her father's line and becomes incorporated with that of her husband. But this seems to have been otherwise in ancient times. This opens up an interesting social problem for the research of orientalists.

12. "And I also had two sons with my wife." dvau sutau tu mama tv asyāṃ bhāryāyāṃ saṃbabhūvatuḥ: Literally, "of me two sons were born on that wife." D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead putradvayaṃ mamāpy asyāṃ bhāryāyāṃ saṃbabhūva ha, "of me, as well, a pair of sons was born on that wife."

"The first . . . was Māyāvin followed by Dundubhi" māyāvī prathamaḥ . . . dundubhis tadanantaram: Literally, "Māyāvin [was] first, after that or after him [was] Dundubhi." Cg notes that we are to understand that this is the same Māyāvin who was pursued and destroyed by Vālin in the same forest that is the setting of the present episode (māyāvī ca vālinā pālayito 'traiva praviṣṭo nāśita iti jñeyam). The relationship between Māyāvin and Dundubhi is confusing in that, although they are said to be brothers and sons of Maya here, in the Kiṣkindhākāṇḍa, Māyāvin is said to be the son of Dundubhi. For a discussion of the relationship between these two demons, see 4.9.4; 4.10.17; 4.45.3–4 and notes. D6,10,11,T1,G1,3,M1,3,4,6–8,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the adjective tadanantaraḥ for the adverb tadanantaram, thus describing Dundubhi as "he who came after him."

13. "all of this" etat . . . sarvam: V1,D6,7,10,11,T,G1,3,M1–5,7–10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read evam, "thus," for etat, "this."

"just as it took place" yathātathyena: Literally, "in such a way as to be in accordance with truth." The compound is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. D1,3,4,6,7,T1,G1,3,M1–4,6–9, and KK and VSP read instead yathātattvena, "in accordance with truth."

"may I know who you are?" katham . . . jānīyāṃ ko bhavān iti: Literally, "How might I know, 'Who are you, sir?' "

14. "Addressed in this fashion, the lord of the rākṣasas" evam ukto rākṣasendraḥ: D1,3,4,6,7,10,11,G1,M2, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead evam uktaṃ tu tad rakṣo, "and addressed in this fashion, that rākṣasa."

"courteously" vinītam: We take the adverb on metrical as well as contextual grounds to describe the manner of Daśagrīva's reply. Only Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 405) among the translators consulted understands it to refer to the mode of Maya's questioning.

Following verse 14, D5–7,10,11,T1–3,G,M1–5,7 (only line 2),8–10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of two lines [229*]: " '[the son] of the sage Viśravas, who was third in line of descent from Brahmā.'[1][1] Addressed in this fashion by the rākṣasa lord, O Rāma, the dānava . . . (muner viśravaso yas tu tṛtīyo brahmaṇo 'bhavat / evam uktas tadā rāma rākṣasendreṇa dānavaḥ //)."

[1] "who was third in line of descent from Brahmā" yas tu tṛtīyo brahmaṇo 'bhavat: Literally, "and who was the third from Brahmā." We follow Ck, Ct, Cr, and Cs, who remind us that as the son of Pulastya, Viśravas represents the third generation in the lineage of Brahmā (yo munir viśravā brahmaṇas tṛtīyāpatyam—so Ck, Ct). Dutt (1894, p. 1594) and Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 458), followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 408), erroneously understand Viśravas to be the third son of Brahmā.

15. "no sooner had . . . learned" jñātvā: Literally, "having known."

"that Daśagrīva was the son of a brahman-seer" brahmarṣes taṃ sutam: Literally, "that he was the son of a brahman-seer." D6,7,10,11,M6,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead maharṣes tanayam, "the offspring of a great seer."

"delighted" harṣam upāgataḥ: Literally, "[he] went to joy." D6,7,10,11,M6,10, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead dānavapuṃgavaḥ, "bull among *dānava*s."

"he decided to give . . . in marriage" dātum . . . rocayāmāsa: Literally, "he intended to give."

"then and there" tatra vai: Literally, "right there." Ck and Ct understand the adverb in a temporal sense, glossing, "at the time of knowing his birth from a great lineage (mahākulaprasūtatvajñānakāle)." KK and VSP read the somewhat awkward relative adverb yatra for tatra, lending the phrase the meaning of something like "at which time or place."

Following verse 15, Ś,Ñ1,V1,3,D,T3,4,M6,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of one line [230*]: "Maya then had him take her hand in his own hand (kareṇa tu karaṃ tasyā grāhayitvā mayas tadā)."

16. Compare 6.7.6 and notes, where contrary to this passage, we are told that Maya gave his daughter in marriage to Rāvaṇa out of fear of the latter. In his comments to the earlier passage, Cg tries to reconcile the discrepancy by arguing that Rāvaṇa's ministers talk of Maya's fear of him simply as part of their panegyric of their lord.

17. "kindling a sacred fire . . . he took her hand in marriage" prajvālya . . . agnim akarot pāṇisaṃgraham: Literally, "having caused a fire to blaze up, he performed the hand clasping [ceremony]." The taking of each other's [right] hand in the presence of Agni, the god of fire and witness of contracts, is the definitive act of the Hindu wedding ceremony. On the Hindu wedding ceremony, see Kane 1974, vol. 2, part 1, pp. 516–38 and Pandey 1969, pp. 153–253.

18. "Maya was unaware of the curse that Daśagrīva had received from his father, who was so rich in austerities . . . Maya" na . . . tasya mayaḥ . . . śāpābhijñas tapodhanāt / . . . tena: Literally, "Maya, not aware of his curse from that one whose wealth was austerities . . . by him [she was given]." The curse is the one pronounced by Rāvaṇa's father Viśravas to the effect that his son would be of a vicious nature (7.9.17–18). D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read saḥ, "he," for the negative particle na. This lends the passage the sense that Maya does indeed know about the curse, but gives Mandodarī to him nonetheless. Ck, Cg, Ct, Cr, and Cs offer explanations for what, in their reading, is a highly inappropriate choice of a son-in-law. Cg and Cr understand that even though Maya was aware of Rāvaṇa having been cursed by Viśravas to have a vicious nature, he gives her to Rāvaṇa out of respect for his lofty lineage. (śāpābhijña iti dāruṇaprakṛtir bhaviṣyatīti śrutaśāpavṛttānta iti bhāvaḥ. pulastyaśāpaś cet kevalaṃ kulam eva bahv amanyatety arthaḥ—so Cg; Cr similarly.) Ck, Ct, and Cs add to this idea the notion that Maya fears that if the vicious and powerful Daśagrīva is not given Mandodarī, he will overpower Maya and abduct the girl by force (yady asmā iyaṃ kanyā na dīyate tadā dāruṇaprakṛtitvān māṃ nigṛhya balād api gṛhīṣyatīti jñānena . . . mahākulaprasūtatvajñānena cety arthaḥ—so Ck; Ct and Cs similarly).

See, too, 6.7.6 and notes.

"his lineage derived from his grandfather" paitāmahaṃ kulam: The adjective paitāmaha here is ambiguous in its reference. All but one of the translators consulted take it to be a reference to Pitāmaha, a common epithet of Brahmā from whom, indeed, Rāvaṇa's lineage ultimately derives. This interpretation is quite plausible. We, however, agree with Dutt (1894, p. 1594), who renders, "the race of Rāvana's paternal grandfather," since Rāvaṇa's most common lineage name is Paulastya, a name derived from his actual paternal grandfather, Brahmā's son, Pulastya. See verses 14 and 15 and notes above, where Daśagrīva is referred to as the grandson of Pulastya and the son of a brahman-seer. See note to 7.15.13.

"gave her in marriage" sā dattā: Literally, "she was given [by him]."

19. "the very same one with which Rāvaṇa later struck down Lakṣmaṇa" jaghnivāṃl lakṣmaṇaṃ yayā: Literally, "with which [he] struck down Lakṣmaṇa." See 6.88.22–35. Ck raises the possibility, introduced by several commentators in the Yuddhakāṇḍa, of taking the root √han, "to strike or kill," in the sense of √gam, "to go." Citing Pā 3.2.107, Ck also reminds us that the perfect participle can be used as a substitute for the perfect (jaghnivān iti vibhāṣā gamahaneti kvasor it). The idea of this lexical substitution as explained in the commentaries to the Yuddhakāṇḍa is that Rāvaṇa's javelin merely goes near or past Lakṣmaṇa, but does not, in fact, strike him. For examples of this argument, see 6.80.29; 6.81.4; 6.27.9; 6.48.38; and 6.91.19 and notes.

20. "When he had taken a wife in this fashion" evaṃ sa kṛtadāro vai: Literally, "he by whom a wife is made in this fashion." D7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead evaṃ sa kṛtvā darān vai, "he having made a wife in this fashion." T1,2,G1,3,M3, and KK and VSP read instead evaṃ svīkṛtadāro vai, "he by whom a wife had been accepted in this fashion."

"the mighty lord" īśvaraḥ prabhuḥ: The two terms are largely synonymous. We agree with Cs in taking the latter in its adjectival sense of "powerful (samarthaḥ)."

"of Laṅkā" laṅkāyām: Literally, "in Laṅkā." D6,7,10,11,T1,2,M3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read the genitive laṅkāyāḥ, "of Laṅkā," for the locative.

"had his two brothers each marry a wife" bhārye bhrātṛbhyāṃ samudāvahat: Literally, "he married two wives with two brothers." D7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read samupāharat, "he procured two wives for two brothers," for samudāvahat, "for he married."

21. "had Kumbhakarṇa take as his wife" tāṃ bhāryāṃ kumbhakarṇasya . . . samudāvahat: Literally, "he married as a wife of Kumbhakarṇa." D6,7,10,11,M10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read samakalpayat, "he arranged for," for samudāvahat, "he married."

22. "a knower of righteousness" dharmajñaḥ: Ñ2,B2,3,D3,7,10,11,M1,3,8,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the feminine accusative dharmajñām, which would make the adjective modify Saramā instead.

"of Śailūṣa" śailūṣasya: See 7.90.11 and notes.

"Saramā" saramām: A rākṣasī of this name gives aid and comfort to Sītā in the Yuddhakāṇḍa. No mention there is made of her being the wife of Vibhīṣaṇa or the granddaughter of Śailūṣa. See Yuddhakāṇḍa sargas 24–25 and notes.

23. "She . . . on the shore of Lake" tīre tu sarasaḥ sā vai: Literally, "and she, indeed, on the shore of the lake." D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tīre tu saraso vai tu, "and, indeed, on the shore of the lake and."

"and" ca: The word is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the particle hi, " for or indeed."

"and . . . dear boy, Lake Mānasa" mānasaṃ ca saras tāta: D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead saras tadā mānasaṃ tu, "but then Lake Mānasa."

"once, during the rainy season" jaladāgame: Literally, "at the onset of the rain-clouds."

"flooded" vavṛdhe: Literally, "it swelled or grew."

24. "uttered this wailing cry" ākranditaṃ vacaḥ . . . uktam: Literally, "a wailing speech was spoken." Cr, whom we follow, understands that when the lake flooded, the mother, out of love for her daughter, uttered a cry of alarm telling the lake to stop [growing] (saro mā [vardhata]). For this reason the child was called Saramā. (yadā mānasasya sarasas tīre sā saṃjajñe tadā jaladāgame sati mānasaṃ saro vavṛdhe. tasyā mātrā tu saro mā vardhata ity ākranditaṃ viklavaṃ vaca uktaṃ tato hetoḥ sā saramābhavat.) Ck and Ct understand the syntax of the verse somewhat differently. They believe that as the flooding lake reached the spot where the child was, the frightened child cried out. Hearing that cry, her mother, out of love for her daughter, ordered the lake not to expand further (saro mā [vardhata]). Therefore her daughter came to be known as Saramā. (mānasaṃ saro jaladāgamanimittatas tac chiśuparyantaṃ vavṛdhe. tato bhītāyāḥ kanyāyā ākranditaṃ śrutvā tasyā mātrā kanyāsnehena saro mā vardhatety uktam. tataḥ sā kanyā saramābhavat. pṛṣodarāditvāt sādhuḥ—so Ct; Ck similarly.)

"'O lake! Do not flood!' For that reason she was named, 'Saramā'" saro mā vardhateti . . . tataḥ sā saramā: Literally, "Lake! Do not grow! Therefore, she was 'Saramā.'" Ct and Ck, Cg, and Ct note that the highly irregular compound is acceptable as an example of the pṛṣodara type of composition (pṛṣodarāditvāt sādhuḥ). This type of etymological naming of a figure on the basis of an injunction or prohibition uttered at the time of their birth or early childhood is encountered at various places in the literature. Compare 1.45.19 and 1.46.4 and notes, where the Mārutas (mā rudaḥ) receive their name in a similar fashion, and KumāSaṃ 1.26, where a similar explanation is given for Pārvatī's acquiring the name Umā.

25. "Having thus taken" upādāya: Literally, "having taken." T1,2,G3,M3, and KK and VSP read instead upāgamya, "having approached [sexually]."

26. "gave birth to" asūyata: The verb is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. Ś,Ñ,V1,3,B,D2,6,8–12,T3,4, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the synonymous ajījanat.

"Meghanāda, the one you refer to by the name Indrajit" meghanādam . . . indrajinnāma yuṣmābhir abhidhīyate: As in the case of Rāvaṇa himself, the rākṣasa lord's son is best known by a name that he will not acquire until later in life. In fact, in the earlier books of the poem in which he appears (i.e., the Sundara- and Yuddhakāṇḍas), Indrajit is virtually never referred to by his birth name of Meghanāda, "Cloud Thunderer." He is normally referred to in the epic by his patronymic Rāvaṇi or by some variation on the epithet he acquired upon the defeat of Indra (e.g., Indrajit, Śakrajit, etc.). It is perhaps in reference to this difference that Agastya here reminds Rāma that this is the figure he knows as Indrajit. It is worth noting that, when the nineteenth century Bengali poet Madhusudana Datta wrote his epic poem in which this character is featured, he entitled it Meghanādavadhakāvya. See Seely 2004. For the other occurrences of the name Meghanāda in the Rāmāyaṇa, see verse 28 and note below; and 1.3.26; 7.25.4; 7.28.2; and notes.

27. "No sooner had he been born . . . that son of the rākṣasa" jātamātreṇa hi purā tena rākṣasasūnunā: Literally, "and soon by him, that son of the rākṣasa, who had just been born." D1,6,7,10–12,M10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read rāvaṇasūnunā, "the son of Rāvaṇa," for rākṣasasūnunā, "the son of the rākṣasa."

"unleashed a . . . roar, which was like that of a thundercloud" mukto nādo jaladharopamaḥ: Literally, "a roar like a cloud was released." The simile is somewhat imperfect.

28. "Since all of Laṅkā was stupefied by that roar of his" jaḍīkṛtāyāṃ laṅkāyāṃ tena nādena tasya vai: D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead jaḍīkṛtā ca sā laṅkā tasya nādena rāghava, "Laṅkā was stupefied by that roar of his, O Rāghava."

"Meghanāda, 'Cloud Thunderer'" meghanāda iti: Literally, "[the one] whose roar is that of a cloud." Compare the choice of names for figures such as Kubera, "Ekākṣipiṅgala, 'Dusky in One Eye.'" See 7.13.17 and note.

29. "hidden by beautiful women as is fire by firewood" varastrībhiś channaḥ kāṣṭhair ivānalaḥ: Literally, "hidden by beautiful women as is fire by pieces of wood." The simile is an interesting, if awkward, one. For one thing, it suffers from a fault of gender dissonance, since the women of the inner apartments are being compared to masculine sticks of firewood. Apparently the idea behind it is that baby Meghanāda is kept concealed in the inner apartments by the women only to blaze forth later on like a fire that is latent within its fuel.

Following verse 29, D7,10,11 (after 28),M10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of one line [236*]: ". . . Rāvaṇa's son producing great joy in his mother and father (mātāpitror mahāharṣaṃ janayan rāvaṇātmajaḥ /)."

Sarga 13

1. "intense drowsiness . . . took hold of Kumbhakarṇa" nidrā samabhavat tīvrā kumbhakarṇasya rūpiṇī: Literally, "severe sleep or sleepiness, possessing a form, arose of Kumbhakarṇa." We follow Ct, Cr, and Cs in understanding that the adjective rūpiṇī, "possessing a form," indicates that sleep (Ct and Cr) or the divinity of sleep (Cs) manifests herself in Kumbhakarṇa by such characteristic signs of sleepiness as yawning, etc. (nidrā taddevatā rūpiṇī svavyāpyajṛmbhaṇādiliṅgavatī satī—so Cs). Ck and Cg gloss, "embodied, incarnate (mūrtā)," apparently understanding that the goddess of sleep appears in her anthropomorphic form. Compare BhāgP 10.3.47–51, where Yogamāyā takes hold of the residents of Mathurā and Vraja (see, too, 10.2.15 and 10.4.29, where she is called Yoganidrā).

"brought on by Brahmā, Lord of the worlds" lokeśvarotsṛṣṭā: Literally, "sent forth or released by the Lord of the worlds." Ck, Cg, and Ct all gloss, "sent or dispatched (preṣitā)," while Cr glosses, "produced through the power of his [Brahmā's] words (tadvacanaprabhāvenotpannety arthaḥ)."

2. "who was seated before him" āsīnam: Literally, "seated." Presumably Rāvaṇa is seated on his throne.

"Please have them build an abode where I may sleep." kārayasva mamālayam: Literally, "cause my abode to be made." We are to understand here that Kumbhakarṇa is asking for a special sleeping palace or chamber to be built for him during his long periods of slumber. Cr notes that the structure is a house suitable for lengthy slumber (ciraśayanayogyagṛham). Kumbhakarṇa's sleeping chamber is described in the Yuddhakāṇḍa as an ornately decorated cavern (see 6.48.18–20 and notes). The present passage makes no explicit reference to the residence being a cave, although at verse 6 below it is likened to one.

3. "constructed an abode for Kumbhakarṇa that resembled Mount Kailāsa" akurvan kumbhakarṇasya kailāsasamam ālayam: D6,7,10,11,M10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP omit this line (= pādas cd). This line is rendered only in the translation of Gorresio (1870, p. 44). KK (= 7.13.3cd) brackets the line and, in a footnote, notes that it appears in six of the manuscripts collated for that edition. The word -sama- is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition.

4. "they built one" cakrire: Literally, "they made." The verse contains no explicit noun to serve as a direct object.

"a league in width and twice that in length" vistīrṇaṃ yojanam . . . tato dviguṇāyatam: Literally, "extended for a yojana [and] two times as broad as that." Virtually all the commentators consulted express concern over the fact that the measurements of Kumbhakarṇa's sleeping chamber as given here appear to be different from those given at 6.48.18–19, where the chamber is represented as being as long as it is wide. In general Ck, Cg, and Ct maintain that there is, in fact, no real contradiction and that we should read the earlier passage to express the two-to-one ratio of length to width mentioned here. (vistīrṇaṃ yojanam. tiryaṅmāneneti śeṣaḥ. tatas tiryaṅmānāt. evaṃ ca yuddhakāṇḍe yad yojanāyatām ity uktaṃ tad dviguṇayojanāyatām ity arthakaṃ bodhyam—so Ct; Cv, Ck, Cg, and Cs similarly.)

"splendid" śubhram: D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead snigdham, "shining or lustrous."

"flawless" nirābādham: Literally, "without defect or obstruction." Cs understands that the sleeping chamber is devoid of any obstructing columns or pillars, etc. (madhye śayanasthale vyavadhāyakastambhādirahitam). The word is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. Ñ,V1,3,B,D1,3–5,9,T3, and Gorresio (7.13.4) read instead guhākāram, "in the form of a cavern." See note to verse 2 above. See note to verses 5–6 below.

5–6. Verses 5 and 6 consist entirely of a list of descriptive phrases without any verbal element. Syntactically these would have to be construed as modifying ālayam, "abode," in 3d, which must serve as the direct object of the verb cakrire, "they built," in 4d. We have broken up the sequence into a series of smaller sentences.

"everywhere" sarvatra: Cs understands the adverb to indicate that the columns are placed only along the walls, for, as he argues, otherwise there would be no room in the chamber for such an enormous figure as Kumbakarṇa to lie down. (sarvatra bhittisamīpe. anyatheyatparimāṇavataḥ kumbhakarṇasya śayanaṃ na syād iti bodhyam.) This explanation is in keeping with Cs's gloss on the term nirābādham in verse 4 above (see note).

"Its luster was enhanced by lapis, and" vaidūryakṛtaśobhaṃ ca: Literally, "and it had a luster made by lapis." Ñ,V3,B,D10,11, and Gorresio (7.13.5), GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead vaidūryakṛtasopānam, "it had stairways made of lapis." The syllables -śobhaṃ ca are marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. For lapis, see note to 7.12.8.

"It was surrounded by gateways of ivory" dantatoraṇavinyastam: Literally, "inset with tusk-gates." Ñ2,V3,B1,4,D2,5–8,10,11,T1,2,4,G1,3,M1–9, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP and read instead dānta-, "ivory," for danta-, "tusk." As Ck, Cg, and Ct point out, the term dānta-, "ivory," should be understood to mean some product made of tusk, i.e., ivory (dāntavikāram). Cr glosses, "made of elephant tusks (gajadantanirmitena)."

"filled with raised platforms of diamond and crystal" vajrasphaṭikavedikam: Literally, "having raised platforms of diamond and crystal." For the use of the term vedika in the sense of "a raised platform," see 4.49.19–21; 5.7.14–15; 6.109.22–27; and notes. The term -sphaṭika- is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition.

"delightful in all seasons" sarvartusukhadam: Ś1,Ñ,V1,3,D,T3,4,M4, and Lahore, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP and read sarvatra "everywhere," for sarvartu-, "in all seasons."

Following 6ab, D1,3,4,6,7,10,11,T1,2,G,M, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of one line [237*]: "The rākṣasa had it made [so that it was] delightful and completely comfortable (manoharaṃ sarvasukhaṃ kārayāmāsa rākṣasaḥ /)."

7. "the night-roaming rākṣasa" niśācaraḥ: Literally, "the night-roaming [one]." D6,7, 10,11,M10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead mahābalaḥ, "immensely powerful [Kumbhakarṇa]."

"fell asleep" nidrāṃ samāviṣṭaḥ: Literally, "[he] entered sleep."

"for many thousands of years" bahūny abdasahasrāṇi: On the different accounts of the length of Kumbhakarṇa's sleep, see 6.48.9,12; 6.49.26; and notes. See, too, R. Goldman 2006.

"without waking" nāvabudhyate: Literally, "he did not wake up." D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead na ca budhyate, "and he did not wake," while T2,M3, and KK and VSP read instead na prabudhyate, "he did not wake up."

8. "ten-faced Daśagrīva" daśānanaḥ: Literally, "the ten-faced [one]."

"continually harassed" bādhate sma sa nityaśaḥ: D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead saṃjaghne hi niraṅkuśaḥ, "he slaughtered without restraint."

9. "Going to the magnificent heavenly gardens, Nandana and the rest" udyānāni vicitrāṇi nandanādīni yāni ca / tāni gatvā: Literally, "having gone to those which were the magnificent gardens, beginning with Nandana." Since Nandana is the great heavenly garden of Indra in Amarāvatī, it is clear that the verse refers to the gardens of other divinities.

"ten-faced Daśagrīva" daśānanaḥ: Literally, "the ten-faced [one]."

"in his tremendous rage" susaṃkruddhaḥ: Literally, "extremely angry." Cr, alone among the commentators, offers a specific explanation for Rāvaṇa's rage. He claims that his anger is aroused by the memory of how the gods perverted Kumbhakarṇa's words when the latter was requesting his boon (devakartṛkakumbhakarṇavarayācanakālakakumbhakarṇavacanaviparītakaraṇasmṛtijanitakrodhaviśiṣṭaḥ).

10. "As a playful elephant might roil a river, a driving wind might scatter trees, or the loosed vajra might shatter mountains, he constantly wrought destruction." nadīṃ gaja iva krīdan vṛkṣān vāyur iva kṣipan / nāgān vajra ivotsṛṣṭo vidhvaṃsayati nityaśaḥ //: Literally, "Like a playing elephant, a river, like ruinous wind, trees, like the released vajra, mountains, he constantly destroyed." The syntax of the mālopamā is ambiguous. It is possible to read the verse, as we have done, to mean that Rāvaṇa is destructive in general like the various upamānas mentioned in the first three pādas. On the other hand, Cr, the only commentator to remark on the passage, understands that like the elephant, wind, and vajra, Rāvaṇa specifically destroys the river, trees, and mountains, respectively. Some translators follow this interpretation. This strikes us as a possible, but not probable construction. Then again, the reference might be to features of the parks or gardens mentioned in verse 9 above.

"constantly" nityaśaḥ: D6,7,10,11,M10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead rākṣasaḥ, "the rākṣasa [i.e., Daśagrīva]."

11–12. "acting in such a fashion" tathāvṛttam: Literally, "having such conduct." D7,10,G1, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead yathāvṛttam, "having which conduct."

"conduct befitting his lineage" kulānurūpam . . . vṛttam . . . ātmanaḥ: Literally, "the conduct conformable to his own." Ck and Ct understand that Kubera recalls the virtuous conduct appropriate to his lineage in connection with the necessity of communicating it [to Daśagrīva] (kulānurūpaṃ vṛttam iti sadvṛttam ity arthaḥ. saṃsmṛtyeti bodhanīyatveneti śeṣaḥ—so Ck; Ct similarly.) Cg proposes adding the adjective "dispassionate (asaktam iti śeṣaḥ)," to qualify the family's conduct [in opposition to the violent behavior of the enraged Daśagrīva].

"for the benefit of Daśagrīva" daśagrīvasya vai hitam: Cr takes hitam as an adjective modifying dūtam in the sense of "a helpful or friendly messenger." Ck and Ct understand the term to be used elliptically and suggest supplying the infinitive vaktum, "to speak or say," thus yielding the sense that Kubera sends the messenger to speak beneficial words to Rāvaṇa. Cg glosses, "intent upon [his] welfare (hitaparam)." This is presumably an epithet of dūtam, "messenger." Both hitam and the emphatic vai are marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition.

13. "the messenger" saḥ: Literally, "he."

"The latter honored him in keeping with righteousness and inquired as to why he had come." mānitas tena dharmeṇa pṛṣṭaś cāgamanaṃ prati: Literally, "He was honored by him with righteousness, and was questioned regarding arrival." We agree with Ck, Cg, Ct, and Cr, who understand that the messenger is questioned regarding the purpose of his visit (āgamanaprayojanam ity arthaḥ—so Cr).

14. "of his king" rājñaḥ: Literally, "of the king." As the commentators remind us, the reference is to Kubera.

"his king's relatives on both sides of the family" jñātīn api ca bāndhavān: Literally, "paternal relatives and maternal relatives as well." Both terms are ambiguous. They can be used in the senses that we have used them here, but also more generally as "kinsmen or friends." D6,7,10,11,M10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read vibhīṣaṇaḥ, "Vibhīṣaṇa," for bāndhavān, "maternal relatives."

"Vibhīṣaṇa presented him to ten-faced Daśagrīva" darśayāmāsa tam . . . daśānanam: Literally, "he caused him to see the ten-faced [one]."

15. "When the messenger saw" sa dṛṣṭvā: Literally, "he, having seen."

"he addressed him reverently with blessings of victory and stood silent for a moment" jayena cābhisaṃpūjya tūṣṇīm āsīn muhūrtakam: Literally, "and having worshiped or honored with blessings of victory, he was silent for a moment." For 15cd, D5–7,10,11,M10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead a passage of one line [241*]: "Addressing him reverently with the words 'Be victorious!' he fell silent (jayeti vācā saṃpūjya tūṣṇīṃ samabhivartata)." Ct feels it appropriate to add, "for a moment (kṣaṇamātram iti śeṣaḥ)," thus supplying what the critical reading makes explicit. Cs understands that the messenger pauses for a moment, reflecting that it would not be proper for him to speak immediately (jhaṭiti na cocitaṃ vacanam iti tūṣṇīṃbhāva iti bhāvaḥ).

16. "Once the messenger had taken his seat on a couch that had been brought for him and which was covered with fine cushions" tasyopanīte paryaṅke varāstaraṇasaṃvṛte / upaviśya . . . dūtaḥ: Literally, "Having sat down on a couch that had been brought for him [and] which was covered with fine cushions, the messenger." D5–7,10,11,M10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead sa [KK, VSP taṃ] tatrottamaparyaṅke varāstaraṇaśobhite / upaviṣṭam . . . dūtaḥ, which would lend the verse the meaning: "That messenger then said these words to Daśagrīva, who was seated there on a splendid couch adorned with fine cushions."

17. "It is . . . in keeping with the conduct and lineage of both of you" ubhayoḥ sadṛśam . . . vṛttasya ca kulasya ca: Literally, "it is suitable to the two, to conduct and lineage." The phrase is quite ambiguous, and the commentators and translators alike offer a variety of interpretations. Ck, Cg, Ct, and Cr all understand the term ubhayoḥ, "of the two," to refer to [Rāvaṇa's] mother and father and thus understand the phrase to mean that Kubera's words are conformable to the conduct and lineage of Rāvaṇa's parents (ubhayor mātāpitroḥ kulasya vṛttasya sadācārasya ca sadṛśam—so Cr). This interpretation is followed by Dutt (1894, p. 1596) and Benoît (1999, p. 1255). Cs offers two interpretations. According to the first, the pronoun ubhayoḥ refers to the speaker [i.e., Kubera through his messenger] and to the listener [i.e., Rāvaṇa] of the message that is to follow. That message is, moreover, in keeping with both parties' noble lineage, that is, the lineage of Pulastya, and with their virtuous conduct. Alternatively, Cs notes that we can take ubhayoḥ in apposition to kulasya and vṛttasya, yielding the sense that the message is conformable to both noble lineage and virtuous conduct. (ubhayor vaktus tasya tava śrotuś cety ubhayoḥ. na kevalam etāvat kiṃtu kulasya paulastyakulasya vṛttasya ca caritrasya ca sadṛśam. kulasya vṛttasya cety ubhayor vā.) Our reading of the verse is more or less similar to Cs's first interpretation. Other translators offer various approximations of this.

"kind sir" saumya: Literally, "O kind or gentle [one]!" D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead vīra, "O hero!"

18. "Enough! The course of conduct you have adopted has gone far enough. Enough!" sādhu paryāptam etāvat kṛtaś cāritrasaṃgrahaḥ / sādhu: Literally, "Enough! This much is sufficient, the adoption of behavior that has been made. Enough!" As acknowledged by

Ck, the verse is difficult to construe definitively, although its basic meaning is quite clear (ślokasya kaṭhinārthatvāt). Because of textual variations, only Ck and Cg among the commentators consulted read with the critical edition. Both of them take the term sādhu—which we understand as an interjection, meaning "Enough!"—in its adverbial sense of "properly." Cg then understands the first line of the verse to mean: "If you have properly adopted your mode of behavior, then it has gone far enough." Cg sees the second occurrence of the term sādhu as further expounding the stated meaning. (sādhu samyak. cāritrasaṃgrahaḥ kṛtaś ced etāvad eva paryāptam. uktam arthaṃ vivṛṇoti sādhv ityādi.) Ck understands similarly but adds that Rāvaṇa's deeds up until this point are sufficient for his well-being in this world and the next (etāvad eva paryāptam ihāmutrābhyudayāya). In other words, both commentators understand the line to be a very polite way of asking Rāvaṇa to mend his ways. D10,11,M4, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read the gerundive kṛtyaḥ, "to be done," for the critical edition's past passive participle kṛtaḥ, "done." This is perhaps an attempt at an emendation of the slightly awkward reading of the critical text and lends the line the sense "Enough! So much is sufficient. You should now adopt proper conduct." Thus Ct understands the first line to mean "Very well! Thus far is far enough, that is to say, enough of this sinful behavior. From now on a course of proper behavior is to be adopted." Ct, like Ck and Cg, understands the repetition of sādhu to be for the purpose of more firmly establishing the message. (sādhu samyak. etāvat paryāptam etāvad eva pāpam alam. itaḥ paraṃ cāritrasaṃgrahaḥ kṛtyaḥ kāryaḥ. tad eva dārḍhyāya punar āha sādhv iti.) KK and VSP print the sequence sādhu dharme as a compound, sādhudharme, lending it the sense "proper dharma or the dharma of the virtuous." However, no commentator appears to read it in this way.

"If at all possible" yadi śakyate: Ck and Cg, reflecting on the rather harsh and admonitory tone of Kubera's message, see this phrase, no doubt correctly, as a rhetorical device for softening the sense of an outright command on the part of an older brother (yadi śakyata ity uktyā jyeṣṭhatayā niyogabuddhir vyāvartate).

19. "But . . . the measures the gods are taking against you" devānāṃ tu samudyogas tvattaḥ: Literally, "but . . . the exertion of the gods because of you." We agree with Ck, Cg, Ct, and Cr, who understand that the term samudyoga, "exertion, activity," here refers to the retaliatory activities being undertaken by the gods against Rāvaṇa (tvattas tvannimitto devatānāṃ samudyogaḥ pratikriyāsaṃpādanaviṣaya iti śeṣaḥ—so Ct). See 7.6.10 and notes. Ś,Ñ,V1,3,B,D2,5–12,T3,4,M5, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read devatānām, "of the divinities," for devānāṃ tu, "but of the gods." The syllables -udyo- in the word samudyogaḥ are marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition.

"I have also heard, your majesty" rājañ śrutaś ca me: Literally, "and by [lit., 'of'] me it was heard, O king." D6,7,10,11,M6,10, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read rājan mayā śrutaḥ, "O king, it was heard by me," while KK and VSP read the synonymous rājan mama śrutaḥ.

20. "time and time again" bahuśaḥ: Literally, "many times."

"and, in your folly, you have committed crimes against your own kinsmen, whom you should have been protecting" aparaddhā hi bālyāc ca rakṣaṇīyāḥ svabāndhavāḥ: Among the commentators consulted, the critical reading is shared only by Cg, and apparently Ck, except that the gerundive rakṣaṇīyāḥ, "deserving of protection," is replaced by ramaṇīyāḥ, "to be pleased." Cg glosses, "to be gratified (toṣaṇīyāḥ)." This variant is not noted in the critical apparatus, and only Raghunathan renders it (1982, vol. 3, p. 407). See below.

Ś,V1,3,D2,5–12,T3,4, and Lahore, GPP, NSP, and Gita Press substitute for 20cd a passage of one line [244*]: "Although a child may commit a crime,[1] he still must be protected by his own kinsmen (aparādhyaṃś ca bālo 'pi rakṣitavyaḥ svabāndhavaiḥ)."

[1] "Although a child may commit a crime" aparādhyaṃś ca bālo 'pi: D7,10,11,T3, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead sāparādho 'pi bālo hi, "for even though a child commits a crime [lit., 'with crime']." This variant lends a rather different tone to the verse. Where the critical reading is accusatory, the reading of GPP, NSP, and Gita Press is conciliatory, suggesting that Kubera's admonition is delivered out of a desire to protect his young and inexperienced brother. As Cr puts it, what is suggested here is that Kubera delivers his message in order to protect Rāvaṇa and is suggesting that if the latter should not heed his words, things will not go well for him. (etena tvadrakṣaṇārtham evedaṃ mayocyata iti sūcitam. tena madvacanānādare tava kalyāṇaṃ na bhaviteti dhvanitam.) Oddly enough, Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 407), appears to translate this variant as well as that of Cg: "You have . . . offended against your relations whom you should have striven to please. But the relations of a child have a duty, however blameworthy he may be, to protect him."

21. "undertaking a vow to Rudra" raudraṃ vratam: We follow Ck, Cg, and Ct, who understand the adjective raudram, to mean "relating to the god Rudra," and understand Kubera's vow to be in aid of propitiating that divinity (raudraṃ rudraprasādakavratam—so Cg). Cg notes that this particular vow is known as the kedāravrata (kedāravratam), that is to say, either a vow performed at Mount Kedāra in the Himalayas, or to Śiva in his form of Kedāra or Kedāranātha. Compare notes to verse 28 below, where Cm identifies Kubera's second vrata as the kedāravrata. See, too, Ck's comments on verse 29 below. The adjective can also mean "fierce or terrible," and a number of translators have rendered it in this way. Since, however, the god Rudra appears to Kubera in the very next verse, it seems apparent that the former interpretation is more appropriate in this context. Thus Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 460) translates, "pratiques de Rudra"; Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 411), "penance in order to gratify the Lord Mahādeva"; Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 407), "austerities . . . for the propitiation of Rudra"; Dutt (1894, p. 1596), "terrific vow"; Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1949), "fierce vow"; Gorresio (1870, p. 45), "un durissimo voto"; and Benoît (1999, p. 1255), "la discipline d'un terrible ascétisme." In keeping with the vulgate reading of the previous verse (244*, see notes to verse 20 above), Ct believes that Kubera undertakes his propitiation of Rudra in order to protect his erring kinsman. He introduces this verse by saying, "specifically in order to protect you (tvadrakṣaṇahetor eva—ahaṃ tv iti)." Cr, on the other hand, understands that Kubera's departure to propitiate Rudra is the reason for his failure to prevent Rāvaṇa from performing evil deeds (nanu pāpācaraṇasamaya eva kuto na nivāritam ity ata āha—aham ityādibhiḥ). KK and VSP (7.13.21) read vṛttam, "behavior or practice," for vratam, "vow." This reading is ascribed to Cg in the notes to GPP (7.13.21). However, Cg's commentary reads vratam and not vṛttam.

22. "together with the goddess Umā" saha devyomayā: D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead umayā sahitaḥ, "together with Umā."

"and" caiva: Literally, "and, indeed." D7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead daivāt, "by chance or fate." Cr glosses, "through the power of fate or destiny (bhāgyavaśāt)."

"I cast my left eye upon" savyaṃ cakṣur mayā . . . nipātitam: Literally, "the left eye was caused to fall upon by me." The mention of the left eye is significant here, since the left side of the body is the one associated with sexuality. See MBh 1.92.1–11, especially verse 3, where Gaṅgā, by sitting on the right thigh of Pratīpa, can no longer be considered a proper sexual object and thus cannot marry him. Instead, she becomes his daughter-in-law by marrying his son, Śantanu. See, too, MBh 2.63.12, where Duryodhana shows his left thigh to Draupadī as a sexual taunt. On the symbolism of the left thigh, see Sutherland 1989.

23. The episode is an example of the motif in which a male inadvertently casts his gaze upon the erotized body of the mother goddess and is cursed for this transgression. Perhaps the most widely distributed example of this motif is the well-known tale of the king Ila, who, as a result of a similar transgression, is cursed to become a woman. See Uttarakāṇḍa sargas 78–79 and R. Goldman 1993. In this case, Kubera's partial blinding, as in the case of Ila's gender transformation, must be understood as a form of castration. Compare Oedipus, who blinds himself for his sexual relationship with his mother. See, too, Freud 1914, p. 288 note; and R. Goldman 1978, pp. 360 and 391, note 251.

"I did so merely wondering, 'Who can this lovely woman be?'" kā nv iyaṃ syād iti śubhā: Literally, "'Who, indeed, might she be?' the lovely [one]." We understand this to be another of those occasions in which a word that is intended to be part of a quote is placed after the quotation marker iti. See notes to 7.4.1. D10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead kā nv eṣeti mahārāja, "'Who is she?' great king."

"and for no other reason" na khalv anyena hetunā: Kubera is delicately indicating that he had no voyeuristic or sexual motive in casting his glance upon the goddess. Ck and Ct make this explicit by suggesting that other reasons would include temptation, etc. (vikārādinety arthaḥ). This idea is made explicit also in the translation of Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 407), who renders, "and I innocently wondered who it could be: no other thought entered my mind." Cf. 5.9.34–42, where Hanumān rationalizes his viewing of Rāvaṇa's antaḥpuram.

"since . . . taken on incomparable beauty" rūpaṃ hy anupamaṃ kṛtvā: Literally, "for, having made an incomparable appearance or beauty." D6,7,10,11,M6,10, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read ca, "and," for hi, "for." Ct notes that the extraordinary beauty of the goddess is mentioned as the reason for Kubera's wonder (kā nv iti sūcitavismayahetum āha rūpaṃ ceti).

"Pārvatī . . . was dallying there" tatra krīḍati pārvatī: Literally, "Pārvatī plays or dallies there." D6,7,10,11,M6, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead rudrāṇī tatra tiṣṭhati, "Rudrāṇī stays there."

24. "Nonetheless, because of the radiance of the goddess" tato devyāḥ prabhāvena: Literally, "then by the splendor of the goddess." The words tato devyāḥ are marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. D6,10,11,T1,2,G,M1–5,7–10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead devyā divyaprabhāvena, "by the divine splendor or power of the goddess."

"my left eye was burned" dagdhaṃ savyaṃ mamekṣaṇam: Ck and Ct understand by the term dagdham, "burned," that Kubera's left eye is completely destroyed, that is, burned out or blinded. This leads them, and apparently Cr, to understand that the dimming and discoloration referred to in pādas cd affect his other eye, i.e., his right eye. (dagdhaṃ naṣṭam. savyetarat tu reṇudhvastaṃ reṇusparśakaluṣīkṛtam—so Ct.) This idea is reflected in the translations of Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 461); Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1949); Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 407); and Benoît (1999, p. 1255). There is nothing in the text itself at this point or later on, however, that suggests that Kubera's right eye is also damaged, and since it is clear that only the left eye has offended, there is no reason why the right should be affected. We therefore understand that Kubera's left eye has been damaged and its vision impaired, but not destroyed. This interpretation is shared by Gorresio (1870, p. 46); Dutt (1894, p. 1597); and Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 411). See verse 30 below.

"its sight grew dim as if obscured by dust" reṇudhvastam iva jyotiḥ piṅgalatvam upāgamat: Literally, "the light became tawny as if covered with dust." Ct offers two possible interpretations of the sequence jyotiḥ piṅgalatvam upāgatam. In the first, he appears to read the sequence as a compound, jyotiḥpiṅgalatvam, and glosses the phrase to mean "its condition became tawny because of that light, that is to say, that blazing splendor (jyotiṣā tejasā piṅgalaṃ tasya bhāvas tattvam)." Ck understands similarly. Ct's second, alternative, explanation is that dimness occurred that was like murky light (yadvā kaluṣitajyotir iva piṅgalatvaṃ prāptam ity arthaḥ).

25. "performed" samavāpa: Literally, "I obtained or endured." D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead samadhāram (samādhāram—so Cg), "I maintained," which the commentators gloss as the causal samadhārayam, "I caused to maintain."

"for a full eight hundred years" pūrṇaṃ varṣaśatāny aṣṭau: Literally, "fully, for eight hundred years." D3,10,11,T4,M4,6,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read tūṣṇīm, "silently," for pūrṇam, "fully."

26. "was delighted" prītaḥ: D6,7,10,11,G2,M5,10, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead tataḥ, "then."

Following verse 26, KK and VSP insert a passage of one line [246*]. See note to verse 30 below.

28. "vow . . . all but impossible to perform" vrataṃ suduścaram: Literally, "an extremely difficult to practice vow." Ś,Ñ,V3,B1,3,D3,7,8,10,11,T1,4, and Lahore, GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read suduṣkaram, "extremely difficult to carry out," for suduścaram, "extremely difficult to practice." Cm notes that the difficult vow in question is the kedāravrata, which is to be carried out over a period of twenty-one days. (vratam iti. etat suduṣkaraṃ vratam ekaviṃśatidinasādhyaṃ kedāravratam ity arthaḥ.) Compare notes to verse 21 above, where Cg identifies Kubera's first vrata as the kedāravrata. See, too, Ck's comments on verse 29 below. D2 and, according to the editors of GPP, the text of Cr reads suduṣkṛtam, "extremely difficult to carry out." VSP and KK read suniścayam, "[requiring] great resolve."

29. "please accept my friendship" sakhitvaṃ mayā sārdhaṃ rocayasva: Literally, "you must choose friendship together with me." D6,7,10,11,T1,3,G1,3,M1–3,6,8–10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read the vocative saumya, "gentle friend," for sārdham, "with."

"Since I have been won over by your austerities" tapasā nirjitatvād dhi: Literally, "because of being conquered by austerity." D7,10,11,T1,2,4,G3,M1–5,7,8, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead, tapasā nirjitaś caiva, "and [I] am conquered by austerity." Ck explains that the vow undertaken by Kubera, the kedāravrata, is normally to be accomplished in twenty-one days, but since Kubera had performed it in such an extremely arduous fashion (i.e., for eight hundred years), he received the extraordinary favor of Śiva's friendship. (etad vrataṃ kedāravratam ity arthaḥ. tat tv ekaviṃśatidinasādhyam api tasyaiva kṛcchrasaṃvaravadanuṣṭhānaṃ dhanadasya rocayasva rucitaṃ vṛṇv ity arthaḥ.) Compare notes to verses 21 and 28 above.

30. "your left eye" savyaṃ tavekṣaṇam: See notes to verse 24 above.

"Ekākṣipiṅgala, Dusky in One Eye" ekākṣipiṅgalety eva: Literally, "'Ekākṣipiṅgala ("Tawny in One Eye")' indeed." The sandhi is irregular. D6,7,10, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press avoid the problematic sandhi and read instead ekākṣipiṅgalīty eva, "'Ekākṣipiṅgalin' indeed." KK and VSP read instead ekākṣipiṅgalety evam, "thus, 'Ekākṣipiṅgala.'" See notes to verse 24 above. See, too, 7.36.17 and notes.

Following 30ab, D5–7,10,11,T3,M4,5,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP (following verse 26), insert a passage of one line [246*]: "and since you have acquired dim sight through gazing on the beauty of the goddess . . . (paiṅgalyaṃ yad avāptaṃ hi devyā rūpanirīkṣaṇāt)."

31. "When I had earned the friendship of Śaṅkara in this fashion and had taken my leave of him" evaṃ tena sakhitvaṃ ca prāpyānujñāṃ ca śaṅkarāt: Literally, "having thus acquired friendship with him and taken leave from Śaṅkara."

"I returned. Only then did I hear of your evil intentions." āgamya ca śruto 'yaṃ me tava pāpaviniścayaḥ: Literally, "and having come, by me was heard this evil resolution of yours."

For 31cd, Ś,Ñ,V1,3,B,D,T3,4,M6,10, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, and Gita Press, substitute a passage of one line [249*]: "And this evil behavior of yours was heard about[1] by me who had returned (āgatena mayaitac ca śrutaṃ te pāpaceṣṭitam)."

[1] "evil behavior of yours was heard about" śrutaṃ te pāpaceṣṭitam: D6,7,10,11,M6,10, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead śrutas te pāpaniścayaḥ, "your evil resolve was heard about."

32. "defiler of your lineage" kuladūṣaṇa: D6,7,10,11,T,1,2,G1,3,4,M1,2,4–10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the ablative kuladūṣaṇāt, which then modifies adharmiṣṭhasaṃyogāt, lending the phrase the meaning "from indulgence in such extreme unrighteousness, which defiles your lineage."

33. "was enraged, and his eyes grew red" kruddhaḥ saṃraktalocanaḥ: Literally, "angry, his eyes red." The reddening of the eyes is a stereotypical sign of anger in the epic. Compare 7.8.2; 7.16.10; 7.26.41; and 7.32.25. For examples in the Sundara- and Yuddhakāṇḍas, see 6.19.22–23; 6.31.72; and notes. D6,7,10,11,M10, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead the more usual compound, kopasaṃraktalocanaḥ, "his eyes red with rage."

"Clenching his fists and teeth" hastān dantāṃś ca saṃpīḍya: Literally, "having pressed together his hands and teeth." The plural hastān, "hands," suggests that we are to visualize Daśagrīva in his fearsome form with ten heads and twenty arms. See 7.9.25 and note. D6,T1,G3,M3, and KK and VSP read instead the dual hastau, "his two hands," indicating that Rāvaṇa is in his less fearsome aspect. D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read saṃpiṣya, "having ground or crushed," for saṃpīdya, "having pressed together."

34. "I know . . . the real meaning of these words" vijñātam . . . mayā . . . vākyam: Literally, "the speech is understood by me." We agree with Ck, Cg, and Ct, who take Rāvaṇa to be saying that he knows the true, inner meaning of Kubera's message (vākyaṃ vijñātaṃ vākyatātparyārtho vijñātaḥ—so Ct).

"that you have spoken" yat tvaṃ bhāṣase: D7,T1,2,G,M1–5,8–10, and KK and VSP read the genitive pronoun yasya, "of whom," in place of yat tvam, "which [i.e., that] you." This reading would then constitute a second subordinate clause, along with the one governed by yena, "by whom," in pāda d. Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 408), the only translator consulted to render this reading, translates, "I know what the message you have brought means, knowing as I do its author."

"Neither you nor my brother who sent you shall live!" naiva tvam asi naivāsau bhrātrā yenāsi preṣitaḥ: Literally, "by no means [shall] you be, nor [shall] he, the brother by whom you were sent, [be]." As Cr makes clear, Rāvaṇa is vowing to kill both Kubera and his messenger (tvaṃ naivāsi yena ca tvaṃ codito 'si sa bhrātāpi naivāsty ubhāv api haniṣyāmīti tātparyam). VSP and KK read the somewhat awkward naitat in place of naiva. This variant is not noted in the critical apparatus. The word bhrātrā, "by [my] brother," is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. D7,10,11, T1,2,G3,M1,3,5,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read the near synonym coditaḥ, "urged on, incited," for preṣitaḥ, "sent."

35. "is not saying this for my benefit" hitaṃ na sa mamaitad dhi bravīti: Literally, "he does not say this as a benefit to me." D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read the synonymous naiṣaḥ for na saḥ, "he not."

"Instead, fool, you are merely boasting about his friendship with Maheśvara." maheśvarasakhitvaṃ tu mūḍha śrāvayase kila: Literally, "But, fool, surely you cause [one] to hear about the friendship with Maheśvara." As Ck, Cg, and Ct point out, Rāvaṇa understands Kubera's account of his alliance with Maheśvara to be a veiled threat about his own power (tadrūpabalasaṃpadam ity arthaḥ—so Ct). Ck and Ct continue, noting that Rāvaṇa takes Kubera's autobiographical account wrongly because of his own evil-mindedness (kubereṇa svavṛttāntoktāv api rāvaṇaḥ svadurmatyā viparītaṃ gṛhītavān— so Ct). D3,6,7,10,11,M6, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead mūḍhaḥ śrāvayate for the critical mūḍha śrāvayase, lending the phrase the meaning "that fool is merely boasting." This reading directs the insult to Kubera rather than his messenger.

Following verse 35, D6,7,10,11,T1–3,G,M1–5,7–10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of one line [254*]: "By no means will I tolerate this[1] that you have said (naivedaṃ kṣamaṇīyaṃ me yad etad bhāṣitaṃ tvayā)."

[1] "By no means . . . this" naivedam: KK and VSP read instead na cedam, "And not this."

Following 254*, D6,7,10,11,T3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP continue with a passage of one line [255*]: "which, messenger, I have tolerated from him for such a long time (yad etāvan mayā kālaṃ dūta tasya tu marṣitam)."

36. "I always thought: 'I must not kill him, for he is my elder and my superior' " na hantavyo gurur jyeṣṭho mamāyam iti manyate: Literally, "It is thought: 'He, who is [my] elder, [my] superior, is not to be killed by me.' " The verb manyate is ambiguous. It can either be read as a passive in the sense of "it is thought," or as an active in the sense "he, she, or it thinks." Cr, whom we follow, understands the former, the idea being that, up until the point of the present provocation on Kubera's part, Rāvaṇa always thought that he could never bring himself to kill a respected elder (jyeṣṭho gurur ato yan na hantavya iti mayā manyate 'manyata). Ck, Cg, and Ct also understand that the thought is Rāvaṇa's but take the verb in its active sense, providing as its subject a term meaning "my heart or mind (hṛdayam or antarātmā)" (mama hṛdayaṃ gurur na hantavya iti pūrvam eva manyate sma—so Cg). It is also possible, especially in the absence of the southern insertions 254* and 255* (see notes to verse 35 above), to understand that the subject of the verb could be Kubera himself, who had been counting upon Rāvaṇa's reluctance to kill an elder as his insurance against retaliation for his harsh message. Among the translators consulted, only Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 408) understands the verse in this way, translating, "He apparently thinks that I am inhibited by the feeling that he, being my elder brother, was worthy of my reverence and should on no account be slain." We understand the genitive pronoun mama, "of me," as the agent of the gerundive. The word is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. Ś1,2,B1,3,4,D2,3,6–8,10,11, T1,3,4,G3,M1,4,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, and VSP read instead the less ambiguous mayā, "by me."

"But now, after hearing his words, this is exactly what I intend to do." tasya tv idānīṃ śrutvā me vākyam eṣā kṛtā matiḥ: Literally, "But now, having heard his speech, this resolution has been made by [lit., 'of'] me."

37. "This very hour . . . I" etan muhūrtam eṣo 'ham: Literally, "this moment, I, this one." D6,7,10,11,M4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read the emphatic particle eva in place of the pronoun eṣaḥ, "this one," further strengthening the immediacy of Rāvaṇa's intention. The sequence would now mean "Indeed, this very moment, I."

"and, on account of just one of them, I shall send all four world guardians" tasyaikasya kṛte ca vai / caturo lokapālāṃs tān nayiṣyāmi: Literally, "and, indeed, on account of him, alone, I will lead the four world guardians." At 7.3.14–17, Brahmā appointed Kubera as the fourth and last of the world guardians. D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read tu vai kṛte for kṛte ca vai. This reading can be taken in two ways, depending upon whether one breaks up the sequence into three words as above, or two, tu vaikṛte. In the former case, we have merely a reshuffling of the sequence of the critical edition, which would entail no change of the meaning. However, in the second, which is represented in NSP (7.13.39b) and read by Ck and Ct, a noun, vaikṛtam, "transformation, deformation," is introduced. Ck and Ct then understand the term to refer to his [i.e., Kubera's] being slain. (tasyaikasya tu vaikṛte. vadhaprasaṅga ity arthaḥ.) Cg's reading of the passage is ambiguous, but his interpretation is the same. He proposes adding the phrase "on the occasion of his being killed (tasyaikasya kṛte vadhaprasaṅga iti śeṣaḥ)." This interpretation may be what inspired Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 408), who renders, "because of the provocation that this one of them has given me."

39. "Then" tataḥ: KK and VSP read instead evam, "In this fashion." This variant is not noted in critical apparatus.

"performed benedictory rites" kṛtasvastyayanaḥ: Literally, "one by whom a svastyayana has been performed or completed." The svastyayana is a ceremony for ensuring good fortune or success in an undertaking or journey and commonly involves the recitation of mantras. It can be performed on behalf of someone setting out on a journey by others or by the person undertaking the journey or campaign himself. See 1.21.2; 2.18.38; 2.21.25; 2.22.19; 2.23.1; 4.16.10; 6.72.28; and 6.83.7.

"proceeded to where the lord of wealth was" yayau yatra dhaneśvaraḥ: As Cs points out, we are to understand that Rāvaṇa proceeds directly to Kubera's abode because Kubera is the principal target of his aggression (yatra dhaneśvaras tasyaiva mukhyoddeśyatvād iti bhāvaḥ).

Sarga 14

1–2. "marched forth . . . He was surrounded by six ministers . . . Those that accompanied him were" sa sacivaiḥ sārdhaṃ ṣaḍbhiḥ . . . / vṛtaḥ saṃprayayau: Literally, "he together with . . . [and] surrounded by six ministers, he set forth." The two verses form a single sentence, and the use of both sārdham, "together with," and vṛtaḥ, "surrounded by," in that sentence is redundant. T1,2,M3, and KK and VSP read the particle tu, "but or and," for the pronoun saḥ, "he." M3 and KK and VSP read the synonymous saṃvṛtaḥ prayayau for vṛtaḥ saṃprayayau, "he marched forth, surrounded."

"ever arrogant in their might" nityaṃ balotkaṭaiḥ: D10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead nityabaloddhataḥ, "ever haughty in might." The adjective has much the same meaning as the one in the critical edition, but here it refers to Rāvaṇa rather than to his ministers.

"Mahodara, Prahasta, . . . Dhūmrākṣa" mahodaraprahastābhyām . . . /. . . dhūmrākṣeṇa: On these rākṣasas, see 7.5.35–36 and notes.

"Mārīca, Śuka, Sāraṇa" mārīcaśukasāraṇaiḥ: These three rākṣasas are well known to the Rāmāyaṇa. Mārīca, the son of Tāṭakā and a friend and ally of Rāvaṇa, plays a prominent role in the Bālakāṇḍa (1.18.5; 1.24.8–10; 1.29.10–17) and the Araṇyakāṇḍa (sargas 33–43), while Śuka and Sāraṇa are two of Rāvaṇa's spies in the Yuddhakāṇḍa (sargas 16–19).

"who was . . . eager for battle" samaragṛdhnunā: D7,9–11,M4,7,8, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead the synonymous samaragardhinā.

3. "parks, and woodlands" vanāny upavanāni ca: On Cg's understanding of the difference between the two terms, see notes to 6.30.1–2.

"he reached" āviśat: Literally, "he entered or arrived at." Ś,V3,D2,6–12,T3,4,M10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead āgamat, "he came to."

4. "When the yakṣas had heard . . . they said . . . and went" niśamya . . . uktvā . . . gatāḥ: Literally, "having heard, having said, they went." The critical reading contains not so much as a pronoun to identify the subject of these verbal elements, although it is clear from the context that it must be the yakṣas of Kubera's court. Virtually all manuscripts and printed editions resolve this by inserting and/or substituting a passage in which the subject is indicated either explicitly with the word yakṣāḥ or implicitly by the pronoun te. See 258* and 259* below.

"encamped" taṃ niviṣṭam: Literally, "him [the rākṣasa], encamped." Ñ,B1,2,4,D1,3,4,6,7,10,11,T3,M6, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead saṃniviṣṭam, "[the rākṣasa, who was] encamped."

Following 4ab, Ñ,B1,2,4,D1,3,4,6,7,10,11,S (except T4) insert a passage of two lines [259*]: "[Having heard that the rākṣasa lord] that evil-minded one, who with his counselors was firmly resolved on battle,[1] [was encamped,] the yakṣas were unable to stand before that rākṣasa (yuddhe 'tyarthakṛtotsāhaṃ durātmānaṃ samantriṇam / yakṣā na śekuḥ saṃsthātuṃ pramukhe tasya rakṣasaḥ //)."

[1] "was firmly resolved on battle" yuddhe 'tyarthakṛtotsāham: Ñ2,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead yuddhepsuṃ taṃ kṛtotsāham, "of him desirous of battle [and] firmly resolved."

5. "intention" viniścayam: Ñ2,B,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead cikīrṣitam, "what he wished to do."

"and" caiva: Ś,Ñ,V1,3,B,D2,5–12,T3,4, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead hṛṣṭāḥ, "[they] delighted or excited."

6. "There was a surge of agitation . . . as in the ocean when it floods" saṃkṣobhaḥ sāgarasyeva vardhataḥ / abhūt: Literally, "there was agitation like that of the swelling ocean." Ś,V1,3,D2,5,7,8–12,T3,4, and Lahore, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead saṃkṣobho vyavardhata yatho-(ivo- —D10,11)dadheḥ / tasya, lending the passage the meaning "an agitation swelled up like that of the ocean . . . of that [king]."

"in the army of the king of the rākṣasas, sons of chaos" balasya . . . nairṛtarājasya: Literally, "of the army of the king of the nairṛtas." Given the narrative sequence here and the absence of any mention of rākṣasa troops other than the six ministers named in verse 1, it seems clear that the epithet must refer to Kubera. See 7.11.21 and notes, where Kubera is also identified as a leader of nairṛtas. Ś,Ñ,V1,3,B,D,T3,4,M10, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the plural balānām, "among the troops."

7. "the rākṣasa's" tasya rakṣasaḥ: Ś,Ñ,V,1,3,B,D2,5–12,T3,4, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead rākṣasaya te, "those [ministers] of the rākṣasa."

8. "the night-roaming rākṣasa" niśācaraḥ: Literally, "the night-roaming [one]."

"fighters" sainyam: Literally, "troops or fighting force." Since Rāvaṇa's entire contingent appears to consist only of himself and his six ministers, the term "army" seems excessive. See note to verse 6 above.

"he unleashed a roar in his excitement, and, in a rage, he rushed to the attack" harṣān nādaṃ tataḥ kṛtvā roṣāt samabhivartata: Literally, "Then, having made a roar from excitement, he attacked out of anger." For 8cd, Ś,Ñ,V1,3,B,D2,5–12,T3,4, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP substitute a passage of one line [261*]: "Having unleashed many roars in his excitement,[1] he rushed forward[2] in anger (harṣān nādān bahūn kṛtvā sa krodhād abhyadhāvata)."

[1] "many roars in his excitement" harṣān nādān bahūn: Ñ1,D5–7,10,11,T3,4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead harṣanādān bahūn, "many roars of excitement or many excited roars."

[2] "he rushed forward" abhyadhāvata: Ñ2,B3,D11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead abhyabhāṣata, "he spoke." The reading is marked with the word [sic] by the editors of the critical edition, no doubt because it fits the context poorly in that no words of Rāvaṇa follow it. This awkward reading is rendered by Dutt (1894, p. 1599) and by Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 462), who apparently is followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 413).

9. "Fearsome in their valor, each one of the rākṣasa lord's ministers then engaged in battle with a thousand of those thousands of foes." ye tu te rākṣasendrasya sacivā ghoravikramāḥ / te sahasraṃ sahasrāṇām ekaikaṃ samayodhayan //: Literally, "But they who were the fearsomely valorous ministers of the lord of the rākṣasas, they, one by one, caused to join battle a thousand of the thousands." The reading is not known to any printed edition consulted. Our understanding of the verse is the same as that of Ck, the only commentator to read with the critical edition, who understands that each of Rāvaṇa's ministers engages in battle with one thousand of the thousands of yakṣas (te tv ityādi te rāvaṇasacivāḥ sahasrāṇāṃ yakṣāṇām ekaikaṃ sahasraṃ pratyekaṃ samāyodhayat [sic.]). Ñ2,3,B1,2,4,D6,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP for pādas cd read instead teṣāṃ sahasram ekaiko yakṣāṇāṃ samayodhayat, "each one of them engaged in battle with a thousand yakṣas."

10. "Although . . . was being struck" vadhyamānaḥ: Literally, "[he,] being struck." Ś,Ñ2,D6–8,10,11, and Lahore, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead hanyamānaḥ, "[he] being struck."

"iron clubs" parighaiḥ: Ś,Ñ,V1,3,B,D2,5–12,T3,4, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead musalaiḥ, "with cudgels."

"plunged into the yakṣa army" tatsainyaṃ samagāhata: Literally, "he plunged into their army." One might also read tat sainyaṃ samagāhata, "he plunged into that army." We follow Cr, who glosses, "their, that is, the yakṣas' army (teṣāṃ yakṣāṇāṃ sainyam)." Cr, the only commentator to remark on the verb, glosses, "crushed (amathnāt)."

11. "ten-faced Daśagrīva" daśānanaḥ: Literally, "ten-faced [one]."

"was closely pressed on every side by the yakṣa lords, as if by pelting storm clouds" varṣamāṇair iva ghanair yakṣendraiḥ saṃnirudhyata: Ñ,B,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP substitute a passage of one line [262*] for 11cd: "He was blocked as if by pouring clouds with torrents[1] (varṣadbhir iva jīmūtair dhārābhir avarudhyata)."

[1] "with torrents" dhārābhiḥ: Ct understands the torrents (dhārābhiḥ) to be "masses of weapons (śastrasamūhaiḥ)."

Following 262*, Ñ,B,D6,7,10,11 continue, while V3,D1,3–5,S insert following verse 11, a passage of two lines [263*]: "Although he was struck with weapons by the yakṣas,[1] that hero suffered no more harm[2] than might a mountain drenched by clouds with hundreds of torrents[3] (vyathāṃ na kurute vīro yakṣaiḥ śastrasamāhataḥ / mahīdhara ivāmbhodair dhārāśatasamukṣitaḥ //)."

[1] "Although he was struck with weapons by the yakṣas" yakṣaiḥ śastrasamāhataḥ: V3,D6,7,10,11,T3,4, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead yakṣaśastraiḥ samāhataḥ, "struck by the weapons of the yakṣas."

[2] "that hero suffered no more harm" vyathāṃ na kurute vīraḥ: Literally, "the hero makes no harm or injury." We follow Cr, who understands that Rāvaṇa did not receive or obtain any injury (vyathāṃ na cakāra prāpa). Ñ,V1,B,D6,7,10,11,T3,4,M10, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead na cakāra vyathāṃ caiva, "and he made [i.e., suffered] no harm."

[3] "drenched . . . with hundreds of torrents" dhārāśatasamukṣitaḥ: Ct glosses, "drenched with hundreds of streams of blood issuing from the wounds caused by the weapons (śas trakṣatajanyarudhiradhārāśatasamukṣitaḥ)."

12. "that evil-minded rākṣasa" sa durātmā: Literally, "the evil-minded [one]." Ñ,V1,B, D6,7,10,11,T2,4,M10, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead sa mahātmā, "that great [one]."

"plunged into the army of the yakṣas, sending them to Yama's abode" praviveśa . . . sainyaṃ nayan yakṣān yamakṣayam: Literally, "leading the yakṣas to Yama's abode, he entered the army."

13. "Just as a fire driven by the wind" vātenāgnir ivāyattaḥ: Literally, "Just as a fire under the power of the wind." Ś,Ñ,V1,B,D2,5–12,T3,4, and Lahore, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read ādīptaḥ," flaring or blazing up," for āyattaḥ, "driven."

"Just as a fire . . . might consume . . . he consumed that very fearsome army" agnir iva . . . adahat sainyaṃ sudāruṇam: Literally, "like a fire, he consumed or burned up that very fearsome army." Ś,Ñ,V1,B,D2,5–12,T3,4, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read yakṣasainyaṃ dadāha tat, "he burned up that army of the yakṣas," for adahat sainyaṃ sudāruṇam, "he consumed that very fearsome army."

"parched woodland" kakṣam: Ct is the only commentator to gloss this term. He understands the term in its sense of "grass or straw (tṛṇam)" rather than its sense of "dry woodlands." All translations consulted, with the exceptions of Gorresio (1870, p. 48) and Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 410), understand the term to refer to grass.

14. "decimated . . . were all but destroyed" alpāvaśiṣṭāḥ . . . kṛtāḥ: Literally, "[they] were made such that they had a small remainder." Our understanding of the verse is similar to that of Ct, who understands that Rāvaṇa and his ministers together wipe out most of the yakṣas, leaving only a few survivors (rāvaṇena saha vartamānais tair āmātyair yakṣā alpāvaśeṣāḥ kṛtāḥ). Cr, on the other hand, appears to understand that those few yakṣas who had survived Rāvaṇa's assault are now slaughtered by his ministers like clouds destroyed by winds (alpāvaśeṣā ye yakṣās te mahodaraśukādibhir vātair ambudā iva kṛtā vināśitāḥ). This interpretation seems less convincing on both lexical and contextual grounds, since kṛtāḥ, "made or rendered," seems to be at best an elliptical synonym for vināśitāḥ, "destroyed," and the description of additional yakṣas fighting, dying, fleeing, etc., in the following verses belies the notion that all the yakṣa warriors had now been slain. Ś,Ñ,V1,B,D2,5–11,T3,4, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read the synonymous alpāvaśeṣāḥ . . . kṛtāḥ.

"in battle by his ministers" tasya mṛdhe 'mātyaiḥ: Ś,Ñ,B,D2,5,8,10–12,T3,4, and Lahore, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tasya mahāmātyaiḥ, "by his great ministers." D6,7,9, and Gorresio read sahāmātyaiḥ, "together with his ministers," for the critical edition's mṛdhe 'mātyaiḥ. Although this variant is not recorded in any of the printed editions of Ct (GPP, NSP, and Gita Press), it appears to be the reading upon which he comments as noted above.

"Śuka" -śuka-: On this figure, see 7.18.17; 373*, following notes to 7.19.13; and notes.

15. "Some of them fell . . . Others were knocked to the ground" kecit . . . patitāḥ . . . bhuvi pātitāḥ: Literally, "some fell . . . [some] were felled on the ground." The normal epic idiom in this type of passage is to use separate pronouns, such as kecit, anye, pare, etc., for the different groups of individuals described. Here, however, in the absence of a second pronoun, we have supplied one, since taking the participles patitāḥ and pātitāḥ to refer to the same individuals seems redundant. Ñ2,B1,2,D5–7,10,11, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read kupitā raṇe, "furious in battle," for bhuvi pātitāḥ, "were felled on the ground."

"on the battleground" samarakṣitau: Ś,Ñ2,V1,B,D2,5–12,M6, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead samare kṣitau, "in battle, on the ground."

"their limbs hacked off by weapons" āyudhabhagnāṅgāḥ: Literally, "having limbs or bodies broken by weapons." Ś,Ñ,V1,B1,3,D2,5–12, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead samāhatā bhagnāḥ, "struck [and] broken." Ct and Cr gloss, "with broken limbs (bhagnagātrāḥ)" for "broken (bhagnāḥ)."

"biting their lips with their sharp teeth" oṣṭhān svadaśanais tīkṣṇair daṃśantaḥ: Literally, "biting lips with their own sharp teeth." Ñ2,B1,4,7,10,11,T3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read oṣṭhāṃṣ ca daśanaiḥ, "and lips with [their] teeth," for oṣṭhān svadaśanaiḥ, "lips with [their] own teeth." Ñ2,B1,2,D5–7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read the imperfect adaśan, "they bit," for the present participle daṃśantaḥ, "biting," while Lahore reads the perfect dadaṃśuḥ, "they bit."

16. "one another in terror" bhayād anyonyam: Literally, "one another out of fear." Ś,Ñ1,B1,2,4,D8,12,T3, and Lahore and Gorresio read instead śrāntās tv anyonyyam, "but exhausted . . . one another," while Ñ2,V1,B3,D6,7, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read śrāntāś cānyonyam, "and exhausted . . . one another."

"some of the yakṣas . . . collapsed" niṣedus te . . . yakṣāḥ: Literally, "those yakṣas sank down." See note to verse 15 above. Ñ2,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead sīdanti ca, "and they sit down." Ś,Ñ,V1,B,D3,5–13, and Lahore and Gorresio read instead sīdanti sma, "they sat down."

"like the banks of a river undercut by the current" kūlā jalahatā iva: Literally, "like banks struck by water." D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead kūlā iva jalena ha. This elliptical reading would mean "[they collapsed] like banks by water."

17. "What with the slain, who, after fighting on the surface of the earth, had ascended to heaven, and the hosts of seers, who were watching from there, there was no room left in the heavens." hatānāṃ svargasaṃsthānāṃ yudhyatāṃ pṛthivītale / prekṣatām ṛṣisaṃghānāṃ na babhūvāntaraṃ divi //: Literally, "There was no space in heaven for those who were slain, situated in heaven, fighting on the surface on the earth, [and] the watching hosts of seers." The verse is ambiguous in that it is hard to determine exactly how many groups of individuals are mentioned. The ambiguities are further heightened by the principal variants found in Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP. The issue is whether to understand that the yakṣas slain in battle who ascend to heaven are the same ones who had been fighting on earth or whether the ones who were slain ascended to heaven, while others continued to fight on the ground. In the latter case, one would have to understand that, between the two groups of yakṣas and the seers, both the heavens and the earth are densely crowded. Several translators have rendered in this fashion, taking those who fight and those who are slain as separate groups (Gorresio 1870, p. 49; Roussel 1903, vol. 3, p. 463; Shastri 1959, vol. 3, p. 413; Gita Press 1969, vol. 3, p. 1952; and Benoît 1999, p. 1257). We, however, share the view of Cv, Ck, and Ct, also articulated in Dutt's note to the passage (1894, p. 1599), that the yakṣa warriors who were fighting on the ground have now been slain and, as warriors slain in battle, have ascended to heaven, where they join the ranks of the dense crowds of heavenly beings who have gathered to watch the conflict (pṛthivītale yudhyatāṃ hatānām ata eva svargasthānāṃ tathā vyomni sthitvā yuddhaṃ prekṣatāṃ prekṣamāṇām ṛṣisaṃghānāṃ ca divy ākāśe 'ntaram avasthātum avakāśo na babhūva. vyomni nibiḍam abhūd ity arthaḥ—so Cg, Ck; Ct similarly). The situation is complicated by the variants, which both eliminate mention of a specific locus of the crowding and add an additional participle. This creates the possibility of understanding that as many as four discrete groups contribute to the crowded conditions. In place of pāda a, Ś,Ñ,V1,3,B,D2,5–12,T,3,4, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead hatānāṃ gacchatāṃ svargam, "of the slain, who were going to heaven." In place of pāda b, Ś,Ñ,V1,3,B,D2,5–8,10–12,T3, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead yudhyatām atha dhāvatām, "of those who were fighting and who were running away." Some of the translators who share this reading understand that a single group is running about fighting (Dutt 1894, p. 1599; Roussel 1903, vol. 3, p. 463; Shastri 1959, vol. 3, p. 413; and Benoît 1999, p. 1257). Others understand that dhāvatām refers to those yakṣas who are not fighting but fleeing, thus adding a fourth group to the mix (Gorresio 1870, p. 49 and Gita Press 1969, p. 1952).

Following verse 17, Ś,Ñ,V1,3,B,D,T3,4, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of two lines [264*]: "And when the great-armed lord of wealth saw that those[1] immensely powerful[2] yakṣa lords were broken, he sent forth his generals[3] (bhagnāṃs tāṃs tu samālakṣya yakṣendrān sumahābalān / dhanādhyakṣo mahābāhuḥ preṣayāmāsa nāyakān //)."

[1] "And . . . those" tāṃṣ tu: Ñ,B2,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read tu tān by transposition.

[2] "immensely powerful" sumahābalān: Ñ,D6,7,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tu mahābalān, "and [those] of great power."

[3] "generals" nāyakān: D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead yakṣakān. The term is unattested and may simply be a metrical variant for yakṣa. Cr, the only commentator to remark on this reading, glosses, "other great yakṣas (mahāyakṣāntarāṇi)." Benoît (1999, p. 1719) in a note to the passage appears to echo Cr's gloss, although he does not cite him. He claims that, although the difference between the terms yakṣa and yakṣaka is not clear, the latter term seems to refer to a particular type of yakṣa, more powerful and combative than the others.

18. "an enormous yakṣa . . . arrived" agamat sumahān yakṣaḥ: Ñ2,B1,2,4,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead preṣito nyapatad yakṣaḥ, "a yakṣa, who had been dispatched, attacked."

"Saṃyodhakaṇṭaka" saṃyodhakaṇṭakaḥ: The name, as expected, has many variants. The syllable -dha- is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. Ck and Ct feel called upon to provide an etymology of the yakṣa's name. They explain the name Saṃyodhakaṇṭaka, "Thorn in Battle or Thorn of Warriors," as the thorn, i.e., destroyer, of warriors who face him (saṃyodhānāṃ samakṣayoddhṝṇāṃ kaṇṭakaḥ saṃharteti saṃyodhakaṇṭakaḥ).

19. "Struck down by that yakṣa" tena yakṣeṇa . . . samāhataḥ: Ś,Ñ,V1,3,B1–3,D2,5–12, T3, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tena cakreṇa [Lahore yakṣeṇa] . . . raṇe hataḥ, "[Mārīca] was struck down by him with a discus in battle." Cs reminds us that the basis for the simile is the fact that both the yakṣa and Viṣṇu use the discus as their weapon (cakrāyudhasāmyād viṣṇudṛṣṭāntaḥ).

"fell and crashed to the earth" patitaḥ pṛthivīṃ bheje: Literally, "[He,] fallen, had recourse to the earth." D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead patito bhūtale śailāt, "[He] fell to the surface of the earth from the mountain." Ct reminds us that the mountain in question is Kailāsa (śailāt kailāsāt).

"from the heavens when his merit is exhausted" kṣīṇapuṇya ivāmbarāt: Literally, "like he whose merit is exhausted from the sky." Ś,Ñ,V1,3,B,D2,5–12,T3,4, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read iva grahaḥ, "as a planet or heavenly body," for ivāmbarāt, "as from the sky." Both variants reflect the common Indian concept that heavenly beings, who have attained their lofty station through the accumulation of merit, fall to earth in the form of meteors or shooting stars when their stores of merit are exhausted. See 5.7.39; 5.15.20; and notes.

20. "Regaining consciousness after a moment . . . composed himself" prāptasaṃjño muhūrtena viśramya: Literally, "he by whom consciousness was regained after a moment having rested." See, for example, 6.23.7; 6.76.7; and notes for a similar use of the adverb muhūrtena. Ś,Ñ,V1,3,B,D2,5–12,T3,4, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the nearly synonymous sasaṃjñas tu (Ś3,D2 read tam), "and conjoined with consciousness," for prāptasaṃjñaḥ, "by whom consciousness was regained."

"the night-roaming rākṣasa" niśācaraḥ: Literally, "the night-roaming [one]."

21. "Then, at the perimeter, watched over by the gatekeepers, Daśagrīva breached the gateway, every part of which was ornamented with gold and which was inlaid with lapis and silver." tataḥ kāñcanacitrāṅgaṃ vaidūryarajatokṣitam / maryādāṃ dvārapālānāṃ

toraṇaṃ tat samāviśat //: Literally, "Then he entered that gateway-arch whose parts were variegated with gold and which was sprinkled with lapis and silver and which was the boundary of the gatekeepers." The verse is awkward and elliptical. We know that the subject of the verb is Daśagrīva, rather than the figures mentioned in the previous verse, only from the following verse. As the verse is explained by Cs, and also Cm, quoted by Ct, Rāvaṇa has forced his way into the interior of the gateway arch, which constitutes the boundary for the prevention of the entry of unfamiliar persons. (maryādām aparicitapuruṣapraveśaparihārāyāvadhibhūtām. toraṇasyāntaraṃ madhyasthānam āviśat—so Cs; Cm [as quoted by Ct] similarly.) Ct, Cr, and Cs all indicate that we should supply the name Rāvaṇa (āviśad rāvaṇa iti śeṣaḥ).

"by the gatekeepers" dvārapālānām: Literally, "of the gatekeepers." The reading is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. Ś,Ñ,V1,3,B,D,T3,M6, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead pratihārāṇām, "of the doorkeepers."

"inlaid with lapis and silver" vaidūryarajatokṣitam: Literally, "which was sprinkled with lapis and silver." KK and VSP read instead vaidūryarajasokṣitam, which would yield the meaning "which was sprinkled or coated with lapis dust or powder." This reading appears to be reflected in the translation of Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 410), who renders, "encrusted with lapis lazuli." See note to 7.12.8.

22. "But, Rāma . . . night-roaming rākṣasa" tato rāma . . . niśācaram: Literally, "then Rāma, . . . the night-roaming [one]." Ś,V1,3,D2,7,12, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read taṃ tu rājan for tato rāma. This lends the line the meaning "But, O king . . . that night-roaming rākṣasa."

Following verse 22, Ś,Ñ,V1,3,B,D2,5–12,T3,4, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of one line [265*]: "Though he was challenged by the yakṣa, Rāvaṇa still[1] entered (sa vāryamāṇo yakṣeṇa praviveśaiva rāvaṇaḥ)."

[1] "Rāvaṇa still" [e]va rāvaṇaḥ: Ñ,V1,B,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead niśācaraḥ, "the night-roaming [rākṣasa]."

Thereafter, Ñ,B,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP continue, D1,3,4,T1,2,G,M insert after verse 22,.while T4 inserts after 23ab, a passage of one line [266*]: "Though he was blocked by him,[1] your majesty,[2] the rākṣasa did not stop (sa tena vārito rājan na vyatiṣṭhat sa rākṣasaḥ)."

[1] "he . . . by him" sa tena: Ñ,B,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead yadā tu, "But when."

[2] "your majesty" rājan: Ñ,B,D6,7,10,11,G3,M5, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead rāma, "O Rāma."

23. "Although the rākṣasa was struck by the gateway hurled by the yakṣa" rākṣaso yakṣasṛṣṭena toraṇena samāhataḥ: Literally, "the rākṣasa was struck by the gateway released by the yakṣa." Ś,Ñ,V3,B,D,T3,4,M6,7, (D1,3,4,M6,7, second time), and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read sa śailaśikharābheṇa for rākṣaso yakṣasṛṣṭena, lending the line the sense "Struck by that gateway that resembled a mountain peak, he."

"he was not injured, Rāma" na kṣatiṃ prayayau rāma: Literally, "he did not go to injury, Rāma." Ñ,V,B,D6,7,10,11,M6, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead jagāma na kṣatiṃ vīraḥ, literally, "that hero did not go to injury."

"because of the boon of Brahmā, who was born from the waters" varāt salilayoninaḥ: Literally, "from the boon of the one who has water as his womb." Ś,Ñ,V3,B,D2,5–12, T3,4,M3, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead varadānāt svayaṃbhuvaḥ, "from the gift of the boon of the self-existent one." On the motif of Rāvaṇa's boon, see note to 7.10.16.

Following 23ab, Ñ1,2,B,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of one line [267*]: "Gushing blood, he resembled a mountain with streams of minerals (rudhiraṃ prasravan bhāti śailo dhātusravair iva)."

24. "And then, with that very same gateway, he struck down that yakṣa" sa tu tenaiva taṃ yakṣaṃ toraṇena samāhanat: According to Ck, Cg, and Ct, we should understand the term "gateway (toraṇa-)" to refer to "the beam or post of the gateway (toraṇadaṇḍa-—Ck, Cg)." For these two pādas (23ab), Ś,Ñ,V3,B,D2,5–12,T3, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP substitute a passage of one line [268*]: "Then he in turn was struck by the rākṣasa[1] with the very same gateway (tenaiva toraṇenātha rakṣasā so 'pi tāḍitaḥ)."

[1] "in turn was struck by the rākṣasa" rakṣasā so 'pi tāḍitaḥ: Ñ,V3,B1,2,4,D6,7,10,11, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead yakṣas tenābhitāḍitaḥ, "the yakṣa was struck by that."

"Pulverized, the yakṣa simply vanished." nādṛśyata tadā yakṣo bhasma tena kṛtas tu saḥ: Literally, "Then that yakṣa was rendered into ash by that and was not seen." We agree with Ck, Cg, Ct, and Cr, who understand bhasma, "ash," here to refer to "powder." Ck and Cg gloss, cūrṇitaḥ, "pulverized." Ct and Cr understand similarly. Ñ1,3,B1,D6,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read bhasmīkṛtatanus tadā, "then he was one whose body was reduced to ash."

25. "Witnessing his valor, all of the yakṣas" sarve yakṣā dṛṣṭvā parākramam: Literally, "having seen valor, all the yakṣas." Ñ2,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead sarve dṛṣṭvā rakṣaḥparākramam, "all, having seen the valor of the rākṣasa."

Following verse 25, Ñ,V,1,3,B3,D5–7,9–11,T3,4, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of one line [269*]: "abandoning their weapons, exhausted,[1] their faces pale, [the yakṣas] then [entered] (tyaktapraharaṇāḥ śrāntā vivarṇavadanās tadā)."

[1] "exhausted" śrāntāḥ: D3,5, and KK and VSP read instead śāntāḥ, "pacified, subdued."

Sarga 15

1. "Then, seeing that the yakṣas had fled in their hundreds and thousands" tatas tān vidrutān dṛṣṭvā yakṣāñ śatasahasraśaḥ: D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tatas tāṃl lakṣya vitrastān yakṣendrāṃś ca sahaśraśaḥ, "Then, observing that the yakṣa lords in their thousands were terrified."

"the lord of wealth himself went forth to battle" svayam eva dhanādhyakṣo nirjagāma raṇaṃ prati: Ś,Ñ,V1,3,B2,3,4,D2,5–12,T4, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP substitute, while D1,4 insert after 1ab, and D3,T3 insert after verse 1, a passage of one line [270*]: "The lord of wealth then spoke to the great yakṣa Māṇibhadra[1] (dhanādhyakṣo mahāyakṣaṃ māṇibhadram athābravīt)."

[1] "Māṇibhadra" māṇibhadram: D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead māṇicāram, "Māṇicāra." Ck, Cg, and Ct all note that Māṇicāra is another name for Māṇibhadra. See Yuddhakāṇḍa, App. I, No. 9, following notes to 6.13.5. Note especially the commentators' remarks at note 3.

Following 270*, Ś,Ñ,V1,3,B2,3,4,D2,5–12,T4, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP continue with a passage of two lines [271*]: "'Yakṣa lord, you must slay the evil-minded miscreant Rāvaṇa.[1] You must be the refuge of the heroic and warlike yakṣas (rāvaṇaṃ jahi yakṣendra durvṛttaṃ pāpacetasam / śaraṇaṃ bhava vīrāṇāṃ yakṣāṇāṃ yuddhaśālinām //)."

[1] "Rāvaṇa" rāvaṇam: Only Cs among the commentators consulted catches Kubera's anachronistic use of the name Rāvaṇa, which will not, in fact, be given to Daśagrīva until his well-known encounter with Śiva in the following sarga. He justifies the seeming lapse by claiming that Kubera is omniscient [and would thus have prior knowledge of Daśagrīva's future epithet]. (rāvaṇam iti. tasyānupadam eva śivena dīyamānaṃ nāma sārvajñād anenodāhṛtam.) See notes to 7.9.25.

2. "There was an all-but-invincible yakṣa there by the name of Māṇicara." In verse 6 below and following, this yakṣa is called Māṇibhadra. Ś,Ñ,V1,3,B2–4,D2,5–12,T3,4, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP substitute a passage of one line [272*]: "Addressed in this fashion, great-armed and unconquerable Māṇibhadra (evam ukto mahābāhur māṇibhadraḥ sudurjayaḥ)."

"he" saḥ: Ś1,Ñ2,V3,D1,3–7,10,11,T3,G1,2,M4–7,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tu, "and."

3. "in battle" raṇe: Ś,Ñ,V1,3,B2,D,T3,4, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tadā, "then."

Following verse 3, Ś,Ñ,V1,3,B2–4,D2,5–12,T3,4, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of one line [273*]: "Giving tumultuous battle, wheeling swiftly like falcons[1] (kurvantas tumulaṃ yuddhaṃ carantaḥ śyenaval laghu)."

[1] "like falcons" śyenavat: See note to 6.75.20.

Following 273*, Ñ,V3,B2–4,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of three lines [274*]: "shouting, 'Well done!' 'Give!' 'I don't want to!' 'You must give!'[1][1] Then the gods, together with the gandharvas and the seers, those expounders of the vedas, observing that tumultuous battle, were filled with the greatest wonder.[2–3]"

[1] "shouting, 'Well done!' 'Give!' 'I don't want to!' 'You must give!' " bāḍhaṃ prayaccha necchāmi dīyatām iti bhāṣiṇaḥ: Cr and Cs propose various ways of supplementing the three elliptical imperatives that various combatants shout out in the course of the battle. Cr understands that we are to provide the word "battle" as the object of the imperative "give (prayaccha)" and the infinitive "to retreat" to supplement the phrase "I don't want to." He then proposes two ways to supply the ellipsis created by the passive imperative "it must be given," both adding "your weapon" and glossing the verb in the sense of "cut down," the object of which would be [the enemy's] weapon. (yakṣādayaḥ prayaccha yuddham iti śeṣaḥ. necchāmi nivartitum iti śeṣaḥ. dīyatāṃ svaśastram iti śeṣaḥ. kiñca dīyatāṃ chidyatām asya śastram iti śeṣa iti bhāṣiṇo babhūvur iti śeṣaḥ.) Cs understands that one yakṣa says, "Give battle"; another says, "Very well, so be it!"; a third says, "I don't want to fight with you," while his opponent replies, "Why don't you want to? You must give battle." (kaścid vadati yuddhaṃ prayaccheti. aparas tu bāḍham om iti vadati. anyas tu tvayā saha yuddhaṃ necchāmi. pratibhaṭas tu kuto necchasi yuddhaṃ dīyatām ity evaṃ bhāṣiṇa ity anvayaḥ.) Translators render variously. For this type of colorful rendition of battlefield cries, compare 6.34.3–4 and notes.

4. "Nonetheless, Prahasta" tataḥ prahastena tadā: Literally, "After that Prahasta then." Ñ,V3,B2–4,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead yakṣāṇāṃ tu [B2—ca] prahastena, "and by Prahasta [a thousand] of the yakṣas." See 7.1.16 and 7.5.35–36 and notes.

"a thousand of them" sahasram: Literally, "a thousand."

"with his mace" gadayā: Ñ2,D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead cānindyam, "and blameless or irreproachable." This poorly attested adjective seems odd in the context. Those commentators who share the reading ignore it. Translators vary. Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 464), Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1954), and Benoît (1999, p. 1258) take it in its common meaning of "irreproachable." Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 415), apparently misunderstanding the syntax of Roussel (see Goldman and Goldman 2009, pp. 115–17), mistakenly applies the adjective to Mahodara. Dutt (1894, p. 1601) extends the meaning of the adjective, rendering, "capable." Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 411) simply ignores it.

5. "Rāma" rāma: Ñ,V3,B2,3,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead rājan, "O king."

"evil-minded" durātmanā: Ś,Ñ,V3,B3,4,D3,5–8,10–12, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead yuyutsunā, "eager for battle."

Following verse 5, Ñ2,V1,3,B2–4,D3,5–7,10,11,T3,4, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of two lines [276*]: "What comparison is there, tiger among men, between the straightforward fighting of the yakṣas and[1] the rākṣasas' reliance on the power of magical illusion? By means of the latter, the rākṣasas proved superior[2] in battle. (kva ca yakṣārjavaṃ yuddhaṃ kva ca māyābalāśrayam / rakṣasāṃ puruṣavyāghra tena te 'bhyadhikā yudhi //) "

[1] "What comparison is there . . . between . . . and" kva ca . . . kva ca: Literally, "where [on the one hand] and where [on the other]." This is a typical Sanskrit idiom to express the incommensurability of two things. See, for example, 1.55.4; 6.74.14; and notes. Cf. RaghuVa 1.2.

[2] "the rākṣasas' . . . By means of the latter, the rākṣasas proved superior" rakṣasām . . . tena te 'bhyadhikāḥ: Literally, "of the rākṣasas . . . by that, they [were] greater."

6. "In that great battle, Māṇibhadra confronted Dhūmrākṣa. Although he was angrily struck in the chest with a cudgel, he was not shaken." dhūmrākṣeṇa samāgamya māṇibhadro mahāraṇe / musalenorasi krodhāt tāḍito na ca kampitaḥ: Literally, "Having met with Dhūmrākṣa in the great battle, Māṇibhadra was struck out of anger on the chest with a cudgel and was not shaken." In verse 2 above this yakṣa is called Māṇicara. On Dhūmrākṣa, see notes to 7.5.35–36.

7. "he collapsed" nipapāta ha: Literally, "indeed, he fell down." Ñ2,B2,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead sa papāta ha, "he fell, indeed."

8. "ten-faced Daśagrīva" daśānanaḥ: Literally, "the ten-faced [one]."

"he charged . . . in a towering rage" abhyadhāvat susaṃkruddhaḥ: Ñ2,B2–4,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead abhyadhāvata saṃgrāme, "he charged into battle."

9. "But as he . . . in his rage" taṃ kruddham: Literally, "him, who was angry." Ñ1,D10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead saṃkruddham, "enraged."

"like the fire blazing up at the end of a cosmic era" yugāntāgnim ivotthitam: Literally, "like fire that has arisen at the end of the yuga." Ñ2,B2–4,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead māṇibhadro daśānanam, "Māṇibhadra [pierced] the ten-faced [one]."

"pierced" tāḍayāmāsa: Literally, "he hit or struck."

10. "But he, in turn, was then struck with a mace by the rākṣasa king" tato rākṣasarājena tāḍito gadayā: D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tāḍito māṇibhadrasya mukuṭe prāharat, "struck, he struck at Māṇibhadra's diadem."

"in battle" raṇe: The word is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition.

"his diadem was knocked to one side" mukuṭaḥ pārśvam āgataḥ: Literally, "the diadem came to the side." D6,10,11,M10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the synonymous mukuṭaṃ pārśvam āgataṃ.

"was known as Pārśvamauli, 'He of the Sideways Diadem'" pārśvamaulir iti smṛtaḥ: Literally, "[he is] remembered as 'Pārśvamauli.'" The term mauli also refers to the head, and it is possible that the intention is that Māṇibhadra's head is injured in such a way as to prevent him from holding it erect. This would be, perhaps, a more lasting injury and more worthy of a permanent epithet. This seems to be the interpretation of Ck and Ct, who gloss mukuṭa as "the place of the diadem or crown (mukuṭasthalam)," apparently referring to the head. The interpretation of Ck and Ct appears to have inspired the translation of Dutt (1894, p. 1602), who renders, "and at that stroke his crown was depressed at one side. And from that day forth that Yaksha remained with his head hollow on one side." Ñ,B2–4,D6,7,9–11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead pārśvamaulir abhūt kila, "he became Pārśvamauli, it is said."

Following verse 10, D3,4,T1,3,G,M, and GPP (in brackets between verses 7.15.14 and 15), KK (7.15.15ab), and VSP (7.15.15ab) insert a passage of one line [278*]: "Then, although he was blocked by Māṇibhadra, who continued to engage him,[1] he did not waver [lit., 'shake'] (tataḥ saṃyudhyamānena viṣṭabdho nāpy akampata)."

[1] "Māṇibhadra, who continued to engage him" saṃyudhyamānena: Literally, "by [him] who was fighting or being fought with."

11. "When the . . . yakṣa . . . had retreated" yakṣe vimukhe: Literally, "when the yakṣa was one whose face was turned away." Ś1,Ñ,V1–3,B3,4,D2,5–7,9–12,T3,4, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead vimukhībhūte, "[when Māṇibhadra] became one with an averted face." Compare note to verse 22 below.

"Rāma" rāma: Ś,Ñ,V1,3,B2,3,D2,5–8,10–12, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead rājan, "O king."

"a deafening cheer" saṃnādaḥ sumahān: Literally, "a very great roar." We follow Ct, who points out that this would be the cheering of the rākṣasas (saṃnādo rakṣasām).

"arose" vyavardhata: KK (7.15.16) and VSP (7.15.16) read instead abhyavartata, "[a roar] occurred."

12. "accompanied by Śaṅkha and Padma" sañkhapadmasamāvṛtaḥ: Literally, "surrounded by Śaṅkha and Padma." These names, which mean, respectively, "conch" and "lotus," are the names of two of the nine treasures or treasuries of Kubera. The nine are listed as follows in a verse cited by Apte (s.v. navanidhi): "The nine treasures are [called]: Mahāpadma, Padma, Śaṅkha, Makara, Kacchapa, Mukunda, Kunda, Nīla, and Karva (mahāpadmaś ca padmaś ca śaṅkho makarakacchapau / mukundakundanīlāś ca karvaś ca nidhayo nava //)." We follow the suggestion of Ck, Cg, Cm, Ct, and Cr that the names here refer to the presiding deities of these treasuries (śaṅkhapadmanidhyabhimānidevaiḥ saṃvṛtaḥ). Cv offers another meaning. He suggests that we are to understand by the two named deities that, by a kind of lakṣaṇā, all nine are intended. Cv notes that it is impossible to be surrounded by only two individuals and indicates that the other treasuries are mentioned elsewhere [at verse 28 below]. (śaṅkhapadmasamāvṛta ity atrānyo 'rtho veditavyaḥ. dvābhyāṃ samāvṛtatvāsaṃbhavāt paratra ca śaṅkhapadmādīnāṃ nidhīnām upādānāc ca.) Ñ2,V1,3,B2,3,D5–7,10,11,T3,4, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read by transposition padmaśaṅkhāsamāvṛtaḥ.

"appeared" pradadṛśe: We are inclined to agree with Ck, Cg, and Cr, who appear to read the verb intransitively, especially in light of the fact that in the following verse Kubera is said to see Rāvaṇa, which would make a transitive reading in this verse seem redundant. Ct, however, reads the verb transitively, indicating that we should connect the verb with the word "brother" [in the following verse] (dhanādhyakṣo bhrātaram iti saṃbandhaḥ). This interpretation is reflected in the translations of Dutt (1894, p. 1602), Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 465), Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 415), and Benoît (1999, p. 1259).

"with Śukra and Proṣṭhapada" śukraproṣṭhapadābhyām: Śukra is a name for the planet Venus and Proṣṭhapada for the month Bhādrapada, which is governed by the twenty-fifth and twenty-sixth nakṣatras. In this context, however, it seems probable that Cg is correct in taking these as the names of two of Kubera's ministers (mantriṇau—so Cg). Ck, Cm, Ct, and Cr further specify that they are ministers who guard Kubera's treasures (nidhirakṣakamantribhyām—so Ct).

13. "who because of the curse was deprived of all sense of decorum" śāpād vibhraṣṭagauravam: Literally, "one whose respect has fallen away because of a curse." The curse is that pronounced by Rāvaṇa's father, Viśravas, that he would be of a vicious nature (7.9.17–18). The term gauravam, "weightiness, importance," is ambiguous in that it can mean both the inherent dignity or respectability of a person or a person's sense of respect for elders and others who are to be held in high esteem. Given the context in which Rāvaṇa is violating the culture's norms of deference by assaulting his elder brother, we agree with Ck, Cg, Ct, and Cr, who understand that Rāvaṇa is devoid of that excellent quality that would inspire him to act respectfully, etc. (vandanādiprayojakaśreṣṭhatvagauravarahitam akṛtavandanādivyavahāram iti yāvat—so Ct). Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 465), however, understands that Rāvaṇa has lost all dignity. He renders, "qui . . . avait perdu toute dignité." In this he is followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 415) and Benoît (1999, p. 1259).

"the wise Kubera" dhīmān: Literally, "the wise [one]."

"the lineage of their grandfather" paitāmahe kule: Literally, "the grand-paternal family." Again, we understand this as a reference to Pulastya, the grandfather of both Rāvaṇa and Kubera, although many translators understand the reference to be to Grandfather Brahmā. See notes to 7.12.18.

14. "Although I tried to stop you" mayā tvaṃ vāryamāṇo 'pi: Literally, "even though you are being prevented by me." Ñ,B2,3,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead yan mayā vāryamāṇas tvam, "since you are being prevented by me." Ct fleshes out the elliptical expression by adding the phrase "from evil conduct (asadvṛttād iti śeṣaḥ)."

"evil-minded wretch" durmate: Literally, "evil-minded [one]." This could also mean "fool."

"Only after you have received your just deserts" paścād asya phalaṃ prāpya: Literally, "afterward having obtained the fruit of this." The commentators offer various phrases to serve as the referent of the nonspecific pronoun asya, "of this." Ct sees the pronoun as referring to two behaviors on Rāvaṇa's part: 1) failure to heed Kubera's advice and 2) crimes such as transgressing the rules of proper deference. Ck mentions only the second of these. (asya madvacanākaraṇasya pūjyapujāvyatikramādidoṣasya ca—Ct.) Cr glosses simply, "of this evil conduct (asya duṣkṛtakarmaṇaḥ)." Cg understands, "of this behavior characteristic of your race (kulācārasya)."

"will you come to realize this" jñāsyase: Literally, "you will know." Ck and Ct again flesh out this elliptical phrase, glossing, "You will experience remorse at the realization: 'Why did I not act properly? Why did I do evil?' (jñāsyase kim ahaṃ sādhu nākaravaṃ kim ahaṃ pāpam akaravam iti paritapsyase)."

15. "A foolish man who . . . once it has taken effect" yo . . . mānavaḥ . . . pariṇāme sa vai mūḍhaḥ: Literally, "a man who . . . that fool, indeed, in [its] transformation." The term pariṇāma, "transformation or digestion," is used here no doubt to refer to the metabolization of the poison, at which point it produces the symptoms of poisoning. On his synonymous variant pariṇāmānte, "at the end of digestion or transformation," Cr glosses, "on the completion of its change of state (rūpāntaraprāptau)." Cs, who reads the variant as well, probably more accurately glosses, "through its transformation at the end, that is to say, at the time of the spreading of the toxin (tadvikāreṇānte rasaprasaraṇakāle)." Ś,Ñ,V1,3,B2–4,D2,5–12,T3,4, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead yo . . . durmatiḥ / sa tasya pariṇāmānte, "that fool who, he at the end of the transformation of that."

"mistakenly" mohāt: Literally, "out of error or delusion." Cr glosses, "out of the absence of discrimination (avivekāt)." Cs attributes the mistaken consumption of poison to a dementia brought about by hunger (annābhāvaprayuktavaicityāt).

"without knowing it" nāvagacchati: Literally, "he does not know or understand." Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 465) inexplicably understands that the person does understand that he has drunk poison but nonetheless does not stop drinking it. He translates, "Celui qui . . . boit du poison, et (lorsqu'il s'en aperçoit) ne cesse pas (de boire)." In this he is followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 415).

16. " 'Indeed, the gods take delight only in one who is righteous. It is because of this that you have been reduced to such a state, and you do not even realize it.' " daivatāni hi nandanti dharmayuktena kenacit / yena tvam īdṛśaṃ bhāvaṃ nītas tac ca na budhyase //: Literally, "For the gods are delighted by someone linked with dharma, because of which you have been led to such a condition, and you do not understand." Among the commentators consulted, only Cv appears to share the reading of the critical edition, nandanti, "they rejoice," without a negative particle. He understands the verse to mean that the gods are pleased by any action that is conjoined with righteousness and that it is because of this that Rāvaṇa has been reduced to the condition of utter imbecility. It is because of this state, Cv continues, that Rāvaṇa does not understand divine approval. What this all means, Cv argues, is that because of his extreme idiocy, Rāvaṇa does not understand that the gods take pleasure only in actions indicating respect for one's elders, actions such as respectful greeting, etc. (daivatāni hītyādi. dharmayuktena kenacit karmaṇā daivatāni nandanti. yena tvam īdṛśaṃ bhāvam atimūrkhasya bhāvaṃ nītas tena tac ca daivataṃ nandanaṃ ca na budhyase. abhivādanādigurugauravakarmaṇā daivatāni nandantīty etad atimūrkhaprakṛtitayā na jānīṣa ity arthaḥ.)

Ś,Ñ,V1,3,B2–4,D1–4,6–12,T3, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read the negative particle na in place of the critical edition's emphatic particle hi, "indeed or for." This negates the finite verb nandanti, "they rejoice," in pāda a, making it appear that the gods do not rejoice in or approve of righteous acts or individuals. The awkwardness of this reading has forced the commentators and translators who follow it to devise a variety of interpretive strategies. Ck, Cg, and Ct understand that because of certain vulgar behavior, the gods, that is, Brahmā, Rudra, etc., do not approve of Rāvaṇa, that is to say, they have turned their backs on him. They further understand that now, because of the gods' disapproval deriving from his [i.e., Rāvaṇa's] lack of righteousness, he has been reduced to such a state, that is to say, to such a vicious condition, but does not know it. (daivatāni brahmarudrādayaḥ. dharmayuktena kenacit prākṛtena vyāpāreṇa tvām īdānīṃ nābhinandanti tvayi vimukhā bhavanti. saṃprati tvayi dharmābhāvād yena devatānabhinandanena tvam īdṛśaṃ bhāvaṃ krūraṃ nītaḥ prāpitaḥ san nāvabudhyase—so Ct.)

the seers, etc., but he does not recognize this as injurious. In other words, he does not understand that it is sinful, and, even when he does, he does not desist from it. It is for this reason that the gods, Brahmā and others, who are themselves characterized by righteousness, do not approve [of Rāvaṇa]. This, Cr concludes, is to suggest that the moment of Rāvaṇa's doom is at hand. (yena kenacid dhetunaidṛśam ṛṣiprabhṛtihiṃsārūpaṃ bhāvaṃ dharmaṃ nītaḥ prāptas tvaṃ tad dhiṃsanaṃ na budhyase pāpatvena na jānāsi jñātvā na nivartasa ity arthaḥ. tena hetunā dharmayuktenopalakṣitāni daivatāni brahmādayo na nandantīti. etena tava vināśakālaḥ saṃprāpta iti sūcitam.)

Cs explains that the principal gods do not approve when they see Rāvaṇa. The reason for this, he argues, is that Rāvaṇa has been reduced to such a vicious state because of the agency of powerful fate, which is linked to dharma, and because of which he has performed evil deeds. Because of this, he fails to recognize the gods' disapproval. Optionally, Cs states that it is his fate that Rāvaṇa fails to understand. The basic meaning of the verse, Cs concludes, is that, because of his [evil] actions, the Lord has made the gods turn their backs on him. (daivatāni vṛndārakāḥ. na nandanti tvāṃ dṛṣṭvā. kutas tad anabhinandanam ity ata āha dharmayukteneti. kenacid dharmayuktena mahatā daivena kartṛṇā yena tvadduṣkarmarūpakaraṇenedṛśaṃ bhāvaṃ kruratvaṃ nītaḥ. ato devatānabhinandanam iti nāvabudhyase. tad daivaṃ nāvabudhyasa iti vā. bhagavataivaivaṃvidhānād vibudhās tvadvimukhā iti bhāvaḥ.)

M5 and KK (7.15.21) and VSP (7.15.21), as well as the commentaries of Ck, Cg, and Ct, read the more or less synonymous devatā nābhinandanti, "the gods do not rejoice" for pāda a, while B3,D5,T1,2,G1,3,M3–6 and KK and VSP read san nāvabudhyase, "being [brought], you do not understand," for the critical text's tac ca na budhyase.

Gorresio (1870, vol. 3, p. 51), Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 465), Shastri (1959, vol. 3, pp. 415–16), and Benoît (1999, p. 1259) understand the verse to mean that the gods do not approve of even righteous actions when they result in bringing someone to a state such as Rāvaṇa's. Benoît, in a note to the passage (p. 1719), understands that the reference is to Rāvaṇa's acts of asceticism described in sarga 10 (cf. the Lahore variant tapoyuktena [7.14.17]). Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1955) understands the reference somewhat differently, translating, "The gods will not be pleased even with an act which is righteous (in your [Rāvaṇa's] eyes)." Dutt (1894, p. 1602) more or less follows Ct in rendering, "The gods have set their face against thee on account of a certain misdeed of thine." Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 412) offers, "The gods have never had occasion to praise you for any act of righteousness."

17. "A person who disrespects his mothers, fathers, brothers, and preceptors" yo hi mātṝḥ pitṝn bhrātṝn ācāryāṃś cāvamanyate: Literally, "For he who disrespects mothers, fathers, brothers, and preceptors." GPP (7.15.21) and NSP (7.15.21) read instead mātaraṃ pitaraṃ vipram ācāryaṃ cāvamanya vai, "Having disrespected a mother, a father, a brahman, or [lit., 'and'] a preceptor." KK (7.15.22) and VSP (7.15.21) read a variant not noted in the critical apparatus, mātaraṃ pitaraṃ yo hi ācāryaṃ cāvamanyate (with hiatus), "whoever disrespects a mother, father, or [lit., 'and'] preceptor." Among the translators, Cg's variant is rendered only by Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 412).

"will experience" sa paśyati: Literally, "he sees."

18. "when he sees where he has gone" dṛṣṭvātmano gatim: Literally, "having seen one's own path or condition." Ñ2,V3,D3,6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read gatvā, "having gone," for dṛṣṭvā, "having seen," lending the phrase the sense "once he has gone to his own path or condition." See verse 21 below, which specifies that the destination intended is hell.

Following verse 18, D7,T3,M3, and GPP (in brackets between 7.15.22 and 23), Gita Press (7.15.23–24), KK (7.15.24–25), and VSP (7.15.23–24) insert a passage of four lines [279*]: "It is from righteousness alone that kingship, wealth, and happiness derive. From unrighteousness comes only misery. Therefore, for the sake of one's own happiness, one should practice righteousness and eschew[1] evil conduct. For the fruit of evil conduct is misery, which must be experienced here and now. Therefore, a fool engages in evil conduct only for his own destruction.[2]"

[1] "one should . . . eschew" vivarjayet: D7,T4, and GPP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead visarjayet, "one should give up."

[2] "only for his own destruction" ātmopaghātārtham: Literally, "for the sake of his own destruction." GPP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead ātmāpaghārtham, "for the sake of his own destruction."

These verses are rendered only in the translations of Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1955) and Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 412).

19. "No evil-minded person spontaneously acquires good judgment." kasyacin na hi durbuddheś chandato jāyate matiḥ: Literally, "For of no witless or evil-minded [one] is [good] judgment produced from will or desire." The phrase is somewhat ambiguous, especially since the term durbuddhi may refer either to a person of little intelligence or to a person of evil mind. (See note to verse 14 above.) We agree with Ck, Cg, and Ct, who understand the phrase to mean that judgment, that is to say, good judgment (also Cs), is not acquired by a person lacking judgment merely by wishing and in the absence of service to one's father, etc. (durbuddher buddhirahitasya kasyacit kasyāpi puruṣasya chandataḥ pitrādisevāṃ vinā svecchāmātreṇa matiḥ śubhā matir na jāyate—so Ct). Cr understands similarly.

"A person experiences the fruit of whatever action he performs." yādṛśaṃ kurute karma tādṛśaṃ phalam aśnute: Literally, "As is the action one performs, so is the fruit one eats."

20. "Intellect" buddhim: Ñ,V1,3,B2–4,D7,10,11,T4,M6, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead ṛddhim, "wealth or prosperity."

"strength" balam: T3 and KK and VSP read instead phalam, "fruit or reward."

"wealth, sons, and greatness" vittaṃ putrān māhātmyam eva ca: D10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead putrān vittaṃ śūratvam eva ca, "sons, wealth, and heroism." KK (7.15.27) and VSP (7.15.26) read instead śauryaṃ dhīratvam eva ca, "heroism and steadfastness."

"all of this through the previous actions they have performed" sarvaṃ svakṛtaiḥ pūrvakarmabhiḥ: Literally, "[they obtain] everything by means of self-performed prior actions." Ñ2,D6,7,10,11,12, and Lahore (reading pūrva- as in critical text = 7.14.21), Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead loke nirjitaṃ puṇya[pūrva—Lahore]karmabhiḥ, "[they obtain] in this world what is won through meritorious actions."

21. "I shall not speak with you again" na tvāṃ samabhibhāṣiṣye: Literally, "I shall not converse with you."

"to one of evil ways" durvṛttasya: D10,11, and, GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead [a]sadvṛtteṣu, "with regard to those of unvirtuous conduct."

22. "When Kubera had spoken in this fashion" evam uktvā tatas tena: Literally, "Then, having spoken in this fashion . . . by him." Ñ2,V1,3,D7,10,11,T3,G2,3,M1,2,7,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read the participle uktāḥ, "addressed," for the gerund uktvā, "having spoken." This lends the line the sense "When they had been addressed in this fashion by him." The commentators understand that Kubera has addressed the same words, i.e., "You, too, are not fit to be conversed with," to the ministers as he had to Rāvaṇa (evam uktā rāvaṇavad eva yūyam apy asaṃbhāṣyā ity uktāḥ—so Ct).

"Rāvaṇa's" tasya: Literally, "his or of him."

"turned tail" vimukhāḥ: Literally, "with faces averted." Compare notes to verse 11 above.

23. "did not give any ground" na ca sthānād vyakampata: Literally, "and he did not waver from his place or stance." D1,3–5,7,10,11,T3,4,G2,M5,8,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read prakampitaḥ, "shaken," for vyakampata, "he did not waver," lending the phrase the sense "and he was not shaken from his place."

24. "in fierce combat" paramāhave: Literally, "in supreme battle." Ñ,B2,3,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead mahāmṛdhe, "in a great battle."

"remained unyielding" babhuvatur amarṣaṇau: Literally, "those two were unforgiving or intolerant." Ñ,V3,B2–4,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead tāv ubhau yakṣarākṣasau, "those two, the yakṣa and the rākṣasa."

25. "in battle, the bestower of wealth" dhanado raṇe: The phrase is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. Ś,Ñ2,V1,3,B2–4,D2,5–12, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read dhanadas tadā, "then, the bestower of wealth," for dhanado raṇe, "in battle, the bestower of wealth."

"the divine weapon of Agni, but Daśagrīva parried that divine weapon with that of Varuṇa" āgneyam astram . . . / vāruṇena daśagrīvas tad astraṃ pratyavārayat: Literally, "the āgneya astra . . . he blocked that astra with the vāruṇa [astra]." The idea here, no doubt, is that Rāvaṇa is using the watery astra of Varuṇa, the lord of the oceans, to quench the fiery astra of Agni, god of fire. On the term astra, see note to 6.35.5. For various astras used (deployed) by warriors in the Yuddhakāṇḍa, see "divine weapon-spells" in the index to that volume. Ś,Ñ,V1,3,B2–4,D2,5–12,T3, and Lahore, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read rākṣasendro vāruṇena, "the lord of the rākṣasas . . . with that of Varuṇa," for vāruṇena daśagrīvaḥ, "Daśagrīva . . . with that of Varuṇa."

26. "having recourse to the rākṣasas' power of illusion" māyāṃ praviṣṭaḥ sa rākṣasīm: Literally, "he entered the rākṣasī māyā." Cg, the only commentator to take note of the phrase, understands that Rāvaṇa has made himself invisible (adṛśyatvaṃ prāpta ity arthaḥ). The power to make oneself invisible has heretofore been restricted to Indrajit in the previous sections of the epic. Interestingly, Rāvaṇa himself does not resort to this stratagem during his final battle with Rāma. On Indrajit's acquisition of invisibility, see 7.25.9–12; on its use, see 6.36.8,9; 6.67.4,15,17; and notes. See S. Goldman 2015b.

Ñ,V3,B2–4,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read the synonymous praviṣṭo 'sau for praviṣṭaḥ saḥ.

Following 26a, Ś,Ñ,V1,2,B2–4,D,T3,4, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert, while T1,2,G3,M1,3,6,7 continue (lines 2–3 only) after 289*, a passage of three lines [287*]: "In order to wreak destruction, ten-faced Daśagrīva[1] took on a hundred thousand forms, appearing as a tiger, a boar, a cloud, a mountain, the ocean, a tree, a yakṣa, and one bearing the form of a daitya."

[1] "ten-faced Daśagrīva" daśānanaḥ: Literally, "the ten-faced [one]."

Following 287*, D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP continue, while T1,2,G3,M1,3,6,7 insert following 26ab, a passage of one line [289*]: "And though he produced many such forms,[1] he himself remained invisible (bahūni ca karoti sma dṛśyante na tv asau tataḥ)."

[1] "he produced many such forms" bahūni ca karoti sma: Literally, "and he made many." The phrase is elliptical. Like other translators consulted who have this reading, we follow the suggestion of Cr, who sees the reference to be to the multiple illusory forms of Daśagrīva. The idea is that the illusory forms alone are visible, while Rāvaṇa in his own proper form remains hidden. (daśānano bahūni rūpāṇi karoti sma tāny eva rūpāṇi dṛśyante 'sau daśānanas tu na dṛśyate.) Ck and Ct offer a dual solution. Their first idea is that the adjective bahūni, "many," refers to "hails of weapons" that Rāvaṇa produced. These weapons, they believe, are visible, while Rāvaṇa himself is not. Both commentators add that the illusory forms such as the tiger, etc., listed in 287* are also visible. (bahūni śastravarṣāṇi ca karoti sma. tāny eva dṛśyante na tv asau tathā māyāprayuktavyāghrādaya eva dṛśyante na tv asau—so Ct; Ck similarly.)

Following 289*, D10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP continue, while Ñ2,D7 continue after 287*, with a passage of one line [290*]: "Then, Rāma, ten-faced Daśagrīva[1] having seized an enormous weapon[2] (pratigṛhya tato rāma mahad astraṃ daśānanaḥ)."

[1] "ten-faced Daśagrīva" daśānanaḥ: Literally, "the ten-faced [one]."

[2] "an enormous weapon" mahad astram: Since in the following line Rāvaṇa is shown using a great mace, we assume that the term astra here is used in its general sense of any weapon. See note to verse 25 above and note to verse 27 below.

27. "with that" tena: The reference is to the mace mentioned in the previous verse. But the gender of the pronoun here, masculine or neuter, is not in agreement with the feminine gadā, "mace," its antecedent. The most immediate antecedent in the so-called vulgate text is the neuter astram, "weapon," from 290* (see notes to verse 26 above).

"like an aśoka tree" ivāśokaḥ: Literally, "like an aśoka." The aśoka tree or the Saraca indica L. or Jonesia asoka Roxb. has no doubt been selected here as an upamāna since its reddish or orange blossoms would suggest a comparison to the blood-drenched body of Kubera. In other books of the epic, a standard arboreal upamāna for a wounded warrior is either the kiṃśuka tree, also known as the palāśa tree (Butea monosperma or B. frondosa), or the śālmalī tree (Salmalia malabarica or Bombax malabaricum). See notes to 6.35.9; 6.55.22; 6.60.34, 6.67.33; 6.76.28; etc.

28. "the presiding deities of his treasuries, Padma and the rest" padmādibhiḥ . . . nidhibhiḥ: Literally, "by the treasuries, starting with Padma." Ck, Ct, and Cr remind us that these are the deities that preside over Kubera's treasuries (nidhibhis taddevatābhiḥ—so Cr). See notes to verse 12 above.

"brought . . . that bestower of wealth, to the Nandana grove and there revived him" nandanaṃ vanam ānīya dhanado śvāsitas tadā: Literally, "the bestower of wealth, having been brought to the Nandana grove, was then revived."

"the lord of wealth" dhanādhipaḥ: Ñ,B2,3,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tadā vṛtaḥ, "then [he] surrounded [by]."

For 28cd, Ś,Ñ,V1,3,B2–4,D2,5–12,T3,M3, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead a passage of one line [291*]: "The lord of wealth having been brought to the Nandana grove was revived[1] (āśvāsito dhanapatir vanam ānīya nandanam)."

[1] "The lord of wealth . . . was revived" āśvāsito dhanapatiḥ: D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead dhanadocchvāsitas tais tu, "And the bestower of wealth was revived by them."

29. "And now, Rāma, when . . . had defeated the" tato nirjitya taṃ rāma: Literally, "then, Rāma, having defeated him." Ñ,B2–4,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead nirjitya rākṣasendras tam, "the lord of the rākṣasas having defeated him."

"the lord of the rākṣasas" rākṣasādhipaḥ: The compound is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. Ś,Ñ,V1,3,B2–4,D,T3, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead hṛṣṭamānasaḥ, "whose heart or mind was delighted."

"as a token of victory" jayalakṣaṇam: Literally, "a mark of victory." Ck, Cg, and Ct take the reference to be elliptical, adding that Rāvaṇa or his minions proclaimed it as a sign of victory. (jayalakṣaṇaṃ jayacihnam. khyāpayann iti śeṣaḥ—so Ct.) For mention of this episode earlier in the epic, see 3.46.1–6; 6.7.3–5; and notes. Compare the Rāmopākhyāna, where Kubera, after his defeat, curses Rāvaṇa to the effect that the Puṣpaka shall never carry him, but will only carry the person who will one day kill him (MBh 3.259.34–35).

30. The verse consists of four compound adjectives in the accusative modifying either vimānam, "flying palace," in 29d or tat, "that [palace]," in pāda 31a. For the sake of style, we have rendered it as if it were a series of independent sentences. From descriptions of the Puṣpakavimāna earlier in the epic, it is clear that, contrary to popular imagination and many translations, the Puṣpaka is not merely a flying chariot but an elaborate flying palace. For detailed descriptions of the Puṣpaka, see 5.6.11–14; 5.7.9–15; 6.109.22–27; and notes. See, too, note to 6.33.28.

"its gateways were of lapis and gemstones" vaidūryamaṇitoraṇam: The compound is somewhat ambiguous. It can be read as a dvandva, as we and a number of other translators have done, or as a karmadhāraya in the sense of "gateways of lapis-gems." This latter sense is the interpretation of Cr, who analyzes the compound as "having outer doors, that is, gateways of vaidūrya gems (vaidūryamaṇes toraṇaṃ bahirdvāraṃ yasmin)." If, as several translators have done, one reads the compound in this way, it is probably best to understand the term vaidūrya in its sense of "emerald or cats-eye beryl" rather than lapis. See note to 7.12.8.

"had trees that bore whatever was desired as their fruit" sarvakāmaphaladrumam: Literally, "having trees whose fruit was all desirable things." Ś1,Ñ2,V1,3,D6,10,11,G1,M2,3, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead -kāla-, "time," for -kāma-, "desire," lending the compound the sense "whose trees bore fruit at all times."

Following verse 30, Ñ2,V1,D3,5–7,9–11,T3,4, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of four lines [293*] that continues the description of the vimāna: "It moved with the speed of thought and was steered by its owner's will.[1] It could take on any form at will and could fly through the sky.[2] Its staircases were of gemstones and gold, and its raised platforms of burnished gold.[1–2] It was a celestial vehicle,[3] indestructible and a perpetual delight to the eye and the mind. It contained manifold wonders and was splendid with its various sections.[4] It had been built by Brahmā.[5][3–4]"

[1] "was steered by its owner's will" kāmagamam: Literally, "whose movement was by desire." Cs glosses, "possessing motion in accordance with the wish of its master (svāmīcchānusāreṇa gatimat)." See 7.16.4; 7.23.24; 7.25.10; 7.73.18; and notes.

[2] "It could take on any form at will and could fly through the sky." kāmarūpaṃ vihaṃgamam: Although no textual evidence seems to support it, Cr appears to read the two terms as a single compound. He glosses, "in which the birds could take on any form at will (kāmarūpā vihaṃgamā yasmin)."

[3] "It was a celestial vehicle" devopavāhyam: Literally, "worthy of being borne by the gods." The compound is somewhat unusual. It does not appear anywhere in the poem that the gods actually carry the Puṣpakavimāna. We therefore understand it to mean something like "a vehicle fit for the gods." For a discussion of the commentators regarding the Puṣpaka's movement through the sky, see note to 6.110.23.

[4] "and was splendid with its various sections" bhakticitram: Literally, "variegated with divisions." The idea seems to be, as indicated in the Sundarakāṇḍa (5.7.9–15), that the Puṣpakavimāna has many splendid rooms and apartments. Apte, citing this verse alone, understands the compound to mean "drawings" (s.v. bhakticitram). This idea appears to be reflected in the translation of Dutt (1894, p. 1603), who, however, takes the term bhakti in its other meaning of "devotion," rendering, "painted with images designed to fill the mind with reverence." Cs takes the term bhakti in the sense of "road or path" and understands that the vimāna is variegated or beautified by its passages [lit., "roads"] (bhaktir mārgas tābhiś citram).

[5] "It had been built by Brahmā." brahmaṇā parinirmitam: Ck and Ct, recalling that the Puṣpaka has been described elsewhere in the epic as built by Viśvakarman, suggest that we take Brahmā here as a reference to Viśvakarman (brahmaṇā viśvakarmaṇā). Cr understands that we should read the participle parinirmitam, "constructed," as a causative, so that we could take it that Brahmā had Viśvakarman build the vehicle (brahmaṇā viśvakarmaṇā parinirmitaṃ parinirmāpitam). Cf. 5.7.10 and notes, where it had been made in heaven by Viśvakarman on behalf of Brahmā; and 5.7.14–15; 6.109.22–27; and notes, where it was fashioned by Viśvakarman. See, too, note to 5.6.4, in which the fashioning of the Puṣpakavimāna and other great structures of Kubera by Viśvakarman as architect of the gods is discussed in detail.

Following 293*, Ñ2,V1,D3,6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP continue, while Ñ1,V3,B2–4,D1,4,M6 insert after verse 30, a passage of two lines [294*]: "It was constructed of all desirable things. It was ravishing and unsurpassed. It was never cold and never hot, but was splendid and pleasurable in all seasons. (nirmitaṃ sarvakāmais tu manoharam anuttamam / na tu śītaṃ na coṣṇaṃ ca sarvartusukhadaṃ śubham //)"

31. "that flying palace" tat tu: Literally, "but that." Ñ,B2–4,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead sa tam, "he that." Note the less common use of the masculine gender for the Puṣpakavimāna in the variant.

"which was steered by its owner's will" kāmagam: Literally, "whose movement was by desire." See 293*, note 1, following verse 30 above.

"descended" avarohata: Note the absence of the augment. The word is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. Ñ,B3,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the synonymous samavātarat, "he descended."

Following 31ab, Ñ2,V1,B2,4,D3,5 (after verse 31),6,7,10,11,T3,4,M4,D5, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of one line [295*]: "In the excess of his arrogance, that extremely evil-minded one thought that he had conquered the triple world (jitaṃ tribhuvanaṃ mene darpotsekāt sudurmatiḥ)."

Following verse 31, Ñ,V3,B2–4,D3,6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of four lines (consisting of four pādas) [296*]: "When he had achieved that great victory through his blazing energy, the valorous night-roaming rākṣasa,[1] who with his shining diadem and necklace was blazing like fire placed in a sacrificial enclosure,[2] mounted that greatest of flying palaces (sa tejasā vipulam avāpya taṃ jayaṃ pratāpavān vimalakirīṭahāravān / rarāja vai paramavimānam āsthito niśācaraḥ sadasi gato yathānalaḥ //)."

[1] "night-roaming rākṣasa" niśācaraḥ: Literally, "the night-roaming [one]."

[2] "was blazing like fire placed in a sacrificial enclosure" rarāja . . . sadasi gato yathānalaḥ: Literally, "he shone like fire that had gone to the sacrificial enclosure." The meaning of the simile, like so many in this kāṇḍa, is very unclear. Commentators and translators alike struggle to determine its precise basis. The critical element is how to take the word sadaḥ. We tentatively follow, with Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1957), Cs, who explains, "in the sadaḥ means in the place of the sacrificial assembly (sadasi yajñasadaḥsthāne)." Cr understands that Rāvaṇa, who has gone into his assembly hall, is shining there like fire (rāvaṇaḥ . . . sadasi gataḥ sann anala iva rarāja). This interpretation has been followed by Gorresio (1870, p. 53), who understands that Rāvaṇa shines like fire in the assembly of his warriors. He renders, "e venuto nel mezzo dell' adunanza de' suoi guerrieri, risplendeva come vivo fuoco." Dutt (1894, p. 1604) translates, "appeared radiant in his court like Fire himself." Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 413) offers, "went to Lankā and appeared in his audience-chamber shining like the fire." Apte (s.v. sadas), citing this verse, takes the term in the sense of "the sky." This would lend the line the sense "Mounted on his excellent flying palace, the night-roaming rākṣasa, going in the sky, shone like fire." Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 466), evidently confusing the term sadas with its close homonym sadyas, "immediately," renders, "partit aussitôt: il étincelait comme Anala." In this he is apparently followed by Benoît (1999, p. 1261), who offers, "flamboyant comme le feu, repartit sans plus s'attarder." Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 417) ignores the term completely.

The meter is rucirā.

Interestingly, Ct remarks that Ck indicates that the [correct] number of ślokas in this sarga is thirty-three (katakas tu trayastriṃśacchlokasaṃkhyānam atra sarge lilekha). This number, of course, closely approximates the number of ślokas in the critical edition. Our copy of Ck has no indication of the number of verses that he reads. Ct's own text (as given in GPP and NSP) has forty-one verses, while the editions of Cg have forty-six (KK) and forty-five (VSP), respectively. Gorresio's edition has forty-two, while Lahore (= sarga fourteen) has thirty-six.

Sarga 16

1. "his brother, the bestower of wealth" bhrātaram . . . dhandadam: B1,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP transpose the two terms.

"then" tataḥ: Ś,Ñ2,V2,D2,5–12,T4, and Lahore, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the adjective mahat, "great, vast," which modifies Śaravaṇa.

"the Śaravaṇa" śaravaṇam: Literally, "the forest of reeds." As recounted in the Bālakāṇḍa (1.35.18), this would be the thicket of reeds in which Śiva's semen was deposited and thus was the birthplace of Skanda. See 7.35.22.

"the birthplace of Skanda Mahāsena" mahāsenaprasūtim: Literally, "the birth of Mahāsena." As Ck, Cg, Ct, and Cr point out, the term prasūti, "birth," here must be understood to mean "birthplace (prasūtisthānam—so Cg)." Mahāsena, literally "he whose army is great," is an uncommon epithet of Skanda. Apte (s.v. mahāsena) cites this verse to support his listing of the epithet as belonging to Kārttikeya, i.e., Skanda. Ck, Cg, Ct, and Cr all gloss Skanda.

2. Ck and Cg note that the episode beginning here is an expansion of the brief mention of the concluding event of the last sarga (i.e., Rāvaṇa's descent from Mount Kailāsa in the Puṣpakavimāna) (apaśyad ityādi pūrvasargāntoktasaṃkṣepaprapañcanam).

"then" tadā: Ś,V1,B2,D1–5,8–12,T3,4, and Lahore, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the adjective mahat, "great, vast," which modifies Śaravaṇa.

"haloed" -saṃvītam: Literally, "covered."

3. "But as he approached that mountain, he spied some other lovely grove, and there, Rāma, the Puṣpaka was brought to a halt in the sky." parvataṃ sa samāsādya kiṃcid ramyavanāntaram / apaśyat puṣpakaṃ tatra rāma viṣṭambhitaṃ divi //: Literally, "Having approached the mountain, he saw there another beautiful grove, and there, Rāma, the Puṣpaka was immobilized in the sky." Ñ,V3,D5,10,11,T3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read the masculine singular kaṃcit for the critical edition's neuter singular kiṃcit. The variant permits a rather different reading of the entire verse, in that it refers to the mountain, parvatam, rather than to -antaram, "other or different," in pāda b. This, in turn, permits the compound ramyavanāntaram to serve as a bahuvrīhi compound, that is to say, as an adjective, modifying parvatam, "mountain." This lends the phrase the sense of "a certain mountain possessing another charming forest." Translators who follow this reading offer variations on this idea. In this reading, by subordinating the compound to the noun parvatam, which is the object of the gerund samāsādya (v.l. samārūhya, "having ascended"), it frees the finite verb apaśyat, "he saw" (v.l. prekṣate, "he saw"), to govern as its direct object puṣpakam in pāda c. In other words, the second half of the verse would mean "[Daśagrīva] saw that the Puṣpaka had been stopped." The critical reading involves an enjambment, where apaśyat in pāda c takes as its object -antaram in pāda b. For a description of the Puṣpaka and Rāvaṇa's acquisition of it, see 7.15.29–31 and notes. See, too, 293*, following notes to 7.15.30, where its construction is also mentioned (see note 5). Ś,Ñ2,V1,3D2,5–12,T,M10, and Lahore, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read samārūhya, "having ascended," for samāsādya, "having approached."

"he spied" apaśyat: Ñ1,V1,3,D6,10,11,T3,4, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead prekṣate, "he saw."

"in the sky" divi: Ñ1,V1,D6,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tadā, "then."

4. "Perceiving that the Puṣpaka, which had been steered by its owner's will, had been stopped and rendered motionless" viṣṭabdhaṃ puṣpakaṃ dṛṣṭvā kāmagaṃ hy agamaṃ kṛtam: Literally, "Having seen the Puṣpaka immobilized, that which moved by will rendered motionless." D7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead viṣṭabdhaṃ kim idaṃ kasmān nāgamat kāmagaṃ kṛtaṃ, "Why has this, which was steered by my will, been rendered motionless? For what reason does it not go?" Ct explains the line as follows: "This, which moved by will, that is to say, which was designed so that its motion followed the thoughts of its master, how has it been stopped? Therefore he [the poet] says, 'he thought, "Why does it not go?"' (kāmagaṃ svāmicittānukūlasaṃcāravat kṛtaṃ nirmitam idaṃ viṣṭabdhaṃ kim. tad evāha kasmān nāgamad ity acintayat)." Ck, perhaps in a reflection of his interest in the worship of Brahmā (see note to 5.1.177), observes that Rāvaṇa's consternation is derived from the fact that even though the Puṣpaka was built by Brahmā, it will not move (brahmanirmitam apīdaṃ puṣpakaṃ na gaman na gacchad bhavati). On the construction of the Puṣpaka, see 293*, following note to 7.15.30. For chariots moving according to desire, see 293* and note 1, following note to 7.15.30; 7.23.24; 7.25.10; 7.73.18; and notes. See, too, 6.72.12; note; and 3071*, note 1, following notes 6.96.29.

"the rākṣasa . . . fell to brooding" rākṣasaś cintayāmāsa: Ś,1,3,Ñ,V1,3,B,D2,5–12,T3,4, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead (B2—so '; T3—vy-) acintayad rākṣasendraḥ, "the lord of the rākṣasas thought."

5. "What is the reason that the Puṣpaka does not move for me?" kim idaṃ yan nimittaṃ me na ca gacchati puṣpakam: Literally, "And what reason is this for which the Puṣpaka does not go for me?" D10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead kiṃ nimittam icchayā me nedaṃ gacchati puṣpakam. KK and VSP read instead kiṃ nimittaṃ cecchāya me nedaṃ gacchati puṣpakam. These variants lend the line the sense "For what reason does this Puṣpaka not move according to my wish?"

"Who on this mountain could have done this?" parvatasyoparisthasya kasya karma tv idaṃ bhavet: Literally, "of whom situated on top of the mountain might this be the act or work?" V3,D6,10,11,T3,4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead parvatasyopariṣṭhasya karmedaṃ kasyacid bhavet, "this must be the work of someone located on top of the mountain." Although the critical apparatus attributes this variant to Ck, his commentary indicates that he reads with the critical edition. However, he glosses that reading as if it were the same as the variant: "By the question 'Whose action?'[is meant] that this action, that is, the action of stopping, must be of some person (kasya karmeti kasyacit puruṣasyedaṃ karma stambhanakarma bhavet)." Cg, who reads with Ct, on the other hand, comments as though he reads with the critical edition. He understands, "of whom, that is, of which person, might this be the work. (kasya kasya puruṣasya. idaṃ karma bhavet.)"

6. "Daśagrīva" daśagrīvam: Ś,V1,B3,D,T3,4,M6, and Lahore, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tadā rāma, "then, O Rāma."

"the Puṣpaka" puṣpako 'yam: Literally, "this Puṣapaka." D1,3,4,7,10,11,M6, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead puṣpakaṃ yat, lending the line the sense "In that the Puṣpaka does not move, your majesty, it cannot be without a reason."

Following verse 6, Ś,V1,D2,3,5–9,12,T3,4,M10, and Lahore and KK (7.16.7 in brackets) insert a passage of two lines [297*]: "Who living on the mountain has performed this miraculous feat on the mountain peak? Surely, the Puṣpaka has been obstructed by [Kubera,] the king of kings. (śikharasthaṃ giristhasya karma kasyedam adbhutam / niścitaṃ rājarājena puṣpakaṃ vinivāritam //)"

Following verse 6, Ñ,V3,B,D1,3,4,6,7,10,11,T1,2,G,M1–9, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, and VSP read, while T3,4,M10, and KK read following 297*, a passage of one line [299*]: "Or, perhaps, the Puṣpaka will not carry anyone other than[1] the bestower of wealth (atha vā puṣpakam idaṃ dhanadān nānyavāhanam)."

[1] "the Puṣpaka will not carry anyone other than" puṣpakam idam . . . nānyavāhanam: Literally, "this Puṣpaka is not the vehicle of another [than]." We read the compound anyavāhanam with Ck and Ct, who gloss, "It is not the conveyance of one other than Dhanada (dhanadād anyasya vāhanaṃ nety arthaḥ—so Ct.)" On the idea that the Puṣpaka would not carry Rāvaṇa, see note to 7.15.29.

Following 299*, D6,7,10,S, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP continue with a passage of one line [301*]: "Therefore, since it has been removed from the lord of wealth, it has become immobile (ato niṣpandam abhavad dhanādhyakṣavinākṛtam)."

Following 301*, D7,10,11,T3,4,M6, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP continue with a passage of two lines [298*]: "In the middle of that speech of his, the mighty Nandin, a fearsome, deformed, bald, yellow and black,[1] short-armed dwarf [having approached] (iti vākyāntare tasya karālaḥ kṛṣṇapiṅgalaḥ / vāmano vikaṭo muṇḍī nandī hrasvabhujo bali //)."

[1] "yellow and black" kṛṣṇapiṅgalam: Literally, "black and yellow." Apte (s.v.) and Monier-Willams (s.v.) understand, "dark brown or darkish brown." See 6.26.30, where death is described in similar terms.

7. "mighty . . . said this" balī . . . uvācedam: D7,10,11,T3,4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead [a]bravīt . . . vacaś cedam, "he spoke this speech."

"Nandīśvara" nandīśvaraḥ: The name, which, in the sense of "Nandin's lord," is normally an epithet of Śiva himself, is somewhat unusual and awkward when applied, as it must be here, to Śiva's attendant and mount, Nandin. Two of the commentators attempt to explain the epithet. Cr understands the prior member nandin adjectivally in the sense of "one who is perpetually filled with bliss," so that the name would mean "the blissful lord" (nandī nityānandayukto nandīśvaraḥ). Cs understands the term nandin similarly but appears to take it as a reference to Śiva, so that the compound would mean "he whose lord is the blissful one." With this reading, Cs continues, the term nandin is not excessive or repetitive. (nanda ānando 'syāstīti nandī. sa īśvaro yasyeti. tena nandīti nādhikam.) Benoît (1999, p. 1719) includes a note on the various possible meanings of the name.

8. "is dallying on this mountain" śaile krīḍati: The mountain, of course, is Kailāsa. Cf. 7.13.23 and notes and 7.78.11ff. and notes, where a similar motif is found.

9. "the mountain has been forbidden" agamyaḥ parvataḥ kṛtaḥ: Literally, "the mountain has been rendered unapproachable." Ck and Ct add the phrase "according to the wishes of the Lord (īśvarecchayeti śeṣaḥ)."

"the great birds" suparṇa-: The reference here is, undoubtedly, to the class or race of semidivine birds descended from Vinatā. Most translators consulted merely understand "birds." Gorresio (1870, p. 54) and Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 414) both understand this to be a singular proper noun Suparṇa, an epithet of Garuḍa. In the context of the classes of beings listed here, this seems inappropriate. Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1958) renders, "Suparṇas," which is similar to our interpretation. At 4.57.27 it is said that, of the seven paths of the birds, the highest path belongs to those birds that are descended from the son of Vinatā, i.e., Garuḍa or Suparṇa (see 4.57.27 and notes). At 3.13.31cd–33, Jaṭāyus explains his and Saṃpāti's genealogy, tracing it back to Vinatā (see 3.13.31cd–33). Compare 2.22.14; 3.33.27cd–35; and notes, where we are told of the most famous of birds, Suparṇa, i.e., Garuḍa. MBh 1.24ff. provides an extended narrative of Garuḍa's history.

"daityas, dānavas" daityadānava-: These two terms are often treated as synonymous epithets of the asuras. When both are used, one would understand that they are the lineages of the demons descended from Diti and Danu, respectively. Ś,V1,3,D2,5–12,T3,4,M1, and Lahore, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead devagandharva-, "gods, gandharvas [and]."

"and, indeed, to all living beings" prāṇinām eva sarveṣām: Ś,V1,3,D2,5–12, and Lahore, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead sarveṣām eva bhūtānām, "and, indeed, to all beings."

Following 9ab, Ñ2,B1,2,4,D1,3,4,T1,2,G,M1–3,6,7,10, and Gorresio = 7.16.11ab, GPP = 7.16.11cd (in brackets), KK 1905 = 7.16.11cd. KK 1913 = 7.16.12ef, and VSP = 7.16.11cd (in brackets) insert a passage of one line [302*]: "So you must turn back, you fool! Do not bring about your own destruction[1] (tan nivartasva durbuddhe mā vināśam avāpsyasi)."

[1] "Do not bring about your own destruction." mā vināśam avāpyasi: Literally, "Do not! You will obtain destruction."

Following verse 9, D5–7,10,11,T3,4,M6,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert or continue after 302* a passage of one line [303*]: "When he had heard this speech of Nandin, his [Daśagrīva's] earrings shaking with rage (iti nandivacaḥ śrutvā krodhāt kampitakuṇḍalaḥ)."

10. "Daśagrīva, his eyes red with rage" sa roṣāt tāmranayanaḥ: Literally, "his eyes red from rage, he." Ñ2,V1,D5–7,10,11,T3,4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead roṣāt tu, "but from anger."

"he approached" upāgamat: Ś2,3,V3,D2,5–7,10,12, and Lahore, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the synonymous upāgataḥ.

11. "He glared at the lord Nandīśvara, who . . . stood close by" nandīśvaram athāpaśyad avidūrasthitaṃ prabhum: Literally, "Then he watched the Lord Nandīśvara, who was standing not far." For 11ab, Ś,V1,3,D2,5–12,T3,4,M3, and Lahore, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP substitute a passage of one line [304*]: "There he saw[1] Nandin, who was standing not far from the god (apaśyan nandinaṃ tatra devasyādūrataḥ sthitam)."

[1] "he saw" apaśyat: V3,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead so 'paśyat, thus providing the pronoun "he."

"holding" avaṣṭabhya: Literally, "having held or wielded." Several of the translators understand the gerund in its other contextually apposite sense of "having leaned or supported oneself on."

12. "Seeing that he had a monkey's face, the rākṣasa regarded him with contempt" sa vānaramukhaṃ dṛṣṭvā tam avajñāya rākṣasaḥ: Literally, "having seen that monkey-faced one, the rākṣasa having despised him." For 12ab, Ś,Ñ,V1,3,B,D2,5–12,T3,4, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP substitute a passage of one line [305*] (taṃ dṛṣṭvā vānaramukham avajñāya sa rākṣasaḥ), which is identical in wording and meaning but places the words in a different order.

"as might a storm cloud charged with rain" satoya iva toyadaḥ: Literally, "like a water-giver with water."

"in his folly" maurkhyāt: Literally, "from foolishness." Ś,Ñ,V1,3,B,D,T3,4, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tatra, "there."

13. "infuriated" saṃkruddhaḥ: V1,3,B1,D1–7,9–11,T3,4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead taṃ kruddhaḥ, "[Nandin] angry [addressed] him [Daśagrīva]." Cs, who shares this reading, cites the Viśvakośa in support of his contention that the word tam is, in fact, the accusative singular of the word ta, in the sense of "thief," understanding that Nandin addresses Rāvaṇa, who was like "a thief." (taṃ corasadṛśaṃ rāvaṇaṃ pratyabravīt. takāraḥ kīrtitaś cora iti viśvaḥ.)

"the rākṣasa Daśagrīva . . . there" rākṣasaṃ tatra daśagrīvam: D1,3,4,6,7,9–11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tatra tad rakṣo daśānanam, "[addressed] that ten-faced rākṣasa there."

14–15. KK (1913 = 7.16.17) reads verse 14 with the critical edition but places it in brackets, noting that it is found only in some manuscripts. The verse is then repeated as its 7.16.18 with the variants, including 307*, found in GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK (1905), and VSP.

"evil-minded rākṣasa . . . when you saw" dṛṣṭvā rākṣasa durmate: Literally, "having seen [me], O evil-minded rākṣasa." V1,D5–7,10,11,T3,4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead avajñāya daśānana, "having treated [me] contemptuously, O ten-faced [one]."

"in your folly, you were contemptuous . . . and roared with laughter" maurkhyāt tvam avajānīṣe parihāsaṃ ca muñcasi: Literally, "from folly, you disregarded and released a derisive laugh."

"me in my simian form" vānaramūrtiṃ mām: Literally, "me, having the form of a monkey." Ś,V1,D,T3,4, and Lahore, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the synonymous vānararūpaṃ mām, "me, having the form of a monkey."

For 14cd, Ś,V1,D,T3,4, and Lahore, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP substitute a passage of one line [307*]: "you released loud laughter[1] like the crashing of a thunderbolt (aśanīpātasaṃkāśam aṭṭahāsaṃ pramuktavān)."

[1] "loud laughter" aṭṭahāsam: V1,D7,10,11,T3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead apahāsam, "derisive laughter." KK and VSP read the synonymous v.l. upahāsam. The variant is not noted in the critical apparatus.

"bearing my form and with blazing energy equal to my might" madrūpasaṃyuktā madvīryasamatejasaḥ: Literally, "conjoined with my form, having blazing energy equal to my might." D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead madvīryasaṃyuktā madrūpasamatejasaḥ, "conjoined with my might, having blazing energy equal to my form." M6 and KK and VSP read madrūpasaṃpannāḥ, "endowed with my form," for madrūpasaṃyuktā, "conjoined with my form."

Following verse 15, Ś,Ñ,V1,3 (line 1 only),B2–4,D,T3,4,M3, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of four lines [308*]: "Those heroes,[1] swift as thought or the wind,[2] will have claws and fangs for weapons. Frenzied in battle and fierce in their strength,[3] they will be like moving mountains.[1–2] Once they take birth, they will quickly demolish the strength,[4] pride, and all sorts of arrogance[5] of you, your sons, and your ministers.[3–4]"

[1] "Those heroes" śūrāḥ: Literally, "heroes." V3,D10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead the vocative singular krūra, "O cruel [one]." D6,7, and KK and VSP read instead the nominative plural krūrāḥ, "the cruel or vicious [ones]."

[2] "swift as thought or the wind" manaḥpavanaraṃhasaḥ: V3,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead manaḥsaṃpātaraṃhasaḥ, "swift as the flight of thought."

[3] "fierce in their strength" balodagrāḥ: D7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead balodriktāḥ, "abounding or excessive in strength."

[4] "quickly . . . strength . . . of you" tavāśu balam: D3,5,7,10,11,T3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tava prabalam, "strength . . . of you."

[5] "pride, and all sorts of arrogance" darpam utsekaṃ ca pṛthagvidham: Literally, "pride and arrogance of separate kinds." D7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read utsedham, "exaltation, superiority," for utsekam, "arrogance." Ct understands darpa to refer to internal or mental pride and utsedham to refer to physical superiority. (darpa āntaraḥ. utsedhaḥ śārīraḥ.) On Vālmīki's use of similar pairs of synonyms, see notes to 6.4.23–24.

16. "although I am well able to deal with you . . . night-roaming rākṣasa" mayā śakyaṃ kartuṃ yat tvāṃ niśācara: Literally, "in that by me it is capable of being done to you, night-roaming [one]." D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read hantuṃ tvāṃ he for kartuṃ yat tvām, lending the line the sense "I am able to kill you, O night-roaming [rākṣasa]."

"I must not kill you" na hantavyaḥ: Literally, "[you] are not to be killed." Ck and Ct understand that Nandin is referring to the necessity of keeping the word of the Lord [that is to say, the boon of Brahmā at 7.10.17–20, which immunizes Rāvaṇa against death at the hands of any supernatural being]. (bhagavadvacanānupālanāyeti śeṣaḥ.) Cs has a similar interpretation but quotes a verse from the MBhTN 8.123 of Madhva (Ānandatīrtha), suggesting that it is Viṣṇu who has made a vow that Rāvaṇa [and Kumbhakarṇa] can only be killed by him. (satyasaṃkalpabhagavatsaṃkalpāt. mayaiva vadhyau bhavataṃ trijanmasv ity evaṃrūpāt.) Cr understands that Rāvaṇa is not to be killed because, as indicated in pādas cd, he has already been slain by his previous actions (tvaṃ na hantavyo hi yataḥ svakarmabhiḥ pūrvam eva hato 'si).

"you have already been slain by your own actions" hatas tvaṃ hi pūrvam eva svakarmabhiḥ: Literally, "for you were slain previously by your own actions." Ck and Ct understand the reference to be to Rāvaṇa's history of evil deeds and note that the real meaning is that at a future time he is to be destroyed by those possessing his, i.e., Nandin's, form. (kiṃca tvaṃ pūrvam eva svakarmabhiḥ svaduṣkṛtair hata evāsi. kālāntare madrūpair eva hantavyo bhaviṣyasīti bhāvaḥ—so Ct.) Cs takes the term hataḥ, "slain," in the sense of "practically slain or as good as dead (tatprāyaḥ)."

Following verse 16, D6,7,10,11,T1,2,G1,3,M1,3,5, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of two lines [309*]: "When the great god had uttered this speech, the war drums[1] of the gods resounded and a shower of blossoms fell from the sky (ity udīritavākye tu deve tasmin mahātmani / devadundubhayo neduḥ puṣpavṛṣṭiś ca khāc cyutā //)."

[1] "war drums" dundubhayaḥ: See 155*, note 2, following note to 7.9.27, and note to 7.26.45.

17. "However" tadā: Literally, "then."

"heedless" acintayitvā: Literally, "not having considered or thought."

"the night-roaming rākṣasa" niśācaraḥ: Literally, "the night-roaming [one]." Ś,Ñ,V1,B2,D,M6, and Lahore, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead mahābalaḥ, "the one of great strength."

"and said these words" vākyam etad uvāca ha: Ś,Ñ,V1,D2,5–12,T3, and Lahore, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead vākyam āha daśānanaḥ, "the ten-faced [Daśagrīva] spoke words."

18. "this mountain" tad etac chailam: Literally, "this very mountain." Ś1,Ñ1,V1,D5–8,10,11, and Lahore, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read the synonymous masculine accusative tam imaṃ śailam.

"lord of cattle" gopate: The term is ambiguous and puzzling in this context. Among the principal meanings of the term gopati is "bull," and Nandin, to whom Daśagrīva's speech seems to be addressed, is almost everywhere represented as a great white bull. Indeed, he is depicted in this form both on Śiva's banner and at the entrance to virtually every Śaiva temple. The problem here is that Nandin has been described in verses 12–14 as having the form of a monkey, and in verse 15 he prophesizes that powerful beings sharing this form—the vānaras who will form Rāma's army—will bring about the destruction of Rāvaṇa's race. This problem is exacerbated for the southern commentators, whose text elaborately describes Nandin as appearing here in the form of a short-armed, deformed, bald, and hideous dwarf (see 298*, following notes to verse 6 above). In an effort to avoid the apparent contradiction, Ck, Cg, and Ct understand the vocative to refer to Rudra himself, i.e., the lord of the bull (Ck, Cg). (gopate he vṛṣabhapate rudra—so Ck, Cg; he gopate rudra—so Ct.) Indeed, the compound gopati is sometimes found as an epithet of Śiva, as it also is for Kṛṣṇa and Indra (Apte s.v.). It is apparently used in this sense once more in the Rāmāyaṇa at 7.29.23 (see note). Cv, whose text, along with B4,D1,4,M2,9, reads the genitive gopateḥ, understands that the speech is directed to Nandin but takes the reference to be to his, Nandin's, lord, that is, Śiva Paśupati (tava gopateḥ tava svāminaḥ paśupateḥ). Translators are divided as to how the term should be understood. Gorresio (1870, p. 55) takes the vocative to refer to Śiva as lord of herds, translating, "o signore degli armenti (Siva)." Dutt (1894, p. 1605) skirts the issue by rendering simply, "O Gopati." Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 468), perhaps influenced by Gorresio, renders, "ô bouvier." In this he is followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 418), who similarly renders, "O cowherd." Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, pp. 1958–59), again referring to Śiva, understands, "O master of a bull." Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 415), in a similar vein to Gita Press, translates, "O Lord of the Bull." Benoît (1999, p. 1262) translates as does Roussel, but adds a note (p. 1719), where he appears to understand the epithet as referring to Nandin but also seems to allude to the possibility of taking it as an epithet of Śiva Paśupati. He observes: "Nandin est le gardien des troupeaux de Śiva, dont l'un des noms est Paśupati, «Maître du bétail»."

"while I was traveling" mama gacchataḥ: Literally, "of me who was going."

19. "By what authority" kena prabhāvena: Literally, "by what power or lordliness."

"there" tatra: D7,10,11,M10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead nityam, "always or constantly."

"You do not realize, as you should" vijñātavyaṃ na jānīṣe: Literally, "you do not know what should be known." D7,10,11,T1,4,G2,3,M3,7,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read the third person singular jānīte, "he does [not] know," for jānīṣe, "you do [not] know," thus making Śiva the subject. Dutt (1894, p. 1605) and Benoît (1999, p. 1262) understand the gerundive vijñātavyam, "what should be known," to refer to the question posed in pādas ab, that is to say, they see Daśagrīva as demanding to know by what authority Śiva is disporting himself on the mountain.

"what a dangerous situation is at hand" bhayasthānam upasthitam: Literally, "the place or occasion for danger that has drawn near." Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 468) renders, "le moment de trembler est venu." This is echoed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 418), who renders, "the moment for him to tremble has come."

20. "your majesty" rājan: D5–7,10,11,T3,4,M3,7, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead, rāma, "O Rāma."

"he thrust his arms under the mountain" bhujān prakṣipya parvate: Literally, "having thrown [his] arms on the mountain." Ñ1,V3,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the nearly synonymous bhujān vikṣipya parvate, "having pressed or thrown [his] arms on the mountain." We follow Ct, the only commentator to gloss this phrase, who understands the locative parvate, "in or on the mountain," to mean "underneath the mountain (parvate parvatādhastāt)." In light of verse 22 below, where the rākṣasa's arms are explicitly shown to be crushed under the mountain, and of the general iconographic representation of this scene, we feel that Ct's understanding is correct.

"it" taṃ śailam: Literally, "that mountain." Ś,V1,D2,5–12, and Lahore, GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead śīghram, "quickly."

"together with its deer, its beasts of prey, and its trees" samṛgavyālapādapam: V1,D6,7,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead sa śailaḥ samakaṃpata, "that mountain shook."

Following verse 20, V1,D5–7,D10,11,S insert a passage of two lines [311*]: "Through the shaking of the mountain, the hosts of god were shaken. Then, even Pārvatī shook and clung to Maheśvara. (calanāt parvatasyaiva gaṇā devasya kampitāḥ / cacāla pārvatī cāpi tadāśliṣṭā maheśvaram //)"

21. "smiling when he saw what Daśagrīva had done" prahasan vīkṣya tatkṛtam: Literally, "[he] laughing or smiling, having seen that action of him or that action." Ś,Ñ,V1,3,B2–4,D2,5–12,T4, and Lahore, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead devānāṃ pravaro haraḥ, "Hara, foremost of the gods."

22. "which were beneath the mountain" śailasyādhogatāḥ: Ś,V1,3,B3,4,D2,5,7–12,T4 (second time), and Lahore (7.15.24), GPP (7.16.28), NSP (7.16.28), and Gita Press (7.16.28) read instead śailastambhopamāḥ, "[arms] which resembled stone pillars or which resembled mountains and/or pillars." Despite GPP's reading this variant, Ct (also Ck) read with the critical edition, leaving only Cr among the southern commentators to read with the variant. VSP and KK (noting the variant) read with the critical text. A number of northern manuscripts (Ñ,B3,4,D1,3,4) and Gorresio show a variant of the variant, understanding that Rāvaṇa has only two arms, and so read the dual for the plural (śailastambhopamau bhujau). Thus all translations consulted with the sole exception of Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 415) understand that Rāvaṇa's arms are being compared to pillars of stone or mountain columns. Concerning the number of arms and heads that Rāvaṇa has, see note to 7.9.25.

"on account of which" tatra: Literally, "with regard to that."

23. "in this fashion" tathā: T3,4, and KK and VSP read instead tadā, "then."

"tremendous" sumahān: V1,3,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead sahasā, "violently or suddenly."

"filled" pūritam: Ñ,V1,3,B2–4,D1–5,7,9–11,T3, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead kampitam, "shaken."

24. "the end of the world" lokasaṃkṣayam: Literally, "the destruction of the world[s]."

"were disturbed as they discharged their duties" calitāḥ sveṣu karmeṣu: Literally, "agitated in their own work or actions." The precise meaning of the phrase is not clear. The idea seems to be that the tremendous sound of Daśagrīva's cry distracts the gods from their proper duties. No commentator or translator consulted shares this reading, as indicated below.

Ś,Ñ,V1,3,B2–4,D5,7–12,T3,4, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP and all commentators consulted substitute for verse 24 a passage of two lines [316*]: "The daityas thought it was the crashing of the vajra and mortals thought it was the end of the cosmic age,[1] while the gods with Śakra[2] at their head were shaken from their thrones[3] (menire vajranişpeṣaṃ daityā martyā yugakṣayam / āsanebhyaḥ pracalitā devāḥ śakrapurogamāḥ //)."

[1] "The daityas thought it was the crashing of the vajra and mortals thought it was the end of the cosmic age" menire vajranişpeṣaṃ daityā martyā yugakṣayam: Literally, "the daityas thought it was the crash of the vajra [and] mortals [thought] it was the destruction of a cosmic age." The sequence vajranişpeṣam . . . yugakṣayam seems awkward. Several manuscripts and B3 and Gorresio's edition read the more transparent locative yugakṣaye, "at the end of a cosmic age," for the accusative yugakṣayam, "the end of a cosmic age." V1,D7,10,11,T3,4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead menire vajranişpeṣaṃ tasyāmātyā yugakṣaye, "his [Rāvaṇa's] ministers thought it was the thunderclap at the end of the cosmic age." Given the reading of the critical edition, yugakṣayam, we believe that the term vajranişpeṣam must refer to the dreadful sound of Indra's thunderbolt-weapon, the vajra, which would, of course, produce terror on the part of his immemorial foes the daityas. The comparison of a fearsome cry with a thunderclap of doom is found elsewhere in the epic; compare 6.55.13.

[2] "Śakra" śakra-: B3,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead indra-, "Indra."

[3] "were shaken from their thrones" āsanebhyaḥ pracalitāḥ: Literally, "[they were] moved from seats." D10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead tadā vartmasu calitāḥ, "[they were] shaken on their paths." Ct glosses, "Those gods who were standing on the paths were shaken from those paths (vartmasu sthitā devā vartmabhyaḥ pracalitā ity arthaḥ)." Ck and Cm understand similarly. Cg reads instead vartmasthāḥ pracalitāḥ, "those [gods] standing on the path were shaken." KK and VSP read instead vartmasthacalitāḥ, "[the gods] shaken from their positions on the path[s]."

Following 316*, D6,7,10,11,T3,4, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press continue, while T1,2,G,M1–5,7–10, and KK and VSP insert after verse 24, a passage of ten lines [317*]: "The seas were agitated and the mountains shook, as the yakṣas, vidyādharas, and perfected beings cried out, 'What is that?'[1–2] Then his ministers addressed him as he howled.[1][3] 'You must propitiate Mahādeva, the black-throated[2] lord of Umā. We can see no refuge here, ten-necked Rāvaṇa, other than him. Bowing low, you must approach him for refuge with hymns of praise.[4–6] For once propitiated, merciful Śaṅkara will grant you his grace.'[7] Addressed in this fashion by his ministers, ten-necked Rāvaṇa, bowing humbly, propitiated the bull-bannered lord with various conciliatory hymns of praise.[3][8–9] And so, a thousand years passed while the rākṣasa cried out.[10]"

[1] "Then his ministers addressed him as he howled." atha te mantriṇas tasya vikrośantam athābruvan: D5,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press omit this line.

[2] "black-throated" nīlagrīvam: D5–7,10,11,T3,4, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the synonymous nīlakaṇṭham. See notes to 7.6.8.

[3] "with various conciliatory hymns of praise" sāmabhir vividhaiḥ stotraiḥ: We follow Cr, the only commentator to remark on this line, who takes the term sāman in its adjectival sense, "conciliatory or pacifying (sāntvanakārakaiḥ)." This seems to us entirely apposite to the context. All translators consulted, however, take the term in its other common meaning, "vedic hymn or chant, the Sāmaveda." This seems to us both inapposite and redundant.

25. "But" tadā: Literally, "then." D5 (second time),6,7,10,11,T3,4, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead prabhuḥ, "lord," which then refers to Mahādeva.

"your majesty" rājan: D6,7–11,T3,4,M1,6, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead rāma, "O Rāma."

"resting on the summit of the mountain" śailāgre viṣṭhitaḥ: Literally, "present or standing on the summit of the mountain." D10,11, and GPP and NSP read the accusative viṣṭhitam for the critical edition's nominative viṣṭhitaḥ, thus improbably placing Rāvaṇa rather than Śiva on the summit of the mountain. This reading is followed by Dutt (1894, p. 1606) and Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 469). Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 419) avoids the seeming oddity of placing Rāvaṇa at the top of the mountain by rendering, "released the arms of Dashanana from under the mountain."

"ten-faced Daśagrīva's . . . him" tasya . . . daśānanam: Literally, "[arms] of him . . . [spoke] to Daśānana." Ś,V3,D2,5–12,T4,G1, and Lahore, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead cāsya, "and, of him," for tasya, "of him."

26. "with your might and boldness" tava vīryāc ca śauṇḍīryāc ca: Literally, "from your might and boldness." The two terms have overlapping sets of meanings, including such concepts as strength, valor, prowess, etc. In our judgment, Śiva is impressed with Rāvaṇa's strength, demonstrated by his ability actually to shake the mighty mountain, and by his audacity in actually daring to do so. Ck and Cr understand that the term śauṇḍīryāt here refers to physical strength (balam iha śauṇḍīryaśabdenocyate—so Ck). D11 and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read vīrasya, "of heroic [you]," for the critical edition's vīryāt, "from might," while D6,7, and KK and VSP read the genitive vīryasya. Ś,Ñ,V1,3,B1,2,4,D9,12, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read the synonymous śauṭīryāt for śauṇḍīryāt. Since Ct's reading lacks a second source for Śiva's pleasure, he takes the conjunction ca, "and," to refer elliptically to Rāvaṇa's hymn of praise as a source of the god's satisfaction (cāt stuteḥ). See 317*, lines 8–9 and note 3, following notes to verse 24 above.

"night-roaming rākṣasa" niśācara: Literally, "O night-roaming [one]."

"The howl you released in your agony as you cried out was truly terrifying." ravato vedanāmuktaḥ svaraḥ paramadāruṇaḥ: Literally, "the pain-released sound of [you] crying out is supremely terrifying." D6,7,10,11,T4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead śailākrāntena yo muktas tvayā rāvaḥ sudāruṇaḥ, "the cry that you released when crushed [lit., 'overcome'] by the mountain was very terrifying."

27. "And since this triple world, reverberating with your cries, was terrified, you shall be known by the name 'Rāvaṇa.'" yasmāl lokatrayaṃ tv etad rāvitaṃ bhayam āgatam / tasmāt tvaṃ rāvaṇo nāma nāmnā tena bhaviṣyasi //: Literally, "And since the triple world, which was caused to cry out (rāvitam), came to fear, therefore, you indeed shall be [known] namely by the name Rāvaṇa." For a discussion of the name Rāvaṇa [rāvaṇaḥ], "the one who causes to cry out," and references to the use of this epithet elsewhere in the epic, see notes to 6.8.12. See also R. Goldman (1984, pp. 105–6) on the echoing of names in epithets. The present passage, which purports to be the original explanation of how the great rākṣasa lord came by his most familiar appellation, does not completely resolve the ambiguity of the epithet mentioned in the note to 3.30.20. The question is whether Daśagrīva (as he is actually named at birth because of his most conspicuous anatomical anomaly) earns this sobriquet because he causes all creatures to cry out (in terror), as suggested at 3.30.20, where he is described as rāvaṇaṃ sarvabhūtāṇām, or, as in the present passage, where his own deafening roars of rage and pain cause the three worlds themselves simply to resound (lokatrayaṃ tv etad rāvitam). Ck and Ct , the only commentators to offer an opinion here, apparently prefer the latter explanation, glossing the causative participle rāvitam, "made to cry," with śabditam, "made to sound." This would seem to accord with the passage's focus on the extraordinary character of the rākṣasa's mighty roar (verse 23), which fills the entire universe, and the degree to which Śiva is impressed with its volume and fearsomeness (verse 26). On the other hand, Ct's gloss may be simply an elliptical repetition of his gloss on 3.30.20, where he describes Rāvaṇa as he who causes all creatures to cry out (rāvaṇaṃ sarvabhūtāṇām ākrośaśabdakāriṇam) in a context where no mention is made of the legend of the demon's own anguished roaring. The ambiguity is maintained here by the fact that reference is also made to the terrifying effect on the world of Rāvaṇa's roar (verse 26). Of the translators consulted, only Gorresio (1870, p. 56) and Benoît (1999, p. 1263) offer interpretations of the name. The former places the term fragoroso in parentheses after the name, while the latter adds in quotation marks, "celui qui provoque des hurlements." Benoît (1999, p. 1719) also provides a note on the etymology of the name from the verbal root √ru. In the Rāmopākhyāna, we are told that Rāvaṇa got his name because he made the worlds cry out (rāvayāmāsa lokān yat tasmād rāvaṇa ucyate) (MBh 2.259.40). As noted at 3.30.20, there has been some scholarly speculation as to the actual etymology of the name Rāvaṇa. As Pollock observes in his note to 3.30.20, Mayrhofer had speculated that the term was a pre-Aryan name for a kind of bird. If by pre-Aryan Mayrhofer (1956–1980, vol. 3, pp. 55–56) means Dravidian, and if the conjecture that the name is actually of such a provenance is correct, it may be one of those names in which the productive honorific suffix -aṇa/aṇṇa, "elder brother," figures. On this onomastic issue, see Emeneau and Gowda (1974, pp. 210–12).

"And . . . this" tv etat: V1,3,B1,D5–7,9–11,T3,4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the synonymous caitat.

"by the name" nāmnā tena: Ś,V2,D,T4,M6 and Lahore, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead nāmnā rājan, "by the name, your majesty."

28. "everyone else" cānye: Literally, "and others."

"Rāvaṇa, 'He Who Makes the Worlds Reverberate with His Cries'" rāvaṇaṃ lokarāvaṇam: Literally, "Rāvaṇa who causes the worlds to reverberate." See notes to verse 27 above.

29. "without fear" visrabdhaḥ: Literally, "confident or secure." D7,9–11,T3,4,M5, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the adverbial accusative visrabdham, "confidently." Cr notes that Rāvaṇa is not to have any fear of Śiva (madviṣaye saviśvāsaṃ yathā bhavati tathā).

"I grant you leave" mayā tvam abhyanujñātaḥ: Ck, Cg, and Ct all agree that Śiva is giving Rāvaṇa leave to depart by means of the Puṣpakavimāna (puṣpakeṇa gamanāyeti śeṣaḥ).

Following verse 29, D6,7,10,11,T,G1,2,M1,3,5,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of twelve lines [321*]: "When the lord of Laṅkā had been addressed in this fashion by Śambhu himself, he[1] said, 'If you are pleased, Mahādeva, please grant me a boon as I beg it of you.[1–2] I already cannot be slain[2] by the gods, gandharvas, dānavas, rākṣasas, guhyakas, great serpents, and other extremely powerful beings.[3–4] I take no notice of animals and humans, since I regard them as weak.[3] I attained[4] a long life span from Brahmā, O destroyer of Tripura. So please grant me the remainder of my desired life span and a weapon.[5]' [5–7] Then[6] addressed in this fashion by Rāvaṇa, Śaṅkara gave him the brilliantly blazing sword known as 'Candrahāsa.'[7][8–9] And, smiling,[8] Śambhu, the lord of malignant spirits,[9] granted him the remainder of his life span,[10] and then[11] said: 'This must not be treated with disrespect by you.[12] For if this is disrespected, then, without a doubt, it will return to me.[10–12]'"

[1] "he" saḥ: D6,7,10,11,T3,G1,M5, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead ca, "and."

[2] "I already cannot be slain" avadhyatā mayā prāptā: Literally, "the state of being not to be killed was obtained by me." D6,7,10,11,T3,4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the synonymous avadhyatvaṃ mayā prāptam. Cf. 7.10.16–20. On the motif of Rāvaṇa's boon, see note to 7.10.16.

[3] "I take no notice of animals and humans, since I regard them as weak." tiryañmanuṣyān na gaṇe durbalā iti cintayan: D10,11,M10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead mānuṣān na gaṇe deva svalpās te mama saṃmatāḥ, "I take no notice of humans, O god, for I regard them as puny."

[4] "I attained" saṃprāptam: Literally, "it was attained." D7,10,11,T4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead me prāptam, "it was attained by [lit., 'of'] me."

[5] "So please grant me the remainder of my desired life span and a weapon." vāñchitasyāyuṣaḥ śeṣaṃ śastraṃ ca tvaṃ prayaccha me: The commentators are in general agreement that Rāvaṇa, fearful that his evil deeds may have shortened his long life span that was preordained by Brahmā, is asking Śiva to ensure that he will live out his full life span (brahmadattadīrghāyuṣy ādyo bhāgas tatas tasmāc cheṣam avaśiṣṭaṃ vāñchitam idānīm eva duṣkarmaṇā kenāpy avinaṣṭaṃ me prayaccha—so Cg). Cr notes that Rāvaṇa's request for the guarantee of the fulfillment of his life span suggests his extreme fearfulness (āyuḥśeṣayācanena tasyātibhītatvaṃ vyaktam). Ck and Ct amplify on the quest for the weapon, adding that it should be a divine weapon that will ensure Rāvaṇa's universal conquest during his remaining life span (tasmiṃś cāyuṣi sarvajayāya śastraṃ ca divyaṃ prayaccha—so Ct). D6,7,10,11,T3,4,G1,2,M5,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read tvaṃ ca by transposition. On the motif of Rāvaṇa's boon, see note to 7.10.16.

[6] "Then" tadā: D6,7,10,11,T3,4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tataḥ, "after that or then."

[7] "the brilliantly blazing sword known as 'Candrahāsa'" khaḍgaṃ mahādīptaṃ candrahāsam iti śrutam: The term candrahāsa, literally, "laughter of the moon," is listed in the Amarakośa (2.8.89) as a synonym for "sword." The presence of the term khaḍga, "sword," and the phrase iti śrutam, "heard of or known as," strongly suggest that Candrahāsa is the proper name of the weapon. This would appear to be confirmed by Bālarāmāyaṇa 1.56.61 (he pāṇayaḥ kimiti vāñcatha candrahāsam). And we, like other translators, have rendered it in this way. The line, however, presents a syntactic anomaly in that the expected case of the proper noun would be the nominative and not, as we find, the accusative. This feature is exploited by Cs to argue that candrahāsa is not the proper name of the sword Śiva presents to Rāvaṇa and that the quotation marker iti here must be taken in the sense of proximity, as permitted by the Viśvakośa. Cs then takes the participle śrutam, "heard of," in its sense of "famous or well known." (khaḍgas tu nistriṃśacandrahāsāsiriṣṭaya ity amaroktakhaḍgaparyāyād ayam anyaś candrahāsaśabdaḥ śivanistriṃśavācīti sāṃnidhye vidyamānaṃ nāmnā candrahāsaṃ śrutaṃ prasiddhaṃ khaḍgaṃ dadāv ity anvayaḥ. anyathetiśabdasya candrahāsapadayoge prathamātvaprāpteḥ. iti svarūpe sāṃnidhya iti viśvaḥ.)

[8] "smiling" smitvā: The text does not explain why Śiva smiles, nor does the reading appear in the texts of any of the commentators consulted. Perhaps, as Cg suggests (see below), Śiva is thinking, even as he grants Rāvaṇa the boon of a long, natural life span, about Rāvaṇa's future death at Rāma's hands. D7,10,11,T3, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead dadau, "he gave or granted." KK and VSP show the variant sthitvā, "having stood," which is not noted in the critical apparatus. Cg comments on this reading, glossing matvā, "having thought or having reflected." He explains that what Śiva is reflecting on is Rāvaṇa's future death at the hands of Rāma (rāmeṇa vadha iti sthitvā matvety arthaḥ). This would appear to gloss the minor southern variant smṛtvā, "having called to mind," found in T2,M1,10.

[9] "the lord of malignant spirits" bhūtapatiḥ: For this meaning of the polysemic term, see note to 6.47.9.

[10] "granting him the remainder of his life span" āyuṣaś cāvaśeṣaṃ ca . . . dattvā: Cg attempts to sum up the entire problematic of Rāvaṇa's life span, boon of invulnerability, and impending death by indicating that Śiva is validating Brahmā's grant of long life, along with the exclusion of violent or untimely death at the hands of the gods, etc., while keeping in the back of his mind the idea that the rākṣasa will one day die at the hands of Rāma (brahmā dīrghāyuṣyaṃ tāvad dattavāṃs tatrāsyāpamṛtyavo devatādibhyaḥ prāptāḥ parihṛtā bhavantu rāmeṇa vadha iti sthitvā matvety arthaḥ—Cg according to KK and VSP). Ck's interpretation is similar, although he includes death through the curse of Vedavatī among those excluded by Brahmā and Śiva. On Vedavatī, see 7.17.8 and note.

[11] "then" tadā: D7,10,11,T3,4,M10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tataḥ, "after that or then."

[12] "This must not be treated with disrespect by you." nāvajñeyam idaṃ tvayā: We agree with the commentators in understanding the referent here to be the sword given by Śiva to Rāvaṇa. According to Ck, Cg, and Ct, Śiva is instructing Rāvaṇa that he must not omit worship of the sword for even a single day (ekasminn api dine pūjaudāsīnyaṃ na kartavyam ity arthaḥ—so Ck and Cg; Ct similarly).

30. "by Maheśvara Mahādeva . . . him" maheśvareṇa . . . /. . . mahādevam: Literally, "by Maheśvara . . . to Mahādeva." We have added the pronoun to avoid any confusion arising from the fact that both names refer to the same divinity.

"himself" sākṣāt: Literally, "directly, in person." D6,7,10,11,T4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead evam, "in this fashion."

"then mounted his flying palace" vimānaṃ tat samāruhat: Ś,Ñ1,V1,3,D2,5–12,T3,4, and Lahore, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead ārurohātha puṣpakam, "then he mounted the Puṣpaka."

31. "wherever he went" tatas tataḥ: Literally, "here and there." V3,D5,M3, and KK and VSP read instead the more or less synonymous itas tataḥ.

Following verse 31, Ś,Ñ,V1,B1,2,D (D10,11 omit lines 5–6),T3,4, as well as Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK (lines 5–6 in brackets), and VSP (omit lines 5–6) insert a passage of six lines [322*]: "Some of the kshatriyas who were powerful heroes, difficult to crush in battle, would not accede to his rule and so perished, along with their followers.[1–2] Others, realizing[1] that the rākṣasa was invincible, with the approval of their wise men, submitted to that rākṣasa, so arrogant in his strength, 'We have been defeated.'[3–4] And thus, in this fashion, Rāvaṇa, who made the worlds reverberate with his cries, inflated with arrogance and strength, roamed about subjugating the kshatriyas through his valor.[2][5–6]"

[1] "realizing" jānānāḥ: Ñ2,B1,D5–7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, and KK read instead the synonymous parasmaipada participle jānantaḥ.

[2] "roamed about subjugating the kshatriyas through his valor" pratāpāvanatān kurvan kṣatriyān: KK reads instead pratāpavanatīkurvan rāṣṭrāṇi, "[he roamed about] subjugating kingdoms through his valor."

Sarga 17

1. "the earth" sa mahītalam: Literally, "he [i.e., great-armed Rāvaṇa] . . . the surface of the earth." Ś2,3,B4,D1,3,4,12,M1,3, and KK and VSP read instead sa mahītale, "he [i.e., great-armed Rāvaṇa] . . . on the surface of the earth," while D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read pṛthivītale, "on the surface of the earth."

"the Himalayan forests" himavadvanam: Literally, "the forest of or on the Himalayas." G1,M5, and KK and VSP read instead himavatsānum, "the slope of the Himalaya."

2. "wearing black antelope skin and matted locks" kṛṣṇājinajaṭādharām: Black antelope skins and matted locks are normally associated with male renunciants. Compare, for example, 6.1.13.26–30, where Bharata assumes the guise of an ascetic while waiting for Rāma's return. However, it is by no means unheard of for female ascetics to adopt these symbols. See, for example, 4.49.31, where Hemā is described as wearing black antelope skin, and KumāSaṃ 5.9, where Pārvatī is said to wear her hair in matted locks.

"She was engaged in asceticism according the ordinances of the seers, and she looked like a goddess." ārṣeṇa vidhinā yuktāṃ tapantīṃ devatām iva: Literally, "conjoined with the ordinances of the seers, she [was] performing austerities like a divinity." The text as it stands in the critical edition presents yet another awkward simile on the part of the Uttarakāṇḍa authors. With certain famous exceptions, such as that of Pārvatī in her pursuit of Śiva as a husband, asceticism is not a conventional activity of the Hindu goddesses. Ñ2,B,D10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read dīpyantīm, "shining, blazing," for tapantīm, "performing austerities." This reading improves the simile in that we now see the young woman shining or radiant like a goddess (dīpyantīṃ devatām iva). However, it leaves hanging, as it were, the expression "conjoined with the ordinances of the seers (ārṣeṇa vidhinā yuktām)." Ck, Cg, and Ct attempt to remedy the disconnect of this reading by glossing the phrase ārṣeṇa vidhinā as "with the practice of asceticism (taponuṣṭhānena)." Cr glosses the entire phrase as "the sense is, 'she was practicing the rituals set forth by the seers' (ṛṣiproktakarmakartrīm ity arthaḥ)." KK and VSP read cainām, "and her," for yuktām, "conjoined with or engaged with," lending the line the sense "and through the practice of asceticism, she was shining like a goddess."

3. "Laughing softly" prahasann iva: Ck and Ct believe that Rāvaṇa is laughing in his delight at finding a defenseless young beauty alone in the forest (bata mamāraṇye 'nāthā sukanyā prāpteti saṃtoṣajaprahāsavān evety arthaḥ—so Ck). Cg believes he laughs because he has come upon a young woman who would be hard to find (durlabhakanyālābhāt prahāsaḥ). Cs understands that Rāvaṇa is laughing for one of two reasons. The first is the thought that the woman would not refuse his advances, since he is a king who solicits her. The second is that Rāvaṇa actually believes that the woman is probably performing her austerities with the precise purpose of obtaining someone like him [as a husband] (rājānaṃ māṃ yācantaṃ na ceti na vadet prāyo mādṛśaprāptyai taponiṣṭheyam ity abhiprāyeṇa vā hāso rāvaṇasyeti jñeyam)."

4. "Lovely lady" bhadre: This term of address to a woman can take on different resonances, depending on the emotional tenor of the situation. When used in a seductive context like the present, it generally refers to a woman's beauty. See, for example, 3.46.6 and 3.47.12, where Rāvaṇa is attempting to seduce Sītā. On the other hand, compare 6.103.2 and notes, where Rāma uses it to distance himself from Sītā when she is under a cloud of suspicion.

"Such perverse behavior . . . with your beauty" rūpasyeyāṃ pratikriyā: Literally, "of [your] beauty, this contrary action." The term pratikriyā normally refers to retaliation or counteraction but can also mean simple opposition. Ck and Ct gloss, "behavior (ācaraṇam)." We follow Cr and Cg, who gloss, "perversity (vipāryayaḥ)" and "conduct contradictory to youth (yauvanapratikūlakriyā)," respectively. D7,10,11,M4, and NSP and Gita Press read rūpasyevaṃ pratikriyā, "of [your] beauty . . . perverse behavior in this way," D6,T3, and VSP (noted as a variant in KK)read rūpasyeva pratikriyā, "of beauty, indeed, perverse behavior," and T1,G1,M3,5, and KK read rūpasya tapasaḥ kriyā, "of beauty, this performance of asceticism." The reading of GPP is unclear, as the editors have placed a footnote sign over the final syllable of rūpasyeva[ṃ], making it unclear whether the editors are reading eva or evam.

Following verse 4, Ñ,V3,B,D1,3,4,7,10,11,T,G1,3,M1,3,5,6, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of two lines [326*]: "Your incomparable beauty, timorous lady, stirs mad passion in men.[1] It is not proper for you to practice austerities.[2] This has been firmly established.[3] (rūpaṃ te 'nupamaṃ bhīru kāmonmādakaraṃ nṛṇāṃ / na yuktam tapasi sthātuṃ nirgato hy eṣa nirṇayaḥ //)"

[1] "stirs mad passion in men" kāmonmādakaraṃ nṛṇām: Literally, "of men, it produces a madness of desire."

[2] "It is not proper for you to practice austerities." na yuktaṃ tapasi sthātum: Literally, "it is not proper to stand or remain in asceticism."

[3] "This has been firmly established." nirgato hy eṣa nirṇayaḥ: The expression is obscure and elliptical. The literal meaning would be something like "for this resolution has gone forth." The consensus of the commentators is that the reference is to an established principle of the śāstras of the elders. Ct glosses nirgataḥ as "well known or well established (prasiddhaḥ)" and adds, "on the part of the elders (vṛddhānām iti śeṣaḥ)." Cr glosses, "well known to us (asmābhir jñātaḥ)." Cs glosses, "set forth according to the śāstras. That is to say, well established. (nirgataḥ śāstrata iti. prasiddha iti yāvat.)"

5. "Lovely lady" bhadre: See note to verse 4 above.

"daughter" duhitā: D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead kim idam, "what is this?"

"blameless lady . . . your" tavānaghe: D7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead varānane, "O fair-faced one."

"at once" śīghram: D6,7,10,11,T1,2,G,M1–5,7–10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead sarvam, "all," which would construe with the imperative śaṃsa, "tell," yielding the sense "Tell me everything."

"For what purpose do you amass these austerities?" ko vā hetus tapo 'rjane: Literally, "Or what is the reason with respect to the amassing of austerities?" D6,7,10,11,T4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead kasya hetoḥ pariśramaḥ, "for what purpose is the exertion?"

Following 5ab, D6,7,10,11,T,G,M1,3,5,7–10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of one line [327*]: "The man who gets to enjoy you, timorous lady, is the luckiest man on earth[1] (yena saṃbhujyase bhīru sa naraḥ puṇyabhāg bhuvi /)."

[1] "The man who gets to enjoy you, timorous lady, is the luckiest man on earth." yena saṃbhujyase bhīru sa naraḥ puṇyabhāg bhuvi: Literally, "The man by whom you are enjoyed is the partaker of auspiciousness on earth."

6. "by the ignoble rākṣasa" tenānāryeṇa rakṣasā: Literally, "by the non-āryan rākṣasa." D6,7,10,11,T1,2,4,G,M1–5,7–10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead rāvaṇena yaśasvinī, "by Rāvaṇa, [the] illustrious [young woman]."

7. "My . . . righteous" mama dhārmikaḥ: D6,7,10,11,T4,G1,2,M1,2,4,5,7–10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead amitaprabhaḥ, "of immeasurable splendor."

"the . . . brahman-seer . . . Kuśadhvaja" kuśadhvajaḥ . . . brahmarṣiḥ: Ck notes that by the qualification brahmarṣi we know that the individual mentioned here is different from the well-known [kshatriya] ancestor of Viśvāmitra of the same name (kuśadhvajo brahmarṣir iti viśeṣaṇād ayaṃ viśvāmitrapūrvakād anyaḥ). However, there does not appear to be any ancestor of Viśvāmitra named Kuśadhvaja, and the only known ancestor with a similar name is Kuśanābha, mentioned at Bālakāṇḍa sargas 31–33. Moreover, there are no variants recorded in the critical edition for the name Kuśanābha. The only other figure having the name Kuśadhvaja in the Rāmāyaṇa, or, indeed, it appears, in the epic literature, is the younger brother of Janaka mentioned at 1.69.2–3ff., but he, of course, is neither a brahman nor the son of Bṛhaspati. Perhaps Ck has had a lapse of memory and is confusing the name with that of Viśvāmitra's grandfather, Kuśanābha. See note 2 to 344*, following note to verse 28 below.

8. "an incarnation of vedic speech" vāṅmayī: Literally, "consisting of speech." The verse is somewhat obscure in its precise meaning and the commentators and translators offer several slightly different interpretations. The general consensus is that Vedavatī is an incarnation or embodiment of the goddess of speech Vāc, lauded in the vedic literature. See S. Goldman 2000b. The term vāṅmayī is often used as an epithet of Sarasvatī, the goddess of speech, learning, and the arts. Only Ct and Ck comment on the verse. Ct understands, as do we, that the girl was born as an embodiment of the vedas in the form of speech directly from the sage Kuśadhvaja, who was chanting the vedas. That is why, Ct continues, her father gave her the name Vedavatī, "she who is possessed of the vedas." Ct continues, noting that she is the feminine energy of the Lord, that is to say, the goddess Lakṣmī, who took birth for the destruction of Rāvaṇa by means of a curse. The goddess's identification with vedic speech is complete, Ct argues, and therefore she is able to state [in verse 11 below] that her father intended Viṣṇu to be his son-in-law. (vedābhyāsaṃ kurvato mahātmanas tasya sakāśād vāṅmayī vāṅmayavedamūrtiḥ kanyāhaṃ saṃbhūtāta evāhaṃ pitrā nāmnā vedavatīti smṛtā. bhagavataḥ śaktir lakṣmīr eva rāvaṇavadhāya rāvaṇaṃ śaptum atrāvatīrṇā. asyā vāṅmayītvaṃ sārvātmyād ata eva vakṣyati pitur me viṣṇur jāmātābhipreta iti.) The first portion of Ck's comments is quite similar to that of Ct's and, like Ct, he understands that Vedavatī is born directly from the speech of her father (mahātmanas tasya vācaḥ sakāśāt). Ck, however, differs from Ct in keeping with his earlier expressed devotion to Lord Brahmā (see notes to verse 14 below; see also 5.1.177; 6.47.104; 6.59.82; 6.62.28; and notes; and Goldman and Goldman 1996, p. 96) in understanding that Vedavatī is not born from a human womb but is a self-realized incarnation of the one encompassing the three vedas, who is mother-Gāyatrī (tripadāṃbikā), that is to say, the great mother Sarasvatī. Ck understands Agastya to be informing Rāma that she, Vedavatī, is, in fact, Sītā, i.e., Mahāsarasvatī, and that he, Rāma, is Brahmā. Ck justifies these claims by quoting Praśnopaniṣad 5.5, in which the enlightened being attains the Brahmaloka. (evaṃ ceyaṃ vedatrayavatyās tripadāṃbikāyā mahāmātuḥ sarasvatyāḥ svocito 'yonijo 'vatāra iti suspaṣṭam. iyam eva sīteti bodhayatāgastyenārthād iyaṃ mahāsarasvatī tvaṃ brahmā. sa etasmāj jīvaghanāt parātparaṃ puriśayaṃ puruṣam īkṣata iti prasiddhaḥ. paraṃ puruṣam iti suspaṣṭam upapāditaṃ draṣṭavyam.) An interesting issue in this passage is that if Vedavatī is an incarnation of Sarasvatī, that goddess is normally regarded as the consort of Brahmā rather than Viṣṇu. This, of course, is in keeping with Ck's project of identifying Rāma himself as an incarnation of Brahmā. It would be most unusual for a deity to change spouses in the course of his or her incarnations. See notes to verse 28 below. Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 421), like Ck, understands that Vedavatī "was born of the speech" of Kuśadhvaja rather than from abstract or personified Speech. Gorresio (1870, p. 58) translates the term vāṅmayī as "vocale fanciulla," adding in his translation the interpretive phrase "figlia del verbo vedico." In his note to this passage (p. 318), Gorresio remarks on the two possible interpretations, one of which is "la parola vedica personificata," and the other, "Nacqui per virtù della recitazione del verbo vedico."

9. "great serpents" -pannagāḥ: The reading is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. Lahore and Gorresio both read variants.

"approached . . . and" te cāpi gatvā: Literally, "moreover, they having gone." KK and VSP read instead the more or less synonymous te 'pi gatvā hi, "they, too, indeed having gone."

"asked for my hand in marriage" varaṇaṃ rocayanti me: Literally, "they chose the choice of me." The term varaṇam, "choice," can refer specifically to the choice of a bride. Ck and Ct remark on the redundancy of the expression. They rationalize it by saying that we should take the causal root √rocay, "to choose," in the generic sense of "to do or make." Thus they take the expression to mean "They made a choice or request." (ruciḥ kriyāsāmānye. varaṇaṃ kurvanti smety arthaḥ.)

10. "lord of the rākṣasas" rākṣaseśvara: KK and VSP read instead rākṣasarṣabha, "O bull among rākṣasas."

"Listen, great-armed hero" niśāmaya mahābhuja: Literally, "Hear, O great-armed [one]." KK and VSP read instead niśācara niśāmaya, "Hear, O night-roaming [rākṣasa]."

11–12. "foremost of the gods" surottamaḥ: D6,7,9–11,G1,M1,5, and Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead sureśvaraḥ, "lord of the gods." For some reason, both GPP and NSP (7.17.12) read the contextually inappropriate vocative sureśvara.

"that righteous man" dhārmikaḥ: Literally, "the righteous [one]." D6,7,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tasmai tu, "but to him [Viṣṇu]."

"to anyone else" anyasya: Literally, "of another." We agree with Ck, Ct, and Cr in understanding the dative anyasmai for the awkward genitive.

"Śambhu" śambhuḥ: T1,G3,M1,3, and KK and VSP read the variant name dambhuḥ, "Dambhu." According to Vāyupurāṇa 67.76–81, Śambhu is one of the five sons of the daitya king Virocana. He is also mentioned at Prakṣipta I, sarga 1.41–42 (= App. I, No. 1, lines 81–84).

"as he slept" prasuptaḥ: Literally, "asleep." D6,7,10,T1,2,G,M1–5,7–10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead śayānaḥ, "as he lay [sleeping]."

13. "my . . . mother" me jananī: After arguing that Vedavatī was born directly from her father's recitation of the vedas, Ck and Ct are silent on the identity of this woman. See notes to verse 8 above.

"entered the fire with him" praviṣṭā dahanaṃ saha: Ś,Ñ,V1,3,B,D2,5–12,T3,4,M3,10, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead praviṣṭā havyavāhanam, "entered the [fire,] bearer of oblations." This is the first reference in the critically established text to the practice of sahagamanam, whereby a woman immolates herself on her husband's funeral pyre. The practice is known to the Mahābhārata but appears to be alien to the social and ritual world of the Rāmāyaṇa. Benoît (1999, p. 1720) refers to a passage in the Ayodhyākāṇḍa in which the grieving widow Kausalyā threatens to hurl herself upon Daśaratha's funeral pyre but does not, of course, follow through on this vow. That passage, however, is known only to the southern recension and is thus relegated to the critical apparatus (2.60.1534* = GPP 2.66.12 [see notes 2.60.10]). See Sutherland 1994.

14. "And so the wish is firmly lodged in my heart that I will make" karomīti mamecchā ca hṛdaye sādhu viṣṭhitā: D6,10,11,T4,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP substitute a passage of one line [331*] for 14cd: "I will make . . . and so, I bear him in my heart (karomīti tam evāhaṃ hṛdayena samudvahe)." Ck, Ct, and Cr and all of the translators consulted agree that it is Nārāyaṇa that Vedavatī cherishes in her heart.

"with respect to Nārāyaṇa" nārāyaṇaṃ prati: The reference, of course, is to the late Kuśadhvaja's desire that his daughter marry Nārāyaṇa. Both Ct and Ck provide etymologies for the name Nārāyaṇa. Ct offers two alternatives. According to the first, the term nāra refers to the collectivity of living beings, while ayana takes its normal sense of "resort or way"; thus the name means "the refuge or resort of all creatures." Ct's second interpretation takes nāra in its sense of "the waters." In this interpretation, the term refers to Viṣṇu as "he whose resting place is the primal waters." (nārāyaṇaṃ nārasya jīvasamūhasyāyanam. nārā āpo 'yanaṃ yasyeti vā taṃ.) Ck similarly cites the second etymology, derived from ManuSm 1.10, which he quotes. He takes the reference, however, as an opportunity to launch into yet another of his theological excursuses, in which he asserts that the name Nārāyaṇa refers, in fact, to Brahmā rather than Viṣṇu. (nārāyaṇam "āpo narā iti proktā āpo vai narasūnavaḥ / tā yad asyāyanaṃ proktā [sic for pūrvaṃ] tena nārāyaṇaḥ smṛtaḥ //" iti manusmṛtau bhūjalapradhāno virāḍupagraho bhagavān brahmety arthaḥ.)

For 14cd, Ś,Ñ,V1,3,B,D1–5,7–9,12,T3,M6, and Lahore and Gorresio substitute a passage of one line [330*]: "Having seen my father dead, I desire to carry out his great vow (mṛtaṃ ca pitaraṃ dṛṣṭvā cartukāmā mahāvratam)." Only Gorresio (1870, p. 58) translates this line.

15. "I will fulfill my father's desire even though he has departed" ahaṃ pretagatasyāpi kariṣye kāṅkṣitaṃ pituḥ: D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, and VSP omit this line (15ab). KK (7.17.17) includes the line in brackets, preceded by 330*, also in brackets. See note to verse 14 above.

16. "Know that I am resorting to righteousness in my desire to make Nārāyaṇa my husband." āśritāṃ viddhi māṃ dharmaṃ nārāyaṇapatīcchayā: D10,11,T4,M10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead āśraye niyamaṃ ghoraṃ nārāyaṇaparīpsayā, "I resort to this fearsome vow out of a desire to obtain Nārāyaṇa."

Following 16ab, Ś,Ñ,V1,3,B1,2,4,D2,5,7–12,T3, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert, while D1–4,T4 insert following verse 16 a passage of one line [332*]: "Nārāyaṇa is the husband for me; I will consider no other man[1] (nārāyaṇaḥ patir mahyaṃ na cānyo mānuṣo mataḥ)."[1]

[1] "I will consider no other man" na cānyo mānuṣo mataḥ: Literally, "no other man is considered." D7,10,11,T3,4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read puruṣottamāt, "than Puruṣottama," for mānuṣo mataḥ, "man is considered," yielding the sense "[there is] none other than Puruṣottama." Cr notes that by the term puruṣottamāt, Vedavatī is saying that Nārāyaṇa is none other than the Supreme Being, i.e., Rāma (puruṣottamād rāmād yo 'nyo 'tyantabhinno na sa nārāyaṇa eva mama patiḥ).

18. "from atop his flying palace" vimānāgrāt: Literally, "from the top or highest point of the vimāna." Cr reads vimānāgryāt, "from that excellent vimāna." This variant is not noted in the critical apparatus.

"there" tatra: D6,7,10,11,T1,2,4,G2,3,M1–4,8–10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead bhūyaḥ, "once more."

19. "The amassing of righteous actions . . . is an adornment only of the elderly" vṛddhānām . . . bhrājate dharmasaṃcayaḥ: Literally, "the piling up of dharma shines among the old." D10,11,M4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read puṇya- for dharma-, giving the compound the sense "the amassing of religious merit."

20. "You ought not in your youth be acting in such a manner that is fitting only for the elderly." nārhase kartum īdṛśam /. . . yauvane vārdhakaṃ vidhim //: Literally, "You should not be doing such geriatric conduct in youth." D6,7,10,11,T1,2,4,G,M1–5,7–10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read vaktum, "to speak," for kartum, "to act." In addition, the same manuscripts and printed editions read yauvanaṃ te 'tivartate, "your youth is passing," for yauvane vārdhakaṃ vidhim, "geriatric conduct in youth." KK and VSP read nivartate for [a]tivartate, lending the line the sense "your youth is fleeing." These variants lend the line the sense "You ought not speak in this fashion, for your youth is passing away." The critical reading is rendered only in the translation of Gorresio (1870, p. 59).

Following verse 20, D6,7,10,11,T1,3,4,G,M1–5,7–10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of two lines [333*]: "Lovely lady,[1] I am the lord of Laṅkā, known as Daśagrīva. You must be my wife and enjoy pleasures to your heart's content (ahaṃ laṅkāpatir bhadre daśagrīva iti śrutaḥ / tasya me bhava bhāryā tvaṃ bhuṅkṣva bhogān yathāsukham //)."

[1] "Lovely lady" bhadre: See note to verse 4 above.

21. "lovely lady . . . my lady" bhadre . . . aṅgane: Literally, "O auspicious one . . . O woman." For the uses of bhadrā, see note to verse 4 above.

"he . . . is not equal to me" na mayāsau samaḥ: D6,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead the synonymous sa mayā no samo, while G2,M3, and KK and VSP read the equally synonymous na mayā sa samo.

"wealth" bhogena: The word normally refers to "enjoyment or pleasure," but also, not infrequently, to "objects of pleasure, possessions, or wealth itself." Translators have rendered variously.

Following verse 21, D6,7,10,11,T3,4,G2,M3,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of one line [335*]: "Then, when he had spoken in this fashion, Vedavatī replied (ity uktavati tasmiṃs tu vedavaty atha sābravīt)."

22. "'Don't do this! Don't!'" mā maivam iti: Literally, "'Don't [act] in this fashion! Don't!'" The passage raises a significant issue as to what action Vedavatī is trying to forestall. The sequence of verses in the critical edition as well as in the northern recension focuses specifically on Rāvaṇa's sexual assault on Vedavatī, which is suggested by the common, symbolic sexual defilement of seizing a woman by her hair. See Hara 1986 and R. Goldman 2015b. Indeed, following verse 22, several northern manuscripts (Ñ,V3,B) as well as Gorresio (7.17.25) insert a passage of one line [337*] in which Rāvaṇa's rape of Vedavatī is made explicit: "That powerful rākṣasa forcibly brought the trembling girl to womanhood (strībhāvam anayac caināṃ visphurantīṃ balād balī)." Compare Ct's remarks at verse 24 below. Compare D3, which, following verse 22, inserts an even more explicit passage of one line [338*]: "He began to have intercourse with the trembling girl to his heart's content (visphurantīṃ yathākāmaṃ maithunāyopacakrame)." The situation is rather different in the southern recension, which interpolates a passage of three lines following 22ab [336*], in which Vedavatī protests Rāvaṇa's belittling words concerning Viṣṇu rather than his incipient sexual assault. All translators consulted, with the exception of Gorresio, follow this reading and have Vedavatī cry out against Rāvaṇa's words regarding Viṣṇu rather than against any physical action directed toward her. See below.

"to that night-roaming rākṣasa, as he seized her by the hair with his hand" niśācaram / mūrdhajeṣu ca tāṃ rakṣaḥ karāgreṇa parāmṛśat: Literally, "to the night roamer, . . . the rākṣasa, seized her on the hairs with the tip of his hand." The verbal root parā √mṛś is somewhat ambiguous in this context, as it can mean either "seize violently" or "stroke gently." We believe that the context clearly supports the former sense because of the well-attested symbolism of seizing a woman by the hair as a form of sexual assault. (See Hara 1986.) Both Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 471) and Benoît (1999, p. 1265) seem to view Rāvaṇa's approach as more erotic than violent. The former renders, "passa les doigts dans les cheveux," while the latter, perhaps under Roussel's influence, translates, "passa le bout des doigts sur les cheveux."

Following 22ab, D5 (after 22),6,7,10,11,T,G,M1–5,6–8 (after 21),10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of three lines [336*]: "What wise person other than you, lord of the rākṣasas, would treat with contempt Viṣṇu, who is overlord of the triple world and is worshiped in all the worlds?[1–2] Addressed in this fashion by Vedavatī there, the night-roaming [rākṣasa] . . . [3]."[1]

[1] As noted above, in separating Vedavatī's protestation from Rāvaṇa's assault in this way, the southern text indicates that Vedavatī's cry of "Don't! Don't do this!" refers to Rāvaṇa's contemptuous words regarding Viṣṇu, and this is exactly the way in which Ct interprets her elliptical outcry. He proposes supplying the phrase "[Don't] speak [in this fashion] about Viṣṇu. (mā maivam. viṣṇuviṣaye vadeti śeṣaḥ.)" Given the southern interpolation and the gloss of Ct, it is only natural that the translators of the southern text understand similarly.

23. "cut off her hair with her hand" keśān hastena sācchinat: Since hair is powerfully charged with sexual symbolism in South Asian culture, the cutting of a woman's hair marks her as removed from the realm of sexuality. See Hiltebeitel and Miller 1998. In the present instance, the act may have more than symbolic value, as it would serve to free Vedavatī from the clutches of Rāvaṇa, who had grasped her long hair.

"Eager to end her life" maraṇāya kṛtatvarā: Literally, "making haste for death."

Following 23ab, D5–7,10,11,T1–3 (line 1 only),G,M1–5,7,8,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of two lines [340*]: "Having become a sword, her hand then divided her hair in two.[1] [She] blazing, as it were, with rage, as if to burn up the night-roaming rākṣasa. (asir bhūtvā karas tasyās tadā keśān dvidhākarot / sā jvalantīva roṣeṇa dahantīva niśācaram //)"

[1] "then divided her hair in two" tadā keśān dvidhākarot: D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead keśāṃś chinnāṃs tadākarot, "[it] then rendered her hair cut." Ck, Ct, Cr, and Cs use this passage as a welcome explanation of how one can possibly cut one's hair simply with one's hand (hastena keśacchedaḥ kathaṃ tatrāhāsir bhūtveti—so Ct). Cs ascribes the magical transformation of Vedavatī's hand into a cutting implement to the power she derives from her yogic praxis (yogasāmarthyād iti bhāvaḥ).

24. "As I have been violated" dharṣitāyāḥ . . . mama: Literally, "of me assaulted." Ct glosses the participle as "made to attain the state of womanhood by the touching of [my] hair (dharṣitāyāḥ keśasparśeṇa strībhāvaṃ prāpitāyāḥ)." Compare this comment with the northern insert 337* discussed above at note to verse 22. See, too, 7.26.44; 7.30.27; 637*, line 2, following notes to verse; and notes.

"my life is at an end" nedānīṃ mama jīvitam: Literally, "of me there is now no life." D6,7,10,11,T2,G,M1–5,7–10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead na me jīvitam iṣyate, "I do not desire life."

25. "innocent and without a protector" apāpā cāpy anāthavat: Literally, "and [I] without sin and as if without a protector." D6,7,10,11,T4,M10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tvayā pāpātmanā vane, "by evil-minded you in the forest."

"I shall be born" samutpatsyāmy aham: The reading is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. Ś1,3,Ñ2,V1,B2,D10–12,T3,M3, and GPP and NSP read the third person singular samutpatsyati, "he, she, it will be born," for samutpatsyāmy [aham]. Ct and Cr gloss the first person ātmanepada, samutpatsye, "I shall be born." M3 and Gita Press, KK, and VSP read samutpatsye hy aham, "indeed, I shall be born."

26. "Truly it is not possible for a woman to kill anyone, least of all you, evil rākṣasa." na hi śakyaḥ striyā pāpa hantuṃ tvaṃ tu viśeṣataḥ: Literally, "For, evil [one], it is not possible for a woman to kill you especially." D6,7,10,11,T1,2,G,M1–5,7–10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read hantum, "to kill," for pāpa, "evil [one]," and these same manuscripts (except G1,M5) and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read puruṣaḥ pāpaniścayaḥ for hantuṃ tvaṃ tu viśeṣataḥ, lending the line the sense "For it is not possible for a woman to kill a man of evil intent." Cr understands the sense to be that a woman cannot engage in battle with an evildoer for fear of contact with him (sparśaśaṅkayā pāpinā saha yuddhaṃ na yogyam iti tātparyam).

"it would exhaust the power of my asceticism" tapasaś ca vyayo bhavet: Literally, "There would be a destruction or diminution of asceticism." Ct understands the term vyayaḥ, "destruction," differently. He believes that Vedavatī is saying that, were she to use her ascetic power to curse Rāvaṇa, it would be in vain because of the boon of Brahmā, which immunizes him from such a death at this time. (vyayaḥ. brahmavaradānād idānīṃ tava maraṇābhāvena vṛthā vyaya ity arthaḥ.) Cr notes that by this she is suggesting that she will kill Rāvaṇa by a stratagem (i.e., by taking birth as Sītā) (etenopāyatas tvāṃ ghātayiṣyāmīti sūcitam).

27. "If I have performed good deeds, made charitable donations, and offered sacrificial oblations" yadi tv asti mayā kiṃcit kṛtaṃ dattaṃ hutaṃ tathā: Literally, "but if there is anything done, given, and sacrificed by me." Several translators understand only two actions to have been performed, namely charity and sacrifice, apparently taking kṛtam, literally, "done," as a generic in the sense of "performed," describing the other two actions. Cs, evidently disturbed at the notion of a woman performing vedic sacrifice, notes that it is appropriate in this case because Vedavatī is a superior woman (hutam uttamastrītvād yuktam). See S. Goldman 2010b.

"then, by virtue of that" tena hi: Literally, "indeed by that." D6,7,10,11,T4,M10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tasmāt tu, "then because of that."

28. "the blazing fire, the eater of oblations" jvalantaṃ vai hutāśanam: Literally, "the blazing eater of oblations." V1,3,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead jvalitaṃ jātavedasam, "the blazing fire." Jātavedas is another vedic epithet for "fire." Its etymology is disputed; see Nirukta 7.19. See, too, ŚatBr 9.5.1.68 and MBh 2.28.29.

"a heavenly shower of blossoms" divyā puṣpavṛṣṭiḥ: Ck and Ct note that this is a token of [the gods'] delight at the certainty of the destruction of Rāvaṇa (atrāpi puṣpavarṣaṃ rāvaṇanāśaniścayajasaṃtoṣāt—so Ct).

Following verse 28, B2,D3,6,7, and a number of texts and printed editions (Gorresio 7.17.32–35ab; GPP in brackets, unnumbered, between GPP 7.17.33 and 34; Gita Press 7.17.35cd–39; KK 7.1.7.36–39 [pace the critical edition's "in brackets"]; and VSP 7.17.35–39ab) insert, while B1 and D5 continue following 342*, a passage of nine lines [343*], which the editors of GPP (vol. 7, p. 2792) attribute to the text of Cg only: "And she, as radiant as a lotus, was born[1] once again in a lotus.[1] After that, she was once again taken by that rākṣasa, just as before.[1–2] Seizing that young woman, who resembled the calyx of a lotus, he proceeded to his own residence. Entering there, Rāvaṇa showed her[2] to his minister.[3–4] And the latter, who was familiar with signs, observing her, said this to Rāvaṇa:[3] 'This fair-hipped woman has appeared in your house solely for your destruction.'[4][5–6] Hearing this, Rāma, Rāvaṇa threw her[5] into the sea. Thrown out like this, she[6] reached dry land and found herself in the middle of a sacrificial ground, where that virtuous woman rose up on the tip of the king's ploughshare.[7]"[7–9]

[1] "And . . . was born . . . in a lotus" hi saṃbhūtā padme: KK and VSP read instead samudbhūtā padme, "[she] was born in a lotus." The theme of Sītā as being born in a lotus in Rāvaṇa's garden is found in Telugu folk songs (Sarma 1980, pp. 222–23) and noted by W. L. Smith (1988, p. 21).

[2] "Entering there . . . her" praviśya . . . cainām: Literally, "having entered . . . and her." GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead pragṛhya . . . tv etām, "and having seized her."

[3] "said this to Rāvaṇa" rāvaṇasyedam āha ca: Literally, "and he said this to Rāvaṇa." GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead rāvaṇaṃ caivam abravīt, "and he spoke in this fashion to Rāvaṇa."

[4] "This fair-hipped woman has appeared in your house solely for your destruction." gṛhasthaiṣā hi suśroṇī tvadvadhāyaiva dṛśyate: Literally, "For the fair-hipped one, staying in your house is seen for your destruction." The syntax is elliptical and somewhat obscure. We understand with Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1964) that the term gṛhasthā, normally a masculine term, "householder," here refers to the simple physical presence of Vedavatī/Sītā in Rāvaṇa's house. One could also break up the sequence as the masculine vocative gṛhastha, "O householder," plus eṣā, "she," yielding the sense "O householder, this fair-hipped woman has appeared for your destruction." This latter interpretation is somewhat consonant with the equally obscure variant found in B1,2, and Gorresio, which reads gṛhastho nārhati śroṇīṃ tvam etāṃ tyaktum arhasi. Gorresio (1870, p. 59) renders the line "L'uomo accasato non ha potere sopra lombi di donna; tu dei quindi rilasciar costei." Gorresio (1870, p. 318) has a note on this obscure phrase, remarking that his translation is a literal one, but it is possible that one can supply the infinitive gṛhītum, following the verbal phrase nārhati, and translate, "A married man must not place his hand on a woman's loins," that is to say, a married man must not perpetrate violence against a woman.

[5] "threw her" saṃpracikṣepa: Literally, "he threw." GPP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tāṃ pracikṣepa, "he threw her."

[6] "Thrown out like this, she" sā kṣiptā: Literally, "thrown." D3,6,7, and GPP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead sā caiva, "and she." B1,2, and Gorresio read sā kṣiptormibhiḥ, "she, tossed by the waves."

[7] "on the tip of the . . . ploughshare" halamukhāgrasthā: Literally, "[she] situated on the edge of the ploughshare." GPP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead halamukhotkṛṣṭā, "[she] extracted by the edge of the ploughshare."

This curious episode of Vedavatī's second and transitional birth and abduction at Rāvaṇa's hands prior to her appearance as the child Sītā in the furrow appears to be unknown to most versions of the Rāmāyaṇa tradition. Gorresio (1870, p. 318) notes this as well and ascribes the legend specifically to the Gauḍa or Bengal recension of the text (1026*, lines 6–7 and note 2, following note to 6.48.7). As it stands here, the story appears to borrow a widespread motif in various Rāmāyaṇa traditions that Sītā is born in Laṅkā, sometimes as Rāvaṇa's daughter, and, after a prophecy that she will destroy him, is disposed of either in the sea or by being buried. This version differs from the others in having her brought to Laṅkā after a prior abduction at Rāvaṇa's hands. See W. L. Smith 1988, pp. 20–23.

Following 343*, B2,D3,6,7, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP continue, while Ñ,V1,3,B3,4,D1,4,10,11,S insert after verse 28, D2 continues after 346*, and D9 continues after 347*, a passage of two lines [344*]: "She is the very one, lord, who was born as the daughter of King Janaka. She is your wife, great-armed hero,[1] for you, indeed, are the eternal Viṣṇu.[2] (saiṣā janakarājasya prasūtā tanayā prabho / tava bhāryā mahābāho viṣṇus tvaṃ hi sanātanaḥ //)"

[1] "great-armed hero" mahābāho: Literally, "O great-armed [one]."

[2] "for you, indeed, are the eternal Viṣṇu" viṣṇus tvaṃ hi sanātanaḥ: Ct notes that by this reference it is clear that Sītā is, indeed, the goddess Lakṣmī (anena sītāyā lakṣmītvaṃ sphuṭam evoktam). He further documents this by quoting the Viṣṇupurāṇa 1.9.144 (etext), where Parāśara states that she, i.e., Lakṣmī, was Sītā in the era of Rāghava and was Rukmiṇī during the lifetime of Kṛṣṇa (tad uktaṃ parāśareṇa—rāghavatve 'bhavat sītā rukmiṇī kṛṣṇajanmani). Cr provides two etymologies: one of the word sanātanaḥ, "eternal," and the other of the name Viṣṇu. He explains the term sanātanaḥ, "eternal," as meaning the creator or source of all beings, which he then supports by quoting a well-known passage from the upaniṣads (Taittirīyopaniṣad 3.1.1). (sanātanaḥ sanati sarvaṃ racayatīti sanaṃ yato vā imāni bhūtāni jayanta ityādi śrutipratipāditam.) Cr also understands that the name Viṣṇu derives from the god's function of spreading or expanding (vistārayati) all the actions of the various divinities, Brahmā and the rest, which he, as Brahman in the form of pure light, calls into being (prakāśabrahma tadupalakṣitabrahmādīn ātanoti tattatkāryapravartakatvena vistārayati sa viṣṇur asīti śeṣaḥ). Cr then provides an unusual account of Vedavatī's future role in the Rāmāyaṇa story. He begins by providing a curious etymology of her name, apparently deriving it from the archaic sense of veda as "gain or acquisition." He glosses, "she who has a desire for acquisition." This is presumably a reference to Vedavatī's vow to acquire Viṣṇu as her husband. Cr then notes that Vedavatī thus appears in the family [of Janaka?], where Mantharā, reflecting on this, causes a mix-up whereby Vedavatī winds up married to Bharata, as is described in the Bāla- and Ayodhyākāṇḍas. (vedavatī prāptīcchāvatīty anena vedavaty api tatraiva kule prādurbhūteti sūcitam. tenaitat saṃmatyaiva mantharayā sarvaṃ viparītaṃ kāritam iti vyaktam. vedavaty eva bharatena vivāhiteti bālāyodhyayor nirūpitam.) It is difficult to say for certain what Cr intends by this obscure passage or how he arrives at this peculiar interpretation. It may be that he is confusing Vedavatī's father Kuśadhvaja with the younger brother of King Janaka of the same name, mentioned in the Bālakāṇḍa (1.69.2–3ff.). The latter Kuśadhvaja is the father of Māṇḍavī, who marries Bharata at 1.72.19ff. See notes to verse 7 above. Even if this is so, it is not clear what Mantharā has to do with any of this, nor is there any mention of Māṇḍavī or any other wife of Bharata in the critical text of the Ayodhyākāṇḍa. Ck understands that Vedavatī is an incarnation of Sarasvatī (normally the consort of Brahmā; see note to verse 8 above), who has vowed to destroy Rāvaṇa. Rāma is therefore, in essence, the eternal Viṣṇu, even though he is, in his present incarnate form, the non-eternal manifestation of that divinity. (yā sarasvatyavatārakathitā vedavatī kṛtarāvaṇavadhapratijñā saiṣety arthaḥ. yasmād evaṃ tasmāt tvaṃ ca sanātano viṣṇur yady api tvam evaṃmūrtir asanātano viṣṇuḥ.) See notes to verse 8 above.

29. "That foe, who had previously been doomed by her in her wrath, has now been slain by you" pūrvaṃ krodhahataḥ śatrur yayāsau nihatas tvayā: Literally, "The foe, previously slain in anger by her [lit., 'by whom'], he has been slain by you." Since Rāvaṇa can only literally be slain once, commentators and translators vary in their interpretation of the first "slaying" by Vedavatī. Cr glosses, "practically slain or all-but-slain (hataprāyaḥ)," and this idea is expressed by Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 419), who renders, "whom she had as good as destroyed by her anger." Roussel (1903, p. 472) renders, "autrefois maudit dans son indignation." In this he is followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 422), who translates, "who, in anger, formerly cursed." Gorresio (1870, p. 60) translates more literally, rendering the root √han in its sense of "to strike." He offers, "fu prima percosso dall' ira colei." In this he is followed by Benoît (1999, p. 1266), who translates, "Autrefois frappé par la colère de cette femme." Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1964) translates, "was consumed by her wrath, in her former birth." Only Dutt (1894, p. 1610) understands both participles in the sense of slain. KK and VSP read the obscure krodhāhitaḥ, literally, "placed or deposited in anger," for krodhahataḥ. Cg, however, offers no comment on the term. Ś,Ñ1,V1,D2,5,8,9,12,T1,2,G3,M3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read tayā, "by her," for tvayā, "by you," thereby positing that both slayings of Rāvaṇa are really accomplished by Vedavatī/Sītā.

"have taken recourse" samupāśritya: Literally, "having resorted." Given the fact that the critical edition reads tvayā, as noted above, there is no ambiguity as to the subject of the gerund, i.e., Rāma himself. D10,11,M3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read the causative upāśrayitvā, literally, "having caused to have recourse to." This with the variant tayā, "by her," noted above, makes Sītā the subject of the simplex, allowing some translators to understand that she uses Rāma's power to destroy Rāvaṇa (e.g., Raghunathan 1982, vol. 3, p. 419). Ck, Ct, and Cr all understand the simplex for the causative (upāśrayitvopāśritya). Ct takes the passage and the verse to suggest that it is Sītā alone who is the prime cause of Rāvaṇa's destruction and that the role of the actual killer has simply been adventitiously superimposed upon Rāma. (anena sītaiva rāvaṇavadhe mukhyaṃ kāraṇam. rāme tu hantṛtvam āropitam iti sūcitam.)

"your . . . superhuman strength" tava vīryam amānuṣam: Literally, "your nonhuman strength." As recorded in GPP, KK, and VSP, the commentary of Cg reads mānuṣam, "human," for amānuṣam, "superhuman." Cg explains that Vedavatī, who previously had made Rāvaṇa her enemy through her anger and who had, according to her vow, obtained [Rāma/Viṣṇu] as her husband, has now slain Rāvaṇa by causing him [Rama], who is now her husband [Rāma], to have recourse to his human strength (vedavatyā yaḥ śatruḥ krodhāhitaḥ so 'sau . . . śatrū rāvaṇaḥ punas tathaiva yathāpratijñaṃ patiṃ ca prāptayā patibhūtasya tava mānuṣaṃ vīryam upāśrayitvādya nihataḥ). Cg is evidently concerned to maintain Rāma's strict adherence to Rāvaṇa's boon that he not be subject to death at the hands of any superhuman being. Cf. 7.10.16–20, 30. On the motif of Rāvaṇa's boon, see note to 7.10.30.

"mountainous" śailābham: Literally, "having the appearance of a mountain." D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the nominative singular śailābhaḥ, which would then modify śatruḥ, "foe or enemy." This would serve to avoid the peculiar collocation in which strength or valor is likened to a mountain.

30. "has been born once again" utpadyate punaḥ: Literally, "is born again." D10,11,T1, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the future utpatsyate punaḥ, "she will be born again." Since Sītā's birth is long in the past at the time of Agastya's conversation with Rāma, Ck, Ct, and Cr understand the future tense to allude to Sītā's and Rāma's (so Ct) births in future ages for the stated purpose (i.e., the killing of Rāvaṇa or subsequent demonic foes). (punaḥ punar utpatsyate. uktaprayojanāyeti śeṣaḥ. utpattir atrāvirbhāvaḥ. etena bhagavato 'pi tathāvatāraḥ sūcita eva—so Ct.)

"torn up by a ploughshare" halamukhagraste: Literally, "devoured or seized by a ploughshare." Ñ,B1,3,D6,7,10,11,T,M3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead halamukhotkṛṣṭe, "ploughed by a ploughshare."

31. The passage's account of the rebirth of Vedavatī as Sītā stimulates Ct to quote a passage of several verses from the Mahāsundarītantra, which he takes as a source for his assertion that Sītā was born on the ninth day of the bright half of the lunar month Vaiśākha. The passage quoted describes the day as a festival celebrated by Rāmabhaktas with dancing, singing, the playing of musical instruments, etc. The passage then further specifies the material and spiritual benefits accruing to the worshiper on this festival day.

"in the Kṛta Yuga . . . the Tretā Yuga" kṛte yuge / tretāyugam: This is the only reference in the critical text that explicitly places the Rāmāvatāra in the Tretā Yuga. It is one of the few references to the Tretā Yuga in the epic, all of which occur in the Uttarakāṇḍa. See 7.65.11,12,17; 7.67.18; 7.68.1; and notes. See, too, Prakṣipta III, sarga 3.20 (= App. I, No. 3, lines 209–210) and notes.

"Since she was born from a furrow [sītā], men always call her Sītā." sītotpanneti sītaiṣā mānuṣaiḥ punar ucyate: Literally, "'Born from a furrow [sītā],' she is repeatedly called Sītā by men." The sequence -aiṣā is marked as doubtful by the editors of the critical edition. Ś,V1,3,D1–9,12,T,G1,3,M3,4, and Lahore, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read sītotpannā tu sīteti, "born from a furrow, [she is] 'Sītā.'" This verse repeats the familiar etymology of Sītā's name as "furrow or tilled ground," first found in the Bālakāṇḍa. See 1.65.14 and notes.

D10,11,G2,M1,2–4,7–10, substitute 31ef with 350*, while D6,7,T1,2,4 (after 31),G1,2, M3,5,6, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert following 31cd a passage of one line [350*]: "She was born in the Maithila lineage of great Janaka (utpannā maithilakule janakasya mahātmanaḥ)."

Sarga 18

1. "the flying palace Puṣpaka" puṣpakaṃ tat: Literally, "that Puṣpaka." Ñ1,V1,3, B2,4,D6,7,10,11,T3,M10, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead puṣpakaṃ tu, "and Puṣpaka."

2. "the country of Uśīrabīja" uśīrabījam: According to Ck, Cg, Ct, and Cr, this is the name of a country or region (uśīrabījam iti deśanāma). The name literally means "the seed of the uśīra." The term uśīra normally refers to the fragrant root of a specific type of grass. Brockington (1984, p. 106) identifies uśīra, or khas-khas grass, as Andropogon muricatus (Retz.) or Andropogon squarrosus (L.). It is also mentioned at App. I, No. 69, lines 20–21, following notes to 6.99.41. Monier-Williams (s.v.) understands Uśīrabīja to be the name of a mountain. At 6.18.25–28 a mountain of this name is said to be the favored haunt of the monkey troop leader Pramāthin. It is said to lie along the course of the Ganges. Assuming that the mountain lies in the region of the same name, it is likely that the region referred to is in the Himalayan foothills, north of Haridwar. See 6.18.25–28 and note. This seems reasonable in light of Rāvaṇa's continuing journey from Mount Kailāsa in the high Himalayas (at 7.15.31ff.) through the forested slopes of the range (at 7.17.1ff.) to the site of Marutta's sacrifice.

"the rākṣasa" rākṣasaḥ: Ś,Ñ,V1,3,B,D,T3,4,M3,6,10, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead rāvaṇaḥ, "Rāvaṇa."

"Marutta" maruttam: As Cs notes, this is the name of a pious king whose sacrifice in the company of the gods is mentioned in a number of vedic texts (AitBr 8.21.13; ŚatBr 13.5.4.6; Śāṅkhāyanaśrautasūtra 16.9.16b). Marutta's sacrifice is also described at MBh 12.29.16ff. and 14.4–10. See also 7.81.14 and note.

3. "Saṃvarta by name" saṃvarto nāma: The sage is well known in the vedic literature and Mahābhārata. He is named as the ṛṣi of ṚV 10.172, where he is identified as an Āṅgirasa, and he is mentioned at ṚV 8.54.2. At AitBr 8.21.13, he is again identified as an Āṅgirasa and is said to consecrate Marutta Āvikṣita. At MBh 14.4–10, the elaborate story of Saṃvarta and Marutta, including the former's rivalry with his brother, is narrated. See, too, 7.81.4,14 and notes.

"the brother . . . himself" bhrātā sākṣāt: Ś,Ñ1,V3,D2,5–12,T3,4,G1,M5, and Lahore, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read by transposition sākṣād bhrātā.

"surrounded by all the hosts of brahmans" sarvair brahmagaṇair vṛtaḥ: D7,10,11,M3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead sarvair devagaṇair vṛtaḥ, "surrounded by all the hosts of gods." This variant prompts Ck and Ct to observe that the gods were invisibly present for the purpose of sharing the oblation (aparokṣatayā havir bhāgārtham avasthitair iti śeṣaḥ).

4. "they betook themselves to the wombs of various creatures" tāṃ tāṃ yoniṃ samāpannāḥ: Literally, "They approached this and that womb." D6,7,10,11,T4,M4,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read tiryagyoniṃ, "animal[s]," for tāṃ tāṃ yonim, while Ś,Ñ,V1,3,B,D2,5,8–12, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read samāviṣṭāḥ for samāpannāḥ, giving the pāda the sense "they entered an animal," that is, they entered into the forms of various animals.

"terrified that he would attack them" tasya dharṣaṇabhīravaḥ: Literally, "fearful of his attack." Ñ1,B2,4,M6, and KK and VSP read instead darśana-, "sight," for dharṣaṇa-, "attack," lending the pāda the sense "terrified at the sight of him."

5. "Yama, the king of righteousness" dharmarājaḥ: Literally, "the king of righteousness."

"a haṃsa" haṃso vai: Literally, "a haṃsa, indeed." D6,7,10,11,T4,M6,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead haṃsaś ca, "and a haṃsa." See notes to verse 30 below.

Following verse 5, Ñ,V3,B,D1,3,4,6,7,10,11,S insert a passage of two lines [352*]: "When the other gods had done likewise,[1] Rāvaṇa, destroyer of the gods,[2] entered the sacrificial enclosure, as might a defiling dog[3] (anyeṣv api gateṣv evaṃ sureṣu surasūdanaḥ / rāvaṇaḥ prāviśad yajñaṃ sārameya ivāśuciḥ //)."

[1] "When the other gods had done likewise" anyeṣv api gateṣv evaṃ sureṣu: Literally, "and when the other gods had gone in this fashion." We agree with Ck, Ct, and Cr, who understand that the other gods are [also] entering the forms of various animals (tiryagyonisvarūpaṃ gateṣv ity arthaḥ—so Ct). D6,7,10,11,G1,2,M1,2,5,7–10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read the synonymous deveṣu for sureṣu, "gods."

[2] "destroyer of the gods" surasūdanaḥ: D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the vocative ariniṣūdana, "destroyer of [your] enemies." This then becomes an epithet of Rāma.

[3] "as might a defiling dog" sārameya ivāśuciḥ: Cs is eager to differentiate the ordinary dog, referred to here and a standard metaphor for a vile or defiling creature in the brahmanical tradition, from the two watchdogs of Yama, Śyāma and Śabala, the sons of the bitch Saramā, from whom they take the metronymic Sārameya (na śyāmaśabalādivad ayam ity āha—aśucir iti). Cf. ṚV 10.14.10.

6. "Approaching the king" taṃ ca rājānam āsādya: KK (1905 and 1913 editions; 7.18.7) reads instead taṃ ca rājā samāsādya, "And then that king having approached." Here the term rājā, "king," refers to Rāvaṇa rather than, as in our reading, Marutta. The variant is mentioned in a footnote in GPP, while KK notes the critical reading as a variant in several of the manuscripts on which that edition is based. This variant is not noted in the critical apparatus.

"You must either offer me battle or acknowledge defeat." yuddhaṃ prayaccheti nirjito 'smīti vā vada: Literally, "Give battle or say, 'I am defeated.'" Compare 7.19.2–3 and notes.

7. "Then . . . But" tataḥ . . . /. . . tataḥ: Literally, "Then . . . Then."

"the rākṣasa" rākṣasaḥ: D6,7,10,11,T1,2,4,G3,M1,3,7, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead rāvaṇaḥ, "Rāvaṇa."

"laughed derisively" avahāsaṃ tato muktvā: Literally, "Then having released a laugh." T1,2,G,M1–5,7–10, and KK and VSP read instead the nearly synonymous apahāsaṃ tato muktvā.

8. "I am amused by how unimpressed you are" akutūhalabhāvena prīto 'smi tava: Literally, "I am pleased with you, because of [your] state of non-wonderment." Ck, Cg, and Ct understand that the term akutūhala, here, combines the qualities of disrespect, fearlessness, and the lack of wonderment (avismayanirbhayānādarabhāvena); Cv simply understands it in the sense of disrespect (anādareṇa). Cr believes that Rāvaṇa's delight is occasioned by the non-arousal of fear on the part of Marutta upon seeing him (tavākautūhalabhāvena māṃ dṛṣṭvāpi bhayānutpattyā prīto 'smi).

"in that you do not seem to grasp" yo mā nāvagacchasi: Literally, "you who do not recognize me as."

9. "For who in the three worlds does not know" triṣu lokeṣu kaḥ so 'sti yo na jānāti: Literally, "Who is he that exists in the three worlds who does not know . . . ?" D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read ko 'nyo 'sti, "who else is there?" for kaḥ so 'sti, "who is he?"

10. "King" nṛpatiḥ: D1,3,4,6,7,10,11,G1,M1,2,4–7,9, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead sa nṛpaḥ, "that king."

"to the rākṣasa" rākṣasam: D6,7,10,11,M3,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead rāvaṇam, "to Rāvaṇa."

"What a splendid fellow you are, sir" dhanyaḥ khalu bhavān: Literally, "You, sir, are surely wonderful or blessed." Several of the commentators point out the obvious fact that Marutta is speaking ironically or mockingly here. Ct regards his words as an example of the poetic figure of vyājastuti, or "mocking praise." See KāvyPra 10.112; see also Bronner 2009. Ck understands it to be vyaṅgyokti, or "insinuation." Cs notes simply that Marutta is mocking Rāvaṇa (upajahāsa).

Following verse 10, D6,7,10,11,T3,4,M4,M10 (following 11ab), and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of one line [356*]: "There is no one to be found in the three worlds to equal you in praiseworthiness (na tvayā sadṛśaḥ ślāghyas triṣu lokeṣu vidyate)."

11. "That which is inconsistent with righteousness is not praiseworthy, nor is that which goes against proper conduct." nādharmasahitaṃ ślāghyaṃ na lokapratisaṃhitam: Literally, "What is accompanied by unrighteousness is not to be praised; what is counter to worldly practice [is also] not [to be praised]." Our reading agrees with that of Cv, the only commentator to share the critical reading. He reads the line as two elliptical sentences, understanding that the two adjectives adharmasahitam and lokapratisaṃhitam modify an understood term, "action (karma)." Like us, he appears to understand the polysemic term loka in its specific sense of "normative worldly practice" (adharmasahitaṃ karma na ślāghyaṃ lokapratisaṃhitaṃ lokaruddhaṃ ca karma na ślāghyam—Cv [according to Adyar Library transcription, 1912], pp. 817–18). GPP (7.18.11cd), KK (7.18.12ab), and VSP (7.18.12ab) read tallokaṃ pratisaṃhitam for na lokapratisaṃhitam. This would give the line the sense "That which is inconsistent with righteousness is not praiseworthy and is inimical to proper conduct." Ck regards the entire verse, which he notes is found only in a few manuscripts, as negligible since he regards its sense as already having been articulated. (anantaram [i.e., following verse 10] atra kvacid ekaḥ śloko dṛśyate. sa tu gatārthatvād upekṣyaḥ.) Ct, paraphrasing Ck, notes that it is interpolated. (ekaḥ ślokaḥ prakṣiptaḥ. uktārthatvād iti katakaḥ.)

12. "Did you perform some perfect act of righteousness in the past, such that you received a boon?" kiṃ tvaṃ prāk kevalaṃ dharmaṃ caritvā labdhavān varam: Literally, "Having previously performed perfect dharma, did you receive a boon?" D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read the masculine kam for the neuter kim, lending the line the sense "what perfect act of righteousness." In either case, of course, Marutta continues to taunt Rāvaṇa with irony. Ck and Ct understand the phrase kaṃ kevalaṃ dharmam to mean "what dharma devoid of respect for one who is worthy of respect (kevalaṃ pūjyapūjārahitaṃ kaṃ dharmam)." This is evidently a jibe at Rāvaṇa's disrespectful treatment of his elder brother Kubera. Cg, on the other hand, understands the phrase ironically to mean "flawless act of righteousness (kevalaṃ dharmaṃ doṣahīnaṃ dharmam)." Cv merely understands either "having performed such an act of righteousness (evaṃdharmaṃ kṛtvā)" or "having performed an act of righteousness in this fashion (evaṃ dharmaṃ kṛtvā)."

"The sort of thing you yourself boast of is something I have never heard of before." śrutapūrvaṃ hi na mayā yādṛśaṃ bhāṣase svayam: Literally, "For the sort [of action] you yourself proclaim has not previously been heard of by me." Cv explains: "No righteous person would speak in this way about the sort of act that you yourself have proclaimed and no one should perform any such act of 'righteousness.' You yourself should know this through common practice (na kaścidapi dhārmika evaṃ bhāṣate kaścidapi dharmaṃ carituṃ na yogya iti vyavahāreṇa jñāyasa ity arthaḥ [Adyar Library transcription, 1912])." Ck, Cg, and Ct agree that this refers to Rāvaṇa's egregious conquest of his elder brother (yādṛśaṃ bhrātṛvijayarūpam adharmam—so Cg; Ck and Ct similarly).

Following verse 12, Ñ,V1,3,B,D1,3–7,10,11,S insert a passage of two lines [357*]: "Stay right where you are![1] Evil-minded wretch, you shall not escape me alive.[2] This very day, with my sharp arrows, I shall send you to the abode of Yama. (tiṣṭhedānīṃ na me jīvan pratiyāsyasi durmate / adya tvāṃ niśitair bāṇaiḥ preṣayāmi yamakṣayam //)"

[1] "Stay right where you are!" tiṣṭhedānīm: Literally, "Now, stand!"

[2] "you shall not escape me alive" na me jīvan pratiyāsyasi: Literally, "Living, you shall not go back from me."

13. "the king" sa pārthivaḥ: Ś,V1,3,D2,5–12,T4, and Lahore, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead narādhipaḥ, "the overlord of men."

14. "If you want my advice" śrotavyaṃ yadi madvākyam: Literally, "If my speech is to be heard."

15. "If left incomplete, this sacrifice" idaṃ sattram asamāptam: The failure to complete a ritual act is uniformly regarded as catastrophic in the vedic/brahmanical tradition. See, for example, 1.38.18–10; 1.60.7; etc. See, too, Yuddhakāṇḍa sarga 73, where Indrajit fails to complete his sacrifice and thus becomes vulnerable. KK 1913 (7.18.17) reads alam āptam, clearly a typographical error for asamāptam; KK 1905 (7.18.17) reads with the critical.

"violence" krūratvam: Literally, "cruelty or pitilessness." V3,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead krodhitvam, "the state of being angered."

16. "battle is always uncertain" saṃśayaś ca raṇe nityam: Literally, "there is always uncertainty in battle." V3,D6,7,10,11,T3,M3,7, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read jaye, "in victory," for raṇe, "in battle," yielding the meaning "there is always uncertainty concerning victory."

"this rākṣasa is invincible" rākṣasaś caiṣa durjayaḥ: D6,7,10,11,T4,G2,M3,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read ca sudurjayaḥ, "and utterly invincible," for caiṣa durjayaḥ. Cr notes in passing the absence of the normal quotation marker, iti.

"turned his attention to the sacrifice" makhamukho 'bhavat: Literally, "he became one whose face was toward the sacrifice." Ct glosses, "intent on the completion of the sacrifice (makhasamāptyunmukhaḥ)."

17. "Śuka" śukaḥ: Cr alone notes that the reference is to one of Rāvaṇa's ministers (rāvaṇāmātyaḥ). This figure is, no doubt, the same as the minister of this name introduced in this kāṇḍa at 7.14.14 (see, too, 373*, following notes to 7.19.13) and mentioned frequently throughout the Yuddhakāṇḍa. See 6.16.1 and notes and Goldman, Goldman 2009, pp. 84–86.

"'Rāvaṇa is victorious!'" rāvaṇo jitavāṃś ceti: Literally, "'And Rāvaṇa has conquered!'" V3,D7,10,11,T4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead rāvaṇo jayatīty uccaiḥ, "[proclaimed] loudly: 'Rāvaṇa is conquering!'"

"and he roared" nādaṃ ca muktavān: Literally, "and he released a roar." Ś,V1,3,D2,6–12,T3,4,M6, and Lahore, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead nādaṃ vimuktavān, "he let loose a roar."

18. "Rāvaṇa . . . began to roam" saṃprayayau: Literally, "he roamed."

"sated" vitṛptaḥ: Like all the translators consulted who share this reading, with the exception of Raghunathan, we agree with Ck, Cm, and Ct, who understand the upasarga vi- as an intensifier, in the sense of "especially sated (viśeṣeṇa tṛptaḥ)." Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 420), apparently reading the upasarga vi- in its privative sense, renders,

"was not satisfied." Compare the reading vitṛṣṇaḥ, "devoid of thirst, sated," of Ś,V1,B3, D2,8,12,T3, and Lahore (7.18.21) and Gorresio (7.18.21).

19. "the gods, denizens of heaven" divaukasaḥ: Literally, "the heaven-dwelling [ones]." See note to 7.5.23.

"resumed their natural forms" svāṃ yonim āsādya: Literally, "having had recourse to their own womb." As Ck, Cg, and Ct note, the idea is that the gods, [having disguised themselves as various animals in fear of Rāvaṇa earlier in the sarga,] resume their respective proper forms now [that he is gone] (svasvaprakṛtim āsādya—so Ck, Cg, and Ct). See verses 4 and 5 above.

"addressed those creatures whose forms they had taken" tāni sattvāny athābrūvan: Literally, "then they spoke to those creatures." As Ck, Cg, and Ct point out, the elliptical reference is to those animals of the various species of which they had taken the forms because of the force of prior necessity (prākkāryavaśagṛhītamūrtijātīyaprāṇinaḥ—so Ck, Ct; Cg similarly). See verses 4 and 5 above. V1,D6,7,10,11,T3,4,M10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read tāni sattvāni cābrūvan, "and they spoke to those creatures." Cr understands similarly, glossing, "those creatures who had become the respective receptacles into which [the gods] had entered (svasvapraveśādhikaraṇībhūtāni sattvāni)."

20. "with its indigo tail feathers" nīlabarhiṇam: Translators vary in their understanding of the color of the peacock's tail prior to the boon of Indra that will be announced in verses 21 and 22 below. The text, supported by Ck, Cg, Ct, and Cr, makes it clear that prior to Indra's boon the peacock, tail and all, was of a uniform indigo (nīla) color and that the boon added the characteristic eyelike spots to its tail. Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, pp. 420–21) and Gorresio (1870, p. 62), however, appear to understand that Indra's intervention changes the color of the bird's tail from black (Raghunathan) or brown (Gorresio) to beautiful or variegated, respectively.

"with . . . assistance, O sky-going bird" upakārād vihaṃgama: Literally, "from assistance, O sky-goer." D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead bhujaṃgād hi na te bhayam, "you shall have no fear of a snake."

21. "The thousand eyes that I possess" mama netrasahasraṃ yat: Literally, "which set of a thousand eyes [is] of me." Indra's common epithet, "thousand-eyed" (sahasrākṣa, sahasranetra, etc.), and the peculiar anatomical characteristic that gives rise to it are explained variously in different epic and purāṇic episodes. According to one version, the god was cursed to bear a thousand vulvas for his adulterous liaison with Ahalyā, the wife of the sage Gautama. Placated, the sage modified his curse such that the sexual organs became eyes. See, for example, MBh 13.34.25–26 and 13.41.21 and R. Goldman 1978, p. 392, note 263. An alternative explanation is found at Mahābhārata 1.203.25, where the god sprouts a thousand eyes to better appreciate the extraordinary beauty of the apsaras Tillottamā. Benoît (1999, p. 1720) notes only the latter story without citation. In a note, Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 632) also remarks upon a variant in the Ahalyā story as it is related in the first and last kāṇḍas. These variants of the episode of Gautama's curse of Indra and the various punishments are found at Bālakāṇḍa sargas 47–48 and Uttarakāṇḍa 30.22–33. Ś1,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead idaṃ netrasahasraṃ tu, "And this set of a thousand eyes."

"upon your tail" tat te barhe: Literally, "that [will be] on your tail." D7,10,11,T4,M10, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead yat tad barhe, "which [set of a thousand eyes] that [will be] on tail," while KK and VSP read tat tvadbarhe, "that [will be] on your tail."

"as a token of my gratitude, you shall experience delight whenever I send my rains" varṣamāṇe mayi mudaṃ prāpsyase prītilakṣaṇam: Literally, "you shall attain joy when I am raining as a token of my pleasure." From vedic times, Indra was worshiped as the deity of the monsoon. The reference here is to the literary convention that peacocks dance delightedly during the rains, which is their mating season. Ck and Ct understand the compound prītilakṣaṇam to mean "a token of [my] pleasure (prīticihnam)." KK and VSP read the feminine prītilakṣaṇām for prītilakṣaṇam, thus making the compound a bahuvrīhi modifying mudam, "delight." Cg, the only commentator to comment on this reading, glosses, "which [delight] would become a token of my pleasure (prīticihnabhūtām)." See verse 29 and notes below.

Following verse 21, D6,7,10,11,T,G,M1–5,7–10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of one line [361*]: "And thus did Indra, lord of the gods, grant a boon to the peacock (evam indro varaṃ prādān mayūrasya sureśvaraḥ)."

22. "And so . . . they say" kila: This appears to be a typical use of the particle as a marker of a traditional legend or tale, and, indeed, this fits well with this and the following little folksy origin stories of this sort made famous by such collections as Kipling's Just So Stories. However, Ck, Cg, Ct, Cr, and Cs appear to take the particle in an emphatic or exclusive sense (kevalam—so Ck, Ct, and Cs), reading it with the adjective nīlāḥ, "blue," in the sense of "pure blue." See, for example, Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1966), which clearly offers this interpretation. The idea, as pointed out by Ck, Cg, Ct, Cr, and Cs, is that previously peacocks' tails were devoid of the eye markings (netrarahitāḥ—so Ck, Cg, Ct, and Cr; nirnetrākārāḥ—so Cs). See notes to verse 21 above.

"they all became variegated" gatāḥ sarve vicitratām: Literally, "they all went to the state of being variegated." D7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead gatāḥ sarve 'pi barhiṇaḥ, literally, "all those possessing [magnificent] tail feathers departed." The term barhin, "possessed of tail feathers," is a common kenning for peacock. This meaning, however, would lend the pāda the rather flat sense "all the peacocks departed." This interpretation has been followed by Dutt (1894, p. 1612), who, ignoring the plural sarve, "all," renders, "the peacock departed," and Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1966), which offers, "the whole body of the peacocks left." Cr, on the other hand, believes that we should take the term barhin as a possessive indicating that the thing possessed is of a very high degree or quality. He explains: "By the term barhinaḥ is meant those that were characterized by magnificent tail feathers, that is to say, that all peacocks became such that their tails were marked by eyes (sarve mayūrā barhiṇaḥ praśastabarhaviśiṣṭā netrayuktapakṣavanto babhūvur ity arthaḥ)." Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 421) follows this interpretation, rendering, "they all became possessed of beautiful feathers." Cs makes it clear that by the term "all" is meant the entire species [of peacocks] (sarve 'pi tajjātīyāḥ). Roussel, Shastri, and Benoît no doubt read this variant but nonetheless translate as if reading with the critical edition. Thus Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 473) renders, "sont toutes devenues bigarrées," while Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 424) translates, "have become brilliant hued," and Benoît (1999, p. 1267) offers, "sont toutes chamarrées." It is possible that here, as in some other instances, Roussel has been directly or indirectly influenced by Gorresio (1870, p. 63), who reads with the critical edition and renders, "tutte diventarono variopinte." Roussel, in turn, may have influenced the others.

23. "that crow, which now" vāyasam: Literally: "crow." This is the same crow in whose body King Dharma, i.e., Yama, had hidden. As Benoît (1999, p. 1720) notes, the ubiquitous Indian crow (Corvus splendens) perched near the sacrificial altar, ready to steal the offerings, is a familiar Indian scenario.

"on the beam of the eastern sacrificial hall" prāgvaṃśe: The prāg- or prācīnavaṃśa is a technical term for the beam resting on the eastern and western posts of a sacrificial structure and, by extension, may also refer to the structure itself. See Renou, 1954, p. 114. Commentators and translators are divided between the two meanings. Ck, Ct, and Cr gloss, "the eastern sacrificial hall (prāgghavirgehe [Cr—gṛhe])." Cg, whom we have followed here, glosses, "on the wooden beam of the sacrificial hall (yajñaśālādāruṇi)." Cs offers, "on a portion of the sacrificial hall bearing that name (tannāmakayajñaśālābhāge)." Among the translators consulted, Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 421), who renders,

"the main eastern beam of the sacrificial hall," most clearly follows Cg. Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 424) somewhat similarly, if not accurately, renders, "the sacrificial post." Śrīdharasvāmin's commentary on Bhāgavatapurāṇa 4.5.14, where the term is used, defines it as "a wooden beam extending to the east and west and positioned on the eastern and western posts of the sacrificial hall (yajñaśālāyāḥ pūrvapaścimastambhayor arpitaṃ pūrvapaścimāyataṃ kāṣṭhaṃ prāgvaṃśas tam)." Benoît (1999, p. 1267) understands that the bird is perched "devant la hutte sacrificielle." Gorresio (1870, p. 63) renders, "nel sito opposto all' ara sacrificale." Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 473) leaves the term untranslated. Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1967) notes that the term refers to "[a] shed constructed for the dwelling of the sacrificer and his wife to the east of the sacrificial hall." This appears to refer to the term as it is used at Raghuvaṃśa 15.61, where Rāma is said to be dwelling in such a structure, along with the golden image of his wife. Mallinātha's commentary on that verse shows that he understands the term in this sense as well (prācīnasthūṇo yajñaśālāviśeṣaḥ).

"my words of gratitude" prītasya ca vacaḥ: Literally, "the speech of one who is pleased. V1,D6,7,10,11,T1–3,M3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read vacanam, "words or speech," for ca vacaḥ, "and speech."

24. "with which I afflict" pīḍyante . . . mayā: Literally, "they are afflicted by me." For some reason, Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 421), Dutt (1894, p. 1612), and Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 424) omit the reference to Yama's agency in causing disease.

25. "of death" mṛtyutaḥ: Literally, "from death." Cs understands the word mṛtyu, "death," to be a proper noun, the name of Yama's messenger (tannāmakamaddūtāt).

"so long as men do not kill you" yāvat tvāṃ na vadhiṣyanti narāḥ: Several of the commentators cite Bhagavadgītā 2.27, with its dictum that death is inevitable for all creatures that are born, to explain the exclusionary clause. Ck and Cg, for example, note, "because of the impossibility of avoiding death as indicated in the quote 'death is inevitable for one who is born,' he states 'so long as, etc.' (jātasya hi dhruvo mṛtyur ity aśakyaparihāratvād āha yāvat tvām ityādi)." Ct understands similarly but does not quote the Gītā.

"you shall live forever" bhaviṣyasi: Literally, "you shall exist." Several of the commentators understand, as do we, that the crow will continue to live or never die (jīviṣyasi—so Cs; sthāsyasi na mariṣyasi—so Cr). The passage is apparently based on some tradition concerning the longevity or immortality of crows. We have been unable to find any folkloric or literary source for this belief.

26. "And when you are fed . . . will be sated" tvayi bhukte tu tṛptās te: The famished condition of the departed ancestors (pitṛs) who lack descendants to offer the oblations of food and water is a commonplace in the literature. Compare Śāk 6.25. The idea here seems to be that when any offerings to the dead are made, and, as is inevitable, they are consumed by crows, the spirits of the departed are sated as well. Compare Benoît 1999, p. 1720. Cr understands that crows would be fed by the sons, etc., of the deceased, apparently for this purpose (ye mānavās te tvayi bhukte tatputrādinā bhojite sati sutṛptā bhaviṣyanti). Ñ2,V3,D10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read sutṛptāḥ, "fully sated," for tu tṛptāḥ, "and sated."

"reside in my realm and" ye ca madviṣayasthās tu: Literally, "and [those] who [are] residing in my realm and." The reference is, of course, to the spirits of the departed, who reside in Yama's world (yamalokasthāḥ—so Ck, Cg, Ct) or, more specifically, in that deity's capital city, Saṃyamanī (so Cr). KK and VSP read ete, "these or those," for ye ca, while V3,D6,7,10,11,M10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read vai, "indeed," for tu, "and."

"afflicted by hunger" kṣudhayārditāḥ: KK and VSP read instead kṣudbhayārditāḥ, "afflicted by the fear of hunger."

27. "Next" tu: Literally, "And or But."

"haṃsa" haṃsam: See notes to verse 5 above and verse 30 below.

"O lord of winged creatures" patraratheśvara: Literally, "O lord of those with wings for chariots." The word patraratha is one of the many kennings for "bird." V3 and GPP and NSP read instead the accusative patraratheśvaram, which then construes as an object of the finite abravīt, "he spoke to."

"grateful words" prītisaṃyuktaṃ vacaḥ: Literally, "speech conjoined with pleasure." D7,10, and GPP and NSP read tataḥ, "then," for vacaḥ, "speech." This variant forces one to read the compound prītisaṃyuktam by enjambment as an adverb modifying the finite verb abravīt, lending the phrase the sense "he spoke gratefully." One could alternatively take the compound either adverbially with the imperative śrūyatām, giving the sense "please listen gratefully," or as an adjective modifying the variant patraratheśvaram, yielding the sense "to the grateful lord of winged creatures." These alternatives seem less plausible contextually.

28. "bright, like the orb of the moon" saumyaś candramaṇḍalasaṃnibhaḥ: Literally, "bright, similar to the orb of the moon." There is a mild pun here in that the adjective saumya can also mean lunar or related to the moon.

29. "In contact with the water, my particular domain" maccharīraṃ samāsādya: Literally, "having approached my body." In post-vedic mythology, Varuṇa is universally regarded as the deity of the waters. Ck, Cg, Cm, Ct, and Cr all gloss "water (jalam)" for "body (śarīram)." Ck, Cg, and Ct note that Varuṇa is the embodiment of the waters (jalamūrtitvāt tasya—Ct; Ck and Cg—jalamūrtim).

"as a token of my gratitude" prītilakṣaṇaṃ: See notes to verse 21 above.

30. "Formerly . . . the color of haṃsas was not pure white" haṃsānāṃ hi purā . . . na varṇaḥ sarvapāṇḍurāḥ: There are two possible natural historical explanations for the change in the color of the birds. One is that, in fact, two birds, both of which are referred to as haṃsas, are involved. The first is the bar-headed goose (Anser indicus), which is a grayish-white bird with blackish wingtips, while the second is one or the other of the pure-white swans that may have included the Indian subcontinent as part of their migratory route in antiquity (for example, the whooping swan [Cygnus cygnus] or the mute swan [Cygnus olor], etc.). The ornithologist K. N. Dave (1985, pp. 423–24), citing the present passage, proposes that the reference here is to the color change undergone by swans, whose juvenile forms are darker than the pure-white adults. KK and VSP read nīlavarṇaḥ sapāṇḍuraḥ for na varṇaḥ sarvapāṇḍuraḥ, lending the line the sense "formerly . . . the dark color of the haṃsas contained some white." See notes to 6.57.35 and 6.110.23, where the color of the haṃsas is clearly described as white. Kṣemendra refers to this incident in his Rāmāyaṇa-Mañjarī at 7.339 (haṃso 'pi himakarpūraśītāṃśurajatadyutiḥ varuṇasya varāj jātas toyeṣaprītimān sadā).

"as bright as the tips of new grass" śaṣpāgranirmalāḥ: It is not clear what color is intended by this. If the color intended is a wheatish or straw color, it could perhaps suggest a reference to the bar-headed goose mentioned above. Two of the translators consulted explicitly understand that it is green (Shastri [1959, vol. 3, p. 425], "color of emerald"; Raghunathan [1982, vol. 3, p. 421], "color of verdant"). Ck, Cg, and Ct gloss, "of a pleasing dark color (komalaśyāmavarṇaḥ)."

31. "that lizard, which now" kṛkalāsaḥ: Literally, "the lizard." See note to verse 23 above.

32. "Your head shall be immutably golden forever." sadravyaṃ ca śiro nityaṃ bhaviṣyati tavākṣayam: Literally, "And your head will indestructibly always be together with that element [sadravyam]." The context, supported by the commentators, makes it clear that the term dravyam here must be taken in its sense of "gold-colored" (sadravyaṃ suvarṇavarṇam—so Ck, Ct, Cr). Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 421) ignores the words nityam, "forever," and akṣayam, "indestructible or indelible." Dutt (1894, p. 1613) understands the latter to be an adjective modifying śiraḥ, "head," and so renders the awkward, "Thy undeteriorating head." On the basis of the word grīva, "neck," written in the margin of one of his manuscripts, Gorresio (1870, p. 63) understands sadravyam, "golden," to mean "along with the neck." He discusses this interpretation in a note on page 319.

33. "When the sacrificial ceremony was completed" tasmin yajñotsave . . . / nivṛtte: Although the syntax with the enjambment of the participle is somewhat disjointed, we agree with the majority of commentators and translators who share this reading in taking the whole phrase as a single locative absolute. Cs alone reads the participle nivṛtte separately and proposes that we supply the term rāvaṇe, yielding the sense "[having granted the boons] at the sacrificial ceremony . . . once Rāvaṇa had departed." M6,10, and KK and VSP read the nominative plural nivṛttāḥ for nivṛtte, yielding the meaning "Having given . . . at the sacrificial ceremony, they departed, together with the king, and went to their own abode."

"to these creatures" tebhyaḥ: Literally, "to them."

"returned to their respective abodes together with the king" saha rājñā vai punaḥ svabhavanaṃ gatāḥ: We agree with Ck, Cg, Ct, and Cs, who understand that the gods return to heaven in the company of King Marutta (maruttena saha svargam ity arthaḥ). Indeed, it is a commonplace of the literature that royal sacrificers may visit or reside in heaven on the completion of one or more ritual performances. For some reason, several of the translators consulted, including Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 474), Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 425), Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1967), and Benoît (1999, p. 1268) understand that the gods return home with their king, Indra. D7,10,T4,M6,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read tu, "and," for vai, "indeed."

Sarga 19

1. "spoiling for battle" yuddhakāṅkṣī: Literally, "possessing a desire for battle."

"of other kings" narendrāṇām: Literally, "of lords of men."

2–3. "You must either give me battle or declare yourselves vanquished!" yuddhaṃ me dīyatām iti // nirjitāḥ smeti vā brūta: Literally, " 'Battle must be given to me' or you must say, 'We are defeated.' " Compare 7.18.6 and note.

"This is my resolve. There will be no escape for those of you who act otherwise." eṣo [sic] hi mama niścayaḥ / anyathā kurvatām evaṃ mokṣo vo nopapadyate //: Literally, "For this is my resolve. Of those of you who act other than in this fashion, escape is not possible." D7,10,11,T4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read eṣa me hi suniścayaḥ, "for this is my firm resolve," for eṣo hi mama niścayaḥ, "for this is my resolve." D6,7,10,11, T2,G1,3,M1,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read naivopapadyate, "it is not at all possible," for vo nopapadyate, "it is not possible for you."

4. "those many" bahavaḥ: B1,D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead abhīravaḥ, "not fearful or fearless."

Following 4ab, D6,7,10,11,S (except M6) insert a passage of one line [363*]: "Then, although they were fearless in battle,[1] having taken counsel among themselves, [they] . . . (mantrayitvā tato 'nyonyaṃ yuddhe santo 'py abhīravaḥ)."

[1] "although they were fearless in battle" yuddhe santo 'py abhīravaḥ: D7 and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead rājānaḥ sumahābalāḥ, "those immensely powerful kings."

5. "Rāma my son" tāta: Literally, "O son."

"Duṣyanta, Suratha, Gādhi, Gaya, and King Purūravas" duṣyantaḥ suratho gādhir gayo rājā purūravāḥ: These are famous monarchs of various lineages and eras in the Indian epic and purāṇic tradition. Cv, Ck, Ct, and Cs, all concerned at the appearance of an anachronism resulting from the impression that the kings are speaking simultaneously, note that, although they lived at different times, each in his own era submitted individually to the very long-lived Rāvaṇa (eteṣāṃ bhinnakālavartitvena yugapadvacanāsaṃbhave 'pi rāvaṇasya cirakālavartitvena svasvakāle te tathāvadann ity arthaḥ—so Cs). Most of these names are found elsewhere in the Rāmāyaṇa; thus Gādhi, the son of Kuśanābha and father of Viśvāmitra, is known to the Bālakāṇḍa (see 1.33.3–61 and 1.50.19); a figure known as Gaya is mentioned in the Ayodhyākāṇḍa (see 2.99.11 and notes) (there is also a ṛṣi of that name in the Ṛgveda [see ṚV 10.63 and 64]); and Purūravas is mentioned in the Araṇyakāṇḍa (see 3.46.18 and notes) and in this kāṇḍa (see 7.80.23 and notes), while, in this kāṇḍa, Suratha is said to be the younger brother of Śveta (see 7.69.4,9).

6–7. "Give me battle" yuddhaṃ me saṃpradīyatām: Literally, "Let battle be given to me." D6,7,10,11,S (except M6) read instead yuddhaṃ dehīti rāvaṇaḥ, "'give battle,' [said] Rāvaṇa."

"Such is my command." mamaitad iha śāsanam: Literally, "This is my command now." V3,D6,7,10,11,T, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tvam evaṃ mama śāsanam, "you [declare] . . . Such is my command."

Following verse 6, Ś,V1,3,D1,3,5,7–12,T3,4, and Lahore, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of one line [365*]: "He [accosted] that tiger among men, who was the equal in might of Indra, smasher of citadels (sa taṃ puruṣaśārdūlaṃ puraṃdarasamaṃ bale /)."

Following verse 6, D6,7,10,11,S (except M6) insert a passage of one line [366*]: "And when the lord of Ayodhyā had heard that contemptuous[1] speech of his (ayodhyādhipatis tasya śrutvā cāvamataṃ vacaḥ /)."

[1] "And . . . contemptuous" cāvamatam: D7,10,11,T3,4,M10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead pāpātmanaḥ, "of that evil-minded one (i.e., Rāvaṇa)."

8. "In a towering rage" susaṃkruddhaḥ: Literally, "extremely enraged." Ś,Ñ,V1,3,B,D1–4,7–12,T3,4,M3,4,6,10, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tu saṃkruddhaḥ, "and enraged."

Following verse 8, D6,7,10,11,S (except M6), insert a passage of one line [367*]: "Take your stand! Get ready quickly, while I do likewise.[1] (saṃtiṣṭha kṣipram āyatto bhava caivaṃ bhavāmy aham /)"

[1] "while I do likewise" caivaṃ bhavāmy aham: Literally, "and I will become thus."

9. "the vast army . . . which" sumahad dhi yat /. . . balam: Literally, "indeed, which [was] a very great army." Ś,Ñ,V1,3,B,D1–5,7–12, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read balam, "army," for hi yat, "indeed which." This reading creates a redundancy with the term balam, "army," in pāda d.

"which he had made ready after hearing of those earlier conquests" pūrvaṃ śrutārthena sajjitam: Literally, "made ready by him who had previously heard that matter." We agree with Ck, Cg, Ct, and Cr in fleshing out the elliptical phrase pūrvaṃ śrutārthena to mean that, prior to Rāvaṇa's arrival, Anaraṇya had learned about the rākṣasa's campaign of conquests (pūrvaṃ rāvaṇagamanāt pūrvaṃ śrutārthena śrutarāvaṇavṛttāntena—so Cg). Ñ1,V3,B4,D10–11,T1,2,G1,3,M1,2,4,8,9, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read nirji- tam, "conquered, defeated," for sajjitam, "made ready." This extremely awkward reading causes considerable consternation on the part of the commentators, some of whom struggle to force the term to mean something other than its usual lexical sense. Ck and Ct take the participle nirjitam as a bhāve ktaḥ (Ct; niṣṭhā—Ck), understanding that the king has engaged his army with the purpose of the defeat of [the rākṣasa] forces. (nirjitam. bhāve ktaḥ. nirjayaṃ prati yat sumahad balaṃ niyuktam—so Ct.) Cs reads the adverb pūrvam, "previously," with the participle and takes the root √ji, "to conquer," in the sense of "to reach or attain" on the basis of a usage he ascribes to the Chāndogyabhāṣya. He thus understands the phrase pūrvaṃ nirjitam to mean "having attained ordered ranks." Alternatively, he takes the participle as an antonym of itself to mean "undefeated by anyone." (pūrvaṃ nirjitaṃ paraṃparāprāptam. svarjita ityādi nidarśayitvā chāndogyabhāṣye jiḥ prāptyarthaka iti vyākhyātatvāt. nirjitaṃ kairapy aparājitam.)

10. "At once" kṣaṇāt: Literally, "After an instant." D7,10,11,T3,4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead raṇe, "in battle."

"many thousands" bahusāhasram: Ñ1,V1,3,B1,2,D3–5,7,10–11,T3,4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead daśasāhasram, "ten thousand."

"ten thousand" ayutam: Ñ1,V1,3,D7,10–11,T3,4,M3,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead niyutam, "one million."

Following 10ab, D7,10,11,G2,M5, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a redundant passage of one line [368*]: "And many thousands of chariots and infantry, O best of men (rathānāṃ bahusāhasraṃ pattīnāṃ ca narottama /)."

Following verse 10, Ñ1,V1,3,B,D1,3–5,7,9–11,T3,4,M3, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of two lines [369*]: "Then, O you who are skilled in battle, there took place a great and marvelous battle between King Anaraṇya and the rākṣasa lord (tataḥ pravṛttaṃ sumahad yuddhaṃ yuddhaviśārada / anaraṇyasya nṛpate rākṣasendrasya cādbhutam //)."

11. "army . . . that of " -balam . . . balam: Literally, "army . . . army."

"your majesty" rājan: Ñ2,D10,11,G2,3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read sarvam, "all or entire," for rājan, lending the phrase the sense "the entire army."

Following verse 11, D7,10,11,T3,4,G2,3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert, while D6,T1,2,G1,M1–5,7,9,10 insert after 11ab, a passage of four lines [370*]: "[The army] having fought for a very long time, having demonstrated tremendous valor,[1] [and] having joined up with him who was filled with the furor of battle and endowed with discipline and strength,[1][2] [and] who was the foremost of men [and] who was blazing,[2] [the army] was quickly decimated.[3] It plunged into the host like moths into the fire.[4]"

[1] D6,7,10,11,T3,4,G2,3,M10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, and VSP—KK [in brackets between lines 1 and 3]—omit line 2.

[2] "who was the foremost of men . . . who was blazing" prajvalantaṃ naraśreṣṭham: D10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read tam āsādya, "having approached him," for naraśreṣṭham, "foremost of men," while KK and VSP read samāsādya, "having encountered." The critical reading, naraśreṣṭham, "the foremost of men," can only refer here to King Anaraṇya, in which case one is forced to take the gerund samāsādya in line 2 to mean that the king's army had joined him to confront Rāvaṇa in battle. The replacement of the term naraśreṣṭha in the above manuscripts and printed editions allows one, as indicated by Ck, Cg, and Ct, to understand that the participle prajvalantam, "blazing," refers to Rāvaṇa (samāsādyeti taṃ rāvaṇam āsādya). This lends the first half of line 3 the sense "having encountered the blazing [Rāvaṇa]." This interpretation has been followed by Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1969), which renders, "coming in contact with the inflamed Rāvaṇa," Benoît (1999, p. 1269), who renders, "Au contact de Rāvaṇa qui dardait des flammes," and Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 475), who translates, "ce (héros) qui projetait des flammes." The remaining translators consulted take the object of the gerund to be the ranks or troops of Rāvaṇa. Thus Dutt (1894, p. 1614) offers, "flaming Rākshasa ranks," and Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 426) similarly offers, "those ranks projecting flames."

Following 379*, G3, GPP (in brackets between line 4 and 12ab), KK, and VSP repeat 11cd ("it was consumed, your majesty, like an oblation offered in the sacrificial fire").

12. "his vast army" mahad balam: Literally, "the great army." V1,D6,7,10,11,T,G3,M1–5, 7–10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the synonymous compound mahābalam.

"like the waters of the five rivers" yathā pañcāpagājalam: The reference here appears to be to the well-known five rivers of the Pañcanada or the Panjab. D1,4,7,10,11,G3,M1, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead vanāpagaśataṃ yathā, "like a hundred rivers of water." The unusual compound vanāpaga- is the subject of forced interpretation and some dispute on the part of the commentators. Ck, Ct, and Cr take the term vana in its sense of "water" and understand the normally feminine noun āpagā, "river," to have its final vowel irregularly shortened. (vanāpagaṃ śataṃ vanaṃ jalaṃ tatpūrṇanadīśatam. ārṣo hrasvaḥ.—so Ct.) This yields the tautology "hundreds of rivers full of water." This reading and interpretation are followed by all translators consulted with the exception of Gorresio. Cs takes exception to Ct's interpretation, arguing that we should take the term vana in its more common sense of "forest." He thus understands that the upamāna here is "a hundred forests that are endowed with many rivers and that, in confrontation with the mighty ocean, are destroyed." Cs quotes Ct and, typically, ridicules him, arguing that his taking the term vana in other than its commonly accepted sense (of forest), coupled with his imaginary understanding that the final vowel of the word āpagā has been irregularly shortened, has forced him into a tortuous interpretation. (apāṃ samūha āpam. tena saha gacchantīty apagacchantīti vāpagāḥ. apagā vā . . . vanāni kāntārāṇi ca tāny āpagāni ca. teṣāṃ śataṃ bahunadīsahitavanānāṃ śatam arṇavaṃ samāsādya prāpya yathā naśyati tathā naśyamānam apaśyat. nāgojibhaṭṭas tu "vanāpagaṃ śataṃ vanaṃ jalaṃ tatpūrṇanadīśatam. ārṣo hrasva" iti vyācakhyau. tatrāpagaśabdo 'rūḍha evety aṅgīkaraṇāsvārasyaṃ hrasvatāyā ārṣatvakalpanaṃ ceti kuṭilatā ṭīkanīyā.)

Following verse 12, Ñ,V1,3,B,D1,3–5,9,T3,4, and Gorresio insert a passage of two lines [373*]. See note to verse 13 below.

13. "Rāvaṇa" rāvaṇam: The reading is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition.

Following verse 13, D7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert, while Ñ,V1,3,B,D1,3–5,9,T3,4, and Gorresio insert following verse 12 above, a passage of two lines [373*]: "Broken by Anaraṇya, [Rāvaṇa's] ministers, Mārīca, Śuka,[1] and Sāraṇa, together with Prahasta, fled like deer (anaraṇyena te 'mātyā mārīcaśukasāraṇaḥ / prahastasahitā bhagnā vyadravanta mṛgā iva //)."

[1] "Śuka" -śuka-: See 7.14.14 and 7.18.17 and notes.

14. "rained down" pātayāmāsa: Literally, "he caused to fall."

"on the . . . head" mūrdhani: It is noteworthy here that in a battle situation, Rāvaṇa is depicted as having but a single head. Normally, in violent situations he takes on his ten-headed form. For a discussion of the differing number of heads and arms of Rāvaṇa, see note to 7.9.25.

15. "showers of rain" vāridhārāḥ: Literally, "streams of water."

"in falling" patantaḥ: Literally, "[his arrows] falling."

"no injury whatsoever" na kṣataṃ kvacit: Literally, "no wound anywhere." T2,4,G1,3, M1–3,5,9,10, and KK and VSP read the synonymous kṣatim for kṣatam, "wound or injury."

16. "But then, with the palm of his hand, the enraged king of the rākṣasas struck King Anaraṇya on his head so that he fell from his chariot." tato rākṣasarājena kruddhena nṛpatis tadā / talenābhihato mūrdhni sa rathān nipapāta ha //: Literally, "After that, at that time, the king, struck on the head with his palm by the king of the rākṣasas, fell from the chariot."

17. "trembling, his limbs twitching" vihvalāṅgaḥ pravepitaḥ: Literally, "trembling, his limbs distressed." D6,7,10,11, GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead vihvaḥ pravivepitaḥ, "[the king] distressed [and] trembling."

"mighty" mahān: Literally, "great or large." D1,3,4,6,7,10,M6, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the adverb yathā, "just like," which, given the iva in pāda c, is redundant.

"struck down . . . by a thunderbolt" vajradagdhaḥ: Literally, "scorched or burned by a thunderbolt." We follow Ck and Ct, who gloss, "struck by lightning (aśanihataḥ)."

18. "Mocking the Ikṣvāku king" taṃ prahasya . . . ikṣvākuṃ pṛthivīpatim: Literally, "having mocked that lord of the earth, Ikṣvāku." Ikṣvāku is the name of the legendary founder of the Solar Dynasty. The name is also used here to refer to his descendants. Ck, Cg, and Ct note that the reference is to Anaraṇya, who belongs to Ikṣvāku's lineage (ikṣvākuṃ tadvaṃśyam anaraṇyam—so Ct; Ck and Cg similarly). See notes to verse 22 below.

"Now what benefit have you reaped in doing battle with me?" kim īdānīṃ tvayā prāptaṃ phalaṃ māṃ prati yudhyatā: Literally, "what fruit has been acquired now by you fighting against me?" Ck, Cg, and Ct want to flesh out Rāvaṇa's expression, arguing that we should add the words "without uttering the words 'I have been defeated' (nirjito 'smīti vacanam anuktveti śeṣaḥ)." V3,D6,7,10,11,T1,3,4,G1,M1, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP transpose tvayā and phalam.

19. "addicted" pramattaḥ: Literally, "intoxicated." Ñ,V1,3,D6,7,9–11,T3,4,M1,3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead prasaktaḥ, "attached."

20. "As Rāvaṇa was speaking in this fashion" tasyaivaṃ bruvataḥ: Literally, "as he was speaking in this fashion."

21. "For it is not you who have defeated me . . . although you boast about it." na hy ahaṃ nirjitaḥ . . . tvayā cātmapraśaṃsinā: Literally, "For I have not been defeated by you who are praising yourself."

"by fate . . . here" kāleneha: Ñ2,V3,B,D6,7,10,11,T1,2,4,G1,3,M1,3,10, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read the more contextually apposite kālenaiva, "by fate alone."

"You, sir, have merely been its instrument in my case." hetubhūtas tu me bhavān: Literally, "You, sir, have become for me the proximate cause or instrument." The notion that it is fate, time, or destiny that kills a warrior and not his enemy is a common one in the epic literature. Compare Bhagvadgītā 11.33. Cr understands that the expression suggests that Anaraṇya engaged in this battle in full awareness of the fact that it was his time to die (etena svamṛtyukālaṃ jñātvaivāhaṃ yuddhe pravṛtto 'smīti sūcitam).

22. "But what I can do now" kiṃ tv idānīṃ mayā śakyaṃ kartum: Literally, "But now by me it is possible to do." Despite the normal sense of the sequence kiṃtu, as "but or however," all translators consulted understand the phrase to be a question in which Anaraṇya asks what he can do now as his life breaths are fading away. This may be because translators of the southern editions are confronted with an insert (376*, see below) of one line following 22ab, which somewhat changes the subject, thus leaving 22ab hanging, as it were. Gorresio's text (7.19.25) lacks the insert, but he translates the line as a question in any case (Gorresio 1870, p. 65).

"as my life breaths ebb away" prāṇaparikṣaye: Literally, "at the cessation of life breaths."

"is utter a prophecy" vaco vakṣyāmi: Literally, "I will utter speech." The context makes it clear that Anaraṇya is going to prophesy the destruction of Rāvaṇa. Ct glosses, "speech in the form of a curse (vacaḥ śāparūpam)."

"since you have insulted the House of Ikṣvāku" ikṣvākuparibhāvitvāt: Literally, "because of [your] being one who possesses an insult to the Ikṣvākus." Ck, Cg, and Ct understand that the insult is to the Ikṣvāku family and takes the form of his words. Thus Ct notes: "The meaning is 'because of the insult to the Ikṣvāku lineage pertaining to the disrespectful words that you uttered' (tvaduktāvamānanavākyasyekṣvākukula-paribhavarūpatvād ity arthaḥ)." Cr understands, "Your behavior insults Ikṣvāku himself, and since you—the phrase 'of your' must be supplied—are possessed of that . . . (ikṣvākor eva paribhavati t[v?]acchīlas ta[t]tvāt taveti śeṣaḥ)." See notes to verse 18 above.

Following 22ab, D6,7,11,T1–3,G,M1–5,7–10 (T4 continues after 378*) insert a passage of one line [376*]: "For I did not turn away,[1] rākṣasa, but was vanquished[2] by you while fighting (na hy ahaṃ vimukho rakṣo yudhyamānas tvayā jitaḥ /)."

[1] "turn away" vimukho: Literally, "one whose face is averted." D7,11,T3, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead the synonymous vimukhī.

[2] "was vanquished" jitaḥ: Literally, "vanquished." D6,7,11,T3,4,M2,8,9, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead hataḥ, "[was] struck down or slain."

23. "if I have properly engaged in penances" yadi sukṛtaṃ tapaḥ: We agree with the majority of translators in understanding sukṛtam adjectivally. Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 423), alone, takes it in its nominal sense of "good," rendering, "if I have . . . done any good or practiced austerities." But this is syntactically improbable.

"then" tathā: Literally, "so [may that be]." Ñ,V1,D6,7,10,11,T4,M3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tadā, "then."

24. "a king of immense blazing energy" rājā paramatejasvī: D1,3,4,6,7,10,11,S (except T4), and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead rāmo dāśarathir nāma, "[a hero] named Rāma Dāśarathi."

25. "No sooner . . . than" tataḥ: Literally, "After that or then."

"the war drum of the gods" devadundubhiḥ: See 155*, note 2, following notes to 7.9.27.

"loud as a thundercloud" jaladharodagraḥ: Literally, "fierce or high as a water-holder [i.e., cloud]." We agree with Cr in understanding the adjective udagra here to refer by extension to the intensity of the sound. He glosses, "possessing abundant sound (adhikaśabdavān)." This interpretation is more or less followed by Gorresio (1870, p. 65), Dutt (1894, p. 1615), Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1970), and Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 423). Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 476) understands that it is the sky covered with clouds that is resonating with the sound of divine gongs ("Le [ciel] couvert de nuées retentit du son des gongs divins"). This interpretation is followed by both Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 427) and Benoît (1999, p. 1270).

26. "ascended" gataḥ: Literally, "[he] went."

"heavenly abode" sthānaṃ triviṣṭapam: Literally, "the place Triviṣṭapa." The term triviṣṭapa, depending on the context, can refer either to the heavenly world in general or specifically to Indra's heaven. Cr, the only commentator to take note of the term here, glosses, "gone to the abode that is heaven (svargaṃ sthānaṃ gataḥ)." For other occurrences of the term triviṣṭapa in the Rāmāyaṇa, see 1.56.6; 2.100.9; 5.3.35; 6.90.5–7; 7.26.35;

7.41.20; 7.76.22; and notes. See, too, 3709*, lines 5,6, following note to 6.116.90, and note 16 (p. 1551).

"Rāma" rāma: D6,7,10,11,T1,2,4,G3,M1,3,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tasmin, which then construes as part of the absolute construction "when that king had departed."

"departed" sa nyavartata: D6,7,10,11,T1,2,G,M1,2,4,5,7–10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the irregular so 'pasarpata, "he went away." Ck and Cg provide the correct Pāṇinian form, apāsarpat, and gloss, "he went (apagatavān)."

Sarga 20

Before sarga 20, Ś,Ñ,V1,B,D1–5,8,9,12,T,4,M6, and the printed editions of Gorresio and Lahore read sargas 31–34.

1. "the people of the earth" martyān pṛthivyām: Literally, "the mortals on the earth."

"foremost of sages" munisattamam: D6,7,10,11,T1,M10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP, with the exception of Ck, read instead munipuṃgavam, "bull among sages."

*"in a forest" vane tasmin: The critical reading is ghane tasmin, "on that cloud." All manuscripts (Ś,Ñ,V,B,D1–9,12,T1,3,4,G,M) and Lahore and Gorresio, with the exception of D9,10,T2, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP, read vane, "in a forest," for the critical reading of ghane, "on a cloud." No doubt, in spite of this overwhelming textual evidence, the critical editors are attempting to rationalize verses 1 and 2, in the latter of which Nārada is unambiguously said to be situated on the back of a cloud (meghapṛṣṭhasthaḥ). It is perfectly possible that Rāvaṇa, flying through the sky in his aerial palace, would meet the divine seer Nārada, who often travels between the heavens and the earth, on or near a cloud. Nonetheless, given the strong textual evidence for the reading vane, "in the forest," we have emended accordingly. Ck, Cg, Ct, and Cr, who read with the critical edition, see the sage as on or near a cloud. Ck, Cg, and Ct understand that the sage is situated on the back of a cloud (ghanapṛṣṭhe), as in verse 2. Cr understands that Nārada is simply situated near a cloud (meghasamīpe sthitam).

Following verse 1, D3,6,7,10,11,S (except M6) insert a passage of two lines [384*]: "The night-roaming [rākṣasa] Daśagrīva, after making his respectful salutation and inquiring about the sage's well-being, asked[1] the reason for his coming there (tasyābhivādanaṃ kṛtvā daśagrīvo niśācaraḥ / abravīt kuśalaṃ pṛṣṭvā hetum āgamanasya ca //)."

[1] "asked" abravīt: Literally, "he said." We follow Ct and Cr, who understand Rāvaṇa to be asking a question (papracchety arthaḥ—so Ct; Cr similarly).

2. "Perched on the back of a cloud" meghapṛṣṭhasthaḥ: See note to verse 1 above.

3. "stay a moment" tiṣṭha: Literally, "stay or stand." Ck, Cg, and Ct suggest adding the phrase "in order to hear my words (madvacanaṃ śrotum iti śeṣaḥ)."

4. "Tārkṣya's defeat of the great serpents" tārkṣyasyoragadharṣaṇaiḥ: Literally, "by Tārkṣya's [i.e., Garuḍa's] assaults on the serpents." D7,10,11,T4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read gandharva- for tārkṣyasya, thus removing the reference to Tārkṣya as the agent of the defeat of the serpents. In this reading, Nārada ascribes the defeat of the gandharvas and great serpents to Rāvaṇa. Ct understands that these conquests are yet to occur, noting: "I will be pleased with your future battles involving assaults on the gandharvas and great serpents (tvayā samaṃ gandharvoragadharṣaṇair vimardair bhāvibhiḥ paritoṣito bhaviṣyāmīty arthaḥ)." The editors of the critical edition have marked the word tārkṣyasya as uncertain. Given the critical evidence, it appears that only the -asy- of the word tārkṣyasya should have been considered uncertain, as the variant [tārkṣy]eṇ[a] occurs in numerous northern and southern manuscripts (Ś,Ñ,V1,3,B,D1–4,8,9,12,T2,3,G2,M1,3,6). The word, usually a name for Garuḍa, is used only one other time in the Rāmāyaṇa, at 2.98.6.

"and your crushing blows in battle" tvayā samaramardaiś ca: Literally, "by the blows in battle by you." D7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tvayā samaṃ vimardaiś ca, "and equally by you with [your] crushing blows." Cr takes samam, "equally," in its sense of "entirely (kṛtsnam)." Cs notes that Nārada is delighted by Viṣṇu's acts of violence because of his well-known fondness for conflict. He breaks up the sequence tvayā samam into tvayā asamam, lending the sense that Rāvaṇa's deeds were unequaled in the past. Like Ct, Cs also notes that he will be delighted with Rāvaṇa's future conquests of the gandharvas and great serpents. He concludes by noting that Nārada's effort here to incite violence is not a transgression, because, in fact, it has the function of providing a service to the gods. (viṣṇunā kartrā daityaghātaiḥ paritoṣitaḥ. kalahapriyatvān mameti bhāvaḥ. tvayāsamaṃ yathā bhavati tathā kadāpi kairapi pūrvam anācaritatvād anaupamyam. gandharvoragadharṣaṇair vimardair etadrūpaiḥ kariṣyamāṇaiḥ paritoṣito 'tisaṃtuṣṭo bhaviṣyāmi. vinā mahad aṃho na hatir etasya bhavatīti tadarthaṃ bhavann ayaṃ yatno devasevārūpa iti nāradasya na pratyavāya ity abhiprāyaḥ.)

5. "you" te: D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead tu, "and."

"And once you have heard it, bull among rākṣasas, you should then act on it." śrutvā cānantaraṃ kāryaṃ tvayā rākṣasapuṃgava: Ñ,B,D6,7,10,11,G1,2,M2,4,6–10, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press substitute for 5ab, while V3,T1,2,G3,M1–3,5, and KK and VSP insert after 5ab, a passage of one line [385*]: "Concentrate your mind on listening, dear boy, while I tell it to you (tan me nigadatas tāta samādhiṃ śravaṇe kuru /)." GPP inserts the line in brackets after 7.20.6ab with a note that this line is an addition in the text of Cg.

"bull among rākṣasas" rākṣasapuṃgava: T1,2,G3,M1,3,5, and KK and VSP read instead rākṣasasattama, "foremost among the rākṣasas."

6. "you, who are invulnerable to the gods" avadhyena daivataiḥ: The reference is, of course, to the critical boon of Rāvaṇa that makes him invulnerable to supernatural beings. On Rāvaṇa's boon, see 7.10.14–22 and notes and 6.28.28–29 and notes. Ct takes the reference to indicate that Rāvaṇa has nothing to fear from mortals (anena martyebhyo bhayarāhityam uktam). This is ironic in light of the fact that in the end only mortals will present a danger to the rākṣasa.

"mere mortals . . . these mortals" lokaḥ . . . ayaṃ lokaḥ: Literally, "the world . . . this world" or "the people . . . these people." The context supports Ck's and Ct's gloss of "the world of mortals (martyalokaḥ)." D5–7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read tāta, "dear boy," for the first occurrence of the term lokaḥ.

Following verse 6, Ñ2,V3 (line 8 only),B,D6,7,10,11,T1,2,G,M, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert, while D3 continues line 4 and line 2 only following 390*, and T4 continues line 7–8 only following 393*, a passage of eight lines [386*]: "It is not proper[1] for you who are invulnerable to the gods, dānavas, daityas, yakṣas, gandharvas, and rākṣasas to harass the world of humans.[1–2] What person such as you[2] would kill these people who are ever confused as to their own good, afflicted with great calamities, and prey to[3] old age and hundreds of maladies?[3–4] What wise person here acting with intelligence[4] would take pleasure in doing battle against those who constantly suffer[5] from various undesirable afflictions?[5–6] You ought not further diminish this world that is constantly[6] wasting away from starvation, thirst, old age, and so forth, and which is deluded by grief and despair.[7–8]"

[1] "proper" yuktaḥ: D10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead the synonymous yogyaḥ.

[2] "such as you" tvādṛśaḥ: Ñ2,B2,3,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the accusative tādṛśam, "such as this." The adjective would thus modify lokam, "world."

[3] "prey to" -vṛtam: Literally, "provided with or endowed with." D6,7,10,11,M10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the synonymous -yutam.

[4] "What wise person here acting with intelligence" ko buddhyā matimān asmin: Literally, "what wise man with intelligence in this." D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead matimān mānuṣe loke, "a wise man in this world of humans."

[5] "suffer" tapyate: D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead kutra kaḥ, "who [any]where?"

[6] "this [world that is] constantly" sadaivainam: D6,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead daivahatam, "struck down by fate."

7. "this world of mortals" mānuṣam / lokam enam: D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead mānuṣam / mūḍham evam, "this mortal [world] deluded in this fashion."

"with innumerable cross purposes" vicitrārtham: Literally, "having variegated purposes or ends." Ct glosses, "obsessed with its various petty human concerns (nānāvidha kṣudrapuruṣārthasaktam)." Cr understands, "characterized by numerous mental and physical afflictions (anekavidhādhivyādhiviśiṣṭam)."

"which is totally unaware of its own fate" yasya na jñāyate gatiḥ: Literally, "of which the destination is not known." Ct understands the polysemic term gati here to refer to "the period of the enjoyment of suffering, etc. (duḥkhādibhogakālaḥ)." Cs similarly glosses, "the time of the aggregation of suffering, etc. (duḥkhādisamavāyasamayaḥ)." Presumably, given the context of the following verses, they are referring to the sufferings and pleasures of people in the afterlife. Cr glosses, "situation or condition (avasthitiḥ)."

8. "are playing music and dancing" vāditranṛttāni sevyante: Literally, "musical instruments and dances are practiced." D7 (first time),10,11,G1,M4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead vāditranṛtyādi sevyate, "musical instruments, dancing, etc., is practiced."

"their faces marked by eyes flooded with tears" dhārāśrunayanānanaiḥ: Literally, "having faces that have eyes which have stream-tears."

9. "With their affection for their mothers, fathers, and sons and delighting in their wives and friends" mātāpitṛsutasnehair bhāryābandhumanoramaiḥ: Literally, "with affections for the mothers, fathers, and sons [and] delighting [lit., 'delightful'] in wives and friends." The adjective manorama, "delightful or attractive," is problematic here at the end of the compound. The commentators nominalize it variously. Cv glosses, "and with desirable objects of the senses (iṣṭaviṣayaiś ca)." Ck understands, "the pleasure that is connected with wives and friends is delight, that is to say, pleasure; the meaning is 'with those [pleasures]' (bhāryābandhuviṣayako manoramo ramaṇaṃ prītis tathā tair ity arthaḥ)." Cg interprets similarly to Ck. Ct explains: "The meaning is 'with desires directed toward wives, etc.' (bhāryādiviṣayakamanorathair ity arthaḥ)." Cr understands similarly. D6,7,10,11,M10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read the two compounds together as a single compound with the same meaning.

"the people, in their infatuation" mohenāyaṃ janaḥ: Literally, "the people through infatuation." D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead mohito 'yaṃ janaḥ, "the infatuated people."

"fail to grasp their own misery" kleśaṃ svaṃ nāvabudhyate: Literally, "[the people] do not understand their own suffering." Unlike the Buddhist conception that all beings are suffering, whether they know it or not, the opinion of Ck, Cg, and Ct is that the suffering referred to here is that which will be experienced in the afterlife (pāralaukikam). Cf. Śaṅkarācārya's bhāṣya to the Kaṭhopaniṣad 2.3.1 (or 6.1), where the diversity, ignorance, and instability of the human condition are discussed in terms of the famous metaphor of the inverted world tree, the saṃsāravṛkṣa.

10. "So why go on tormenting . . . in this fashion" tat kim evaṃ parikliśya: Literally, "Then why, having tormented in this fashion?" Cs understands the interrogative adverb kim here to mean "for what purpose?" He notes that for [Rāvaṇa] to destroy a world that is already destroyed would be like the grinding [of grain] that has already been ground. (kiṃ kiṃ prayojanam. piṣṭapeṣaṇarūpatvād iti bhāvaḥ.) T1,G3,M1, and KK and VSP read instead alam enaṃ parikliśya, "enough of tormenting this [world]."

"has already been destroyed by delusion" mohanirākṛtam: Literally, "destroyed by delusion." Ck, Cg, and Ct understand that the world has been destroyed, that is to say, brought low, by this sort of delusion, that is to say, ignorance (evaṃprakāreṇa mohenājñānena nirākṛtaṃ pracyāvitārtham—so Ct). Cs understands mohena, "delusion," here to refer specifically to that which takes the form of attachment to one's kinfolk (mohena svajanasaṅgarūpeṇa) and takes the term nirākṛtam, "destroyed," to mean "distressed (kleśitam)."

"already completely subjugated" jita eva: Literally, "conquered indeed." Cr understands the phrase to mean that in conquering the outstanding [men], Rāvaṇa has essentially defeated all the lesser ones (uttamānāṃ jaye tadadhamā jitaprāyā evety arthaḥ). Cs glosses simply, "mostly defeated (jitaprāyaḥ)."

Following verse 10, Ñ2,B,D10,11,T4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert, while Ś,V1,3 (after 8ab),D1–5,7–9 continue after 388*, and Ñ1 after 392*, a passage of three lines [389*]: "All of them must inevitably go to the realm of Yama.[1] So you, Paulastya, conqueror of enemy citadels, should subdue Yama.[1–2] For once he is defeated, all will have been defeated in keeping with righteousness.[2][3]"

[1] "All of them must inevitably go to the realm of Yama." avaśyam eva gantavyaṃ sarvaiś ca yamasādanam: Literally, "And by all it must inevitably indeed be gone to the abode of Yama." V1,D5,10,11,T3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead avaśyam ebhiḥ sarvaiś ca gantavyaṃ yamasādanam, "And by all these it must inevitably be gone to the abode of Yama."

[2] "For once he is defeated, all will have been defeated in keeping with righteousness." tasmin hi vijite sarvaṃ jitaṃ bhavati dharmataḥ: D7,10,11,T3,4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tasmiñ jite jitaṃ sarvaṃ bhavaty eva (bhavatīti—T3,4) na saṃśayaḥ, "Once he is defeated all will be defeated. Of this there is no doubt."

11. "blazing, as it were, with splendor" dīpyamāna ivaujasā: D5–7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead dīpyamānaṃ svatejasā, "blazing with his own blazing energy." In this reading, the description applies to Nārada instead of Rāvaṇa.

"respectfully saluted . . . and, smiling" saṃprahasyābhivādya ca: Literally, "having smiled or laughed and having respectfully saluted."

"regarding that" tatra: Literally, "there or in reference to that."

12. "you who take your pleasure among the gods and gandharvas" devagandharvavihāra: Ck and Ct gloss, "given over to diversion in their worlds (tallokakrīḍāpara)." Cg understands, "given over to pleasure with the gods and gandharvas, who are devoted to singing (devagandharvair gānaparair vihārapara)."

"so fond of battle" samarapriya: Ck, Cg, and Ct wish to reassure us that the sage does not himself engage in combat. They gloss, "fond of watching battle (samaradarśanapriya)." The compound is reminiscent of Nārada's common epithet kalahapriya, "fond of quarrels."

"I am indeed preparing" ahaṃ khalūdyataḥ: Literally, "I indeed [am] prepared or eager." D6,7,11,T4,M8, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead ahaṃ samudyataḥ, "I [am] prepared."

"in search of victory" vijayārthī: D6,7,10,11,T2,G2,M1,3,5, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead vijayārtham, "for the sake of victory."

13. "the receptacle of every essence" rasālayam: Literally, "the abode of rasa or rasas." We follow the interpretation of Cr, who takes the term rasa in the compound to be plural and glosses, "the repository of rasas (rasānām āśrayam)," evidently taking the term in its sense of essential substance or fluid. Ck, Cg, and Ct, on the other hand, understand the term rasa here to refer specifically to the nectar of immortality (amṛta) (rasasyāmṛtarūparasasyālayam—so Ct). Rāvaṇa is evidently intending to replicate the famous creation myth of the churning of the primordial ocean for the nectar of immortality. See 1.44.14–27 and notes. The compound could, of course, simply be a kenning for the ocean in the sense of "the abode of the waters."

"for the nectar of immortality" amṛtārthaṃ vai: Literally, "indeed for the sake of amṛta." Ś,Ñ1,V1,3,B3,D3,5–8,10–12,T3,M4,6,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read ca, "and," for vai, "indeed."

14. "So where then are you going now by this path?" kva khalv idānīṃ mārgeṇa tvayānena gamiṣyate: Literally, "Where, indeed, now will you go by this path?" The precise sense of Nārada's question is unclear. Our understanding is that Nārada is pointing out to Rāvaṇa that if, as he indicated in verse 12 above, he is planning to go to Rasātala, he is headed in the wrong direction. For, as he points out in verse 15 below, the road Rāvaṇa is taking goes instead to the world of Yama. Ñ1,V1,D1–4, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read tvayehānyena gamyate for the critical edition's tvayānena gamiṣyate, "will you go by this," lending the line the sense "Where indeed now are you going here by another path?" M1 and KK and VSP read tvayā hy anyena gamyate, lending the line the sense "For where indeed now are you going by another path?" The southern commentators understand these variants in a manner similar to the way in which we read the critical text. Thus Ck, Cg, and Ct gloss, "by a path different from the path to Rasātala (rasātalamārgavyatiriktamārgeṇa)." Translators understand the line variously. Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 425) renders, "that way which leads to Rasātalā [sic]." Dutt (1894, p. 1617) appears to incorrectly construe anyena with tvayā, rendering, "Who save thee can forsooth go on that journey?" Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 477), followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 429), renders, "Pourquoi donc t'engages-tu ici présentement, dans une autre voie?" Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1972) offers, "Where are you proceeding to along a different path?" Ñ2,B, and Gorresio (7.24.20) read vimārgeṇa . . . anena, "by this wrong path or way." Gorresio (1870, p. 83) renders this as "per un'altra malagevole via." Benoît (1999, p. 1271), although translating GPP, appears to agree somewhat with Gorresio. He renders, "par ce mauvais chemin." Perhaps he is reading anyena, "other," in its sense of "unusual or strange."

15. "difficult" durgamyaḥ: Literally, "difficult to traverse." Cr understands the adjective to mean that the path is impossible for anyone other [than Rāvaṇa] to traverse (anyair gantum aśakyaḥ).

"impassable" durdharṣaḥ: Ñ2,B4,D6,7,10,11,M4–7, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead the vocative durdharṣa, "O unassailable one," which would then refer to Rāvaṇa.

"leads to" prati . . . gacchati: Literally, "it goes toward." Cr understands the phrase to be Nārada's suggestion that Rāvaṇa should proceed to Yama's realm (etena yamapuram eva gaccheti sūcitam). No doubt Cr is looking forward to the next verses, in which Rāvaṇa indicates that he will indeed proceed to Yama's realm.

"the city of . . . the king of the ancestors" pitṛrājñaḥ puram: Note the irregular ending on the compound. Ś,Ñ1,V1,D,T,G3,M3,8, and Lahore, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead pretarājapuram, "the city of the king of the departed."

16. "Bursting out with a laugh like an autumnal cloud" śāradameghābhaṃ muktvā hāsam: Literally, "Having released a laugh resembling an autumnal cloud." The basis of the simile is not entirely clear and allows for at least three interpretations. Those commentators that remark upon it (Ck, Cg, Ct, Cr) understand the adjective to refer not to Rāvaṇa's laughter but to the sage Nārada himself. In this case, one would have to understand that the quality of the clouds addressed here is their radiant whiteness. Given the syntax of the verse and the absence of any name or noun referring to the sage, we find this interpretation improbable. Nonetheless, it has been followed by Dutt (1894, p. 1617) and Benoît (1999, p. 1271). An alternative interpretation, followed by a number of translators (Gorresio 1870, p. 83; Roussel 1903, p. 477; Shastri 1959, vol. 3, p. 429; Gita Press 1969, vol. 3, p. 1972; and Raghunathan 1982, vol. 3, p. 425), is to understand the simile to be likening the sound of Rāvaṇa's laughter to the thunder of an autumnal cloud. This seems somewhat more plausible, and certainly the tradition supports an association of autumnal clouds with thunder (for example, the subhāṣita: śaradi na varṣati garjati varṣati varṣāsu niḥsvano meghaḥ / nīco vadati na kurute na vadati sujanaḥ karoty eva //, "In the autumn, it thunders but does not rain; in the monsoon, a silent cloud rains. A low person talks but does not act; a good person acts but does not talk"). (See Bhate 2000, p. 8.) However, since there is no explicit term in either the upameya or the upamāna referring to sound, and since autumnal clouds are chiefly noted for their brilliance, we are less than fully persuaded. A perhaps more credible alternative not mentioned by any of the commentators or translators consulted is to see the simile as referring to the well-established poetic convention that laughter is white. See 6.45.26 and notes and Ingalls 1965, p. 166 (verse 389) and p. 226 (verse 684). Thus, likening Rāvaṇa's laughter to the conventional brilliance of the autumnal clouds is indicative of its intensity.

"ten-faced Rāvaṇa" daśānanaḥ: Literally, "the ten-faced [one]."

"Consider it done!" kṛtam iti: Literally, "Done!" Ck, Cg, and Ct understand that Rāvaṇa is saying that he has practically already followed the path to Yama's city and conquered him (yamapuramārgeṇa gamanaṃ tajjayaś ca mama siddha eveti). Cr understands that Rāvaṇa has now accepted Nārada's instructions, which Cr believes that Nārada gave Rāvaṇa in verse 15 above (bhavaduktam aṅgīkṛtam). See notes to verse 15 above.

17. "Therefore, great brahman . . . I" tasmād eṣa mahābrahman: Literally, "therefore . . . this one, O great brahman." Ck, Cg, and Ct understand the term tasmāt to imply two prior relative clauses, the senses of which are "since you have pointed out the path and since I have vowed to conquer the four guardians of the quarters (yasmān mārga upadiṣṭo yataś ca mayā caturdikpālajayaḥ pratijñātas tasmād ity arthaḥ—so Cg)." In the critical reading we must take the third person pronoun eṣaḥ in its not uncommon usage as an emphatic indicator of the first person. Ñ1,D1,3–7,10,11,T3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead evam, "thus." D10,11, and GPP and NSP read instead the optional variant mahābrahma (so Ck and Ct, citing Pā 5.4.105), while D1,3–7, and Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead ahaṃ brahman, "I, O brahman."

19. "Therefore I" tenaiṣaḥ . . . aham: Literally, "By that, this one, [i.e.,] I." D7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tad iha, "thus now," for tenaiṣaḥ, "By that, this one."

"the city of the king of the ancestors" pitṛrājapuram: The first two members of the compound (pitṛrāja-) are marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. KK (7.20.25) and VSP (7.20.25) read instead pretarāja-, "the king of the departed." Ñ,B1,2,4, and Gorresio (7.24.24) read instead dharmarāja-, "the king of righteousness." Oddly, however, Gorresio (1870, p. 83) translates, "re dei morti." V1,3,D1,3,5,T3,4,M3, and Lahore (7.23.25) read vaivasvata-, "[the city] of Vaivasvata."

"and I shall put that tormentor of living beings to death" prāṇisaṃkleśakartāraṃ yojayiṣyāmi mṛtyunā: Literally, "I shall cause the author of the suffering of living beings to be conjoined with death." Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 429) erroneously renders, "I shall compass the end of Mrityu, he who plunges all beings into mourning."

20. "accompanied by his excited counselors" prahṛṣṭaiḥ saha mantribhiḥ: Ś,Ñ1,V1,3,B3,4,D1–3,5,8,9,12,T3,4,M9, and Lahore, Gorresio, VSP, and KK read the nominative singular prahṛṣṭaḥ for prahṛṣṭaiḥ, yielding the sense "excited, he [set out], accompanied by his counselors." Ñ2,B,2,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read praviṣṭaḥ, "he entered," for prahṛṣṭaiḥ, "by [the] excited [counselors]." Ct and Cr understand that Rāvaṇa has entered the southern region (tato dakṣiṇām āśāṃ praviṣṭaḥ).

22. " 'It is Kāla who afflicts the three worlds with their fixed and moving contents, including Indra, when their lives and merit are at an end. How can he himself be slain?' " yena lokās trayaḥ sendrāḥ kliśyante sacarācarāḥ / kṣīṇe cāyuṣi dharme ca sa kālo hiṃsyate katham // : Literally, "How is Kāla, by whom the three worlds, together with Indra and together with what moves and does not move, are afflicted when their life span and righteousness are exhausted, killed?"

"and merit" dharme ca: The reading of the critical edition is somewhat awkward, although it appears to have solid textual support. Ñ1,V1,D2,6,10–12,T3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead dharmeṇa, "righteously," which then construes with kliśyante to yield the sense "is afflicted rightfully or righteously."

"can he himself be slain" hiṃsyate: Literally, "he is slain." D10,11,T3,4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead jeṣyate, "[he] will be conquered or vanquished."

Following verse 22, D6,7,10,11,S insert, while Ñ2,B, and Gorresio insert following 22ab, a passage of two lines [397*]: "And who is the witness of all that is given and done,[1] like a second fire, purifier of all things, and on account of which great being the worlds act, having gained consciousness[2] (yaś ca datte kṛte sākṣī dvitīya iva pāvakaḥ / labdhasaṃjñā viceṣṭante yasya lokā mahātmanaḥ //)."

The meaning of the verse is obscure.

[1] "And who is the witness of all that is given and done" yaś ca datte kṛte sākṣī: Literally, "he who is the witness with respect to what is given and what is done." D7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead svadattakṛtasākṣī yaḥ, "who is the witness to his own gifts and acts." Ct and Cr understand datta- to refer to donations. Ct adds that the term is actually a metonym for ordained sacrifices, etc. (dattaṃ dānam. idaṃ vihitayāgāder apy upalakṣaṇam—so Ct). Ck, Ct, and Cr understand kṛta- to refer to austerities that mortify the body (kṛtaśabdena kāyakleśarūpaṃ tapaḥ—so Ct). Cg takes the compound svadattakṛta- to refer only to asceticism (svadattasvakṛtaśabdena kāyakleśarūpaṃ tapaḥ). Benoît (1999, p. 1721) observes in a note that Yama's being a witness of gifts and acts may be explained by the fact that all ritual acts are accompanied by offerings to the departed ancestors.

[2] "and on account of which great being the worlds act, having gained consciousness" labdhasaṃjñā viceṣṭante yasya lokā mahātmanaḥ: The phrase is obscure. Ck, Cg, Ct, and Cr understand it to mean that it is through the power or grace of the great being Yama that creatures come to consciousness and act. They variously thus supply either the term prabhāvāt, "through the power (so Cr)," or anugrahāt, "through the grace (so Ck, Cg, Ct)." Cv glosses labdhasaṃjñāḥ as dattaprāṇāḥ, "given life." KK and VSP read vijyeṣyante, "[they] will be conquered or vanquished," for viceṣṭante, "they act." D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read lokā yasya by transposition.

23. "can . . . approach" abhigacchati: Literally, "he approaches." D6,7,10,11,M10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the future gamiṣyati, "he will go to."

24. "who is the creator and who apportions the fruits of good and evil deeds" yo vidhātā ca dhātā ca sukṛte duṣkṛte tathā: Literally, "who is the creator and who is the author or arranger with respect to good deeds and bad deeds." The exact meaning of the phrase is obscure. D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read a slight variant, yo vidhātā ca dhātā ca sukṛtaṃ duṣkṛtaṃ ca. Ck and Ct understand the phrase to refer to three activities of Yama: 1) general creation, 2) particular creation of the world, and 3) the apportionment of the fruits of good and evil actions. (yo lokasya dhātā vidhātā sāmānyato viśeṣataś ca kartā. yaḥ sukṛtaṃ duṣkṛtaṃ. tatphalada ity arthaḥ—so Ct.) Cg understands the phrase yo vidhātā ca dhātā ca as do Ck and Ct, but he is silent on the issue of the apportionment of the fruits of actions. Cv takes a different tack. He glosses dhātā as kṣeptā, literally, "thrower or distributor," which we take to refer to the assignment or determination of the rewards, while he understands vidhātā to refer to the actual apportionment of those rewards (dhātā kṣeptā vidhātā phalapradātā). If one takes dhātā in the sense of kṣeptā, the collocation of the latter term with vidhātā could also mean "the destroyer [and] creator." Translators, not surprisingly, tend to struggle with the line, differing as to whether two or three functions are assigned to Yama. Dutt (1894, p. 1618), following Ct, renders, "who ordaineth things both great and small, who meteth rewards and punishments for good and bad acts." Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1973) understands, "who is the sustainer (of the universe) and the dispenser of the fruit of their good and evil deeds." Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 425) translates, "who is the creator of all beings and the dispenser of their destinies and who allots them the fruit of their good and evil deeds." Roussel (1903, p. 478) and Benoît (1999, p. 1272) appear to follow Ct's tripartite rendering, but they avoid the issue of the meanings of the terms dhātā and vidhātā by leaving them untranslated. Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 429) follows Roussel, translating, "He who is Vidhatar and Dhatar, the distributor of rewards and punishments in accordance with men's deeds." Gorresio (1870, p. 83), the only translator whose text reads with the critical edition, renders, "colui che determina e discerne ciò che è bene e ciò che è male." Compare 7.21.10 and notes.

25. "And what other means will he devise to accomplish this?" aparaṃ kiṃ nu kṛtvaivaṃ vidhānaṃ saṃvidhāsyati: Literally, "Indeed, having used what other means in this way, will he manage [this]?" V1,B2,3,D2,5,7,9–11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read kiṃtu for kiṃ nu, "what indeed," lending the line the sense "However, he will devise another means to accomplish this." KK and VSP read kṛtvāyam, "he, having done," for kṛtvaivam, "having done in this way." The reading is not noted in the critical apparatus. The commentators and translators who follow them understand this obscure and elliptical sentence in two different ways. We, like Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 425), follow the interpretation of Ck, Cg, Ct, and Cv, who understand that since Yama as Time (Kāla) is himself the means of accomplishing everything, what other means apart from him can Rāvaṇa employ to defeat him? (aparaṃ kiṃtv iti kāla eva sarvasādhanam. ayaṃ tu kālātiriktam aparaṃ kiṃ nu vidhānaṃ kālavyatiriktasādhanasaṃpādanaṃ kṛtvā kālajayaṃ saṃvidhāsyati—so Ct.) Raghunathan renders, "With what instrument other than time itself is he going to effect the conquest of Time?" Cr understands the passage quite differently. He believes that Nārada, rather than wondering how Rāvaṇa will manage to defeat Yama, is curious as to how, once he has done so, he will establish a new order of the world in the absence of Kāla (Time) (evaṃ vidhānaṃ yamena saha yuddhaṃ kṛtvāparaṃ kiṃ saṃvidhāsyati). Gorresio's edition (7.24.31) reads a slight variation: [yamakṣayaṃ tu saṃprāpte daśagrīve niśācare /] aparaṃ kiṃtu tatrāyaṃ vidhānaṃ saṃvidhāsyati, "[Once the night-roaming (rākṣasa) Daśagrīva reaches Yama's abode] what alternative means will he employ there?" Gorresio's translation (1870, p. 84) indicates that he understands the line as does Cr, rendering, "qual altra legge stabilirà egli mai colà."

"Having become quite curious" kautūhalasamutpannaḥ: We follow Cv and Cs in reading the compound as a paranipāta (kautūhalasamutpannaḥ samutpannakautūhalaḥ—so Cv), lending it the sense "one in whom curiosity has arisen." Ñ,V3,B,D10,11,M5,10, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read kautūhalaṃ samutpannaḥ, which is, no doubt, intended to have the same meaning.

Following verse 25, Ñ1,V1,D1,3,5,10,11,T3,4,M3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of one line [400*]: "in order to see for myself the battle between Yama and the rākṣasa (vimardaṃ draṣṭum anayor yamarākṣasayoḥ svayam /)."

Sarga 21

1. "Nārada, the foremost of brahmans" viprendraḥ: Literally, "the foremost among brahmans."

"swiftly" laghuvikramaḥ: Literally, "he of swift strides." Cs observes that the term means that Nārada traveled faster even than Rāvaṇa (rāvaṇato 'pi tīvragamanaḥ).

2. "who . . . was dealing out appropriate fates to living beings" vidhānam upatiṣṭhantaṃ prāṇino yasya yādṛśam: Literally, "passing on or attending upon which[ever] fate to which[ever] living being." Ś,Ñ,V1,3,B,D1–3,5–12,T3,4, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read anutiṣṭhantam, "assigning," for upatiṣṭhantam, "passing on." We follow Ck and Cg, who gloss upatiṣṭhantam as anutiṣṭhantam. Ct understands that Yama is either distributing the appropriate rewards or punishments for good or evil conduct or is handing out either punishment or favor. (puṇyapāparūpaṃ karma tādṛśam anutiṣṭhantaṃ tat tad anuguṇaphalaṃ prayacchantam. yadvā yasya yādṛśaṃ vidhānaṃ nigrahānugraharūpaṃ kṛtyam anutiṣṭhantam ity arthaḥ.) Cr generally agrees with Ct's first alternative, while Ck and Cg understand in accordance with Ct's alternative explanation.

"attended by Agni" agnipuraskṛtam: As Ck, Cg, Ct, and Cr note, the god of fire is present in his characteristic role as witness (agniḥ puraskṛtaḥ sarvasākṣitayā—so Ct).

3. "the guest-offering" arghyam: For a listing of the various articles of food and drink traditionally offered to a respected or venerable visitor, see 16*, note 1, following notes to 7.1.10.

4. "I trust that all is well" kaccit kṣemaṃ nu: Literally, "I trust that all is well indeed." Ct adds, "in the world (loka iti śeṣaḥ)." Ś1,V3,B4,D2,3,6,8,9,12,M2,5,9,10, and KK and VSP read tu, "and," for nu, "indeed."

5. "Then you must take the necessary steps." vidhānaṃ ca vidhīyatām: Literally, "Let an expedient be arranged." Ck, Cg, and Ct gloss, "and the remedy for the calamity which [will be] heard from me (mattaḥ śrutāyā āpadaḥ pratikriyāṃ ca—so Ct; Ck, Cg similarly)."

6. "the night-roaming rākṣasa" niśācaraḥ: Literally, "the night-roaming [one]."

7. "It is for that reason that I" etena kāraṇenāham: The reading is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. The majority of manuscripts (Ś,Ñ,V1,3,B,D1–3, 5,8,9,12,T3,M6) and Lahore and Gorresio read instead etad vai kāraṇaṃ yena, "this is the reason by which." Some of these manuscripts substitute alternate particles after etat.

"What can he do this day to you whose weapon is the rod?" daṇḍapraharaṇasyādya tava kiṃ nu kariṣyati: Ck, Cg, and Ct note that the weapon in question is the rod of Kāla (kāladaṇḍaḥ). Ś2,D10,11,T3,4,G2,M1,2,4,8,9, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read bhaviṣyati for kariṣyati, yielding the sense "What will befall you . . . ?" The commentators note that Nārada is wondering whether Yama will experience victory or defeat (jayaḥ parājayo vety arthaḥ—so Ck, Ct, and Cr; Cg similarly).

8. "Nārada spied" dadṛśe: Literally, "he saw." M3 and KK and VSP read instead the parasmaipada dadarśa, "he saw," while D6,7,10,11,G1,2,M1,2,4,5,7–10, and GPP, NSP, and

The commentators note that Nārada is wondering whether Yama will experience victory or defeat (jayaḥ parājayo vety arthaḥ—so Ck, Ct, and Cr; Cg similarly).

8. "Nārada spied" dadṛśe: Literally, "he saw." M3 and KK and VSP read instead the parasmaipada dadarśa, "he saw," while D6,7,10,11,G1,2,M1,2,4,5,7–10, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead the plural dadṛśuḥ, "they saw." Presumably the plural would refer to Nārada, Yama, and Agni and/or Yama's attendants.

"divine" divyam: D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead dīptam, "blazing."

9. "The immensely powerful rākṣasa drew near" mahābalaḥ /. . . samīpaṃ samavartata: Literally, "the immensely powerful [one] approached the vicinity." D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read the synonymous abhyavartata for samavarta, "he approached."

"of the Puṣpaka" puṣpakasya: For Rāvaṇa's acquisition of the Puṣpaka and a description of it, see 7.15.29–31 and notes. For its construction, see 293* and note 5, following 7.15.20.

10. "the great-armed . . . saw" sa tv apaśyan mahābāhuḥ: Literally, "And he, the great-armed [one], saw." D6,10,11,T1,G1,2,M3–5,7, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read the redundant so 'paśyat saḥ, "he saw, he," for sa tv apaśyat, "and he saw," while D7,T2,4, G3,M1,8,10, and KK and VSP read so 'paśyat su[mahābāhuḥ], "he, the extremely [great-armed one] saw."

"experiencing the consequences of their good and evil deeds" sukṛtaṃ karma bhuñjānāṃś caiva duṣkṛtam: Literally, "enjoying well done and badly done action." In this construction karma, "action," appears to take on its sense of "consequence of action." D6,7,10,11,M10, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read caiva, "and indeed," for karma, yielding the sense "experiencing their good and evil deeds," which again we must understand to refer to the consequences of these actions, as at verse 7.20.24 above.

Following verse 10, V1,3,D1–5,7–9,10–12 (following verse 8),T3 (continues after line 8 of 404*),T4 (continues after line 3 of 404*), and Lahore, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of one line [402*]: "And he saw Yama's warriors and attendants[1] (apaśyat sainikāṃś cāsya yamasyānucaraiḥ saha /)."

[1] "And he saw Yama's warriors and attendants." apaśyat sainikāṃś cāsya yamasyānucaraiḥ saha/: Literally, "And he saw his [Yama's] warriors, together with Yama's attendants."

Following 402*, D7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP continue, while following verse 10, Ñ1 (after 10cd),2,B,D6,T1,2,G,M insert, a passage of twenty lines [404*]: "He saw embodied beings being beaten[1] and tormented by Yama's cruel[2] and terrifying servants, whose appearance was frightful.[1–2] They were wailing loudly and given over to sharp groans[3] as they were being devoured by worms and fierce dogs.[3–4] Terrifying, they uttered cries[4] that grated on the ear; many were being carried across the Vaitaraṇī River,[5] which had blood in place of water.[5–6] Some were being burned over and over again on its scorching sand banks,[6] while many[7] were being slashed in the forest that had swords in place of leaves.[7–8] Some were in the Raurava Hell,[8] in rivers of salt and on a razor's edge.[9] Parched and famished, they begged for water.[9–10] Some—corpselike, emaciated, wretched, pallid, their hair flying loose, covered with filth and mud, exhausted,[10] and naked[11]—were running about.[11–12] And thus Rāvaṇa saw hundreds and thousands of mortals.[12][13] And Rāvaṇa also saw some who, by virtue of their own good deeds, were enjoying themselves with the sounds of singing and musical instruments in splendid mansions.[13][14–15] Here and there those who had donated cows were enjoying milk; those who had donated food were enjoying food,[14] while those who had donated houses were enjoying[15] houses there.[16–17] The donors of gold, jewels, and pearls were beautifully ornamented,[16] while other righteous people were blazing with their own inherent splendor.[18–19] Great-armed Rāvaṇa saw them all.[17][20]"

[1] "being beaten" vadhyamānān: The verb √vadh normally means "to kill"; however, given that the inmates of Yama's realm are already dead, we have taken the root in its other sense of "to beat or to strike."

[2] "cruel" raudraiḥ: D10,11, and GPP and Gita Press read instead ugraiḥ, "fierce."

[3] "sharp groans" tīvraniṣṭana-: Ct glosses, "the sound of the afflicted (duḥkhitaśabda-)." Cg glosses, "cruel sound (krūraśabda-)." Ck oddly glosses the incomprehensible "sound of Kubera (kuberaśabda-)," which is noted but questioned by the editors of the critical edition. The term niṣṭana is used elsewhere in the epic to indicate the groans and/or moans of the dying. See 1744* and notes, following notes to 6.79.4. There the reference is mistakenly attributed to line 2 instead of line 3. See, too, 7.32.61 and note.

[4] "Terrifying, they uttered cries" vāco vadataś ca bhayāvahān: Literally, "[he saw those] terrifying [ones], [who were] speaking words." D3,7,10,11,G2,T4,M2,3,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read the feminine accusative plural bhayāvahāḥ, which makes the adjective modify vācaḥ, "speech," lending the phrase the sense "[they] uttering terrifying speech."

[5] "the Vaitaraṇī River" vaitaraṇī: Much like the Styx, this is the river of hell. See 3.51.18 and note. See, too, AmaK 1.11.2 (pretā vaitaraṇī sindhuḥ syād alakṣmīs tu nirṛtiḥ).

[6] "on its scorching sand banks" vālukāyāṃ ca taptāyām: Literally, "on the scorching sand bank." D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read the plural vālukāsu ca taptāsu, "on scorching sand banks."

[7] "many" anekaśaḥ: Ñ,V1,B,D3,6,7,10,13,M6, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead adhārmikān, "the unrighteous [ones]."

[8] "in the Raurava Hell" raurave: Literally, "in Raurava." This is a name of one of the hells. See ManuSm 4.88.

[9] "and on a razor's edge" kṣuradhāre tathaiva ca: D6,7,10,11,T4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the expected feminine plural kṣuradhārāsu caiva hi, "and, indeed, on the very edges of razors."

[10] "exhausted" śrāntān: D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read the redundant dīnān, "wretched."

[11] "naked" nagnān: D6,7,10,11,T3,4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead rūkṣān, "dirty or soiled."

[12] "mortals" mārtyān: D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead mārge, "on the way or path."

[13] And . . . some . . . in splendid mansions" kāṃścid gṛheṣu mukhyeṣu: Literally, "some in splendid houses." D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead kāṃścic ca gṛhamukhyeṣu, "and some in splendid houses."

[14] "food . . . food" bhojanaṃ cānnā-: Ñ2,V3,B,D7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the more or less synonymous annaṃ caivānna-. KK and VSP read instead hy annaṃ caivānna-.

[15] "Here and there . . . were enjoying . . . were enjoying . . . were enjoying" tatra tatra samaśnute: Literally, "here and there they enjoy." D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead svakarmaphalam aśnutaḥ, "enjoying the fruit of their own actions."

[16] "The donors of gold, jewels, and pearls were beautifully ornamented" suvarṇamaṇimuktānāṃ pradātṝṃś cāpy alaṃkṛtān: D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead suvarṇamaṇimuktābhiḥ pramadābhir alaṃkṛtān, "ornamented with gold, jewels, pearls, and beautiful women."

[17] "Great-armed . . . saw them all" dadarśa sa mahābāhuḥ: Literally, "he, the great-armed [one] saw." G1 and KK and VSP read sumahābāhuḥ, "the extremely great-armed [one]," for sa mahābāhuḥ, "he, the great-armed [one]."

11. "Then . . . those who were being tormented" tatas tān vadhymānāṃs tu: Literally, "but then those who were being beaten." D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tatas tān bhidyamānāṃś ca, "and then those who were being torn asunder."

"freed" mocayāmāsa: The reading is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. The only variant is the synonymous mokṣayāmāsa.

"their own evil deeds" karmabhir duṣkṛtaiḥ svakaiḥ: Literally, "by their own actions, which were evil actions."

Following verse 11, Ñ,V1,B,D2,6,7,10,11,S insert a passage of two lines [405*]: "Those living beings who were liberated by the rākṣasa Daśagrīva experienced unanticipated and undreamt of[1] happiness for a brief moment (prāṇino mokṣitās tena daśagrīveṇa rakṣasā / sukham āpur muhūrtaṃ te hy atarkitam acintitam //)."

[1] "unanticipated and undreamt of" atarkitam acintitam: Literally, "unguessed [and] unthought." Ct understands that the second of these roughly synonymous terms is a further exposition of the first (acintitam ity atarkitam ity asyaiva vivaraṇam). Cv glosses atarkitam as ākasmikam, "unforeseen or unexpected." Cs understands acintitam to be an adjective modifying sukham, "happiness," while he reads atarkitam adverbially as referring to the fact that the departed souls could not reckon on such a turn of events. (acintitam iti sukhaviśeṣaṇam. atarkitaṃ svatarkanāviṣayatvaṃ vinā yathā bhavati tathā.)

12. "immensely powerful" balīyasā: Literally, "mightier." D7,10,11,T1,4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead mahīyasā, literally, "greater."

"enraged" susaṃrabdhāḥ: Ñ1,D6,7,10,11,T4,G1,2,M1,3–5,7,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the synonymous susaṃkruddhāḥ.

Ś,V3,D1,2,4,5,8,9,12 and Lahore substitute for verse 12, while Ñ1,2,V1,B,D3,7,10,11, T3,4,M3, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert following verse 12, a passage of two lines [406*]: "Then as the heroic warriors of Yama, the king of righteousness, charged, there arose from all directions a tumultuous din (tato halahalāśabdaḥ sarvadigbhyaḥ samutthitam / dharmarājasya yodhānāṃ śūrāṇāṃ saṃpradhāvatām //)."

13. "sent a hail" samavarṣanta: Literally, "they showered." D7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead samadharṣanta, "they assailed."

"war hammers" mudgaraiḥ: Ñ1,B1,3,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead musalaiḥ, "with cudgels."

14. "Swarming like bees, they . . . battered" babhañjus te . . . madhukarā iva: Literally, "they shattered like honey-makers." We agree, with some reservation, with Cr, who takes the pronoun to refer to Yama's agents mentioned in the previous verse (te yamadūtāḥ). One could, however, also understand the reference to be to the weapons listed in verse 13. Since bees are not known for their destructiveness, we understand the simile to derive from the resemblance of the swarms of warriors (or weapons) to those of bees.

"terraces" prāsādān: We take the term in its secondary sense of "terrace" here rather than in its more common usage as "palace." But compare 5.7.1,9,18, and notes, where the Puṣpaka is said to contain palaces within its confines.

15. "since [the Puṣpaka] . . . was an abode of divinity" devaniṣṭhānabhūtam: Ck, Ct, and Cr gloss the unusual term niṣṭhāna here with adhiṣṭhāna, "abode or position of governance." It is unclear as to what precise divinity or divinities the Puṣpaka is supposed to house. Perhaps this is a reference to the idea, never made explicit in the text of the Rāmāyaṇa but addressed in commentaries, that the Puṣpaka is inhabited and directed by an indwelling presiding divinity or adhiṣṭhātṛdevatā. See notes to 6.110.23. Another possibility is that the term refers to Viśvakarman, the creator of the palace. See 7.1.18 and notes. Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 427) understands the reference to be to the fact that the palace was built for Kubera Vaiśravaṇa, the god of wealth. He translates, "But the Pushpaka, being an abode designed for the God Vaiśravana . . ." On the other hand, Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 480) attributes the indestructibility of the structure to the divine energy of Brahmā, translating, "le char Pushpaka . . . demeurait indestructible, en vertu du Tejas de Brahmā." In this he is followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 431), who renders, "but the celestial aerial car . . . was indestructible and resumed its former shape through Brahma's power." Benoît (1999, p. 1274) understands similarly, offering, "Toute fois Puṣpaka . . . restait indestructible, car l'éclat divin de Brahmā." Ct merely notes that the Puṣpaka is an abode of a god or gods (devādhiṣṭhānabhūtam), while Cr generalizes, explaining that it is an abode of the gods, etc. (devādīnām adhiṣṭhānatvam). See Uttarakāṇḍa sarga 15, especially 7.15.29; and 6.7.3–5; 6.98.12–13; and notes, where Rāvaṇa takes the Puṣpaka from Kubera Vaiśravaṇa after defeating him in battle.

"remained indestructible . . . even as it was being battered" bhajyamānaṃ tathaivāsīd akṣayaṃ: Literally, "being shattered, still it was indestructible." The idea seems to be that although the palace suffered damage from the weapons hurled upon it, it repaired itself. Cr seems to read the situation in the reverse. He notes that although the Puṣpaka was indestructible because it was infused with divine energy, it still suffered damage (tejasopalakṣitam akṣayam api puṣpakaṃ bhajyamānam āsīt).

While a number of manuscripts insert 407* following verse 13, D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a variant of this verse following verse 15. The variant reads, "Great Yama's[1] vast army of heroes who marched in the vanguard[2] by the hundreds and thousands could not be numbered (asaṃkhyā sumahaty āsīt tasya senā mahātmanaḥ / śūrāṇām agrayātṝṇāṃ sahasrāṇi śatāni ca //)." One might also render these two lines as "The vast army of the great [Yama] could not be numbered. Of the heroes who marched in the van, there were hundreds of thousands." Cf. Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1975) and Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 427).

[1] "Great Yama's" mahātmanaḥ: Literally, "of the great one."

[2] "who marched in the vanguard" agrayātṝṇām: KK (7.21.29) and VSP (7.21.29) read instead ugrayātṝṇām, "marching fiercely." This variant is not noted in the critical apparatus.

Following 407*, D6,7,10,11,M3,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert, while Ś,Ñ,V1,3,B,D1–5 (reads following 407*, line 1),8,9,12,T3,4, and Lahore and Gorresio substitute for 14ab, a passage of one line [408*]: "then [they battered] trees, boulders, terraces and seats[1] (tato vṛkṣāṃś ca śailāṃś ca prāsādān āsanāni ca)."

[1] "then [they battered] trees, boulders, terraces and seats" tato vṛkṣāṃś ca śailāṃś ca prāsādān āsanāni ca: D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tato vṛkṣaiś ca śailaiś ca prāsādānāṃ śatais tathā, "then with trees, boulders, and hundreds of terraces as well." The two readings differ in that in the former the articles mentioned are the objects of attempted destruction, while in the variant they appear to be the weapons of destruction. The variant line must then construe with ayudhyanta, "they fought," in 16c. The reading prāsādānām, "of terraces," is awkward, and translators struggle. Some translate what appears to be the facilior variant, found in D6,7,M10, prāsānām, "of darts," (Roussel 1903, vol. 3, p. 480; Shastri 1959, vol. 3, p. 431; Raghunathan 1982, vol. 3, p. 427; and Benoît 1999, p. 1274), while Dutt (1894, p. 1620) and Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1975) struggle with prāsādānām, rendering, respectively, "of blocks of buildings" and "of housetops."

16. "Rāvaṇa's mighty counselors" rāvaṇāmātyāḥ . . . /. . . mahāvīryāḥ: Literally, "Rāvaṇa's counselors of immense might." Ś,Ñ,V1,3,B,D,T3,4,M6, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read sacivās tasya, "his ministers," for rāvaṇāmātyāḥ, "Rāvaṇa's counselors." D6,7,10,11,T1,2,M3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read mahāvīrāḥ, "great heroes," for mahāvīryāḥ, "of immense might."

18. "And" ca: Ś,Ñ,V1,3,B,D,T3,4,M5,6, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead te, "they."

"great host" mahat sainyam: V1,D6,7,10,11,T3,4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the vocative mahābāho. The epithet in its phonological context, i.e., coming before rāvaṇasya, could either be a vocative, "O great-armed one," referring to Rāma, or a genitive singular, "of that great-armed one," which could then construe either with yamasya, "of Yama," or rāvaṇasya, "of Rāvaṇa." As the variant replaces the phrase "great host (mahat sainyam)," translators who follow the variant reading must construe the term mantriṇaḥ, "counselors," with both Yama and Rāvaṇa, lending the phrase the sense "the ministers of Yama and of Rāvaṇa."

"rākṣasa's" rākṣasasya: Ś1,D6–8,10,11,T4,G1, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead rāvaṇasya, "Rāvaṇa's."

"in battle" yudhi: Ś,Ñ,V1,3,B,D,T3,4,M6, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead bhṛśam, "intensely."

19. "turning away from" saṃtyajya: Literally, "having abandoned."

"the rākṣasa's . . . those exceedingly mighty warriors" rākṣasasya mahaujasaḥ: Literally, "the [ones] of great might of the rākṣasa." The term mahaujasaḥ is extremely ambiguous here. In addition to being a nominative plural, which would refer to Yama's troops, it can also be taken as accusative plural, referring to Rāvaṇa's counselors, and even as a genitive singular, construing with rākṣasaya, "of the rākṣasa," i.e., Rāvaṇa himself. We have chosen the first alternative since the other two interpretations leave the sentence without a clearly identified subject. Also, it is clear from the following verse that Yama's warriors have seriously wounded Rāvaṇa. Ś,V1,3,D,T3,4, and Lahore, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead yamayodhā mahābalāḥ, "the mighty warriors of Yama."

20. "grievously wounded" jarjarīkṛtaḥ: The yaṅluganta adjective is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition, with many manuscripts showing a variety of variants. GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read with the critical edition.

"the foremost of the rākṣasas in his flying palace resembled an aśoka tree in bloom" vimāne rākṣasaśreṣṭhaḥ phullāśoka ivābabhau: Ś,Ñ,V1,B,D,T3,4,M10, and Lahore (7.35.25cd), GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP and, with some minor variations, Gorresio (7.25.34cd) read instead phullāśoka ivābhāti puṣpake rākṣaseśvaraḥ, "In the Puṣpaka the lord of the rākṣasas resembled an aśoka tree in bloom." Ñ2,B2–4,D6,7,10,11,T4,M10, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read the more or less synonymous rākṣasādhipaḥ, "overlord of the rākṣasas," for rākṣaseśvaraḥ. Dutt (1894, p. 1621) has a note on what he believes is a "peculiarly appropriate and beautiful simile." His point is that the name Puṣpaka refers to blossoms. For some reason, however, Dutt identifies the tree as a "Kinçuka" instead of the aśoka. No such variant is recorded in the critical apparatus. Both of these red-blossomed trees are used as upamānas for a bleeding warrior in the Yuddhakāṇḍa. See Goldman and Goldman 2009, p. 22 and compare 6.91.29 and notes, where Rāvaṇa, wounded, is similarly compared to an aśoka tree in bloom.

21. "However, as he . . . lances, maces, darts" sa śūlāni gadāḥ prāsān: Literally, "he . . . lances, maces, darts" D6,7,10,11,T4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead sa tu śūlagadāprāsān, "but he . . . lances, maces, darts."

"a master of divine weapon-spells" astrabalāt: Literally, "because of [his] power over weapon-spells." We follow Ct, who glosses, "out of his competence with weapon-spells (astrasāmarthyāt)." See verse 22 below. On the semantically complex term astra, see Goldman and Goldman 2009, p. 112. For the numerous references to divine weapon-spells in the Yuddhakāṇḍa, see the index to that volume.

"iron cudgels" musalāni: D6,7,10,11,M10, and GPP and NSP read instead the redundant mumoca ca, "and he released." Cr takes note of the repetition and sees the first instance of the verb as governing the formal weapons mentioned in the first half of the weapons list and the second as governing the informal weapons, such as boulders and trees. (śūlādīn mumoca. śilāvṛkṣāṃś ca mumoca.)

Following verse 21, D6,7,10,11,S insert a passage of two lines [416*]: "That extremely terrifying[1] and fearsome[2] hail of trees, boulders, and weapons cascaded upon Yama's troops (tarūṇāṃ ca śilānāṃ ca śastrāṇāṃ caiva dāruṇam / yamasainyeṣu tad varṣaṃ papātātibhayaṃkaram//)."

[1] "extremely terrifying" [a]tibhayaṃkaram: D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead dharaṇītale, "on the surface of the earth." The variant is ambiguous, since it is not precisely clear as to who or what is on the ground. Ct understands that Rāvaṇa's weapons, having first fallen upon Yama's troops, then fall to the ground (tadvarṣaṃ rāvaṇavisṛṣṭaśastravarṣaṃ yamasainyeṣu patitvā dharaṇītale papāta). This interpretation is followed by Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 480), Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 432), and Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, pp. 427–28). Cr, on the other hand, reads the compound to refer to the fact that it is Yama's troops that are standing on the ground (as opposed to Rāvaṇa, who is fighting from his aerial palace) (taruprabhṛtīnāṃ tad varṣaṃ dharaṇītale vidyamāneṣu yamasainyeṣu papāta). This interpretation is followed by Dutt (1894, p. 1621) and Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1976). Benoît (1999, p. 1274) appears to omit these lines entirely.

[2] "and fearsome" caiva dāruṇam: Literally, "and, indeed, fearsome." D6,7,10,11,T4,G1,M5, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead cātidāruṇam, "and very fearsome."

22. "having repulsed" samākṣipya: Literally, "having thrust aside." D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead vinirbhidya, "having split asunder."

"his divine weapon-spell" tadastram: See verse 21 and notes above. As Ck, Cg, and Ct point out, this must be the weapon-spell that Rāvaṇa employs to send forth the shower of weapons mentioned in the previous verse (tadastraṃ rāvaṇaprayuktaṃ prāguktaśastravarṣasādhakam—so Ck and Cg).

"who was alone" ekam: Literally, "one." The idea here is that Rāvaṇa alone, that is, apart from his ministers, has become the sole object of attack.

23. "they knocked the wind out of him" tam . . . nirucchvāsam akārayan: Literally, "they caused him to be breathless." Ś1,V1,D1,2,4,6–8,10,11,T3,M5,10, and Lahore, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead apothayan, "they struck or beat," for akārayan.

24. "Drenched" siktaḥ: Literally, "sprinkled." GPP (7.21.38) and NSP (7.21.38) read instead siddhaḥ, a reading not attested in the critical apparatus. GPP explicitly assigns this reading to the text of Ct, noting that Cg and Cr read the variant. The precise meaning of siddhaḥ in this context is somewhat unclear unless we take it in its relatively rare sense of "hit or struck [as a target]." Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 480) and Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 432) read this variant and translate, respectively, "harcelé" and "cut to pieces."

"he left the Puṣpaka" sa puṣpakaṃ parityajya: Literally, "he, having abandoned the Puṣpaka." D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tataḥ sa puṣpakaṃ tyaktvā, "then, having abandoned the Puṣpaka, he."

25. "after a moment . . . cleared his mind" labdhasaṃjño muhūrtena: Literally, "he was one by whom consciousness was obtained after a moment." This phrase normally refers to characters who recover after being knocked unconscious in battle. Cf. 6.40.24; 6.55.60; 6.86.10; and notes. In this case, although Rāvaṇa had the wind knocked out of him in verse 23 above, he does not appear to have actually lost consciousness. Therefore, we have translated accordingly.

"the . . . overlord of the rākṣasas . . . on the ground" pṛthivyāṃ rākṣasādhipaḥ: D7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead samare cābhivardhata, "and he grew [great] in battle," while D6 and KK (7.21.38) and VSP (7.21.40) read samare cābhivartata, "and he faced off or attacked in battle." Cr, commenting on the former, glosses, "the meaning is 'He became filled with energy' (utsāhavān abhavad ity arthaḥ)."

"like Yama, the ender of all things" yathāntakaḥ: Literally, "like Antaka [the Ender]."

26. "Nocking to his bow an arrow charged with the divine weapon-spell of Paśupati" tataḥ pāśupataṃ divyam astraṃ saṃdhāya kārmuke: Literally, "Then, having nocked the divine Pāśupata astra on the bow." See verses 21, 22, and notes above.

"he drew" vyakarṣata: T4,M3, and KK and VSP read instead the more or less synonymous vicakarṣa saḥ, "he drew."

Following verse 26, D6,7,10,11,T1,2,4,G,M, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of four lines [419*]: "Drawing the bowstring back to his ear,[1] that foe of Indra, in a rage, released the arrow in battle as did Śaṅkara against Tripura.[2][1–2] The appearance of that arrow with its halo of smoky[3] flames was like that of a spreading fire about to consume a forest[4] in the hot season.[3–4]"

[1] "Drawing the bowstring back to his ear" ākarṇaṃ sa vikṛṣyātha cāpam: Literally, "then he, having drawn the bow as far as his ear." Ñ,V1,3,B1–3,D6,7,10,11,T,G1,3,M1,2, 4–10, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read the synonymous ākarṇāt, "up to the ear," for the accusative ākarṇam.

[2] "Tripura" tripure: Literally, "the triple city." Tripura is the name of the three mythological cities of gold, silver, and iron created by the asura architect Maya and destroyed by the fiery arrows of Śiva. It is also the name of the asura king who ruled those cities and who was likewise destroyed. Here the reference is somewhat ambiguous, as it is at 321*, lines 5–7, following notes to 7.16.29. See note to 7.4.28.

[3] "smoky" sadhūma-: G1,2,M3–5,7,10, and KK and VSP read instead vidhūma-, "smokeless."

[4] "like that of a spreading fire about to consume a forest in the hot season" vanaṃ dahiṣyato grīṣme edhitasyeva śuṣmaṇaḥ: Literally, "like a grown fire about to burn a forest in the hot season." D6,7,10,11,M5, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead vanaṃ dahiṣyato gharme dāvāgner iva mūrcchataḥ, "like an expanding forest fire in the hot season about to burn a forest." Cs glosses the term mūrcchataḥ, "expanding," as ucchrāyaṃ gatasya, "of [the fire] which has gone to growth or intensity."

27. "followed by flesh-eating beasts" kravyādānugataḥ: Literally, "followed by flesh-eaters." The reference is, no doubt, to the swarms of carrion eaters that haunt battlefields to gorge on the bodies of the slain. Cg, the only commentator to gloss the term, seems to understand that the flesh-eaters are produced by the arrow itself (kravyādaiḥ svasṛṣṭair anugataḥ). Dutt (1894, pp. 1621–22) renders, "followed by ghosts," adding in a footnote: "The instrument being Siva's, it naturally was followed by ghosts, as his attendants." Gorresio (1870, p. 87) oddly seems to think that the arrow is following the carnivorous warriors of Yama. He renders, "seguitava quel telo i carnivori guerrieri di Yama." Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 481) mistakenly understands the phrase to refer to Rāvaṇa's release of the arrow. He renders, "lâché par le mangeur de chair." In this he is followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 432), who renders, "loosed by that eater of flesh."

"and" caiva: D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the contextually synonymous cāpi.

28. "in battle" raṇe: D7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, and NSP read instead bale, "in the army." Of those who share this reading, only Gorresio (1870, p. 87) appears to render it correctly, translating, "in quell' oste." Benoît (1999, p. 1275) apparently understands the term to refer to the force of the arrow, rendering, "sous sa violence," but this is highly improbable.

"like trees consumed by a forest fire" dāvadagdhā nagā iva: D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead māhendrā iva ketavaḥ, "like the flagstaffs of great Indra."

29. "that" saḥ: Ś2,3,D6,7,10–12,T1,2,G3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tu, "but or and."

Sarga 22

1. "Now . . . Daśagrīva's . . . he" sa tu tasya: Literally, "And he [Yama], his [Daśagrīva's]." Ś1,B1,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read sa tasya tu by transposition.

"Yama Vaivasvata" vaivasvato yamaḥ: Ś,Ñ,V1,3,B,D,T3,4, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead vaivasvataḥ prabhuḥ, yielding the sense "lord Vaivasvata."

2. "he quickly said" sa tu . . . / abravīt tvaritam: Literally, "And he said quickly." Ñ, B1,2,4,D6,7,10–12, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read hi, "indeed," for tu, "and or but," while Ñ2,B,D2,3,5–7,10–12,T1,3,M8, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read the nominative singular tvaritaḥ, "he, in haste," for the adverbial accusative tvaritam.

"his eyes wild with rage" krodhaparyākulekṣaṇaḥ: Literally, "having eyes disordered with anger." Ś,Ñ,V1,3,B,D,T3 (krodhāt),4,M10, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead krodhasaṃraktalocanaḥ, "having eyes red with anger."

"Bring up my chariot" rathaḥ samupanīyatām: Literally, "let a chariot be brought." D10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read me, "my [chariot]," for sam-, while KK and VSP read [a]yam, "that [chariot]," for sam-.

3. "loudly rumbling" mahāsvanam: Literally, "having a loud [lit., 'great'] noise." Ñ2,B, D1,2,4,6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead mahāratham, "the great chariot."

"chariot" ratham: Ñ2,B,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tadā, "then."

"he . . . mounted that great chariot" āruroha mahāratham: Ñ2,B1,3,4,D6 and 7 (adhyarohata),10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read adhyārohata taṃ ratham, "he mounted that chariot." KK and VSP read hy adhyārohata taṃ ratham, a variant not noted in the critical apparatus.

"and took his stand" sthitaḥ: Literally, "[he] stood or [he was] located."

4. "Standing before him . . . Mṛtyu" mṛtyus tasyāgrataḥ sthitaḥ: Cr argues that this position of Mṛtyu suggests that he is servant or attendant of Yama (etena mṛtyor yamānucaratvaṃ sūcitam).

"a noose" pāśa-: The pāśa (noose) is normally the āyudha (weapon) associated with Yama. The termed is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. Ś2,3,Ñ2,B2,4,D2,5–7,9–12,T3,4,G1,2,M2,4–10, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead prāsa-, "darts."

"with its fixed and moving contents" sacarācaram: Ñ2,B,D6,7,10,11,T1,2,4,G,M1–4, 6–10, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead idam avyayam, "this indestructible." The seemingly oxymoronic reading thus created, i.e., that which destroys the indestructible universe, is negotiated variously by commentators and translators. Ck, Cg, and Ct all understand that although Mṛtyu repeatedly destroys the world at the end of each yuga, the universe is, nonetheless, continuous [as it is recreated periodically]. (yugānte sarvaṃ sakṛd eva saṃhrīyata ity arthaḥ. avyayaṃ pravāhanityam—so Ck and Cg.) This interpretation is interpolated into the translations of Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 481), Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 433), Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1977), and Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 428). Cs offers, as an alternative explanation, that the term means that the universe would be eternal but for Yama (yamaṃ vināvyayam iti vā).

5. "beside him in the chariot stood" pārśvasthaḥ . . . syandane sthitaḥ: Literally, "standing on the side, [he] stood in the chariot." Ñ2,B,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read asya cābhavat for syandane sthitaḥ, yielding the sense "and he was standing beside him as well."

"in human form" mūrtimān: Literally, "embodied." Our understanding, given the context, is that the divine weapon has taken on its anthropomorphic form as the presiding divinity of the weapon. This appears to be the understanding of most of the translators, who offer variations on the idea of "in physical, personal, or corporeal form." Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 481) appears to misunderstand both the compound kāladaṇḍaḥ and the term mūrtimān, rendering, "Kâla, sous forme de baton." Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 433) completely misreads the passage, understanding kāladaṇḍaḥ in verse 5 to be an additional weapon of Mṛtyu, rendering, "And Mṛtyu . . . with a lance and mallet in his hands and Time as his Rod." See notes to 7.98.20.

"glowing, as it were, with its blazing energy" prajvalann iva tejasā: The passage is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. Ñ2,B,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead tejasā jaladagnivat, "like a blazing fire with blazing energy," while KK and VSP read the variant tejasā jaladagnimat, which then modifies praharaṇam, "weapon," yielding the sense "which with its blazing energy was possessed of blazing fire."

Following verse 5, GPP (in parentheses, unnumbered, between verses 5 and 6), KK (7.22.5), and VSP (7.22.5–6) insert a slight variant of verse 7.22.28 (see notes to verse 28 below):

tasya pārśveṣu niśchidrāḥ kālapāśāḥ pratiṣṭhitāḥ /
pāvakasparśasaṃkāśaḥ sthito mūrtaś ca mudgaraḥ //

On every side of it, standing crowded closely together, were the nooses of Kāla. And standing there, too, in human form, was his war hammer, the very touch of which was like fire. [1]

[1] "the very touch of which was like fire" pāvakasparśasaṃkāśaḥ: Literally, "whose appearance was that of the touch of fire." We read the last two members of the compound as a paranipāta. Among the translators consulted, only Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 429) translates this verse in this location, placing it in parentheses. See notes to verse 28 below.

6. "Then the three worlds and the gods, denizens of heaven . . . were afraid and trembled" tato lokās trayas trastāḥ kampante ca divaukasaḥ: Literally, "Then the three worlds, frightened, trembled, and the denizens of heaven." The line could also be rendered as "Then the three worlds were afraid and the denizens of heaven trembled." The term divaukasaḥ, "heaven-dwelling [ones]," is a common kenning for the gods. See notes to 7.5.23. Ñ2,B,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead a passage of one line [422*]: "Then the three worlds were agitated and the heaven-dwelling gods trembled (tato lokatrayaṃ kṣubdham akampanta divaukasaḥ)."

"the terror of the three worlds" lokatrayabhayāvaham: Literally, "bringing fear to the three worlds." Ñ,B,D6,7,10,11,G2, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead sarvalokabhayāvaham, "bringing fear to all the worlds."

Following verse 6, Ñ2,B,D3,6,7,9–11,S insert a passage of four lines [423*]: "Then his charioteer, urging on[1] his brightly lustrous horses,[2] drove, with a frightful roar, to where the lord of the rākṣasas stood.[1–2] In an instant, those horses, swift as thought,[3] the equals of the horses of Indra,[4] drove Yama to where that battle had occurred.[5][3–4]"

[1] "urging on" saṃcodayan: B3,D7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead tv acodayat, while KK and VSP read pracodayat, both of which mean "he urged on." Cg notes that the syllable -co- in pracodayat marks one of the syllables [the twenty second] of the Gāyatrīmantra, which he and Cm see as distributed throughout the poem. See Introduction, "Gāyatrīmantra," pp. 187–98, and notes to 7.1.1.

[2] "brightly lustrous horses" ruciraprabhān hayān: Literally, "horses have a bright or pleasing luster." D3,6,T3,4,G,M1–5,8–10, and KK and VSP read rudhira- for rucira-, yielding the sense "of reddish or blood-red luster." Interestingly, the only translator who renders this variant is Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 433, "were the color of blood"), who usually reads with GPP. Ñ2,V3,D6,7,9–11, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read the synonymous aśvān for hayān, "horses."

[3] "swift as thought" manasas tulyāḥ: Literally, "the equals of thought." Ck, Cg, and Ct point out that the expression is elliptical and refers to the speed of the horses (manasas tulyavegā ity arthaḥ—so Cg; Ck and Ct similarly).

[4] "the horses of Indra" harihaya-: Literally, "the horses of Hari."

[5] "had occurred" prastutam: Literally, "commenced or completed." We follow Cr, whom we understand to take the battle as having already occurred (pravṛttam), as opposed to Ct, who understands that the battle has just begun (prārabdham).

7–8. "And . . . that . . . they" tu te taṃ: Ñ2,V3,B,D5–7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tathaiva, "in this very way."

"fearsome" vikṛtam: Normally, this means "deformed, strange, or extraordinary." Given the context, however, we agree with Ck, Cg, Ct, and Cr, who gloss ghoram, "terrible or frightening." Ct adds that the chariot has an extraordinary equipage (vikṛtasaṃnāhaṃ ca), while Ck and Cg note that the extraordinary appearance of the chariot derives from its fearsome equipage (ghorasaṃnāharūpavikāravantam—so Cg).

"terrifying to all the worlds" sarvalokabhayāvaham: Literally, "bringing fear to all worlds." Ś,Ñ2,V3,D,T3, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead sahasā vipradudruvuḥ, "they suddenly ran away."

"with Mṛtyu mounted upon it" mṛtyusamanvitam: Literally, "accompanied by Mṛtyu."

"because of their inferior strength" laghusattvatayā: Literally, "because of the state of having slight strength." Ck, Cg, and Ct all gloss, "because of the state of having little strength (alpabalatayā—so Ck and Ct)." Cr elaborates, noting that the ministers are frightened because of the inference that their own strength is lesser because of Mṛtyu's disregard (mṛtyūpekṣayānumitasvālpabalena hetunā bhayārditāḥ).

"We are unable to fight here!" nātra yoddhuṃ samarthāḥ smaḥ: Ñ2,B,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read the synonymous neha for nātra. Ñ2,B3,D10, and GPP read yuddham, "battle," for the infinitive yoddhum, lending the phrase the sense "We are not competent for battle here."

"they . . . fled" vipradudruvuḥ: The upasarga vi- is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. Ñ2,B,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead prayayur diśaḥ, "they went to the directions," i.e., "they fled in all directions."

Following verse 7, M3,4, and KK (7.22.10ab in brackets) insert a passage of one line [425*]: "Those very fearsome and powerful warriors, enraged, fled (abhyadhāvanta saṃkruddhā balino 'tibhayaṃkarāḥ /)."

9. "a chariot" tam . . . ratham: Cr understands the pronoun tam and the adjectives that modify it to refer to Yama himself, without making any explicit reference to the chariot itself (daśagrīvas tādṛśaṃ mṛtyusahitam ataḥ sarvalokabhayāvahaṃ taṃ yamaṃ dṛṣṭvā . . .). There is no recorded variant in the critical apparatus reading yamam, "Yama," for ratham, "chariot," and Cr's comments may be the result of an editorial or typographical error (reading yamam for ratham).

"the rākṣasa . . . he was not disturbed, nor did he suffer any anxiety" nākṣubhyata tadā rakṣo vyathā caivāsya nābhavat: Literally, "then the rākṣasa did not tremble, nor was there any agitation of him." D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead nākṣubhyata daśagrīvo na cāpi bhayam āviśat, "Daśagrīva was not agitated, nor did fear possess [him]."

10. "hurled" visṛjan: Literally, "releasing." Ś,Ñ2,B1,3,D6–12,T1–3,M3, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the finite vyasṛjat, "he released."

"piercing the rākṣasa's vital points" marmāṇi . . . rākṣasasya nyakṛntata: Literally, "he cut the rākṣasa's vital points or organs." D1,2,4,6–12, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read rāvaṇasya, "of Rāvaṇa," for rākṣasasya, "of the rākṣasa." KK and VSP read rāvaṇasyopakṛntata, "he injured . . . Rāvaṇa's," for rāvaṇsaya nyakṛntata, "he cut . . . the rākṣasa's."

Following verse 10, T1,2,4,G,M, and KK (in brackets as 7.22.13) insert a passage of two lines [426*]: "Although his vitals were being pierced, Rāvaṇa, lord of the rākṣasas, stood fast, enduring that fearsome injury like a mountain being shattered (marmasu cchidyamāneṣu rāvaṇo rākṣaseśvaraḥ / sahaṃs tasthau rujaṃ ghorāṃ bhidyamāna ivācalaḥ //)."

11. "remained uninjured" sthitaḥ svasthaḥ: Literally, "stood or remained healthy." Ś,Ñ,V1,3,B,D,T3,4, and Gorresio, Lahore, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tataḥ, "then," for sthitaḥ, "stood or remained."

Following verse 11, S inserts a passage of four lines [427*], known only to KK among the printed editions consulted (7.22.15–16): "Those arrows, which were like thunderbolts, completely covered[1] Yama in battle, as might immensely fearsome multicolored storm clouds a mountain.[1–2] But Yama, himself, that slayer of his enemies, swiftly striking down those arrows of Rāvaṇa, released a fearsome weapon.[3–4]"

[1] "completely covered" chādayantaḥ: Literally, "covering." G2,M1,5,8,10, and KK read instead chādayanti, "they cover."

12. "because of the hundreds of huge javelins . . . afflicted by those sharp weapons" mahāśaktiśataiḥ . . . śalyapīḍitaḥ: Literally, "by hundreds of huge javelins . . . afflicted by sharp weapons." T1,3,G2,3,M2–4,7–10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read for -śataiḥ, "by the hundreds," -śaraiḥ, "by arrows," lending the compound the sense "because of the huge javelins and arrows." The term śalya can be used for a variety of sharp weapons that are discharged, including arrows, javelins, lances, etc. We believe that here it is a reference to the javelins mentioned in pāda a. D10,11, and GPP and NSP read instead the inapposite svalpa-, yielding the compound svalpapīḍitaḥ, lending the compound the sense "slightly injured."

13. "the dragger of his foes" arikarśinā: Ś,Ñ,V1,3,B,D7,10,11, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP use the alternative spelling -karṣiṇā. On Yama's epithet, see notes to 6.105.1–3.

"gave battle . . . for seven nights . . . Rāvaṇa was neither broken nor vanquished" saptarātraṃ kṛte saṃkhye na bhagno vijito 'pi vā: Literally, "when battle had been made [by Yama] for seven nights, [he—Rāvaṇa was] neither broken nor vanquished." Ñ,V1, B2,D1,3,5,7,10,11,T3,M6, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead saptarātraṃ kṛtaḥ saṃkhye visaṃjño vimukho ripuḥ, "for seven nights, his enemy was rendered senseless in battle and turned away." On the seven-night battle, compare the description of the battle between Rāma and Rāvaṇa at Yuddhakāṇḍa sarga 97. See especially 6.97.30 and notes.

"in this fashion with all manner of weapons" nānāpraharaṇair evam: Ś,Ñ,V1,3,G,D,T3, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read by transposition evaṃ nānāpraharaṇaiḥ.

14. "Then there broke out a renewed battle" tato 'bhavat punar yuddham: Literally, "Then there was once more battle." Ś,Ñ,V3,B2,3,D1,2,4–12,T4, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tadāsīt tumuluṃ yuddham, "Then there was a tumultuous battle." Cr notes that this battle takes place after Rāvaṇa regains his senses (tadā saṃjñāprāptikāle).

"Then" tataḥ . . . tadā: Literally, "After that . . . then." For the seemingly redundant adverb tadā, "then," Ś2,3,Ñ,V1,3,B1,3,D1,7,9–12,G3,4, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read dvayoḥ, "between the two."

"there . . . both eager for victory" vijayākāṅkṣiṇos tatra: Ś2,3,Ñ,V1,3,B1–3,D1–7,9–12, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead jayam ākāṅkṣator vīra, "both eager for victory, O hero."

15. "gazed upon" dadṛśuḥ: Literally, "they saw." Ś,Ñ,V1,3,B,D,T3,4, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read sametāḥ, "[they] came together or assembled," for dadṛśuḥ, "they saw." On this variant, Ct glosses prāptāḥ, "they reached or came to." Cr proposes adding a finite verb, yielding the sequence the sense "they were assembled at the battlefield (raṇājiraṃ sametā babhūvur iti śeṣaḥ)."

"that battlefield" tad raṇājiram: Ś,Ñ2,B1,2,D5–8,10–12,G1, and Lahore, GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead the grammatically somewhat awkward tad raṇājire, "then (?) at the battlefield."

16. "While those two . . . were engaged in battle, it was" abhavad yudhyatos tayoḥ: Ñ,V1,B,D6,7,10,11,T3,4, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read yudhyatos tadābhavat, "then while the two were engaged in battle, it was." KK (7.22.21) and VSP (7.22.19) read krudhyatos tadābhavat, "then as those two raged, it was." This reading is not noted in the critical apparatus.

17. "Then the lord of the rākṣasas, enraged, drew his bow in battle" rākṣasendras tataḥ kruddhaś cāpam āyamya saṃyuge: D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead rākṣasendro 'pi visphārya cāpam indrāśaniprabham, "And the lord of the rākṣasas, having twanged his bow, which had the splendor of Indra's thunderbolt . . ." Lahore (7.25.17), Gorresio (7.26.19), and Ś,Ñ,V1,3,B,D1–8,10–12,T4,M6 read a close variant, substituting [a]tha, "now," (Ñ1,V1,T4,M6—tu) for [a]pi, "even." Gorresio's edition also substitutes -svanam, "sound, roar," for -prabham, "splendor," a reading shared by a number of manuscripts.

"released" mumoca ha: Ñ2,B,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tato 'srjat, "then he released."

"seeming to fill the sky" nirantaram ivākāśaṃ kurvan: Literally, "as if making the sky without intervals." The image is a favorite of the epics. See, for example, 3.60.45; 5.62.23;

6.95.20,22; and notes. Cf. 6.87.25–27 and notes. See, too, MBh 8.40.96; 9.12.40; 12.279.16; and 13.1.68.

18. "with a thousand arrows" śarasahasreṇa: Ś,Ñ,V1,3,B,D1–6,8–12,T1–3,G3,M3,5,6, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead śata- for śara- lending the compound the sense "with a hundred thousand."

19. "But suddenly there issued forth from the mouth of the enraged Yama an exhalation wreathed in flames, a veritable fire of wrath." tataḥ kruddhasya sahasā yamasyābhiviniḥsṛtaḥ / jvālāmālo viniśvāso vadanāt krodhapāvakaḥ //: Literally, "Then from the mouth of the enraged Yama, an exhalation—a fire of anger that possessed a wreath of flame[s]—suddenly emerged." Ñ2,B1,2,4,D6,7,10, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read a variant verse, tataḥ kruddhasya vadanād yamasya samajāyata / jvālamālī saniśvāsaḥ sadhūmaḥ kopapāvakaḥ //: "Then from the mouth of the enraged Yama there arose, along with his breath, a smoky fire of anger, wreathed in flame[s]." Lahore (7.25.19) reads a close variant. Ck and Ct argue that up until this point Yama, mindful of Brahmā's boon [to Rāvaṇa], had been merely fighting, putting aside any thought of killing Rāvaṇa (tataḥ kruddhasyety anenaitāvat paryantaṃ bhagavān yamo brahmavaradānaṃ smṛtvā māraṇabuddhiṃ vihāya yuddhamātraṃ kṛtavān iti sūcitam—so Ct; Ck similarly).

20. "the gods" deva-: The reading is marked as uncertain by editors of the critical edition.

"born of Yama's wrath" krodhajam: Literally, "born of wrath."

For verse 20, Ś,Ñ,V1–3,B,D1–5,7–12,T3, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP and substitute a passage of two lines [429*]: "Then, witnessing that miraculous thing in the presence of the gods and dānavas, Mṛtyu and Kāla were delighted[1] and even more energized[2] (tadāścaryam atho dṛṣṭvā devadānavasaṃnidhau / praharṣitau mudā yuktau mṛtyukālau babhūvatuḥ //)."

[1] "delighted" mudā yuktau: Literally, "joined with delight." Ñ2,B1,D7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead susaṃrabdhau, "greatly enraged." Ct glosses atikruddhau, "exceedingly angry."

[2] "and even more energized" praharṣitau: Literally, "[those two were] excited." We follow Ct, who supplies "for battle (yuddhāya)."

21. "Give me leave" muñca mām: Literally, "release me."

For verse 21, Ś,Ñ,V1–3,B,D,T3, Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP substitute a passage of two lines [431*]: "Then Mṛtyu, in a towering rage, said to Vaivasvata: 'Release me for battle[1] while I slay this[2] evil rākṣasa' (tato mṛtyuḥ kruddhataro vaivasvatam abhāṣata / muñca māṃ samare yāvad dhanmy enaṃ pāparākṣasam //)."

[1] "for battle" samare: Literally, "in battle."

[2] "while I slay this" hanmy enam: Literally, "I kill him." Ñ2,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the virtually synonymous hanmīmam, "I kill him."

Following verse 431*, Ś,Ñ,V1,B,D1–4,6–10,T3, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP continue with (or, in a few cases, substitute and/or place in a different location) a passage of one line [432*]: "No one connected with me can survive, that is the law of nature concerning me (na mamaiṣa bhavet kaścin maryādā me nisargataḥ /)."

[1] "No one connected with me can survive, that is the law of nature concerning me." na mamaiṣa bhavet kaścin maryādā me nisargataḥ: Literally, "Of me no one can exist, of me this limit or law by nature." D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read the variant naiṣā rakṣo bhaved adya maryādā hi nisargataḥ, "The rākṣasa shall not exist today; for this is limit or law naturally." See verse 25 and notes below.

22–23. "Naraka" narakaḥ: A demon named Naraka, along with his brother Kālaka, is mentioned in 3.13.16cd–17ab as the son of Kaśyapa and Kālakā. In 4.41.25, Sugrīva has his monkey troops search for Sītā in "Prāgjyotiṣa, in which lives an evil-minded dānava named Naraka." In Lefeber's note to that passage she adds that Naraka is a demon associated with Prāgjyotiṣa, who was killed by Kṛṣṇa, and refers to MBh 5.128.44 and BhāgP 10.59.1–22. At 6.57.7 there is a demon named Naraka who is struck down by Viṣṇu. Here the commentators distinguish this Naraka, who is a son of Vipracitti and Siṃhikā, from the Naraka who is a son of the earth goddess and was slain by Kṛṣṇa. 7.27.9 states that Naraka, Śambara, Vṛtra, Namuci, and Bali were slain by Indra on the instructions of Viṣṇu (cf. note). Cf. 99*, note 3, following notes to 7.6.32.

"Namuci, Virocana," namucir virocanaś caiva: Note that pāda 22c is hypermetrical. On Namuci, see 99*, lines 1–2 and notes, following notes to 7.6.32. The asura Virocana is known from the time of the Upaniṣads, in which he and Indra represent the asuras and the devas in their effort to learn the nature of the ātman from Prajāpati (see ChāU 8.7.1–8.8.5). He is also well known to the Mahābhārata, in which he engages in a dialogue with Sudhavan (see MBh 5.35.5–30). He was the son of Prahlāda and the father of Bali.

"Śambara" śambaraḥ: This is an asura who is known from the vedas as a foe who is slain by Indra. He is mentioned elsewhere in the Rāmāyaṇa (e.g., 5.14.8; 6.57.7; 6.63.42; 7.27.9; and notes. He is also known as Timidhvaja (see 2.9.9–11; 2.39.11 and notes).

"Vṛtra" vṛtraḥ: The great primordial serpentine asura, Vṛtra, "the Encloser," is the paradigmatic enemy of the vedic divinity Indra (see ṚV 1.32, etc.). See, too, the story of Indra's aśvamedha sacrifice as it is told at Uttarakāṇḍa sargas 75–77. See note to 7.75.4.

"Śambhu" śambhuḥ: At 7.17.11–12 we are told that Śambhu is the king of daityas, who kills Vedavatī's father. See notes on these verses.

"the mighty Kārtasvara" kārtasvaro balī: Literally the word kārtasvara means "gold." The editors of the critical edition base the reading solely on seven Malayalam manuscripts (M1,4,5,7,8,10). Interestingly, Ck, who reads with the critical edition, understands it to be an alternative name of the demon Hiraṇyāsura (kārtasvaro hiraṇyāsuraḥ). This could possibly be a reference to either the demon Hiraṇyakaśipu or his brother Hiraṇyākṣa. The former is the name provided in 433*, line 1 (see below). The name Kārtasvara appears in a list of daityas and dānavas at MBh 12.220.51. Mani (1975, p. 393) identifies Kārtasvara as an asura who became world emperor and gives the MBh reference.

"Madhu and Kaiṭabha" madhukaiṭabhau: On the identity of these two demons, see notes to 7.4.14.

"were slain the moment I saw them" vinipannā mayā dṛṣṭāḥ: Literally, "seen by me, [they were] slain." Cg glosses, "merely by being seen (dṛṣṭamātrā eva)." The word dṛṣṭāḥ, "seen," is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition.

"this night-roaming rākṣasa" asmin niśācare: Literally, "about this night-roaming [one]."

For verse 22 ("Naraka, Śambara, Vṛtra, Śambhu, the mighty Kārtasvara, Namuci, Virocana, and the pair Madhu and Kaiṭabha"), Ś,Ñ,V1,3,B,D,T3,4, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP substitute a passage of seven lines [433*]: "Majestic Hiraṇyakaśipu, Namuci, Śambara, Saṃhrāda,[1] Dhūmaketu, Bali Vairocana, the great daitya king Śambhu,[2] Vṛtra, Bāṇa, royal seers, scholars of the śāstras,[3] gandharvas, along with the great serpents, seers, snakes,[4] yakṣas, and the troupes of apsarases,[5] indeed, even the earth itself with its mighty oceans, mountains, forests,[6] and trees, have been led to destruction, your majesty."

[1] "Saṃhrāda" saṃhrādaḥ: D10,11 and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead nisandhiḥ, "Nisandhi." KK (7.22.27) and VSP (7.22.25) read the slight variant visandhiḥ, "Visandhi."

[2] "Śambhu" śaṃbhuḥ: KK (7.22.27) and VSP (7.22.26) read instead daṃbhuḥ, "Dambhu." Cg notes that this is the name of an asura. See 7.17.11–12 and notes.

[3] "royal seers, scholars of the śāstras" rājarṣayaḥ śāstravidaḥ: One could also take the second term as a modifier of the first, as do Dutt (1894, p. 1624), Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 482), Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 434), Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1979), and Benoît (1999, p. 1276). Gorresio (1870, p. 89) also subordinates the second term to the first but appears to misread the term śāstra- as śastra- and thus mistakenly renders, "Risci regali dotti di tutte l'armi." Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 430) translates as we do.

[4] "along with the great serpents . . . snakes" samahoragāḥ . . . pannagāḥ: It is not clear what, if any, distinction is intended in the original, as both terms are used to refer to the semidivine serpent people as well as to terrestrial reptiles.

[5] "yakṣas and the troupes of apsarases" yakṣās tathaivāpsarasāṃ gaṇāḥ: D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead daityā yakṣāś ca hy apsarogaṇāḥ, "daityas, yakṣas, and the troupes of apsarases." KK (7.22.28) and VSP (7.22.27) read the minor variant cāpy for ca hi.

[6] "forests" -vana-: Ñ2,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead -sarit-, "rivers."

24. "upon . . . I gaze" mayā dṛṣṭaḥ: Literally, "seen by me." The word dṛṣṭaḥ, "seen," is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition.

"for even an instant" muhūrtam api: Ñ2,B,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead balavān api, "[not] even a mighty being."

25. "Nor is this any power of mine. Rather, it is the law fixed by nature." balaṃ mama na khalv etan maryādaiṣā nisargataḥ /: Literally, "Indeed, this is not my strength, for this is the limit naturally." The sense is most clearly explained by Cr, who comments: "This destruction is not my power; rather, it is the fixed law (maryādā) in the form of birth and death through the force of nature, that is, one's own inherent nature (etad vinaśanaṃ mama balam eva na, kiṃtu eṣā janmamaraṇarūpā maryādā nisargataḥ svabhāvataḥ)." Ck, Cg, and Ct explain: "This statement of mine—'For no one upon whom I gaze can survive even for an instant'—is not merely to demonstrate my own strength. Because naturally, that is, through the nature of beginningless creation, my gaze alone marks the terminus of the life of living things. (etan mayā dṛṣṭo muhūrtam api na jīvatīti mama vacanaṃ balaṃ balaprakāśanamātraparaṃ na khalu. yato nisargato 'nādisṛṣṭisvabhāvenaiṣā mama dṛṣṭir eva prāṇināṃ jīvitasya maryādā—so Ct.)" Compare notes to 432* following verse 21 above.

"For" hi: Ś,Ñ,V1,3,B,D2,6–12,T3,M6, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead na, "not."

"no one . . . can survive, that is certain" kaścin na jived iti niścayaḥ: D10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead the vocative kāla, "O Kāla," for kaścin "any one." KK (7.22.32) and VSP (7.22. 31) unaccountably read the accusative singular kālam. Ñ,V1, B,D6,7,10,11,M2, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read muhūrtam api jīvati, "he [cannot] survive even for a moment," for na jived iti niścayaḥ, "no [one] . . . can survive, that is certain." These substitutions lend pāda d in GPP, NSP, and Gita Press the sense "[Seen by me], one does [not] live for even a moment." The reading of KK and VSP would lend the pāda the sense "[Seen by me,] one would [not] live for [any] time, even a moment." The accusative kālam of KK and VSP is an odd one and must be construed with muhūrtam in pāda d, yielding the redundant sense "for a moment's time." Since, however, this reading does not appear in the critical apparatus, nor does the other reading of the southern commentators appear in the apparatus of KK, we find the variant to be dubious at best. Cg is silent.

"touched" saṃspṛṣṭaḥ: D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead sa dṛṣṭaḥ, "[he was] seen." Ck and Ct note that he would be viewed with the gaze or eye of destruction (saṃhāracakṣuṣā). According to our transcript of Ck and the critical apparatus, Ck reads saṃdṛṣṭaḥ, "seen or beheld," for sa dṛṣṭaḥ, "he or one is seen." He understands the upasarga sam to stand for the term saṃhāra, "destruction," thus accounting for his gloss. Ct, who does not share this reading, nonetheless appears to simply copy Ck's gloss.

26. "When . . . heard these words" etat tu vacanaṃ śrutvā: Literally, "But, having heard these words." Ñ3,V1,B,D6,7,10,11,M2, and Gorresio (tasyedam), GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tasyaivaṃ vacanaṃ śrutvā, "Having heard his words in this fashion."

"he . . . him" ayam . . . enam: Ñ,B1,2,4,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tvaṃ tiṣṭhenainam, "you stay . . . [I will kill] him."

"I will kill . . . myself" nihanmy aham: Literally, "I kill or will kill."

27. "the" tam: D6,7,10,11,G2,M6, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tu, "and or but."

28. This verse is a slight variant of that found in GPP, KK, and VSP following verse 5 above. See notes to verse 5 above.

"standing crowded closely together" niśchidrāḥ: Literally, "without gap or interval." The word is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. Ñ2,B,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead nihitāḥ, "placed, situated, or fixed." This reading has led several translators to understand that the nooses are attached to the sides of the daṇḍa (Gorresio 1870, p. 90; Roussel 1903, vol. 3, p. 483; Shastri 1959, vol. 3, p. 435; Gita Press 1969, vol. 3, pp. 1980; Benoît 1999, p. 1276). T1,2,4,G,M1–5,7–10, and KK and VSP read instead nikhilāḥ, "all."

"the very touch of which was like fire" pāvakasparśasaṃkāśaḥ: As above, we take this as a paranipāta compound. See note to verse 5 above. D7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read [-a]śani- "thunderbolt," for -sparśa-, "touch." This lends the compound the sense "which was like fire or a thunderbolt."

29. "Merely upon being seen, that rod cuts off the lives of living beings." darśanād eva yaḥ prāṇān prāṇinām uparudhyati: Literally, "That which from sight alone obstructs the lives of living things." D10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read api karṣati, "it draws off as well," for uparudhyati, "it obstructs." Gorresio (7.26.34ab), KK (7.22.36ab), and VSP (7.22.5) read apakarṣati, "it drags off."

"How much more so would it take the lives of embodied beings through a blow or through its crushing weight?" kiṃ punas tāḍanād vāpi pīḍanād vāpi dehinaḥ: Literally, "How much more so of an embodied being from striking or crushing." For 29cd, Ś,Ñ,V1,3,B,D,T3, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP substitute a passage of one line [434*]: "How much more so of one being touched or still more being struck[1] (kiṃ punaḥ spṛśyamānasya tāḍyamānasya vā punaḥ)."

[1] "being struck" tāḍyamānasya: Ñ2,V3,B1–3,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead pātyamānasya, "one being felled."

30. "Touched by the hand of that mighty divinity" karasparśo balavatā: Literally, "touched by the hand by the mighty [one]." As Cr notes, the reference is, of course, to Yama. D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read tena, "by that one," for -kara-,

"hand." Benoît (1999, p. 1277) appears to misread the adjective balavatā, rendering, "la puissance du dieu."

"that angry and very fearsome rod" daṇḍaḥ kruddhaḥ sudāruṇaḥ: Ñ2,B2,3,D7,10,11, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead mahāpraharaṇo 'sphurat, "that great weapon flared up." The root √sphur has two meanings that are plausible in this context, "to shine or flash," on the one hand, or "to throb or quiver," on the other. Like most of the translators consulted, we believe that the former is more apposite here. Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 430), alone, understands the latter, rendering, "quivered." See notes 7.98.20.

"as if to consume the night-roaming rākṣasa" pibann iva niśācaram: Literally, "as if drinking the night-roaming [one]." Ś,Ñ,V1,3,B1,3,4,D,T3, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead nirdahann iva rākṣasam, "as if burning up the rākṣasa."

31. "creatures . . . the battlefield" sattvās tasmād raṇājirāt: Literally, "creatures from that battlefield." D10,11,M1, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tasmāt trastā raṇājire, "afraid of that, [everyone] on the battlefield." As Ck, Ct, and Cr note, it is the rod of Kāla that is the object of their fear (tasmāt kāladaṇḍāt—so Ck and Ct).

"seeing . . . with his upraised rod of Kāla" dṛṣṭvā kāladaṇḍodyatam: Literally, "having seen . . . with the upraised rod of Kāla." D10,1l, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead sarve dṛṣṭvā daṇḍodyatam, "all, having seen [him] with his upraised rod." As Ct notes, we must read the compound as a paranipāta (daṇḍodyatam udyatadaṇḍam). See notes to 7.98.20.

32. "just as Yama, eager to strike Rāvaṇa, raised his rod" tasmin prahartukāme . . . daṇḍam udyamya: Literally, "when he, having raised the rod, was eager to strike." Ñ,V3,B,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read yame daṇḍena for daṇḍam udyamya, yielding the sense "just as Yama [was eager to strike Rāvaṇa] with his rod." See notes to 7.98.20.

"himself appeared to him" yamam . . . sākṣād darśayitvā: Literally, "having shown [himself] directly to Yama." Ct glosses, "having become visible in his own divine form (svadivyamūrtyā pratyakṣo bhūtvā)." Ck understands similarly. Cr and Cs propose adding the word ātmānam, "himself."

33. "you of incomparable valor" atulavikrama: Ś,Ñ,V1,3,B,D,T3,4,G2,M5,10, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead amitavikrama, "of unmeasured valor."

"You must not strike this night-roaming rākṣasa with your rod." na khalu . . . / prahartavyaṃ tvayaitena daṇḍenāsmin niśācare: Literally, "It is absolutely not to be struck by you with this rod upon this night-roaming [one]." V3,B1,2,D1,3–5,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP (with small variations) read instead na hantavyas tvayaitena daṇḍenaiṣa niśācaraḥ, "This night-roaming [one] is not to be killed by you with this rod." KK (7.22.40) and VSP (7.22.39) read the slight variant tvayā tena for tvayaitena, while B3,D3,T3, and KK and VSP read daṇḍenaiva for daṇḍenaiṣa. The duplication of the particle na in this variant with the first negative particle in pāda b (na khalu) presents an interpretative challenge to at least two of the commentators. Ct takes the repetition to be emphatic, implying a repetition of the gerundive hantavyaḥ, yielding the urgent sense of "Do not strike! Do not strike!" (nañdvayena na hantavyo na hantavya ity āvṛttiḥ.) Cr, on the other hand, proposes that we read the first na as a vocative addressed to Yama. Cr argues that one should take the term na as a noun referring to Yama's role as the binder of sinners. He bases this on a lexical citation from Medinīkośa, according to which one of the meanings of the noun na is "bondage (bandha)." Alternatively, Cr proposes that the vocative is ana, its initial "a" being elided through sandhi by its position after mahābāho. He understands this term, the normal meaning of which is

"breath," to refer to Yama's role as the protector of all through his being the agent of the purification of everyone. (he na pāpibandhaka. naḥ pumān sugate bandha iti medinī. kiṃca he ana sarvaśuddhikartṛtvena sarvarakṣaka. he vaivasvata.) See notes to 7.98.20.

34. "For I gave him a boon" varaḥ . . . mayā dattas tasya: Literally, "a boon was given to him by me." Ñ,V1,B,D6,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read varaḥ . . . mayaitasmai dattaḥ, "By me a boon was given to him." Ck, Ct, and Cr note that this is a reference to Brahmā's famous boon to Rāvaṇa, granting him invulnerability to all supernatural beings (varo devagaṇāvadhyatvarūpaḥ—Ct; Ck and Cr similarly). See 7.10.16–20. On the motif of Rāvaṇa's boon, see note to 7.10.16.

"You must not falsify" tat tvayā nānṛtaṃ kāryam: Literally, "that [speech] is not to be made false by you." Ñ,V1,B,D3,6,7,10,11,T3, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the masculine sa tvayā nānṛtaḥ kāryaḥ, "that [boon] must not be falsified by you."

Following verse 34, Ñ1,2,V3,B,D3,6,7,10,11,S, and Gorresio insert a passage of four lines [435*]: "For whoever would make me untruthful,[1] whether he be a god or a human, would make the entire triple world untruthful.[2] Of this there is no doubt.[1–2] And this fierce rod, the terror of the three worlds, loosed from your hand in anger would destroy all creatures without distinction,[3] both those that I love and those that I hate.[3–4]"

[1] "For whoever would make me untruthful" yo hi mām anṛtaṃ kuryāt: Literally, "For who would make me one who is possessed of untruth." Ck, Cg, and Ct gloss the term to mean someone whose words are false (asatyavādinam—so Cg; Ck and Ct similarly). Ck and Ct explain that one could prove Brahmā untruthful by violating his command (madājñām ullaṅghya iti śeṣaḥ—so Ct; Ck similarly).

[2] "would make the entire triple world untruthful" trailokyam anṛtaṃ tena kṛtaṃ syāt: Literally, "By him the three worlds would be rendered false." Ct explains this statement by referring to Brahmā's universal concomitance with all beings (sarvasamaṣṭitvān mameti bhāvaḥ).

[3] "loosed from your hand in anger . . . without distinction" kruddhasya karamukto 'yaṃ nirviśeṣaḥ: D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead kruddhena vipramukto 'yaṃ nirviśeṣam, "released by the angry one, without distinction." Cs prefaces his comments with the observation that whether Yama kills Rāvaṇa or not, it would lead to the dissolution of the world (lokāntakarāvaṇamaraṇaṃ bhavatu vā mā vā jagallayas tu syād ity āha).

35. "long ago" pūrvam: Ś1,3,Ñ2,D10,11, and GPP read instead sarvam, literally, "all, everything." Ś2,D2,6–9,12, and Lahore and NSP, and Ck, Ct (as cited in the critical apparatus), and Cs read instead sarva-, "all." Both variants are difficult to construe in the context. Cs is the only commentator to remark specifically on the word sarva, which he reads in compound with -mṛtyupuraskṛtaḥ. See notes below for his interpretation. Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 483) translates, "la Mort universelle," while Dutt (1894, p. 1625) renders, "having the power of compassing the death of all beings."

"in the destruction of all creatures" sarvāsāṃ prajānāṃ vinipātane: Ś,Ñ,V1,3,B,D1–7,10–12,T3, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead sarveṣāṃ prāṇināṃ amitaprabhaḥ, "of all living beings . . . [this rod] of unmeasured splendor."

"and in whose wake Mṛtyu follows" mṛtyupuraskṛtaḥ: Literally, "put forward by Mṛtyu." The compound attracts the attention of the commentators, several of whom wish to read it as both a tatpuruṣa and a bahuvrīhi. The former is a simple tṛtīyā tatpuruṣa, as in our translation. The construction of the bahuvrīhi is not completely clear, nor do any of the commentators explain it, although they probably understand it to have a similar sense. (mṛtyunā puraskṛtaḥ. bahuvrīhiś ca—Ck and Cg.) Ct, who with Cs reads sarvamṛtyupuraskṛtaḥ, simply comments tatpuruṣo bahuvrīhiś ca. Cs takes the term mṛtyu here to refer to any lethal thing and thus reads the compound to mean that the rod of Kāla is the foremost among all lethal weapons (sarve mṛtyavo mārakās teṣu puraskṛto 'gresaraḥ). Cs further believes that the point of Brahmā's injunction against the discharge of the infallible daṇḍa is to prevent Yama from creating a logical contradiction between the two, that is to say, the discharge of an infallibly lethal weapon against an invulnerable adversary. He says: "The meaning is that since I have made Rāvaṇa, like the rod of Kāla, infallible, the destruction of either one is impossible (kāladaṇḍasyeva rāvaṇasya mayaivāmoghīkaraṇān nānyataravyāhatiḥ saṃpādyeti bhāvaḥ)." See notes to 7.98.20.

36. "the rākṣasa's" rākṣasa-: Ñ,B,D6,7,10,11,G2,M1, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead rāvaṇa-, "Rāvaṇa's."

37. "or dies" mriyeta vā: Literally, "or he might die." Ś,Ñ,V1,3,B2–4,D2,3,5–7,10–12, T2,3,G2,M2,7,8, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read the present indicative mriyate vā, "or he dies."

"still in either case" tathāpy ubhayoḥ: Literally, "even so, in both." Ck, Cg, Cm, Ct, and Cr explain that the idea is that, should Rāvaṇa die, Brahmā's promise of invulnerability would have proven false, while should he survive, his investment of the kāladaṇḍa with infallibility would have proven false (daṇḍapāte 'pi rāvaṇajīvane daṇḍasyānṛtatvaṃ rakṣomaraṇe maduktavaravacanasyānṛtatvam ity arthaḥ—so Ct). See Cs's similar comments on verse 35 above. V3,D6,7,10,11,G1, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read tadāpi, "and then," for tathāpi, "even so."

38. "Therefore you must now hold back from that lord of the rākṣasas" rākṣasendrān niyacchādya: Literally, "This day, hold back from the lord of rākṣasas." Ś,Ñ,V1,3,B,D,T3,4, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tan nivartaya laṅkeśāt, "therefore, turn back from the lord of Laṅkā."

"this rod, held high for destruction" daṇḍam enaṃ vadhodyatam: Literally, "this rod, raised for killing." Ñ2,V1,3,B2,D1,2,4,9–11, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead daṇḍam etaṃ samudyatam, "this rod, which is raised up." See notes to 7.98.20.

"Have some regard for the worlds" lokāṃs tvaṃ samavekṣya ca: Literally, "and you, having taken regard for the worlds." Ñ,V3,B (B3 -si),D3,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead lokāṃs tvaṃ yady avekṣase, "if you have any regard for the worlds."

"make my words truthful" satyaṃ mama kuruṣvedam: Literally, "make this [speech] of mine true." Ñ,V1,3,B,D3,5–7,10,11,T3,4, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead satyaṃ ca māṃ kuruṣvādya, "make me truthful this day."

39. "for you are our sovereign lord" prabhaviṣṇur bhavān hi naḥ: Ś,Ñ,V1,3,B1,4,D1–4, 6–12,T3, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read by transposition hi no bhavān. On the word prabhaviṣṇuḥ, see note to 7.5.13.

40. "But . . . what" kiṃ tu: We are forced by the reading to take the words separately. Normally, the expression kiṃtu lacks an interrogative quality and has the sense "but, however." M3 and KK (1905, 1913—7.22.49) and VSP (7.22.47), and the commentaries of Ck, Cg, and Ct read instead the more semantically apposite kiṃ nu, "what indeed?"

"what can I do . . . on the battlefield" kim . . . mayā śakyaṃ kartuṃ raṇagatena: Literally, "what can be accomplished by me, gone to the battlefield."

"since I am unable to kill this rākṣasa, so arrogant by virtue of his boon" yan mayā yan na hantavyo rākṣaso varadarpitaḥ: Literally, "since by me the rākṣasa, arrogant through a boon, is not to be killed." Note the awkward repetition of the adverbial yat, "since." For 40cd, Ś,Ñ,V1,3,B,D,T3, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP substitute a passage of one line [437*]: "If he, who is possessed of a boon, cannot be killed by me (na mayā yady ayaṃ śakyo hantuṃ varapuraskṛtaḥ)."

41. "I shall vanish" praṇaśyāmi: Ck, Cg, Cm, Ct, and Cr note that we are to understand the verb, whose normal sense is "to perish," in the sense of "to vanish from sight." Ck, Cg, and Cm document this usage, citing Dhātupāṭha 4.85 (ṇaśa adarśane—so Ck and Cg; naśa adarśane—so Cm), which authorizes such usage.

42. "Having vanquished Yama" taṃ jitvā: Literally, "having vanquished him." Ck and Ct wryly note that we should supply the phrase "through the grace of the Lord [Brahmā] (bhagavatkṛpayeti śeṣaḥ)." Cs, perhaps even more ironically, glosses, "having vanquished, as it were (jitveva)."

"in great delight . . . in the Puṣpaka" puṣpakena tu saṃhṛṣṭaḥ: Literally, "by the Puṣpaka . . . in great delight." We understand tu to be pleonastic. Ñ,B,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead āruhya puṣpakaṃ bhūyaḥ, "having once more mounted the Puṣpaka."

"loudly proclaimed his own name" nāma viśrāvya cātmanaḥ: Literally, "and having caused his own name to be heard." The proclaiming of one's name on the battlefield is a common practice of warriors. See 7.23.45 and notes, where the phrase is repeated. Cf. 7.33.16 and note. See, too, 6.31.78; 6.42.8; 6.59.5,6; and 6.84.13–14.

43. "Then" tataḥ: Ś1,3,Ñ,V1,3,B1,2,4,D,T3,4, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead sa tu, "but he."

"delighted" hṛṣṭaḥ: In light of the fact that Yama had been, if anything, humiliated by his encounter with Rāvaṇa and Brahmā, some of the commentators naturally try to explain why he is described as hṛṣṭaḥ, "delighted." Ct believes that Yama, etc., are happy because of the preservation of Brahmā's truthfulness (brahmaṇaḥ satyaparipālanaṃ saṃvṛttam iti yamādīnāṃ harṣaḥ). Ck expands somewhat on this theme, noting that Lord Yama is satisfied, thinking: "Through the grace of the Lord, I, who am the foundation of truthfulness, have preserved truthfulness (satyapratiṣṭhasya me bhagavatkṛpayā satyaparipālanaṃ saṃvṛttaṃ kileti vaivasvatasya bhagavataḥ saṃtoṣaḥ)." Cs sees Yama as taking a more personal view. He believes that Yama is pleased because Rāvaṇa has survived the battle only through the intervention of Brahmā and not through any inability of his own (brahmapuraskaraṇena raṇe kṣemī rākṣaso na mamākṣamatayeti hṛṣṭaḥ).

"the highest heaven" tridivam: Literally, "the third heaven." This term is used throughout the epic to mean either heaven in general or the third, or the highest, of the three worlds. Mallinātha, commenting on Śiśupālavadha 1.36 (tṛtīyā dyaus tridivaḥ svargas tasmāt. ghañarthe kavidhānam. vṛttiviṣaye saṃkhyāśabdasya pūraṇārthatvaṃ tribhāgādivat), understands this sense of this term similarly. See 6.107.4–6 and notes.

1. "Next" sa tu . . . tu: Literally, "and or but he . . . and or but." B4,D6,7,10,11,G1,M1, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read tataḥ, "then," for sa tu.

"boastful of his victory" jayaślāghī: D6,7,10,11,T1,2,G3,M1,4,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead raṇaślāghī, "boastful in battle."

"spied" dadarśa ha: Literally, "he saw." Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 484), followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 436), takes the verb to mean that Rāvaṇa went in search of his companions. Benoît (1999, p. 1278) understands that he turned toward his companions. Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1981) chooses to emphasize the particle ha, rendering "saw . . . so the tradition goes."

Following verse 1, D6,7,10,11,S insert a passage of two lines [439*]: "Then, when the rākṣasas saw Rāvaṇa, slashed by weapons, his limbs splattered with blood, they rejoined him delightedly[1] (tato rudhirasiktāṅgaṃ prahārair jarjarīkṛtam / rāvaṇaṃ rākṣasā dṛṣṭvā hṛṣṭavat samupāgaman //)."

[1] "they rejoined him delightedly" hṛṣṭavat samupāgaman: Literally, "delightedly they approached." Ck and Cg believe that the rākṣasas are delighted because somehow or other they have managed to escape even Yama (hṛṣṭavad yamād api kathaṃcin muktā iti hṛṣṭāḥ santaḥ—so Cg). Ck adds that the escape was owing to the grace of the Lord (bhagavatkṛpayā). D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read vismayam for hṛṣṭavat, lending the phrase the sense "they were filled with wonder." Ct remarks that their astonishment is due to the fact that Rāvaṇa has escaped even Yama (yamād api mukta iti vismayaḥ).

2. "Praising him with shouts of victory" jayena vardhayitvā: Literally, "having increased by victory." This or similar phrases are used several times in the poem in contexts in which a hero is praised for or wished victory. We take the term jayena here in the sense of shouts or cries of victory that serve as a greeting for royalty. Among the translators consulted, Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 432) understands similarly, while others understand that Rāvaṇa is being congratulated for his victory. See 6.20.15; 6.27.15; 6.116.32; and notes. Compare 7.1.22 and notes. See also MBh 4.24.7 (498*, line 1) and 4.63.50 (1094*). See Apte (s.v. jaya, meaning 10), who cites this verse.

"they were reassured by Rāvaṇa" sāntvitā rāvaṇena ha: Cs believes that Rāvaṇa's companions are in need of consolation since, like him, they, too, have been wounded by [Yama's] emissaries (te 'pi tadvat taddūtajarjharīkṛtāḥ). Ś,V1,3,D1,2,4,6–12,T4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP substitute the particle tu for ha.

3. "in delight" hṛṣṭaḥ: Literally, "delighted." Ś,Ñ,V1,3,B,D,T3,M6,10, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP (7.23.4), NSP (7.23.4), and Gita Press (7.23.4) read instead rakṣaḥ, "the rākṣasa." T1,2,G3,M1,3, and KK and VSP (7.23.4) read instead the participle gacchan, "going or proceeding," which simplifies the awkward syntax of the verse.

"he proceeded toward Rasātala and plunged into the repository of water, the ocean" rasātalam . . . praviṣṭaḥ payaso nidhim: Literally, "[he] entered Rasātala, the repository of water." The reading is elliptical, since the underworld Rasātala is separate from and beneath the ocean. Commentators make efforts to clarify the situation, and we have followed them. As noted above, KK and VSP read gacchan following rasātalam, yielding the sense "proceeding to Rasātala [he entered]." Ct and Cr suggest supplying one or another form of a verb of motion to make sense of the passage. Thus, Ct would insert the desiderative adjective jigamiṣuḥ, "[he] wishing to go to [Rasātala]," while Cr would add the infinitive praveṣṭum, "in order to enter [Rasātala]." Ck, Cg, and Ct note that it is the necessity of the path [to Rasātala] (mārgavaśāt) that leads Rāvaṇa into the ocean. For the persistent variation in the identification of the rākṣasas' underworld refuge between Pātāla and Rasātala, see notes to 7.8.21.

The genitive singular payasaḥ is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. Ñ,V1,3,B2,4,D6,10,11,T,G,M1,3,5,10, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the genitive plural payasām, "of the waters."

4. "the city of Bhogavatī" bhogavatīm . . . purīm: This is the mythical city of the nāgas, or serpent people, which, as Ck, Cg, and Ct inform us, is in the underworld of Pātāla, under the sea (samudrād adhaḥ pātālalokavartinī nāgānāṃ purī—so Ck and Ct; Cg similarly).

"ruled by Vāsuki" vāsukipālitām: Vāsuki is one of the great serpent lords of Indian mythology, probably best known for his somewhat inglorious role as the churning rope during the great churning of the ocean by the gods and asuras. On the story of the churning of the ocean, see 1.44.14–27.

"he brought the great serpents under his power and, establishing them there" sthāpya nāgān vaśe kṛtvā: Literally, "having established [and] having rendered the nāgas under control." The reading, not found in any of the printed editions and apparently commented upon only by Ck, is elliptical and irregular by the standards of Pāṇinian grammar. Ck glosses the phrase, replacing the gerund sthāpya with the expected sthāpayitvā, "having established." He says: "Having rendered the nāgas under his own power there, and then having established [them] as belonging to him . . . (tatra nāgān svasya vaśe kṛtvātha svīyatvena sthāpya sthāpayitvā)." Ck's idea, which we believe is a sensible one, is that Rāvaṇa first defeats the nāgas in battle and then sets them up in a dependent or feudatory state. B1,2, and Gorresio (7.27.4) apparently gloss and simplify the reading, offering, sthāpayitvā vaśe nāgān, "having established the nāgas under his control." Ś,Ñ1,B1,3,D,T3,4, and Lahore, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP also simplify pāda c, reading kṛtvā nāgān vaśe hṛṣṭaḥ, "having brought the nāgas under his control, he was delighted." Cg and Ct gloss the passage similarly to Ck, but omit any reference to the form sthāpya, as if they were glossing kṛtvā with sthāpayitvā (nāgān vaśe kṛtvā svīyatvena sthāpayitvā).

"the city of Maṇimatī" maṇimatīṃ purīm: D6,10,11,M10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead maṇimayīm, "Maṇimayī."

5. "The Nivātakavacas" nivātakavacāḥ: Literally, "those who have mail for their armor." This is the name of a class of daityas. See 6.50.18 and notes and App. I, No. 68, note 17, following notes to 6.99.20. Arjuna battles these demons in the Mahābhārata (3.167–171).

"who had obtained a boon" labdhavarāḥ: Literally, "[those] by whom a boon was obtained." The nature of the boon is not specified here. Ck, Cg, and Ct assert that the boon was received from Brahmā, while Ck and Ct add that it pertains to the fact that further on in the passage [verse 11] Brahmā will broker an alliance between Rāvaṇa and the Nivātakavacas (bhagavato brahmaṇo 'to 'gre taiḥ sakhyaṃ kāryate bhagavatā rāvaṇasya—so Ck).

"to battle" yuddhena: The word is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. The syntax of the instrumental here seems slightly unusual. Ś,Ñ,V1,B,D1,4,6–12,T,G1,3,M1,3,5,10, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the dative yuddhāya, "for battle."

6. "fought fiercely" prayuddhāḥ: In their comments to GPP 4.16.25 (= 336*, following critical edition 4.16.23), during the Vālin and Sugrīva conflict, both Ct and Cr gloss the term. Ct understands, "those two possessed of violent battle (prakṛṣṭaṃ yuddhaṃ yayos tau)," while Cr offers, "characterized by intense battle (pravṛddhayuddhaviśiṣṭau)." Ñ2,B1, D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead prahṛṣṭāḥ, "frenzied or excited." See 6.77.23 and 6.95.3. Compare 7.25.11; 7.27.20; 7.28.34; and notes.

Following verse 6, Ñ1,2,B1,3,4,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of two lines [441*]: "Enraged, the rākṣasas and dānavas cut each other to pieces with lances, tridents, hatchets, spears,[1] swords, and battle axes (śūlais triśūlaiḥ kuliśaiḥ paṭṭiśāsiparaśvadhaiḥ / anyo 'nyaṃ bibhidhuḥ kruddhā rākṣasā dānavās tathā //)."

"spears" -paṭṭiśa-: KK (1905) reads the variant -paṭṭasa-. Both variants are known to the Yuddhakāṇḍa. See verse 38 and notes below and note to 6.7.2.

7. "a full year" sāgraḥ saṃvatsaraḥ: The phrase is slightly ambiguous. It could also mean, as Cr interprets, "a little more than a year (kiñcid adhikaḥ saṃvatsaraḥ)." Among the translators consulted, only Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1982) and Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 432) understand as does Cr.

"and yet in that time neither side was either victorious or vanquished" na cānyatarayos tatra vijayo vā kṣayo 'pi vā: Literally, "and there was neither victory nor destruction of either of them there." We follow Cr in glossing the adverb tatra to mean tasmin saṃvatsare, "during that year," and kṣayaḥ, normally "destruction or waning," as parābhavaḥ, "defeat." D6,7,10,11, and GSP, NSP, and Gita Press read the adverbial anyataratataḥ, "in either case," for anyatarayoḥ, "of either of the two."

8. "Grandfather Brahmā" pitāmahaḥ: Literally, "the grandfather."

"mounted on his splendid vehicle" vimānavaram āsthitaḥ: Literally, "[he] standing on or seated in that most excellent of vimānas." The term vimāna, which we render as "flying palace" in the case of the Puṣpaka, is polysemic and can also refer to any mount or vehicle in general. Cs, the only commentator to remark on the term here, understands it to refer to Brahmā's vimāna that is borne by haṃsas (vimānavaraṃ haṃsoḍham). This is perhaps a reference to the conventional vehicle of Brahmā, which is the haṃsa. Compare, too, 6.110.23 and notes, where the Puṣpakavimāna itself is yoked to haṃsas.

9. "Calling a halt to the fighting" nivārya raṇakarma tat: Literally, "having warded off the action of battle."

"eternal" vṛddhaḥ: Literally, "old or ancient." Ck (first alternative) glosses, "old, without beginning (anādivṛddhaḥ)." Cg, Ct, and Ck (second alternative) understand, "standing at the head of all the gods and asuras (sarvadevāsurakūṭasthaḥ)."

"unambiguously" viditārthavat: Literally, "possessed of known meaning or in such a way that its meaning is understood." The word can be read either adjectivally, as modifying vākyam, lending the sequence the sense "speech that possessed known meaning," or adverbially, with the verb uvāca, "he spoke," lending the sequence the sense "he spoke speech in such a way that its meaning was known." Ck and Ct gloss, "to be expressed with a meaning that is understood very clearly (suspaṣṭāvagatābhidheyam)." Cr, similarly, glosses, "characterized by clear or well-known meaning (prasiddhārthaviśiṣṭam)."

10. "Surely it is impossible for the gods and asuras to defeat Rāvaṇa in battle." na hy ayaṃ rāvaṇo yuddhe śakyo jetuṃ surāsuraiḥ: Literally, "Indeed, this Rāvaṇa cannot be defeated in battle by the gods and asuras."

"Nor is it possible for the gods and asuras, together with Indra, to vanquish you, gentlemen." na bhavantaḥ kṣayaṃ netuṃ śakyāḥ sendraiḥ surāsuraiḥ: Literally, "You gentlemen are not able to be led to destruction by the gods and asuras together with Indra." Ironically, despite the description of Brahmā's words as "unambiguous (viditārthavat)" in verse 9 above, the line, in fact, is ambiguous, lending itself to two opposite meanings. The second meaning would be "Nor is it possible for you gentlemen, along with the gods and asuras, including Indra, to vanquish [him]." Cr, who reads a slight variant, understands this interpretation, glossing, "This Rāvaṇa is incapable of being defeated even by the gods and asuras. For that very reason, you gentlemen, together with the immortal gods and the dānavas, that is to say, you gentlemen accompanied by [all] worlds, together with the immortal gods and dānavas, are incapable of leading him to destruction. The word 'capable' should be added. (ayaṃ rāvaṇaḥ surāsurair api jetuṃ na śakyo 'ta eva sāmaradānavair amaradānavasahitair lokaiḥ sahitā bhavantaḥ kṣayaṃ netuṃ na śaktā iti śeṣaḥ.)" This interpretation is followed only by Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 432). But aside from making the two halves of the verse essentially redundant, it fails to take account of the fact, stated in verse 7 above, that, even after a year of fighting, neither side can gain the victory. One suspects that perhaps, as in the case of Rāvaṇa himself, the boon of the Nivātakavacas, mentioned in verse 5 above, prevents them from being conquered. Our translation is in accord with that of all other translators consulted. Ś,V1,3, D2,3,7,T3,4, and Lahore, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read api sāmaradānavaiḥ "even together with the immortal gods and the dānavas," for śakyāḥ sendraiḥ surāsuraiḥ.

11. "An alliance between you and the rākṣasa would find favor with me." rākṣasasya sakhitvaṃ vai bhavadbhiḥ saha rocate: Literally, "A friendship of the rākṣasa, together with you gentlemen, is indeed pleasing." Cr fleshes out the elliptical statement, noting, "The words 'to us' should be supplied (asmabhyam iti śeṣaḥ)." Ck, Cg, and Ct observe that Brahmā's statement is not merely a suggestion but rather more of a command. As all three note: "We should supply the words 'because it must be done for me' (kartavyatvena mameti śeṣaḥ)." Benoît (1999, p. 1278) translates idiosyncratically, "Dans ces conditions, il vaudrait mieux que . . ." D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read ca, "and," for vai, "indeed."

"For all good things are shared equally among friends" avibhaktā hi sarvārthāḥ suhṛdām: Literally, "For all things of value are undivided among friends." Ck and Ct explain the phrase as follows: "All things of value, that is to say, all things of value that are a means to all enjoyable things, such as wealth, grain, etc., as well as matters of pride, such as victory, defeat, and the like, are undivided among friends, that is to say, become common to them (sarvārthā dhanadhānyādisamastabhogopakarapadārthā jayāpajayādyabhimānaś ca suhṛdām avibhaktāḥ sādhāraṇabhūtāḥ—so Ck; Ct similarly)." Cr explains: "Undivided means not deserving of being divided, by this is suggested that once friendship is established, the reason for conflict will disappear (avibhaktā vibhaktum anarhā etena sakhitve sati yuddhakāraṇaṃ nañkṣyatīti sūcitam)." D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read ca, "and," for hi, "for." Cr glosses yataḥ, "since." See, too, 202*, following notes to 7.11.26; 7.34.9; and notes.

"of this there is no doubt" nātra saṃśayaḥ: Literally, "[There is] no doubt here." Benoît (1999, p. 1278) oddly takes this formulaic phrase to be part of Brahmā's request, understanding it to mean that the friendship should be formed without hesitation. He translates, "sans hésiter."

13. "honored" arcitaḥ: KK reads instead the awkward arthataḥ, which here could possibly mean something like "by reason of wealth or opulently."

"ten-faced Rāvaṇa" daśānanaḥ: Literally, "the ten-faced [one]."

"dwelt there happily" sukhoṣitaḥ: Literally, "dwelt comfortably." D3,6,7,10,11,T1,2,4, G3,M1,3,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP, with the exception of Ck, read instead athoṣitaḥ, "[he] then dwelt."

"and he received as much homage as he did in his own city" svapurān nirviśeṣaṃ ca pūjāṃ prāptaḥ: Literally, "and he received homage in a way that was non-different from his own city." D7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read priyam, "affection," for pūjām, "homage."

14. "And . . . he acquired" sa tūpadhārya: Literally, "But he having received." B3,D6, 7,10,11,T3, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead tatropadhārya, "having received there." KK (7.23.16) and VSP (7.23.16) read instead tatopadhārya, which appears to be a case of double sandhi, although this is not noted by Cg, the only commentator to share the reading, nor is the variant noted in the critical apparatus. Cm (p. 648) apparently reads avadhārya, "having learned," which is also unnoted in the critical apparatus. However, both GPP and KK note the variant. Ck, Cg, Cm (avadhārya), and Ct gloss the gerund with anusṛtya, "having followed, practiced, or observed," which Ck and Ct then further understand as "Having received [it], that is to say, having practiced [it], he acquired, that is to say, he obtained [it] by means of friendship (upadhārya sakhitvenānusṛtya samāptavān prāptavān—so Ct; Ck similarly)." Note that Ck, Cm, and Ct understand that Rāvaṇa acquires his magic powers by virtue of his friendship (sakhitvena) with the Nivātakavacas. Cs takes strong exception to this characterization, quoting Ct and urging that his comment be ignored on the grounds that it is not in keeping with the respect due Rāvaṇa, who, he understands, had legitimately acquired this knowledge during regular teaching sessions by and from others. (upadhāryānyair anyebhyaḥ pravacanakāle svayaṃ śrutvā. samāptavān prāptavān. sakhitvenānusṛtyeti nāgojibhaṭṭavyākhyānaṃ rāvaṇamānitānanuguṇam ity upekṣyam.) Cr understands that Rāvaṇa acquires the spells for the sake of companionship (sāhāyyārthaṃ gṛhītavān). Presumably, this is a reference to the support or assistance of Rāvaṇa's ministers, who are referred to as his companions (svasahāyān) in verse 1.

"with a disciplined mind . . . the ninety-nine" śatam ekonam ātmavān: Literally, "a hundred reduced by one . . . self-possessed or self-controlled." V1,3,B3,D6,7,10,11,T3, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead śatam ekaṃ samāptavān, "he acquired one hundred."

"powers of illusion" māyānām: Literally, "[ninety-nine] of powers of magical illusion." Cg glosses, "spells for the employment of the asuras' magical illusions (māyānām asuramāyāyogavidyānām)." Ck understands, "spells for the employment of the spells of the asuras (māyānām asuravidyāprayogavidyānām)." See S. Goldman 2010a.

"Varuṇa, lord of the waters" salilendra-: Literally, "lord of the waters."

15. "which was protected by the Kālakeyas" kālakeyābhirakṣitam: D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead kālakeyair adhiṣṭhitam, "occupied by the Kālakeyas." This incident is mentioned in the Yuddhakāṇḍa. See 6.7.9–10 and notes, where the commentators identify the dānavas in question as the Kālakeyas. See, too, Prakṣipta I, sarga 1.1 and notes, and Shukla 2003, p. 139.

Following 15ab, D5–7,10,11,S (except M6) insert a passage of four lines [443*]: "Having gone there and having slain the Kālakeyas, who were arrogant in their might, he then cut down[1] with his sword his mighty brother-in-law, Vidyujjihva,[2] Śūrpaṇakhī's husband, who, arrogant in his might, was licking the rākṣasa with his tongue[3] in battle."

[1] "he then cut down" cācchinat tadā: Literally, "and he then cut down." D10,11,T3,G2,M4,7, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead prācchinat tadā, "he then cut down." At least one commentator seeks an explanation for Rāvaṇa's killing of his own brother-in-law. Cs believes that he did so inadvertently (pramādena), perhaps in the fog of battle. Given the ways that the commentaries of Ck and Ct have been printed or recorded, it is not clear whether they offer an explanation for this reprehensible action. Both commentators place the explanatory term "because of his extreme savagery (nṛśaṃsatvāt—so Ct)" in the juncture between their references to the killing of Vidyujjihva and to Vidyujjihva's cannibalistic behavior. The editors of GPP, NSP, and Gita Press all align the savagery with the cannibalistic behavior, but the arrangement of the verses found in Ck and the critical edition appears to align the term with the killing.

[2] "Vidyujjihva" vidyujjihva: This Kālakeya daitya is the husband of Rāvaṇa's sister Śūrpaṇakhā [here Śūrpaṇakhī]. His marriage is mentioned at 7.12.2, and Śūrpaṇakhā references this battle and his death at 7.24.21,22. He is not to be confused with the rākṣasa lord and master of illusion of the same name known in the Sundarakāṇḍa (see 5.5.18,24 and notes) and Yuddhakāṇḍa (see 6.22.6–43). See also 7.12.2 and notes. See, too, Goldman and Goldman 2009, pp. 84–85.

[3] "was licking the rākṣasa with his tongue" jihvayā saṃlihantam . . . rākṣasam: Translators who render the singular rākṣasam are divided as to which rākṣasa is intended. Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1982) understands that Vidyujjihva is trying to lick "the ogre to death." Presumably the ogre in question is Rāvaṇa, whereas Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 484), Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 437), and Benoît (1999, p. 1279) think that the asura is licking or devouring another unnamed rākṣasa. T4,G1,2,M1–3,7–9, and Ck, Ct, and Cr read the plural rākṣasān, "rākṣasas." Ck, Ct, and Cr take this to refer to the rākṣasas of Rāvaṇa's entourage (rāvaṇīyān rākṣasān—so Ck and Ct). This interpretation is followed by Dutt (1894, p. 1627), who renders, "was licking (the limbs of Rāvaṇa's followers)," and Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 432). By the term "licking," Ck and Ct understand that Vidyujjihva is tasting, that is to say, devouring, the rākṣasas. (saṃlihantam āsvādayantam. bhakṣayantam iti yāvat.) Ck alone likens Vidyujjihva's cannibalism to that of Kumbhakarṇa (kumbhakarṇavat). Cr understands that Rāvaṇa's reason for cutting down his brother-in-law was that the latter was licking, i.e., tasting, i.e., devouring, his own [i.e., Rāvaṇa's] rākṣasas. (śyālasya chede nimittam āha. rākṣasān svakīyān jihvayā saṃlihantam āsvādayantam. bhakṣayantam iti yāvat.) This odd incident is no doubt inspired by a play on the daitya's name, Vidyujjihva, "Lightning Tongued."

16. "established as firmly as Mount Kailāsa" kailāsam iva saṃsthitam: Literally, "situated like Kailāsa." D6,7,10,11,M10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read bhāsvaram, "radiant or shining," for saṃsthitam, "situated."

17. "And he saw": As Ck, Cg, and Ct note, we must carry over the verb apaśyat, "he saw or spied," from the previous verse (apaśad ity anukarṣaḥ—so Ct; Ck and Cg similarly).

"Surabhi" surabhim: Surabhi is the name of a divine mythical cow, the prototypical kāmadhenu, or "wish-fulfilling cow." In the Āyodhyākāṇḍa, she is said to be the wife of Kaśyapa and the daughter of Dakṣa. She is also said to be the mother of all cows. See 2.68.15–24 and notes, especially note to 2.68.23. However, in the Araṇyakāṇḍa, it was Krodhavaśā, a daughter of Dakṣa, who married Kaśyapa and gave birth to Surabhi. She, in turn, had two daughters: Rohiṇī, who gave birth to cows, and Gandharvī, who gave birth to horses. See 3.13.10–28 and note to verse 27, which mentions variations in this story. See also RaghuVa 1.75ff., which tells of Surabhi's curse of Rāma's ancestor Dilīpa for having failed to respectfully circumambulate her.

"constantly" nityam: D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tatra, "there."

"from whose flow of milk" yasyāḥ payoviniṣyandāt: The -vi- is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. V1,3,D5–10,11,T3, and GSP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead yasyāḥ payobhiniṣpandāt, "from the accumulation of whose milk."

"the ocean . . . comes into being" sāgaraḥ: Literally, "the ocean." Ck, Cg, and Ct note that we must supply the verb, "it came into being (samabhavad iti śeṣaḥ)."

"the Ocean of Milk" kṣīrodaḥ: Literally, "having milk for water." The term is used elsewhere in the epic. See 1.44.16; 4.36.25; 4.39.38–42; 6.40.29; and notes

Following verse 17, D6,7,10,11,T1,2,G,M1,2,4,5,7–10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of one line [444*]: "And Rāvaṇa saw there the mother of the foremost of bulls[1] (dadarśa rāvaṇas tatra govṛṣendravarāraṇim)."

[1] "the mother of the foremost of bulls" govṛṣendravarāraṇim: Ck, Cg, and Ct gloss the term varāraṇim as "the actual mother (sākṣān mātaram)." Cr glosses merely, "mother (mātaram)." This term appears to be unknown elsewhere in the literature. Dictionaries that include the term cite this passage, and PW (s.v.) provides Ct's (and Ck's and Cg's) gloss as the source of the meaning. The context leads one to understand that the cow in question is Surabhi. As Ck, Cg, and Ct note, the compound govṛṣendra- refers to the great bull (mahāvṛṣaḥ—so Ck, Ct, and Cr) belonging to Śiva (rudravṛṣabhaḥ—so Cg), in other words, Nandi.

18. "It is out of that ocean" yasmāt: Literally, "from or out of which." Ck, Cg, and Ct note that the meaning here is that the Ocean of Milk is the source of the moon. They also observe that the relative pronouns and adverb here and in the rest of the verse (yatra and yam) are to be construed with the Ocean of Milk. (yasmāc candra iti. indūtpādakaḥ kṣīrasamudra ity arthaḥ. evam uttaratrāpi yacchabdā vyākhyeyāḥ—so Cg; Ck and Ct similarly.)

"beneficial to all creatures" prajāhitaḥ: V3,D7,10,11,T4,M10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead niśākaraḥ, "maker of night."

"resorting to which" yaṃ samāsādya: Literally, "having approached which." D6,7, 10,11,T1,2,G3,M3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read yaṃ samāśritya, "having had recourse to which."

"subsist by drinking its foam" jīvanti phenapāḥ: Literally, "as drinkers of foam, they live or survive." The term phenapa refers in general to a class of ascetics who live by means of foods that would not deprive other beings of their sustenance. Apte (s.v.) understands the term to refer to ascetics who live on fallen fruit, etc. However, in this case the term must be taken literally. Dutt (1894, p. 1627) observes in a note:

> A typical instance of the lengths which the self-denial of the Hindu sages went is furnished by the case of certain class of ascetics, who, abstaining from every other kind of food, lived solely on the froth of milk, falling off from the udders after the calf had drunk it. This froth-drinking, in preference to drinking the milk itself was dictated by a motive of charity—viz, not to deprive the calf of her legitimate fare.

"as well as the wine of the gods, those drinkers of wine" surā cāpi surāśinām: Literally, "and wine as well, of the consumers of wine." No commentator shares this reading, but, in the context of these allusions to the famous myth of the churning of the primordial ocean, where the wine (surā) that is produced is appropriated by the gods, who thereupon come to be called suras, the reference is surely to them. See, for example, Bālakāṇḍa 44.21–23 and notes. D10,11,M1, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead svadhā ca svadhabhojinām, "and the oblation for [the ancestors,] the eaters of that oblation." Ck, Cg, and Ct all note the irregular short final "a" of svadhā and understand that that oblation is for the spirits of the departed ancestors. (svadhabhojinām iti hrasva ārṣaḥ. svadhābhojināṃ pitṝṇām. svadhā pitṛbhakṣam—so Cg; Ck and Ct similarly.) The term svadhā or kavyam, as it is glossed by Ck, Cg, and Ct, refers specifically to the oblations of food for the pitṛs, the departed ancestors, as opposed to sudhā, the nectar of the gods. See ṚV 10.14.3. Ck and Ct note that svadhā is offered to the pitṛs just as amṛta is to the gods (devānām amṛtavat).

19. "that extremely formidable city" mahāghoram: Literally, "extremely formidable or fearsome." The verse lacks a substantive of place. We have added the word "city."

20. "eternally happy" nityaprahṛṣṭam: Ct glosses, "whose populace was happy (prahṛṣṭajanam)."

21. "Belabored by the leaders of the troops, he then struck them down in battle" tato hatvā balādhyakṣān samare taiś ca tāḍitaḥ: Literally, "Then, having struck the leaders of the army and been beaten by them in battle." We understand with Ck, Ct, and Cr that Rāvaṇa is first struck by the leaders of the army and then, in turn, strikes them down in battle (tair varuṇabalādhyakṣais tāḍitas tāṃś ca samare hatvābhitāḍya—so Ct; Ck and Cr similarly).

"Where has your king gone? Immediately announce to him:" kva gato yo vo rājā śīghraṃ nivedyatām: Literally, "Where has he who is your king gone? Let [him] be quickly informed." D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read ca tato yodhān for kva gato yo vaḥ. This lends the passage the sense "And [he] then [said] to the soldiers, 'Let the king be informed immediately.' " Cr's gloss fleshes out the elliptical passage. He glosses, "Let King Varuṇa be informed, that is, be made aware of my arrival (rājā varuṇo nivedyatāṃ madāgamanaṃ bodhyatām)." We follow Ck and Ct, who believe that the announcement to the king includes the substance of the following verse as well. See notes to verse 22 below

22. " 'I am vanquished,' and you shall then have nothing to fear." na bhayaṃ te 'sti nirjito 'smīti: The placement of the phrase "you shall have nothing to fear (na bhayaṃ te

'sti)" makes its provenance and supposed speaker slightly ambiguous. Like Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 433) and Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1983), we follow the interpretation of Ck, Ct, and Cr, who understand the phrase to be part of Rāvaṇa's speech rather than the scripted speech he intends Varuṇa to recite. (nirjito 'smīti vā vada. evaṃ cet te bhayaṃ nāstīti rāvaṇo 'bravīt—Ct; Ck similarly.) Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 485), however, followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 437), takes the phrase to be part of Rāvaṇa's challenge. According to him, Rāvaṇa is saying, "Accepte la bataille, si tu n'as pas peur." Dutt (1894, p. 1628) appears to think that the phrase is part of Varuṇa's intended speech, translating, "I have been defeated by thee, and then thou hast no fear whatever?[sic]" Benoît (1999, p. 1279) also thinks that the phrase is intended to be part of Varuṇa's speech, giving the entire statement the sense "Je n'ai pas à avoir peur de toi, car je suis déjà vaincu!"

23. "as did Go and Puṣkara" gauś ca puṣkara eva ca: Most of the commentators consulted understand these to be the names of two officers in charge of the army of Varuṇa's sons and grandsons (putrāṇāṃ pautrāṇāṃ balādhyakṣau—so Ck, Cg, Ct; Cm and Cr similarly). Cs, however, as is often the case, takes a contrarian view. He believes that all of them are equally sons of Varuṇa (putrāḥ sādhāraṇāḥ). Cs then cites a passage from the Udyogaparvan of the Mahābhārata (5.96.12–13ab) that identifies Puṣkara as a son of Varuṇa. Cs concludes his comments by noting, no doubt with disapprobation, that Nāgojibhaṭṭa and Maheśvaratīrtha identify the two only as generals (senānayakāv ubhāv ity ubhau nāgojibhaṭṭatīrthau). Benoît (1999, p. 1722) notes the same passage from the Mahābhārata. See, too, MBh 2.108* (following 2.9.25), where both Go and Puṣkara are named in association with Varuṇa and his sons and grandsons.

24. "Endowed with might and with every virtue" vīryaguṇopetāḥ: Literally, "endowed with might and virtues or qualities." D10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read tatra for vīrya-, lending the passage the meaning "endowed with virtues, there."

"they yoked" yuktvā: Literally, "having yoked." The verse is elliptical, and, as Cr points out, we should supply a finite verb of motion to indicate that the warriors are now advancing in their chariots (yuktvā prāyur iti śeṣaḥ).

"which were steered by their owners' will" kāmagān: Literally, "going according to desire." It appears that the term indicates that these are magical chariots, like Rāvaṇa's Puṣpaka itself, that can be directed anywhere by their masters' thoughts. Clearly, as we see in verse 28 below, the chariots can fly. Later on, in verse 32, we see that the chariot horses, too, are described as kāmagāḥ, "going according to desire." Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 433) reads the horses back into this passage, rendering, "chariots that . . . were drawn by horses that could go wherever they wanted." For other chariots going according to desire, see 293* and note 1, following notes to 7.15.30; 7.16.4; 7.25.10; 7.73.18; and notes. See, too, 6.72.12 and notes and 3071*, note 1, following notes 6.96.29.

"the radiance of which was like that of the rising sun" udyadbhāskaravarcasaḥ: KK (7.22.29) and VSP (7.22.28) read instead the synonymous udyadbhāsvaravarcasaḥ. The adjective can modify either te, "they," that is, the sons and grandsons of Vāruṇa, or rathān, "the chariots." Given the construction of the verse, we and the majority of translators consulted believe the latter is much more probable. However, Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 486) and Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 437), who appears to follow him, seem to read the adjective as modifying the warriors. This is certainly the case in Benoît (1999, p. 1279).

25. "hair-raising" lomaharṣaṇam: Some manuscripts (unspecified in the critical apparatus) and Lahore, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the phonological variant romaharṣaṇam.

"between the rākṣasa" rakṣasaḥ: Literally, "of the rākṣasa." D6,7,10,11,T1,2,4,G,M1–3, 5,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead dhīmataḥ, "wise."

26. "But" tu: Ñ1,V1,B2,4,D6,7,10,11,T3,4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead ca, "and."

"entire" kṛtsnam: V1,3,B2,D5–7,9–11,T3,4,G1,2,M1,10, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead the synonymous sarvam, "all."

27. "their own forces cut down" svabalam: Literally, "their own army." The verse provides no descriptive adjective, and we have followed the suggestion of Cr to add vinipātitam, "cut down," from the previous verse.

"harried" ārditāḥ: Literally, "pained or tormented." The nominative plural ending -āḥ is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition.

"by a hail" jālena: Literally, "by mass or multitude."

28. "They had been on the ground" mahītalagatāḥ: Literally, "[they] had gone to the surface of the earth."

"they quickly flew up into the sky" ākāśam āśu viviśuḥ: Literally, "they swiftly entered the sky." The sequence of the action here is slightly confusing, as Varuṇa's sons, who had withdrawn from battle under the assault of Rāvaṇa's ministers, are now willing to engage the much more formidable Rāvaṇa himself. Ct explains the situation as follows: "Varuṇa's sons were first fighting with Rāvaṇa on the ground. But there, having seen their army cut down by Rāvaṇa's ministers, who were in the air, they thought that such a battle was not suitable, and so they withdrew from battle, left the ground, and rose into the sky themselves. (varuṇasya sūtāḥ prathamaṃ mahītalagatā eva rāvaṇena yuddham akurvan. tatra rāvaṇāmātyair ākāśasthair nipātitaṃ svabalaṃ dṛṣṭvā tādṛśayuddhasyānanurūpatāṃ vicārya yuddhān nivṛttā mahīṃ tyaktvā svayam apy ākāśam eva gatā ity arthaḥ.)"

29. "they had reached the same elevation" tulyaṃ sthānam avāpya tat: Literally, "having obtained that equal station or place." Ck, Cg, and Ct gloss, "characterized by the sky (ākāśalakṣaṇam)."

30. "they forced Rāvaṇa to turn his back in battle" rāvaṇaṃ yuddhe . . . / vimukhīkṛtya: Literally, "having made Rāvaṇa one whose face was averted in battle."

"they roared out various shouts of victory" vinedur vividhān ravān: Literally, "they roared various cries."

31. "Seeing" dṛśya: Literally, "Having seen." Note the irregular gerund. Ś,Ñ2,V1,B,D2,8–12,T3,M10, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead the synonymous vīkṣya.

"heroic" vīraḥ: D6,7,10,11,M10, and GPP and NSP read instead the redundant kruddhaḥ, "furious."

"Mahodara" mahodaraḥ: At least two different rākṣasa warriors are given this name in the Yuddhakāṇḍa. Both are ministers of Rāvaṇa; one, who is also the cousin-brother of Rāvaṇa, is slain at 6.58.27–29, and the other, one of the most prominent of Rāvaṇa's advisers and generals, is slain later at 6.85.27–28. See 7.1.16 and notes. Because the events described here took place long before the events of the Rāmāyaṇa proper, it is difficult to determine which of the Mahodaras is meant here.

32. "their horses . . . and which" teṣāṃ hayā ye ca: D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead te vāruṇā yuddhe, "those belonging to Varuṇa . . . in battle." KK (7.23.37) and VSP (7.23.37) read te dāruṇā yuddhe, "those fearsome [ones] . . . in battle." This variant is not noted in the critical apparatus. Since the vulgate reading does not actually specify which targets Mahodara hits, translators who follow this version vary in their understanding of the reference. Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 486) inserts the word chars in parentheses, no doubt harking back to verse 24, where the chariots are said to move at their masters' desire. Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 438) follows him, inserting the word "chariots." Dutt (1894, p. 1629) sees the reference to be to "Varuna's sons." Benoît (1999, p. 1280) has a similar understanding, taking the reference to be to "les guerriers de l'armèe de Varuṇa." Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1984) and Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 434) understand the reference to be to "steeds" and "mounts" of Varuṇa, respectively.

"as swift as the wind" pavanopamāḥ: Literally, "comparable to the purifier."

"steered by their owners' will" kāmagāḥ: Literally, "going according to desire." See verse 24 and note above.

"so that they crashed to the ground" te prayayuḥ kṣitim: Literally, "they went to the earth or ground." T1,2,G3, and KK and VSP read the emphatic particle vai, "indeed," for te, "they."

33. "the soldiers and horses" yodhān hayāṃś ca tān: KK and VSP read śatān, "hundreds," for ca tān. This variant is not noted in the critical apparatus. It is, however, acknowledged in the translation of Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 434), who renders, "in their hundreds." The editors of KK do not acknowledge any variants of their reading.

"of . . . sons" -sūnūnām: T1,M3, and KK and VSP read the synonymous -putrāṇām.

34. "excellent" varaiḥ: KK and VSP read instead hataiḥ, "struck or slain."

35. "bereft of their chariots" tyaktvā rathān: Literally, "having left or abandoned chariots."

"through their innate power" svaprabhāvāt: Ck, Cg, and Ct all agree that this is their innate or natural power deriving from their status as divinities (sahajadevatātvaprayukt avaibhavena—so Ck and Ct).

"remained in the sky" ākāśe viṣṭhitāḥ: Literally, "stood or were stationed in the sky."

36. "Stringing their bows" dhanūṃṣi kṛtvā sajyāni: Literally, "having made [their] bows ones with bowstrings." Ś,Ñ2,V1,3,B1,3,4,D1–10,12,G3, and Lahore, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead dhanūṃṣi kṛtvā sajjāni, "having made [their] bows ready."

"they . . . charged" samabhidravan: Literally, "they ran toward." D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead samavārayan. The causal form here is ambiguous, as it can mean both "they encircled" and "they drove back." All translators consulted, with the exception of Dutt (1894, p. 1629), choose the former option.

Following verse 36, Ñ1 (margin),2,V3,B,D3,6,7,10,11,S (except T4), and Gorresio insert a passage of two lines [450*]: "As storm clouds might a mighty mountain, in a towering rage, they tore at him with arrows loosed from their bows, arrows[1] that were very fearsome and whose heads were like thunderbolts[2] (sāyakaiś cāpavibhraṣṭair vajravaktraiḥ sudāruṇaiḥ / dārayanti sma saṃkruddhā meghā iva mahāgirim //)."

[1] "with arrows . . . arrows" sāyakaiḥ: Literally, "with arrows."

[2] "whose heads were like thunderbolts" vajravaktraiḥ: Literally, "having mouths or faces [which were like] the vajra." D6,7,10,11,T3,G1,M3,10, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead vajrakalpaiḥ, "which were similar to a thunderbolt or the vajra."

37. "standing there" viṣṭhitaḥ: V1,D6,7,10,11,T4,M10, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead mūrchitaḥ (v.l. mūrcchitaḥ), "expanding." KK and VSP read instead nirgataḥ, "sallied forth." This variant is rendered only in the translation of Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 434), who offers, "issued."

"let fall" apātayat: Ś1,Ñ,V1,3,B1–3,D5,8,T3,M2,5,8,9, and Lahore, Gorresio, KK, and VSP read instead atāḍayat, "he struck." This variant is rendered only in the translation of Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 434), who offers, "hit."

"an immensely powerful hail of arrows" śaravarṣaṃ mahāvegam: D7,10,11,T4,M10, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read mahāghoram, "very fearsome," for mahāvegam, "possessing great impact or speed." KK and VSP read the instrumental plural śaravarṣair mahāghoraiḥ, "with very fearsome hails of arrows," which construes with their variant, atāḍayat.

Following verse 37, KK and VSP insert a passage of one line, understood in the critical apparatus to be a repeated variant of verse 39. The verse as it stands in KK (7.23.44ab) and VSP (7.23.44ab) reads: tatas tenaiva sahasā sīdanti sma padātayaḥ, "Then, because of that, the foot soldiers suddenly sank down." This line occurs as 7.23.45ab in GPP, NSP, and Gita Press (7.23.46). The editors of GPP provide a footnote stating that the line occurs before verse 38 in the text of Cg.

38. "spears" paṭṭasān: Ś2,3,Ñ1,V1,D1–7,9–12,T3,4, and Lahore, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead paṭṭiśān. See notes to verse 6 above.

"hundred-slayers" śataghnīḥ: Probably here a type of mace, but see 6.3.12 and notes.

"iron cudgels as well" tomarāṃs tathā: Ś2,3,Ñ2,B,D1–5,7,9–12,T3, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead mahatīr api, "[and] even huge [hundred-slayers]."

39. "Then" atha: M1, and GPP (in brackets, numbered as 44cd), Gita Press, KK, and VSP and read apa[viddhāḥ], "driven back." This, according to the editors of the critical edition, is the second occurrence of this line for KK and VSP, the first occurring following verse 37 above. According to the editors of the critical edition, the verse reads here apaviddhās tu te vīrāḥ sīdanti sma padātayaḥ. However, all other printed versions of this line read apaviddhās te vīrā viniṣpetuḥ padātayaḥ, which is identical to the critical text except for the upasarga apa.

Following verse 39, Ś,Ñ1,V1,D,S, and Lahore, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of three lines [452*]: "But seeing them[1] sinking down helplessly like sixty-year-old elephants caught in a huge mudhole, the immensely powerful[2] Rāvaṇa roared in his joy like a great storm cloud."

[1] "But . . . them" tu tān: Ñ1,V1,D5,6,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead sutān, "[having seen] the sons."

[2] "the immensely powerful" sa mahābalaḥ: T1,2,G3, and KK and VSP read instead sumahaujasaḥ, "those immensely powerful [sons]."

40. "a mighty roar" mahānādam: B3,D7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the plural mahānādān, "mighty roars."

"with all kinds of fearsome weapons" nānāpraharaṇair ghoraiḥ: D7,10,11,M9, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read the somewhat awkward adjectival compound nānāpraharaṇopetaiḥ, which then must construe with dhārāpātaiḥ, yielding the unhappy sense "[as a storm cloud might] with torrents of rain filled with various weapons."

41. "their attendants quickly took them from the battlefield to their homes" raṇāt svapuruṣaiḥ śīghraṃ gṛhāṇy eva praveśitāḥ: Literally, "They were caused to quickly enter their homes from the battlefield by their own men." Only Gorresio (1870, p. 95), Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 439), Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1985), and Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 434) appear to have understood the causative construction of the line correctly. Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 487) and Benoît (1999, pp. 1280–81) take the causative as the simplex and the subject of the causative as the instrumental of accompaniment. Thus, they understand that, despite the fact that the sons of Varuṇa have fallen down, they somehow manage to flee the battlefield and return home with their attendants. Dutt (1894, p. 1629) has the oddest misinterpretation of all. He renders: "Thereupon they were all defeated and fell dead on the ground and all their followers fled away from the field of battle to their homes." Dutt's interpretation is made odder still by the fact that in the very next line he has Rāvaṇa addressing them.

42. "And . . . said" cābravīt: Ñ2,B,D5,7,10,11,M4, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the virtually synonymous tv abravīt.

"Prabhāsa" prabhāsaḥ: Ś1,Ñ2,V1,3,B1,D7,10,11,T4,M10, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, and Gita Press give the name as Prahāsa (prahāsaḥ), while M3, KK, and VSP give Prahasa (prahasaḥ).

43. Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 487) has misunderstood the passage, breaking the halves of the verse into two separate units. He thus understands that in Varuṇa's absence, Rāvaṇa is inviting him to listen to a gandharva hymn on the battlefield. He translates, "Il est parti au Brahmaloka, le grand roi, le maître des eaux, Varuna, que tu invites à entendre cet (hymne) de Gandharva, sur le champ de bataille." Benoît (1999, p. 1281) translates similarly, "Varuṇa notre grand roi, le maître des eaux, s'en est allé dans le monde de Brahmā. C'est en vain que tu l'invites à écouter la musique des gandharva sur le champ de bataille."

"of immense blazing energy" mahātejāḥ: Ś,Ñ,V1,3,B2,4,D2,8,10–12,T3,4, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead mahārājaḥ, "the great king."

"to hear a musical recital" gāndharvam . . . śrotum: Literally, "to hear that which relates to the gandharvas." The gandharvas are the celestial musicians, so the term refers to their singing or to music in general. Cs has an amusing comment based on an upaniṣadic passage that associates Varuṇa with a harsh voice. He says: "'To hear gāndharvam' means 'to hear singing.' Even people who themselves have discordant voices enjoy hearing pleasant voices. And the fact that Varuṇa's voice is discordant is established in the Chāndogyopaniṣad and its commentary, where it is said: 'Varuṇa makes unpleasant vocalizations.' 'But Varuṇa's voice is discordant.' Whenever people take too much water, they get this ailment, which causes a hoarseness of the throat. How much more so would there be discordance on the part of someone who always sits in it [water]? This only stands to reason. (gāndharvaṃ gītam śrotuṃ. svayaṃ visvarā api susvarākarṇanarucayo janā bhavanti. varuṇavaisvaryaṃ ca 'apadhmātaṃ [sic (for apadhvāntam)] varuṇasya' 'varuṇasya tu visvaraḥ' iti cchāndogyopaniṣadbhāṣyābhyāṃ pratipāditam. yadā kadācid adhikodakagrahaṇa upadravo lokasya galaghurghuratāprāpako bhavati. sadā tadāsīnasya kā kathā vaisvarya iti yuktiyuktatvāc ca jñeyam.)" Cs paraphrases Śaṅkara's comments. Compare ChāndoU 2.22.1 and Śaṅkara's commentary.

44. "exhaust yourself" pariśrāmya: Literally, "having fatigued [yourself]." Ñ2,B2,D10, 11,T1,2,4,G1,3,M1,4,6, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the simplex pariśramya, "having become tired."

"to no purpose" vṛthā: Literally, "in vain." D10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead the rather awkward yathā. Those translators who follow this variant nonetheless render as if they are reading vṛthā. The editor of GPP observes in a note that vṛthā is the reading of Cg and Cr, implying, of course, that Ct reads yathā. However, Ct's commentary shows him reading vṛthā with the critical edition.

45. "loudly proclaimed his own name" nāma viśrāvya cātmanaḥ: Literally, "And having caused his own name to be heard." See 7.22.42 and notes, where the phrase also occurs. Compare 7.33.16 and note.

Following verse 45, Ś,Ñ,V1,3,B,D1–5,8,9,12, and Lahore and Gorresio insert, while T1,M3, and KK and VSP insert line 1 only (see below), a passage of two lines [454*]: "Mahodara shouted in a voice breaking with joy,[line 1] 'Rāvaṇa, lord of the rākṣasas, has conquered the second world'[line 2] (mahodareṇa saṃghuṣṭaṃ harṣagadgadayā girā / dvitīyaṃ jitavāṃl lokaṃ rāvaṇo rākṣasādhipaḥ //)."

A variant of this line is found in KK and VSP as pāda cd of verse 1 of the first interpolated sarga. Pāda ab is a variant repetition of 45cd. The verse as it occurs in KK reads "Then, releasing a roar in his delight, he set forth from Varuṇa's realm, together with Mahodara, whose voice was breaking with joy." See Prakṣipta I, sarga 1, note preceding note 1.

46. "Returning by the path on which he had come" āgatas tu pathā yena tenaiva vinivṛtya saḥ: Cs, the only commentator to devote much attention to this verse, offers two explanations for Rāvaṇa's choice of this particular path. He argues that either there is a lack of another path because of the road's being mainly underwater or there is a useless path because of the absence of any practical means of traveling on it. (yena pathāgatas tenaiva vinivṛtya. anenādhvanas toyaprāyatvād adhvāntaraviraho vā gamanaprayojanābhāvād vṛthāgatir iti vā sūcyate.)

"the rākṣasa, rising into the sky" rakṣo nabhastalagataḥ: Literally, "the rākṣasa, gone to the surface of the sky." G1 and KK and VSP read the similar nabhassthalagataḥ. As the passage is found in GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP, it presents a case of liṅgabheda since the term rakṣaḥ, a synonym for rākṣasa, is neuter, while the pronoun saḥ and all the adjectives in the verse are masculine. Only Cs calls attention to the grammatical flaw, proposing a remedy by which we are to read the sequence as a single compound word, rakṣonabhassthalagataḥ. This he takes to mean that Rāvaṇa has taken to the aerial path accompanied by his rākṣasas. He argues that this will put the term into agreement with its masculine modifiers, such as āgataḥ, that are found in the verse. (rakṣonabhassthalagata iti padam akhaṇḍam. rakṣobhiḥ sahito nabhassthalagataś ca tathā. āgata ityādīnāṃ puṃlliṅgāntaviśeṣaṇānām evam eva cet sāmañjasyaṃ bhaviṣyati.)

"turned his face toward Laṅkā and proceeded on his way" laṅkābhimukhaḥ . . . yayau: Literally, "facing Laṅkā, he went."

Sarga 24

1. "abducted . . . the daughters of kings, seers, gods, and gandharvas" jahre . . . narendrarṣidevagandharvakanyakāḥ: Although verses 1–17, which describe the abduction and lamentation of the women, conform to the description of the daughters of the great serpents abducted by Rāvaṇa at 5.10.22 and his comments at 3.45.24, they are in striking contrast to the description of the women of Rāvaṇa's harem mentioned at 5.7.65–66. In that passage, it is stated that Rāvaṇa had not taken a single one of his women by force but that they had, instead, been won over by his virtues and that, with the exception of Sītā, not one of them desired another man or had previously belonged to one. See 5.7.65–66; 5.10.22; and notes. Compare 3.45.24. See, too, Goldman and Goldman 1996, pp. 68–70. The abduction of a woman involving violence against her male relatives, as noted at ManuSm 3.43, is one of the eight forms of marriage in traditional Indian literature. Although it is known as the rākṣasa form of marriage, it is actually considered particularly appropriate only for kshatriyas. See Kane 1974, vol. 2, pt. 1, pp. 516–25; Hara 1974; and R. Goldman 2015b.

"gandharvas" -gandharva-: D6,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and KK read instead -dānava-, "dānavas."

2. "the rākṣasa forced any . . . to enter" hi yāṃ rakṣaḥ . . . /. . . saṃnyaveśayat: Literally, "indeed which [woman] the rākṣasa [saw] he caused [her] to enter." Ñ2,B1,3,4,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, Ck, Cg, and Ct read instead hi yāṃ rakṣaḥ . . . /. . . tāṃ rurodha saḥ, "indeed, which [woman] he, the rākṣasa, saw, he confined or imprisoned her." KK and VSP read instead hi rakṣaḥ saḥ . . . /. . . tām rurodha ha, which has a similar meaning. The masculine pronoun saḥ, juxtaposed with the neuter noun rakṣaḥ, "rākṣasa," creates a problem for the commentators who share this reading. Cg simply notes that we have to construe the two terms together (rakṣaḥ sa iti saṃbandhaḥ). Ck indicates that we are to take rakṣaḥ as a separate word (rakṣa iti pṛthak padam). Ct, for some reason, believes that rakṣaḥ here is a vocative (saṃbuddhiḥ), although we cannot see any contextual basis for such a reading. See notes to 7.23.46.

"woman . . . married or unmarried" kanyāṃ strīṃ vā: Literally, "a maiden or a woman." Ck, Cg, Ct, and Cr clarify the distinction, noting that the former term refers to an unmarried woman (anūḍhā—so Ck, Cg, and Ct), while the generic term strī refers to a woman who has a husband (sabhartṛkā).

3. "along the way" tatra: Literally, "there."

Beginning with verse 3 and continuing to verse 7 of the critical edition, many manuscripts and the printed editions consulted diverge significantly from the critical text in both substitutions and the order of verses and half verses. In the table below we have provided a concordance in an attempt to simplify the information found in the apparatus, which is rather complicated. We have not included the manuscripts in the chart, for to have done so would have been excessively complicated. Since the order of the verses in the critical edition is different from that in the other printed editions consulted, we have provided a translation of the so-called southern recension as it has been reconstructed in the critical text and apparatus. We have noted significant differences found in the printed editions of GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP (= 7.24.3–10ab).

"And in this fashion, there came to be hundreds[1] of the daughters of the great serpents, rākṣasas, asuras, humans, daityas,[2] and dānavas in his flying palace.[466*, lines 1–2] All of them, equally afflicted with sorrow,[3] shed copious tears,[4] which, born of fear and the fire of grief, were like flames of fire.[471*, lines 1a,5d,5ab] That flying palace was filled up[5] with tears of misery born of the grief of those flawless women, as is the ocean with rivers.[467*, lines 1–2] In their hundreds, maidens of the great serpents and *gandharva*s, the daughters of royal seers,[6] and daitya and dānava maidens as well wept in the flying chariot.[467*, lines 3–4] They had long tresses and exquisite limbs, their faces were like the full moon.[4ab] They had full breasts, and at their waists they were like altars encrusted with diamonds.[7][468*] They were ravishing, with their thighs resembling chariot poles.[469*, line 1] Those women were as radiant as burnished gold and resembled the women of the gods.[469*, line 2] Those fair-waisted women were distraught and wracked with grief, sorrow, and fear."[8][470*] [for 6ab following, see translation.]

[1] "there came to be hundreds" śataśo 'bhavan: Ñ2,B4,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead so 'dhyaropayat, "he caused to mount."

[2] "daityas" daitya-: Ñ2,B4,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead yakṣa-, "yakṣas."

[3] "All of them equally afflicted with sorrow" sarvās tāḥ samaduḥkhārtāḥ: Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tā hi (KK, VSP—[tā]ś ca) sarvāḥ samaṃ duḥkhāt, "all of them equally out of grief." See notes to verse 5 below.

[4] "shed copious tears" mumucur bāṣpajaṃ jalam: See notes to verse 5 below.

[5] "was filled up" āpupūre: "it was filled up." Ñ2,B1,3,4,D6,7,10,11,T4,M10, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the participle āpuritam, "[it was] filled up."

[6] "royal seers" rājarṣi-: Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead maharṣi-, "great seers."

[7] "They had full breasts, and at their waists, they were like altars encrusted with diamonds." pīnastanataṭā madhye vajravedisamaprabhāḥ: The line is ambiguous and has been interpreted in different ways by both commentators and translators. The issue is whether the second part of the line refers to the spaces between the women's breasts or to their waists. Ct offers two explanations, as follows: "A diamond altar (vedi) is an altar replete with diamonds, a radiance equal to the middle of that, they had at their waist. That is the meaning. Or, a vedi is a small yellow bee [wasp?] with a color similar to that of a diamond. It is a type of bee with an extremely slender waist. Their waists [were like that], and so on, that is the meaning. (vajrayutā vedir vajravedis tanmadhyasamaprabhā madhyabhāga iti bhāvaḥ. yadvā vajratulyavarṇā vediḥ pītavarṇā bhramarikātisūkṣmakaṭiṣaṭpadaviśeṣas tanmadhyetyādir arthaḥ.)" Cr takes the second approach, that with regard to the women's breasts. He says, "madhye (in the middle) means the space between their breasts, in which there was a radiance equal to that of a diamond altar, they possessed that (madhye stanayor antarāle vajravedisamā prabhā yāsām)." Cs, understanding that the reference is to the women's waists, says: "The diamond altar is an altar replete with diamonds, that is, an altar of fire. Their luster was like that. Or, a vedi made of diamonds is a signet ring; 'madhye (in the middle)' means that they had extremely slender waists, which had the luster of that. As the Viśvakośa says, vedi means a signet ring. (vajravedir vajrayutā vedir agnivedikā tatsamaprabhāḥ. vajrātmikāvedir aṅgulimudrā madhye tatsamaprabhā atisūkṣmakaṭitaṭayaḥ. vedir aṅgulimudrāyām iti viśvaḥ.)" The comparison of a woman's waist to an altar [vedi] refers to an hourglass-shaped altar, with a very narrow middle. Compare KumāSaṃ 1.39. KK and VSP read instead pīnastanyas tathā vajravedimadhyasamaprabhāḥ, "they had full breasts and were as radiant in the middle as a diamond altar," which does little to clarify the ambiguity. See notes to verse 4 below.

[8] "wracked with grief, sorrow, and fear" śokaduḥkhabhayatrastāḥ: Cs makes a distinction between śoka, "grief," which he sees as the externally visible (bahirdṛśyaḥ) signs of emotional distress, and duḥkha, "sorrow," which he defines as internal (āntaram).

4. "All of those young women, bent down by the weight of their breasts, were overwhelmed with grief." śokāyattās taruṇyaś ca samastā stananamritāḥ: Ś,Ñ,V1,3,B1,4,D2, 3,5–12,T3, (T4 inserts after 4), and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP, substitute for 4cd a passage of one line [468*]. See note to verse 3, reconstructed passage, note 7 above.

5. "Trembling and afflicted with sorrow, they shed copious tears, which, born of fear and the fire of grief, were like flames of fire." tulyam agnyarciṣāṃ tatra śokāgnibhayasaṃbhavam / pravepamānā duḥkhārtā mumucur bāṣpajajalam //: Ś,Ñ1,V1,3,D–5,8,9,12, T3,4, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read 471*, line 1a, for 5a and then read 5d, 5ab. See notes to verse 3, reconstructed passage above.

"they shed copious tears" mumucur bāṣpajaṃ jalam: Literally, "they shed water born from tears." See note to verse 3, reconstructed passage, note 4 above.

6. "Inflamed by the sighs of those sighing women" tāsāṃ niśvasamānānāṃ niśvāsaiḥ saṃpradīpitam: Literally, "Inflamed with the sighs of them, who were sighing." Ñ2,B1,4,D6,7,10,11,M6, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tāsāṃ niśvāsavātena sarvataḥ saṃpradīpitam, "Inflamed on every side by the wind of the their sighs."

"sacrificial fire pit" agnihotram: Literally, "the sacrificial offering to Agni." We follow Cg and Ct, who gloss, "the sacrificial fire pit (agnikuṇḍam)."

Following verse 6, Ś,Ñ,V3,B1,3,4,D6–12, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of two lines [472*]: "Fallen into the hands of Daśagrīva, those beautiful young women,[1] distracted with grief, their faces and eyes downcast, resembled does who had fallen into the clutches of a lion (daśagrīvavaśaṃ prāptās tās tu śokākulāḥ striyaḥ / dīnavaktrekṣaṇāḥ śyāmā mṛgyaḥ siṃhavaśā iva //)."

[1] "beautiful young women" striyaḥ . . . śyāmāḥ: Cs defines śyāmāḥ as girls of sixteen years of age (ṣoḍaśavarṣavayasyaḥ).

Following 472*, Ñ,B1,3,4,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert, while V1,D3–5,S insert after verse 6, a passage of one line [473*]: "One of them, terrified, thought:[1] 'Is he going to eat me?' (kācit tv acintayat trastā kiṃ nu māṃ bhakṣayiṣyati //)"

[1] "One of them, terrified, thought" kācit tv acintayat trastā: D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead kācic cintayatī tatra, "one, thinking there." Ct and Cr complete the ellipsis by providing a finite verb and correcting the grammar, "she was." (cintayatī. cintayantī babhūveti śeṣaḥ.)

7. "Is he going to kill me?" hanyād api hi mām ayam: Literally, "Would this one kill me?" Ñ2,B3,4,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead api māṃ mārayed ayam, "Would this one kill me [lit., 'cause me to die']?"

"when they remembered their mothers, fathers, brothers, sons, and fathers-in-law" smṛtvā mātṝḥ pitṝn bhrātṝn putrān vai śvaśurān api: Ñ2,B1,3,4,D5–7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP substitute for 7c a passage of one line [475*]: iti mātṝḥ pitṝn smṛtvā bhartṝn bhrātṝṃs tathaiva ca, "thus having remembered their mothers, fathers, husbands, and brothers."

8. "Oh, what will my son do" kathaṃ nu . . . me putraḥ kariṣyati: Literally, "How indeed will my son act?" Ñ,B1,3,4,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read bhaviṣyati for kariṣyati, yielding the sense "What will become of my son [lit., 'how, indeed, will my son be']?" Cs is concerned that the terms śyāmā, which he understands to be a sixteen-year old girl (see note to 472*, following verse 6 above), and kanyā, "maiden, virgin," would be inappropriate for women who have sons. He therefore, taking advantage of the ambiguities of sandhi, proposes as an alternative that we read the sequence me putraḥ, "my son," as me aputraḥ, which he then takes to mean someone other than my son, i.e., my younger brother-in-law, who is like a son and who will not be able to survive without me. In this way, Cs argues, those two terms would be properly used. Cs further notes that by Rāvaṇa's collecting only women who have not given birth, the proof of this [their virginity] become clear. (putraḥ sūtaḥ. yadvā "aputraḥ" putrabhinnaḥ putrasadṛśo devaraḥ. mayā vinā bhaviṣyati jīviṣyati kathaṃ nu. evaṃ vyākhyāne kanyety uktiḥ śyāmety uktiś ca samañjasībhaviṣyataḥ. rāvaṇasyāprasūtavanitāsamānayanena parīkṣakatā sphuṭībhaviṣyati.) One problem with Cs's argument is that only a married woman can have a devara (brother-in-law), but apparently he is referring to young married women who are still virginal and therefore childless. See Cs's comments at notes to 7.25.28.

9. "without my husband, who is a god to me" bhartāraṃ daivataṃ vinā: Literally, "without the husband, the deity." Ñ2,B1,3,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead bhartus tasmād ahaṃ vinā, "I, without the husband."

"Be merciful, Mṛtyu, I beg you. Carry me away to the abode of Yama." mṛtyo prasīda yāce tvāṃ naya māṃ yamasādanam: Ñ2,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead mṛtyo prasādayāmi tvāṃ naya me duḥkhabhāginīm, "Death, I beseech you, carry me, whose lot is only sorrow, away."

10. "What evil deed must I have done long ago in another birth?" kiṃ nu me duṣkṛtaṃ karma kṛtaṃ dehāntare purā: Literally, "What evil deed was done by me long ago in another body?" Ñ2,B1,4,D7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read tat, "that," for me, "by [lit., 'of'] me."

"such that I have been assaulted by him and have fallen into a sea of grief" tato 'smi dharṣitānena patitā śokasāgare: Literally, "Because of that, I am assaulted by him and fallen into a grief-ocean." D10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead evaṃ sma duḥkhitāḥ sarvāḥ patitāḥ śokasāgare, "In this way, all of us sorrowing have fallen into a sea of grief."

11–12. "I cannot see any end to this sorrow of mine in this world" na . . . paśyāmi duḥkhasyāntam ihātmanaḥ: Literally, "I do not see here an end to my own sorrow." V1,B1,4,D7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead na . . . paśyāmo duḥkhasyāsyāntam ātmanaḥ, "we do not see an end of this sorrow of ours."

"How pathetic are men!" aho dhiṅ mānuṣāṃl lokān: Literally, "Oh damn these men or human people!" Ñ2,B1,2,4,D6,7,10,11,M6, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead mānuṣaṃ lokam, "the human world or the world of men."

"Indeed, nothing is more abject" nāsti khalv adhamaḥ paraḥ: Literally, "Indeed, there is no other [one] that is lower." Ck and Ct add the phrase "than the world of men (manuṣāl lokād iti śeṣaḥ)." Cr understands similarly.

"my . . . kinsmen" bāndhavāḥ . . . me: D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead bhartāraḥ . . . naḥ, "our husbands."

"obliterated . . . as are the stars by the risen sun" uditenaiva sūryeṇa tārakā iva nāśitāḥ: For 12cd, Ś,Ñ,V1,3,B1,3,4,D,T2,4, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP substitute a passage of one line [479*]: "Just as at the proper time the constellations are obliterated by the rising sun (sūryeṇodayatā kāle nakṣatrāṇīva nāśitāḥ /)." Note the liṅgabheda.

13. "delights in the ways of slaughter" vadhopāyeṣu rajyate: Literally, "He is enamored of or attached to the methods of slaughter." KK (7.24.18ab) and VSP (7.24.18cd) read instead vadhopāyeṣu yujyate, "is conjoined with or yoked to the methods of slaughter." Ct glosses, "the methods to bring about slaughter, such as killing with weapons (vadhasaṃpādakeṣūpāyeṣu śastraghātādiṣu)."

"Alas, he does not realize himself what an evil nature he has" aho durvṛttam ātmānaṃ svayam eva na budhyate: Literally, "Oh, he does not himself realize at all that [he] himself is of bad conduct." Ñ2,B1,4,D7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead aho durvṛttam āsthāya nātmānaṃ vai jugupsate, "Oh, although resorting to evil conduct, he is not disgusted with himself."

14. "appropriate . . . unbecoming" sadṛśaḥ . . . asadṛśam: Literally, "conformable . . . unconformable." Ck, Ct, and Cr gloss, "fitting or appropriate (yogyaḥ)" for sadṛśaḥ, while Cs glosses, "appropriate to his race or family (kulocitaḥ)." Ck, Ct, and Cs further note that we should add that Rāvaṇa's valor is in keeping with the grace of the Lord [Brahmā], which was attained through austerities (tapaḥsaṃpāditabhagavatprasādasyeti śeṣaḥ).

15. "this evil-minded . . . is enamored of women" strīṣu rajyati durmatiḥ: Ñ2,B4,D7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead ramate rākṣasādhamaḥ, "the lowest of rākṣasas takes [his] pleasure."

"Rāvaṇa . . . he shall . . . meet his death" vadhaṃ prāpsyati rāvaṇaḥ: Ś,Ñ,V1,B1,3,4,D1–7,9–12,T3,M1, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read durmatiḥ, "evil-minded [one]," for rāvaṇaḥ. KK (7.24.20cd) and VSP (7.24.20ab) invert the order and understand the verb as an ātmanepada, reading instead prāpsyate durmatir vadham.

"therefore" tasmād dhi: Therefore, indeed." Ś,Ñ,V1,B1,3,4,D1–4,6,7,9–12,T3, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the contextually synonymous emphatic particle vai, "indeed," for hi, "indeed."

Following verse 15, Ś,Ñ1,V1,3,D1–7,10–12,T3,4, and Lahore, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of two lines [480*]: "Because of those words uttered[1] in this fashion by those chaste and excellent women, drums thundered in the sky and a shower of flowers fell (satībhir varanārībhir evaṃ vākyair udīritaiḥ / nedur dundubhayaḥ khasthāḥ puṣpavṛṣṭiḥ papāta ca //)."

[1] "Because of those words uttered" vākyair udīritaiḥ: D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead vākye 'bhyudīrite, lending the phrase the sense of "when that speech had been uttered [by those women]."

16. "Then" tadā: Ñ2,B1,4,D7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead samam, "all together."

"who were firmly fixed on the path of virtue" sthitābhiḥ sādhuvartmani: Literally, "situated on the path of the virtuous." Ñ2,B1,3,4,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead babhūva vimanā iva, "he became somewhat dejected."

"he was drained of his blazing energy and robbed of his luster" hatatejāḥ suniṣprabhaḥ: Ñ2,B1,3,4,D7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead hataujā iva niṣprabhaḥ, "he was devoid of luster like someone stripped of blazing energy."

17. "As the women continued to lament in this fashion, Rāvaṇa, lord of the rākṣasas" evaṃ vilapamānāsu rāvaṇo rākṣasādhipaḥ: Ñ2,B1,3,4,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP substitute a passage of one line [482*]: "Hearing such lamentation from them, that bull among rākṣasas (evaṃ vilapitaṃ tāsāṃ śṛṇvan rākṣasapuṃgavaḥ)."

"by the night-roaming rākṣasas" niśācaraiḥ: Literally, "by the night-roaming [ones]."

18. "Then the sister of the rākṣasa king, in great sorrow, threw herself at his feet and began to speak." tato rākṣasarājasya svasā paramaduḥkhitā / pādayoḥ patitā tasya vaktum evopacakrame //: Literally, "Then the supremely distressed sister of the rākṣasa king, fallen at his feet, began to speak." Rāvaṇa's sister is, of course, Śūrpaṇakhā, who will not be identified by name until verse 35 below, the final verse of the sarga.

For verse 18, Ñ2,B1,3,4,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP substitute a passage of two lines [485*]: "At this juncture, Rāvaṇa's sister, a fearsome rākṣasa woman, who could take on any form at will, suddenly threw herself [lit., 'fell'] on the ground (etasminn antare ghorā rākṣasī kāmarūpiṇī / sahasā patitā bhūmau bhaginī rāvaṇasya sā //)."

19. "Raising up his sister" tataḥ svasāram utthāpya: Literally, "Then having caused his sister to arise." Ñ2,B1,3,4,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tāṃ svasāraṃ samutthāpya, "having cause that sister to rise."

"What is this, auspicious lady? Please tell me quickly." kim idaṃ bhadre vaktum arhasi me drutam: Ñ2,B1,3,4,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP, with the exception of Ck, read vaktukāmāsi māṃ drutam for vaktum arhasi me drutam, yielding the sense "that you desire to speak to me so urgently." Ck (who shares the critical reading) and Ct understand that the fact that Rāvaṇa is asking his sister what she is so upset about suggests that he is unaware of his having killed her husband, Vidyujjihva. (bhadre me mahyaṃ kiṃ drutaṃ vaktukāmāsi. evaṃ vadatā vidyujjihvavadho 'pi viśiṣya na jñāyata iti sūcyate—so Ct.) Cs makes a similar observation but focuses exclusively on Rāvaṇa's use of the salutation bhadre, "auspicious woman." This term, of course, would never be used of a widow (bhadra iti saṃbodhanena na bodhas tatpatir mṛta ity asyeti jñāyate). Interestingly, the critically established text contains no mention of Rāvaṇa's killing of his brother-in-law Vidyujjihva in its account of the assault on the Kālakeyas in sarga 23. The death of Vidyujjihva appears only in 443* (see following notes to 7.23.15). Compare note to 6.103.2, where the term bhadre is used of Sītā. See, too, notes to 7.17.4.

20. "the rākṣasa woman" rākṣasī: Ñ2,B1,3,4,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead raktākṣī, "[she] whose eyes were red."

"I am ruined! For you, in your might, have made me a widow, your majesty." hatāsmi vidhavā rājaṃs tvayā balavatā kṛtā: Literally, "I am destroyed. I have been made a widow by mighty you, O king." Ñ2,B1,3,4,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead kṛtāsmi vidhavā rājaṃs tvayā balavatā balāt, "O king, I have been made a widow by mighty you through your might."

21. "Your majesty, you, in your might . . . those" ete vīryāt tvayā rājan: Literally, "O king, these by you out of strength." D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio (ye te), GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read by transposition ete rājaṃs tvayā vīryāt, while T1,2,G3,M1,3, and KK and VSP read ete rājaṃs tvayā vīrāḥ, "O king, these heroes by you."

"of immense strength and valor" mahābalaparākramāḥ: Ñ2,B3,4,D2,3,6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead sahasrāṇi caturdaśa, "fourteen thousand [Kālakeyas]."

22. "And in that battle my beloved husband, dearer to me than life itself, was slain by you, a brother no different than an enemy." tatra me nihato bhartā garīyāñ jīvitād api / sa tvayā dayitas tatra bhrātrā śatrusamena vai //: Literally, "There my beloved husband, weightier even than life, was slain there by you, a brother equal to an enemy."

For verse 22, Ñ2,B1,3,4,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP substitute a passage of two lines [486*]: "There, dear brother, my immensely powerful husband, dearer to me even than my life breaths, was slain by you, an enemy in the guise of a brother[1] (prāṇebhyo 'pi garīyān me tatra bhartā mahābalaḥ / so 'pi tvayā hatas tāta ripuṇā bhrātṛgandhinā //)."

[1] "an enemy in the guise of a brother" ripuṇā bhrātṛgandhinā: Literally, "by an enemy merely smelling (i.e., appearing) like a brother." Cs offers two explanations of the idiomatic expression bhrātṛgandhin. In the first, he takes the term gandha in the sense of egotism, thus lending the compound the sense "egotistical in regard to his brothers." (gandho 'haṃkāro 'syāsti sa tathā. bhātṛṣu gandhī sa ca.) As an alternative, Cs appears to interpret as we do, taking gandhin as "merely seeming," in other words, "a kinsman merely in name alone." (asau gandhīti vā. bandhunā tadapadeśena.) KK (7.24.28cd) and VSP (7.24.29ab) show the somewhat obscure variant bhrātṛgṛdhnunā, literally, "greedy or covetous of a brother." Perhaps the intended sense is "envious of your brothers."

23. "Since, your majesty, I have been ruined by you" yā tvayāsmi hatā rājan: Literally, "I who have been destroyed by you, O king." D7,10,11,G1,M5, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tyayāsmi nihatā rājan, "I have been utterly destroyed by you, O king."

"I shall now have to endure the painful epithet 'widow,' which you have inflicted upon me" duḥkhaṃ vaidhavyaśabdaṃ ca dattaṃ bhokṣyāmy ahaṃ tvayā: Literally, "I will enjoy the painful word 'widowhood' given by you." Ñ2,B1,3,4,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio,

GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead rājan vaidhavyaśabdaṃ ca bhokṣyāmi tvatkṛtaṃ hy aham, "For, O king, I shall enjoy the word 'widowhood,' which you have created." B1,4, and Gorresio, KK, and VSP read tvatkṛte for tvatkṛtam, lending the passage the sense "For, O king, I shall enjoy the word 'widowhood' on your account."

24. "Should not your son-in-law, surely, have been protected" nanu nāma . . . rakṣyo jāmātā: Normally, one would read the particle nanu in its common emphatic sense of "surely." Since, however, it is followed here by another indeclinable with the same sense, nāma, we are inclined to follow the commentators in reading nanu as two separate words, na nu, "is it not," and understanding that Śūrpaṇakhā's tone of voice is ironic. (na nv iti pṛthakpade. jāmātā nāma samareṣv api rakṣyo nu na. kākuḥ. rakṣya evety arthaḥ—so Ct.) The term jāmātā, "son-in-law," is used despite the fact that Vidyujjihva was actually Rāvaṇa's brother-in-law. Since, however, he was the husband of Rāvaṇa's younger sister, the term is not inappropriate here, and Śūrpaṇakhā probably uses it to heighten the pathos of the situation. Cf. note to 7.25.47.

"even in battle" samareṣv api: Literally, "even in battles."

"Yet, having slain him in battle . . . your majesty" taṃ nihatya raṇe rājan: Literally, "having slain him in battle, O king." Ś,Ñ,V1,3,B1,3,4,D,T3,4, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead sa tvayā nihato yuddhe, "He was slain by you in battle."

25. "Addressed in this fashion . . . the rākṣasa" evam uktas tayā rakṣaḥ: Literally, "Addressed thus by her, the rākṣasa." Ś,Ñ,V1,3,D,T3,4, and Lahore, GPP, NSP, KK, and VSP read daśagrīvaḥ, "Daśagrīva," for tayā rakṣaḥ, "by her . . . the rākṣasa," lending the phrase the sense "Addressed in this fashion, Daśagrīva . . ."

26. "Enough of this despondency, dear child" alaṃ vatse viṣādena: Ś,Ñ,V1,B1,3,4, D1–5,7–12, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead alaṃ vatse ruditvā te, "Enough of your weeping, dear child!"

"You shall have nothing to fear in any way." na bhetavyaṃ sarvaśaḥ: Literally, "it is not to be feared from anything [or anyone]." Cv notes that this means that Śūrpaṇakhā is to have no fear whatever of her male relatives, etc., in other words, that she can move about freely (bāndhavādhibhyo mā bhaiṣīḥ svairaṃ carety arthaḥ). This is important, as it provides an explanation for the fact that Śūrpaṇakhā will wander about as a sexually liberated female in the Araṇyakāṇḍa, which will lead to her fateful confrontation with Rāma (see 3.3.16–17 and notes).

"always" nityaśaḥ: Ñ2,B1,3,4,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead yatnataḥ, "assiduously."

"with special honors and gifts" mānadānaviśeṣaiḥ: This compound could also be taken to mean "with [various] kinds of honors and gifts." Ñ2,B1,3,4,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read dānamānaprasādaiḥ, which lends the compound the sense "with gifts, honors, and favors."

27. "Intoxicated in battle" yuddhe pramattaḥ: The term pramatta can also mean "heedless or careless." Ñ2,B1,4,D9–11,G2,M10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the synonymous compound yuddhapramattaḥ.

"so I did not, lovely lady, distinguish in battle my friends from my enemies" nāvagacchāmi yuddheṣu svān parān vāpy ahaṃ śubhe: Literally, "I do not recognize in battles my own or others, O lovely one." Ñ2,B4,D7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead nāhaṃ ajñāsiṣaṃ yudhyan svān parān vāpi saṃyuge, "As I was fighting, I did not know either my own or others in battle."

Following verse 27cd ("so I did not, lovely lady, distinguish in battle my friends from my enemies"), Ñ2,V1,3,B1,3,4,D1–7,10,11,T,G3,M3,6,10, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of one line [489*]: "Attacking [and] intoxicated with battle, I did not recognize[1] the son-in-law (jāmātaraṃ na jānāmi praharan yuddha-durmadaḥ)."

[1] "I did not recognize" na jānāmi: Literally, "I do not recognize." Ñ2,B1,3,4,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead na jāne sma, "I did not know."

28. "Whatever beneficial thing might be accomplished at this time, I will do for you." asmin kāle tu yat prāptaṃ tat kariṣyāmi te hitam: Literally, "And at this time, what is accomplished, I will do that beneficial thing for you." Ct understands that we should add to prāptam, "attained or accomplished," the phrase "through the necessity of its being done (kartavyatveneti śeṣaḥ)." Ck and Cg similarly explain, "through the necessity of its being done by me (matkartavyatveneti śeṣaḥ)." Cr glosses simply, "suitable or proper (yogyam ity arthaḥ)."

"You should stay with our brother Khara, who lives in lordly splendor." bhrātur aiśvaryasaṃsthasya kharasya bhava pārśvataḥ: Literally, "Be by the side of brother Khara, who partakes in lordship." Ck, Cg, and Ct, looking forward to verse 30, explain that Khara is more of a cousin-brother than an actual brother, for the term bhrātṛ, "brother," is glossed as mātṛṣvaseya, "the son of the mother's sister" (so Ck, Cg, and Ct). See verse 30 and note below. See, too, 7.12.1 and notes. D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead bhrātur aiśvaryayuktasya kharasya vasa pārśvataḥ, "You must dwell at the side of brother Khara, who is endowed with lordship." Ck, Cg, and Ct observe that Rāvaṇa is sending his sister away because he is too preoccupied with the affairs of the kingdom to pay proper attention to her (mama rājyapāravaśyena tvatsaṃmānane 'vakāśābhāva iti bhāvaḥ—so Ct; Ck and Cg similarly).

29. "the lord . . . commanding and supporting them" prabhuḥ prayāṇe dāne ca: Literally, "the lord or master with respect to setting forth and giving." The reference is somewhat obscure. We, like Dutt (1894, p. 1653), Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1989), and Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 455), follow the interpretation of Ck, Cg, and Ct, who understand the reference to be to dispatching rākṣasas and providing them with food, drink, clothing, etc. (prayāṇe preṣaṇe dāne 'nnapānavastrādidāne—so Cg; Ct and Ck similarly). Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 489), followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 459) and Benoît (1999, p. 1283), understands the terms to refer, respectively, to expeditions and the distribution of booty.

"immensely powerful" mahaujasām: Ś,Ñ,V1,D,T3,4, and Lahore, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead mahābalaḥ, "extremely powerful," which modifies Khara rather than his rākṣasas.

30. "your brother" bhrātā tava: Ś3,Ñ1,V1,3,D7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead bhrātāyaṃ vai, "this brother indeed."

"the son of your mother's sister" mātṛṣvasuḥ putraḥ: Ś,Ñ1,V1,3,D1–5,7–12,T3 (first time), and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead mātṛṣvaseyas te, "your [male] maternal cousin." See notes to verse 28 above.

"always . . . carrying out" sadā kurvan: D7,10,11,T3 (first time),4, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tavādeśam, "your command."

"whatever words you yourself shall utter" yad vakṣyasi vacaḥ svayam: D7,10,11,T3 (first time),4, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead sadā kurvan niśācaraḥ, "the night-roaming [one] always carrying out."

31. "that hero" śūraḥ: Literally, "hero." Ñ2,V3,B3,D6,7,10,11,G1,2,M5, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the synonymous vīraḥ.

Following verse 31, D10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of two lines [490*]: "And there heroic Khara will always[1] carry out your words.

And he will be the lord of those rākṣasas, who can take on any form at will. (tatra te vacanaṃ śūraḥ kariṣyati sadā kharaḥ / rakṣasāṃ kāmarūpāṇāṃ prabhur eṣa bhaviṣyati //)"

[1] "always" sadā: B1,3,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead tadā, "then."

32. This verse is omitted by B1,3,D10,11, and GPP, NSP, VSP, and Gita Press. KK includes it with a slight variant in brackets, numbered as 7.24.39.

"was cursed . . . by . . . Uśanas" śaptaḥ . . . uśanasā: At 7.72.8–10 Uśanas curses the Daṇḍaka region, but in that passage, there is no mention of rākṣasas.

"who said": The words have been added.

"without a doubt" na saṃśayaḥ: Ñ2,B4,D6,7, and KK read instead mahātmanām, "of great [rākṣasas]."

33. "he assigned to him an army" sainyaṃ tasyādideśa: Literally, "he ordered his army." Ñ2,B1,3,4,D6,7,10,11,M8, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read the synonymous variant asya for tasya, "of him." The pronoun leaves an ambiguity as to whether the troops are being assigned to Khara or to his general Dūṣaṇa.

"who could take on any form at will" kāmarūpiṇām: Ñ2,B3,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead vīryaśālinām, "endowed with valor."

34. "surrounded by all" sarvaiḥ parivṛtaḥ: Ñ2,B1,3,4,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read by transposition parivṛtaḥ sarvaiḥ.

"Khara proceeded" kharaḥ saṃprayayau: D7 and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead āgacchata kharaḥ, "Khara came," while D6,10,11, and KK and VSP read agacchata kharaḥ, "Khara went."

35. "Śūrpaṇakhā . . . delighted" śūrpaṇakhā prītā: This is the only mention of Śūrpaṇakhā by name in this sarga. Ñ2,B1,3,4,D7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read tatra, "there," for prītā, "delighted." See notes to verse 18 above.

Sarga 25

1. "forest" vanam: Ñ2,V1,B1,3,4,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead balam, "army."

2. "the great lord of the rākṣasas" mahātmā rākṣasendraḥ: Ñ2,B1,3,4,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tad rākṣasendro balavān, "then the mighty lord of the rākṣasas."

"Laṅkā's vast woodland known as Nikumbhilā" nikumbhilā nāma laṅkāyāḥ kānanaṃ mahat: The name Nikumbhilā is known to the Sundarakāṇḍa (5.22.41 and notes), where it is the name of a goddess worshiped by the rākṣasa women, and in the Yuddhakāṇḍa, where it is also the name of the grove or shrine where Indrajit performs his sacrifices. Cv notes that because of its connection with the goddess Nikumbhilā, the grove takes on her name (nikumbhilāsaṃbandhāt kānanam api tathocyate). Here, as in the Yuddhakāṇḍa, the commentators agree that the grove is located near the western gate of Laṅkā. See 6.60.18; 6.69.23; and notes. In addition, Cm, Ct, and Cr note that it is a grove particularly appropriate for the completion of rituals performed there (laṅkāpaścimadvāradeśavarti). See notes to 6.60.19 and 6.71.13. For Brahmā's boon to Indrajit and the conditions governing it with reference to the Nikumbhilā grove, see 6.72.10–13 and notes. See, too, S. Goldman 2012. Ñ2,B1,3,4,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read laṅkopavanam uttamam, "Laṅkā's unsurpassed grove," for laṅkāyāḥ kānanaṃ mahat.

3. "There" tatra: Ś,Ñ,V1,3,B1,3,4,D,T3,4, and Gorresio, Lahore, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tataḥ, "then."

"a sacrifice was taking place, blazing, as it were, with splendor" viṣṭhitaṃ yajñaṃ saṃpradīptam iva śriyā: The phrase is somewhat ambiguous. We follow the interpretation of Ck, Cg, and Ct, who gloss pravṛttam, "in process, taking place," for viṣṭhitam, normally "set or fixed." This indicates that they take the term yajña in its most common sense of a ritual or sacrificial rite. Cv takes the participle in the sense of samāptam, "completed," indicating that he, too, understands yajñam as a ritual action. Cr, however, takes viṣṭhita in its primary sense of "fixed or standing" and then extends the sense of yajñam to mean a sacrificial hall or enclosure (yāgaśālā). Ñ2,B1,4,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead śriyā saṃprajvalann iva, which makes Rāvaṇa himself the one who is blazing, as it were, with splendor, not the sacrifice or its enclosure. Nonetheless, all translators consulted, with the exception of Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1990), which correctly renders the vulgate reading, understand that it is the sacrifice or the hall that is blazing. The source of this confusion may have to be traced as far back as the translation of Gorresio. Like many northern manuscripts, Gorresio's text (7.33.3) reads, dadṛśe viṣṭhito yajñaḥ śriyā saṃprajvalann iva, in other words, it is a karmaṇi prayoga in which the nominative participle does indeed modify the karman yajñaḥ, "sacrifice." Gorresio (1870, p. 119) correctly translates: "Si vedeva colà disposto un gran sacrificio di splendore quasi fiammante." Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 490), who, as we have noted earlier (Goldman and Goldman 2009, p. 115), sometimes seems to be influenced by Gorresio, gives a translation that appears to be drawn from that source word for word, despite the fact that his text has the kartari construction with dadarśa and the karman yajña in the accusative [yajñam]. He renders: "Un sacrifice . . . d'une splendeur quasi flamboyante." Roussel's reading, in turn, seems to have been followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 460) and Benoît (1999, p. 1284). It is not, however, clear to us why Dutt (1894, p. 1654) and Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 456) translate in this fashion, as the apparatus shows no possible variation in any of the texts or manuscripts on which their translations are based that can support this interpretation. Cr, the only commentator to remark on the syntax, unambiguously states, "Rāvaṇa, blazing, as it were, with splendor, saw a yajña, that is, a sacrificial hall (yajñaṃ yāgaśālāṃ śriyā prajvalann iva rāvaṇo dadarśa)."

4. "bearing the waterpot, tuft, and staff of an ascetic" kamaṇḍaluśikhādhvajam: Literally, "who possessed a waterpot, tuft, and flagstaff." Ck, Cg, Ct, and Cr agree that the term dhvaja, generally "flag or flagstaff," must refer here to the daṇḍa, "staff," that is normally carried by a Hindu renunciant. Cs reads the compound differently. He understands the term śikhā, which normally refers to the unshaven lock or tuft of hair worn by some ascetics, in its meaning of spike or branch, for which he then gives as a synonym the word śiphā, which has a similar range of meanings to śikhā. It is this that, he says, stands for the traditional staff, or daṇḍa, of the ascetic. Cs then takes dhvaja, which the other commentators take to refer to the daṇḍa, in a generic sense of sign or symbol. In other words, for him Meghanāda is carrying only the waterpot and staff as markers of his ascetic status. He bases these definitions on the Viśvakośa. (kamaṇḍaluḥ śikhā śiphā daṇḍa iti yāvat. kamaṇḍaluśikhe dhvaje cihne yasya sa tam. śikhā śiphāyāṃ dhvajaṃ cihna iti viśvaḥ.) Cs's motive in constructing this reading is his desire to turn the dvandva into a proper bahuvrīhi compound. Ck, Cg, and Ct note that the mention of these paraphernalia suggests that Meghanāda is observing a vow of continence but that we should not understand by this that he is in the celibate student stage of life because of the fact that it will soon be stated (in verse 8) that he is performing the agniṣṭoma, aśvamedha, etc., listed in verses 8 and 9 below. As is well known, only a married householder is authorized to perform such vedic rites. (anena brahmacaryaṃ sūcitam. na tu brahmacaryāśramaḥ. agniṣṭomayājitvasyānupadam eva vakṣyamāṇatvāt—so Ct; Ck and Cg similarly.)

"Meghanāda, tamer of his foes" meghanādam ariṃdamam: The birth of Meghanāda is described at 7.12.28. Ñ2,B1,3,4,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read bhayavaham, "terrifying," for ariṃdamam, "tamer of his foes."

5. "Approaching, the lord of the rākṣasas: rakṣaḥpatiḥ samāsādya: Ñ2,B1,3,6,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead taṃ samāsādya laṅkeśaḥ, "Approaching him, the lord of Laṅkā."

"embraced him with his arms" samāśliṣya ca bāhubhiḥ: Literally, "and having embraced with arms." One should perhaps note here the use of the plural for arms, which suggests that Rāvaṇa is in his multiheaded, multiarmed form. See notes to 7.9.25. Ñ2,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead pariṣvajyātha bāhubhiḥ, "then having embraced with arms."

"that is taking place . . . Tell me that." vartate tad bravīhi me: Ñ2,B1,3,6,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead vartase brūhi tattvataḥ, "[what] are you doing, tell me truthfully."

6. "But on that occasion" tu . . . tatra: Literally, "but there." We follow Cr, who understands, "at that time (tasmin samaye)."

"their guru . . . for the success of the sacrifice" gurur yajñasamṛddhaye: Literally, "the guru for the increase or prosperity of the sacrifice." Ck, Ct, and Cs generally agree that Uśanas is answering for Meghanāda, lest the latter, in breaking his sacrificer's vow of silence, ruin the ritual. (putrasya yajamānatvena maunitvāt so 'vadad iti bhāvaḥ. yajñasaṃpatsamṛddhaye yajamānasya maunātyāgena tat samṛddhir bhavati—so Ct; Ck and Cs similarly.) Cr acknowledges that the fact that Uśanas speaks suggests that Meghanāda is observing a vow of silence, but he believes that the guru has come specifically for the purpose of ensuring the success of the rite. (yajñasaṃpatsamṛddhaya āgata iti śeṣaḥ. uśanā śukro 'bravīd etena putrasya maunavratitvaṃ dhvanitam.) As Cg notes, Uśanas is another name of Śukrācārya, the great guru of the demons. Cg further observes that Uśanas speaks because he is the facilitator of the sacrifice (uśanā guruḥ śukrācāryaḥ. pravartakatvāt svayam abravīd iti bhāvaḥ). Uśanas Kāvya or Śukrācārya (Śukra) is a Bhārgava sage who is widely known throughout the literature as the purohita of the asuras. He is not normally associated with the rākṣasas, and this is the only reference to him in the epic as playing the role of priest or purohita for Rāvaṇa's household, although he is mentioned several times in the epic as the planet Venus (2.58.54; 2.93.40; 6.4.42; 7.15.12; etc.), in similes (4.53.4 [and notes]; 6.45.12) and in peripheral narratives (see, for example, 7.51-6*–7.51-7*; 7.24.32; Uttarakāṇḍa sārgas 70–72). D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead yajñasaṃpatsamṛddhaye, "for the success and the prosperity of the sacrifice."

7. "everything" sarvam eva ca: Literally, "and, everything, indeed." The word ca, "and," is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. D6,7,10,11,T3,4,G2, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read tat, "that," for ca, "and," lending the phrase the sense "all that indeed."

"Your son has completed seven extremely elaborate sacrifices." yajñās te sapta putreṇa prāptāḥ subahuvistarāḥ: Literally, "these seven sacrifices with very many details or elements have been acquired by the son." D7,10,11,G1, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read prāptās te bahuvistarāḥ for prāptāḥ subahuvistarāḥ, thus introducing a second instance of the plural pronoun te in the half verse. Ct, who shares this reading, takes the first of them to mean "well-known or celebrated" (te prasiddhās te sapta yajñāḥ). Ck appears to be concerned with this issue as well but is not as explicit, glossing, yajñās ta iti prasiddhā ity arthaḥ. The reference is to the well-known sacrifices listed in the following verses 8–9.

8. The verse consists only of a list of names and terms. We have added the words "These were."

"the agniṣṭoma" agniṣṭomaḥ: This is the name of a soma sacrifice, typically performed in the spring as part of the jyotiṣṭoma sacrifice. Unlike the aśvamedha sacrifice, the agniṣṭoma is rarely mentioned in the Rāmāyaṇa, occurring only at 6.23.24 and 7.89.6 in addition to here. See, too, notes to 6.38.3. For more details on this sacrifice, see Renou 1954, p. 4, and Kane 1974, vol. 2, pt. 2, pp. 1134–1203.

"the aśvamedha" aśvamedhaḥ: A celebrated sacrifice known from the vedic period in which a horse is sacrificed. It is generally used to ensure fertility and expand the sovereignty of the sacrificing king over territories. See 6.107.4–6; 6.116.81–82; and notes; and note to 6.38.3. However, one of its most important uses in the epic and purāṇic literature is to serve as a general expiatory rite to free a sacrificer from a variety of transgressions that he may have committed. See Introduction, "Structure," pp. 119–30, and Uttarakāṇḍa sargas 75–77 (Indra's aśvamedha); 81 (Ila's aśvamedha); and 82–88 (Rāma's aśvamedha). Daśaratha performs an aśvamedha in the Bālakāṇḍa at sargas 12–13, and Rāma performs his aśvamedha in the Uttarakāṇḍa at sarga 83. See, too, 1.8.2; 1.11–13; and notes. For further details on this sacrifice, see Kane 1974, vol. 2, pt. 2, pp. 1228–39, Jamison 1996, and S. Goldman 2004.

"the sacrifice called bahusuvarṇaka" yajño bahusuvarṇakaḥ: Literally, "the bahusuvarṇaka ('having much gold') sacrifice." See the comments of Benoît (1999, p. 1722) on this sacrifice.

"the rājasūya sacrifice" rājasūyaḥ: This is a popular sacrifice performed by kings as part of the ritual of consecration. Bharata dissuades Rāma from performing this rite at Uttarakāṇḍa sarga 74. The rājasūya sacrifice is examined in detail by Heesterman 1957 and Kane 1974, vol. 2, pt. 2, pp. 1213–23. See 2.94.4; 4.5.5–6; 7.74.4,5,6,18; and notes. The rules of the rājasūya are outlined at ŚatBr 5.3.1.2; 5.3.3.5; 5.3.5.7 [5.2.7.5]. See van Buitenen 1972. For an elaborate description of the rājasūya of Yudhiṣṭhira, see MBh Sabhāparvan 23–25.

"the gomedha" gomedhaḥ: Literally, "the cow sacrifice." The exact nature of this sacrifice is unknown, although Kane (1974, vol. 2, pt. 2, pp. 776–77) does mention that in certain instances the sacrifice of a cow was permitted. References that mention it are rare. It is found once in the Mahābhārata (12.159.48), as well as in a few of the purāṇas (for example, AgniP 2.119.4; BrahmP 110.21; ViṣṇuP 2.15.4). See, too, the comments of Benoît (1999, p. 1722) on this sacrifice.

"the vaiṣṇava" vaiṣṇavaḥ: According to Mahābhārata 3.241, Duryodhana undertakes such a sacrifice. There it is said that prior to Duryodhana's performance of this sacrifice, it had been previously undertaken by no one other than Viṣṇu himself. According to the Mahābhārata passage, the sacrifice was one undertaken by Viṣṇu and rivals the Rājasūya (MBh 3.241.32–33). See, too, 7.30.39,41, and notes.

9. "the māheśvara sacrifice" māheśvare: This is clearly an offering to Śiva, but its form and nature are not known. The commentators are silent. See, however, the comments of Benoît (1999, p. 1722) on this sacrifice.

"from Paśupati" paśupateḥ: The name Paśupati, "lord of beasts," is a standard epithet of Rudra/Śiva, and this identification is only strengthened by the name of the sacrifice that appears to have gratified him, the māheśvara. Thus Ct glosses rudrāt, "from Rudra." Only Ck, reverting to his Brahmaite tendencies, identifies the deity as "four-faced Rudra (caturmukharudraḥ)." The quality of having four faces is stereotypically associated with Brahmā, and Ck has argued before that epithets normally associated with Śiva actually apply to Brahmā. See notes to 6.62.28; 7.33.8; and 7.36.30, where Ck uses the same term, caturmukharudraḥ. Cf. notes to 6.59.82 and 6.107.1.

10. The verse consists only of a list of names and terms. We have added the words "These were."

"a heavenly . . . chariot that moved at its owner's will and could travel through the sky" kāmagaṃ syanandaṃ divyam antarikṣacaram: Literally, "a wish-going chariot, divine, moving in the atmosphere." This is the famous aerial chariot from which Indrajit wreaks such havoc on Rāma and his forces in the Yuddhakāṇḍa. Cs is the only commentator to discuss the two adjectives kāmaga, "going at will," and antarikṣacara, "moving in the atmosphere." According to him, the wish or desire expressed in the first term is the desire to see how far the vehicle could travel on land. He then takes the term divya, "heavenly or celestial," to refer to its capacity to travel through the air. (kāmagaṃ bhūmau kiyatparyantaṃ gantavyam itīcchā. tadanusarigamanam. antarikṣacaraṃ ceti divyam.) On the term kāmaga, see 293*, note 1, following notes to 7.15.30; 7.16.4; 7.23.24; 7.73.18; and notes. See, too, 6.72.12 and notes; and 3071*, note 1, following notes 6.96.29.

"virtually indestructible" dhruvam: Literally, "fixed or enduring." Since the chariot will, in fact, be destroyed by the vānaras at 6.77.36, we have qualified its indestructibility. The word is awkward, and the commentators are silent. Translators offer such suggestions as "solide" (Roussel 1903, vol. 3, p. 490); "stable" (Shastri 1959, vol. 3, p. 460); "lasting" (Gita Press 1969, vol. 3, p. 1990); "immune from destruction or damage" (Raghunathan 1982, vol. 3, p. 456); and "d'une solidité à toute épreuve" (Benoît 1999, p. 1284). Dutt (1894, p. 1655) takes the term to be a noun that refers to a boon of Meghanāda's to be eternal. Dutt thus renders the verse as: "He has also obtained illusory powers—which create darkness or ignorance—namely of ranging in the sky, of being eternal, of ascending a celestial car which curses [sic] at will and of creating darkness."

"the power of illusion called the tāmasī, which creates darkness" māyāṃ ca tāmasīṃ nāma yayā saṃpadyate tamaḥ: This, of course, is the magical power by which Indrajit was able to fight invisibly and thus evade any retaliation from his enemies in the Yuddhakāṇḍa. See Yuddhakāṇḍa sargas 60 and 67. Cr understands, "the power of illusion by which darkness, that is to say, ignorance, is produced on the part of one's enemies (yayā tamo ripūṇām ajñānaṃ saṃpadyate tāṃ māyām)."

11. "a warrior's movements" prayuddhasya gatiḥ: Normally, the noun prayuddhaḥ has the sense of a battle, but here the context requires that we take it in its quasi-participial sense of "one who is fighting or has fought," i.e., a warrior. D10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead prayuktayā, "employed." In this reading the adjective modifies māyayā, "through the power of illusion," lending the verse the sense "through this power of illusion when employed in battle, [one's] movements cannot be discerned." On the term prayuddha, see notes to 7.23.6, 7.27.20, and 7.28.34.

12. And . . . he also received": We follow Cr in supplying the phrase "he obtained (labdhavān iti śeṣaḥ)," as the verse contains no verbal element.

"dear boy" saumya: Literally, "gentle one." D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead rājan, "your majesty."

13. "this son of yours, is expecting you, as am I" *tvatpratīkṣaḥ sthito aham: Literally, "[he] stands expecting you, I." D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read tvāṃ didṛkṣan, "wishing to see you," for tvatpratīkṣaḥ, "expecting you." KK and VSP read the adjectival form of the sannanta, didṛkṣuḥ, "desirous to see [you]," for tvatpratīkṣaḥ. The editors of the critical edition have emended the text and marked the word aham, printed without sandhi, as an emendation. It is not clear on what basis they have made this decision. Ś,D2,8,9,12, and Lahore read sthito 'bhavat, "he was standing." Ñ,1,V3, D6,10,11,T3,4,G1,M2,6,8, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read sthito hy aham, "[he] stood, I indeed." Ñ2,D1,3,4, and Gorresio read vibho, "O lord," for aham, "I," while V1,D1,3–7,T1,2,G2,3,M1,3–5,7,9,10 read hy ayam, "for he." In other words, no manuscript collated for the critical edition reads simply aham. Probably a better choice would have been to select hy aham or hy ayam, both of which are found in a broad spectrum of manuscripts, and to mark their choice as uncertain.

14. "This was not well done, since our enemies . . . have been worshiped with material gifts" na śobhanam idaṃ kṛtam / pūjitāḥ śatravo yasmād dravyaiḥ: Literally, "This is not well done, since the enemies are worshiped with material things." The phrase na śobhanam idaṃ kṛtam could also mean "this is not an auspicious action." Ck and Ct explain the nature of Meghanāda's lapse. They believe Rāvaṇa is suggesting that the gods, Brahmā, etc., may be gratified with austerities alone but not with [vedic] sacrifices that include the gratification of Indra, etc. (tapasaiva brahmādayo devās toṣaṇīyāḥ. na tv indrādiprīṇanopetayāgeneti bhāvaḥ—so Ct; Ck similarly.) The idea is that Rāvaṇa is chastising his son for performing vedic sacrifices that involve the offerings of material goods, e.g., food, soma, etc., to the gods, their enemies. This form of gratification is distinguished from the mode of pleasing the supreme divinities, Brahmā, Śiva, Viṣṇu, or the Goddess, purely with acts of self-mortification.

15. "come . . . come" ehi . . . āgaccha: Cs understands that the repetition of the synonymous imperatives suggests Rāvaṇa's stern insistence with regard to both his disapproval of Meghanāda's presence in the Nikumbhilā grove and strong approval of his returning home. As an alternative explanation, Cs proposes that the imperative ehi was part Meghanāda's invocation of Indra to come and partake of his sacrifice, and this is the past action that was grudgingly excused by his father. Finally, Cs, employing his cleverness as a grammarian, proposes that we break up ehi into the normally pragṛhya interjection ā, most likely here an expression of anger, and take the root √ī, which can have the sense "depart," to mean "abandon." Citing the Dhātupāṭha, he understands the root √ī in the sense of vi + √ī, which has, among the meanings listed, the sense of asana, "throwing out or rejecting" (vīgatiprajanakāntyasanakhādaneṣu = Dhātupāṭha 2.43). He then argues that the root √ī here regularly coalesces with the normally pragṛhya interjection ā and takes the sense of "throwing or casting away," i.e., abandonment. (nikumbhilāvasthānāsaṃmatiḥ susaṃmatiś ca bhavanagamana iti cobhayatra dārḍhyasūcanārtham ehy āgacchety uktiḥ. he indra ehītyādikaṃ yatkṛtaṃ tatsukṛtam iti vā. ā ihi tyaja. vīgatiprajanety atra praśliṣṭasya īdhātor asanam artho nirasanaṃ ca tyāga iti vā.)

"for it is impossible to undo what has already been done" kṛtaṃ yad dhi tad akartuṃ na śakyate: Literally, "for that which is done, that cannot be undone." T1,M3, and KK and VSP read viddhi, "you must know," for yad dhi, "for . . . which." D7,10,11,T3,M6 (first time),10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read sukṛtaṃ tan na saṃśayaḥ for tad akartuṃ na śakyate, "that cannot be undone," lending the line the sense of either "Come now, for there is no doubt that whatever is done is well done" (—so GPP, NSP, and Gita Press) or "Come now, you must know that what was done was well done" (—so KK and VSP). The idea in this reading is that Rāvaṇa is uttering a proverb, the sense of which is much like that of the English "What's done is done." By no means is he commending Meghanāda's actions. Cr notes that Rāvaṇa scolds Meghanāda in order to prevent him from the danger of [further] arousing his [Rāvaṇa's] displeasure (svāsaṃtoṣajanyatadbhītinivāraṇāyāha). Ck and Ct understand that in speaking of the impossibility of undoing an act, Rāvaṇa is really warning his son not to repeat this action in the future (akartum aśakyatvād ataḥ paraṃ mā kurv iti bhāvaḥ—so Ct; Ck similarly). Cs explains that it is impossible to say "No!" with regard to a past action (atītakārye neti vaktum aśakyatvāt).

16–17. "when . . . had returned" gatvā: Literally, "having gone." As Cr suggests, we are to supply the phrase "to his own palace" (svabhavanam iti śeṣaḥ).

"made . . . descend from the Puṣpaka" avatārayāmāsa: Literally, "he made [them] descend."

"overwhelmed with tears" bāṣpaviklavāḥ: D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead bāṣpagadgadāḥ, "choked with tears."

"the foremost women" ratnabhūtāḥ: Literally, "[women] who were gems." We follow Ck, Ct, and Cs in taking the term ratna, "jewel," in its common sense of "foremost or most excellent thing" (uttamavastubhūtāḥ—so Ck and Ct).

"endowed with every auspicious mark" lakṣiṇyaḥ: Literally, "possessing marks." Ct and Cr understand, "endowed with excellent marks (sulakṣaṇayuktāḥ)." Cs understands similarly.

"They were adorned with all kinds of ornaments, and they shone with their own blazing splendor." nānābhūṣaṇasampannā jvalantyaḥ svena tejasā: Literally, "endowed with various ornaments, blazing with [their] own splendor." D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, and VSP omit this line. KK reads it in brackets, numbered as 7.25.17cd, substituting nāryaḥ, "the women," for nānā-, "various."

18. "Now, when righteous Vibhīṣaṇa saw those women, who were overwhelmed with grief" vibhīṣaṇas tu tā nārīr dṛṣṭvā śokasamākulāḥ: D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, and VSP omit this line. KK reads it in brackets, numbered as 7.25.18ab, substituting -parāyaṇāḥ, "given over to," for -samākulāḥ, "overwhelmed by."

"realized his brother's intentions toward them" tasya tāṃ ca matiṃ jñātvā: Literally, "having known that intention of his." D7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read tāsu, "toward them," for tāṃ ca, "and that [intention]." Cr glosses, "realizing the thought, that is, the evil intention, of him, that is, of Rāvaṇa, toward them, that is, the women (tasya rāvaṇasya tāsu strīṣu matiṃ duṣṭābhiprāyaṃ jñātvā)."

19. "In assaulting living beings" dharṣaṇaṃ prāṇināṃ dattvā: Literally, "having given assault to living beings." D7,10,11,M10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead dharṣaṇaṃ prāṇināṃ [jñātināṃ—KK, VSP] jñātvā, literally, "having realized the assault of living things (of kinsman—KK, VSP)." These readings are difficult to construe. Ct tries to smooth over the problem by providing a logical object for the gerund in the form of the phrase "realizing the fact that these [evil behaviors] are productive of sin (teṣāṃ pāpajanakatvaṃ jñātvāpi)." But this is only a partial solution. Translators who share these readings struggle to force the grammar.

"to your reputation, your interests, and your clan" yaśorthakula-: Literally, "to fame, wealth, and family."

"you are behaving willfully" svamatena viceṣṭase: Literally, "you act by your own intention." Ck, Cg, and Ct gloss svecchayā, "by your own whim or wish." Ck and Ct understand that Rāvaṇa's willfulness transgresses the boundaries of righteousness and polity (ullaṅghitadharmanyāyamaryādayā). Cg similarly understands that Rāvaṇa's willfulness transgresses the restrictions set down in the śāstras (ullaṅghitaśāstramaryādayety arthaḥ).

20. "In fact" vai: D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tān, which then construes with jñātīn, "kinsmen," yielding "those kinsmen."

"while you were carrying off" tvayānītā: Literally, "[those women] were brought by you." We have added the word "while" to better link the two halves of the verse in the causal relation proposed by several of the commentators. Thus, Cr believes that Vibhīṣaṇa is informing Rāvaṇa that this is a demonstration that unrighteous behavior bears its fruits immediately. Vibhīṣaṇa then says, "Because you assaulted their kinsmen, who were possessed of noble birth and carried off those splendid women, for that very reason, your sister named Kumbhīnasī has been abducted by Madhu." (adharmaṇaḥ phalaṃ jhaṭiti bhavatīti bodhayann āha. jñātīn iti. jñātīn praśastajātimato yato dharṣayitvā varāṅganā ānītā ata eva kumbhīnasī tadabhidhā bhaginī madhunā hṛtā.) Ck, Cg, and Ct present a similar idea. There is a reference to this episode in the Yuddhakāṇḍa (see 6.7.7 and notes).

"Madhu has transgressed against you" tvām atikramya madhunā: Literally, "by Madhu, having overstepped you." Cs glosses, "the daitya Madhu, having disregarded you. (ma- dhunā daityena. tvām atikramyāvigaṇayya.)" Ck and Ct similarly understand Madhu to be an asura (see notes to verse 22 below). They do this despite the fact that Madhu is clearly identified as a rākṣasa at verse 26 below. Perhaps they are thinking of the passage at 7.53.3–15, where this figure is identified as an asura. Compare notes to 7.4.14.

"Kumbhīnasī" kumbhīnasī: On the identification of Kumbhīnasī, see notes to verses 23–25 below.

21. "I don't understand. What is this?" nāvagacchāmi kiṃ tv idam: Ck and Ct interpret the line somewhat differently. They understand Rāvaṇa to be saying, "I do not know about this event. How did it happen? (nāvagacchāmi nemaṃ vṛttāntaṃ jānāmi. kiṃ tv idaṃ kathaṃ saṃpannam.)" A number of the translators understand similarly.

"And who is this" ko vāyaṃ yaḥ: Literally, "And who [is] this who . . . ?" D6,7,10, 11,T3,4,M4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the more or less synonymous ko 'yaṃ yas tu.
